Damages traceable to the wrongful act, but not its legal or natural consequence, are too remote and contingent to be the basis of a recovery. Applying this rule to the facts of the present case, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages alleged to have resulted from an illness caused by a rain which suddenly descended upon him.

Error from City Court of Elberton; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by W. T. Cartledge against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiff bought a ticket from Cannon, in Franklin county, to Hardcash, in Elbert county, a flag station on the line of the defendant's railway. The conductor carried him beyond his station. Upon observing that the train was not slowing down at the flag station, the plaintiff immediately went to the conductor and called his attention to the fact that he was being carried beyond his station. Thereupon the conductor proposed to carry him on to Dewy Rose, a station about two miles further on, or to stop at the place where the train then was and permit him to disembark. He accepted the latter proposition and got off the train about a mile beyond Hardcash. The night was dark and cloudy. He was on his way to see his grandmother, who was seriously ill. She lived about two miles from Hardcash and about a mile and a quarter from the place where he got off the train. Plaintiff walked back to Hardcash, a distance of about a mile, and then walked from Hardcash to his grandmother's home, arriving there late at night. While on his way from Hardcash to his grandmother's, a sudden rain came up, and he walked along for some time in the rain without seeking shelter at any of the nearby residences. As a result of the wetting which he thus received, he claimed that he was made sick, suffered pain, and lost several weeks from his business.

At the trial the defendant admitted liability for nominal damages. The plaintiff insisted that there were aggravating circumstances connected with the tort, growing out of the conduct of the conductor at the time the train was stopped and the plaintiff disembarked therefrom. He testified: "The conductor ordered me to get off. He said that I would have to get off, or he would take me on. When I told him that I did not have any business at Dewy Rose, he told me to get off. He spoke to me in a rather loud tone of voice. You know the train was making a lot of noise, and we had to talk loud. When I approached the conductor on the train, he talked pretty glum and tolerably loud. He talked pretty harsh to me, and said, if I wasn't going to get off, he would carry me to Dewy Rose, or he would put me off right there." The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $200, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

Thos. J. Brown, and A. G. & Julian McCurry, for plaintiff in error. Worley & Nall, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. [1-3] The defendant, having carried the plaintiff beyond the point of his destination, was liable to him in damages. But as the evidence showed a mere negligent omission, unaccompanied by any aggravating circumstances, punitive damages were not recoverable. The conduct of the conductor as set forth in the statement of facts was not such as to authorize the jury to find this character of damages against the defendant. Ga. R. Co. v. Benton, 117 Ga. 785, 45 S. E. 70. In the case just cited, the plaintiff testified that the conductor spoke to him roughly, telling him that he would have to get off or pay more money immediately. The trial judge instructed the jury that they might find punitive damages, and the Supreme Court set aside a verdict of $150, on account of this error in the charge, and because the court charged the law now in Civil Code 1910, § 4504. See, also, Sappington v. A. & W. P. R. Co., 127 Ga. 178, 56 S. E. 311. The case differs from those where a passenger is unlawfully expelled from a train under circumstances of more or less aggravation. In such cases punitive damages are recoverable. Savannah El. Co. v. Badenhop, 6 Ga. App. 371, 65 S. E. 50. The case was one for nominal damages only.

[8] It is true the plaintiff claimed that he had been made sick on account of having been caught in the rain while on his way from Hardcash to his grandmother's; but any such damages sustained by him were not the legal and natural consequence of the act of the defendant in carrying him beyond his station. Indeed, it appears from the evidence that he unnecessarily walked back to Hardcash and from thence to his grandmother's home, when he could have gotten there by a much shorter route. The company was under the duty of putting the plaintiff off at Hardcash. It had assumed no obligation to take him to his grandmother's residence, two miles in the country, and any injury which he sustained, resulting from the fact that he voluntarily walked from Hardcash to his grandmother's home, would be entirely too remote to be the basis of a recovery. See Civil Code 1910, § 4510; Sappington v. A. & W. P. R. Co., supra; Central of Ga. R. Co. v. Dorsey, 116 Ga. 719, 42 S. E. 1024. The case differs from that of Georgia Ry. & El. Co. v. McAllister, 128 Ga. 447, 54 S. E. 957, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1177, for in that case the plaintiff was put off in a rainstorm, and therefore any injury which she received was the direct consequence of the illegal act.

[4] It was clearly error for the trial judge to charge the jury the provisions of section 4504 of the Civil Code of 1910, and especially that portion of the section which provides that "the worldly circumstances of the parties, the amount of bad faith in the transaction, and all the attendant facts should be weighed." It has been expressly held by the Supreme Court that the provisions of this section of the Code have no application in a case like the present. Ga. R. Co. v. Benton, supra.

[5] The case was tried upon an erroneous theory. The only question which should have been submitted to the jury was as to what amount they should find for the plaintiff as nominal damages for the defendant's negligent act in failing to stop its train at the station. The defendant admitted the technical breach of duty and its consequent liability for nominal damages. There was, therefore, no issue in the case as to the defendant's negligence. For this reason the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 2780, relating to the presumption of negligence against the carrier where a person is injured by the running of cars, trains, or other machinery, were wholly inapplicable. Ga. Ry. & El. Co. v. McAllister, 128 Ga. 447, 54 S. E. 957, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1177. Indeed, it is difficult to see how the provisions of this section of the Code could be applicable in any case where the sole claim of negligence is that the plaintiff was carried beyond his station. Under some circumstances, a verdict of $200 might be considered as for a nominal amount; but it cannot be said in this case, as matter of law, that the jury intended to find only a nominal verdict. The case having been submitted to them on the theory that they might find punitive damages, and might find damages on account of illness which the plaintiff claimed to have suffered, it is very probably true that the jury intended the verdict of $200 to be compensation for these damages which the plaintiff claimed to have sustained. At any rate this court cannot say that this is not true, and the case must be sent back for another trial, in the light of the views expressed in this opinion.

Judgment reversed.

RUSSELL, J. (specially concurring). I concur in the decision in this case solely for the reason it is probable that the jury were influenced by the instructions of the court to which reference has been made by Judge POTTLE. We are all agreed that the plaintiff's right to recover nominal damages is undoubted. If the jury had seen proper to return $200 as merely nominal damages, I should be in favor of affirming the judgment refusing a new trial.

While I do not personally assent to the doctrine of some of the rulings cited by my Brother POTTLE, I am judicially bound by them. In my opinion it should be left to the jury in this case to say whether there were any such circumstances of aggravation in the manner of the conductor as would have entitled the plaintiff to have recovered punitive damages, under the ruling in Savannah Electric Co. v. Badenhop, 6 Ga. App. 371, 65 S. E. 50, and cases therein cited. However, I am compelled to concur in the judgment of reversal, because the case was submitted to the jury on the theory that they might find punitive damages, as well as damages on account of illness, which are clearly too remote for recovery. As it cannot be said with certainty that these errors did not contribute to the amount of the verdict, the error must be presumed to have been injurious to the defendant in the court below, and another trial should have been granted.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by T. R. Matthews, for use, against J. D. Dickson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Geo. Westmoreland and Mark Bolding, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Hammond & Smith, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. Dickson employed Matthews to do photographic work of a specified nature. The written contract between them provided, amongst other things, that Dickson would "pay the actual invoice cost of all material used in making the negatives." Matthews bought from the Glenn Photo Company certain material to be used in the work described in his contract with Dickson, and instructed the photo company to charge the account to Dickson, exhibiting to the company's salesman the contract above referred to. The photo company sued Dickson on the account, and the case went to the superior court on appeal from the justice court. On the trial of the appeal, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, the court intimated that a nonsuit would be granted, whereupon the plaintiff, over the defendant's objection, was allowed to amend by substituting the name of Matthews, suing for the use of the plaintiff. The case then proceeded, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and exception has been taken to this ruling.

The points made here are that the amendment introduced a new party plaintiff and a new cause of action, and that, even if the amendment was properly allowed, the verdict was not authorized by the evidence. Since, under Civil Code 1910, § 5689, a plaintiff may amend by substituting another person in his stead, suing for his use, "whensoever it becomes necessary for the purpose of enforcing the rights of such plaintiff," a general objection to the allowance of such an amendment would not be well taken. The amendment is allowable, and, when made, it will be determined, upon a consideration of the evidence, whether the case can proceed as amended and a recovery be had in favor of the plaintiff. This is true, even where the amendment is offered after the introduction of evidence under which the amendment appears to be improper, because new evidence may be thereafter admitted making the amendment proper. The real question is, with the amendment allowed and the evidence all in, has such a case been made as would authorize a recovery by the nominal or substituted plaintiff, for the benefit of the usee, the original plaintiff? So dealing with the present case, we are clear that the verdict against the defendant cannot stand.

Under the admitted facts there was no contractual relation between the defendant and the real plaintiff, the Glenn Photo Company. Dickson did not buy the goods from that company, nor promise to pay it for them, nor did he authorize Matthews to do so for him. It is true he contracted with Matthews to pay for material such as that delivered by the company to Matthews; but this was a contract with Matthews, upon which he alone could sue. The company could not sue Dickson for a breach of his contract with Matthews, and cannot use Matthews' name to accomplish by indirection what it could not do directly. From the plaintiff's standpoint the case is this: Matthews owes the plaintiff; Dickson owes Matthews. Ordinarily an action upon a contract, either express or implied, must be brought in the name of the party in whom the legal interest is vested. Civil Code 1910, § 5516. The exception is where the legal or nominal interest is in one person and the real interest in another. In such case the latter can proceed by using the name of the former as nominal plaintiff. The case here presented is not such a case. The Glenn Photo Company has neither the legal nor the equitable right to use a claim of Matthews against Dickson as the basis for recovery against Dickson of a claim of the company against Matthews. What we hold does not offend the just rule that, where one appropriates the property of another, the law implies a promise to pay for it. Nor is any question of agency involved. There was no evidence that Dickson authorized the purchase of the material on his account. The case rests on the contract between Matthews and Dickson, and, as such, cannot stand.

Judgment reversed.

KEATLEY et al. v. SUMMERS COUNTY COURT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. May 2, 1911. On Rehearing, Feb. 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COUNTIES (§ 108*)—GOVERNMENT—POWERS OF COUNTY COURT.

The county court is the sole judge of how much land is necessary for courthouse purposes; and, if it has acquired more than is requisite or desirable for that purpose, it may dispose of the surplus.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 170-173; Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

2. COUNTIES (§ 110*)—GOVERNMENT—POWERS OF COUNTY COURT.

The county court has the discretion to dispose of such surplus ground to the United States government, for the purpose of a government building, at a less price than could be realized by a sale thereof to individuals for private use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

3. COUNTIES (§ 108*)—PROPERTY—RESTRICTION ON POWER OF ALIENATION.

A deed conveying land to a county court for courthouse purposes, which provides that the judicial proceedings for the county shall be held upon the premises, but which does not expressly provide that the title shall revert in case the land should cease to be so used, does not amount to a restriction upon the right of alienation by the county court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

Brannon and Robinson, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Summers County.

Bill by A. J. Keatley and others against the County Court of Summers County and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. F. Dunlap, for appellants. T. N. Read, for appellees.

WILLIAMS, P. The county court of Summers county was about to sell and convey to the United States government a portion of its courthouse square in the city of Hinton for the purpose of erecting thereon a government building, and plaintiffs, who sue on behalf of themselves and all other taxpayers of Summers county, seek to enjoin it from so doing. Application for injunction was made to the judge of the circuit court of Summers county, and he denied it; later an injunction was awarded by one of the judges of this court. Thereafter the injunction was dissolved and plaintiffs' bill dismissed by the circuit court of Summers county in term, on the 18th of October, 1909, and from that decree plaintiffs have obtained this appeal. The sole question presented is, Has the county court power to dispose of a portion of the public square on which the courthouse of the county is located?

On the 24th of November, 1874, the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, in order to secure the location of the courthouse for Summers county in the town of Hinton, which had then but recently been laid out as a town, conveyed a certain square of ground to the county court, in consideration that, within a reasonable time thereafter, a courthouse should be erected thereon, and the judiciary proceedings of Summers county should be held upon said premises. Shortly after the conveyance was made, it was ascertained that there was a mistake in the description of the land, and that the title to the land really intended to be conveyed had been conveyed to the Central Land Company of West Virginia, and an exchange was made between the county court and the said Central Land Company, whereby the county court obtained title to the square of ground which the county court and the railroad company both thought had been conveyed to it by its deed.

[3] The deed from the Central Land Company of West Virginia to the county court, which was made on the 19th of October, 1876, for the square of ground which the county court now owns, refers to the aforesaid deed made by the railroad company, and makes the covenants and conditions therein contained a part of this deed, the same as if they had been expressly set out in the deed itself. There is no express provision in this deed for a reversion of title in case the land should cease to be used for courthouse purposes; and hence the terms of the deed do not amount to a restriction upon the power of alienation. Section 16 of chapter 39, Code 1906, expressly provides that words in a devise or conveyance of land to the county court, expressing the purpose for which it shall be used, shall not limit or impair the power of the county court to dispose of the same absolutely.

The courthouse lot is a square of 300 feet; it is bounded on all four sides by streets, and is inclosed with an iron fence; it is situate near the business portion of the city of Hinton, and is embellished with shade trees and walks, and a fountain near the center of it. The portion which the county court proposes to convey to the United States government is 120x130 feet off the northeast corner of the square.

[4] It must be admitted that the county court is a municipal corporation created solely for governmental purposes, and is invested with only such power and authority as is conferred upon it by statute. But authority may be conferred as well by intentment as by express language. If a statute expressly confers power to do a certain thing, and omits to mention authority to do other things which are necessary to the proper and complete exercise of the power expressly given, such additional power as may be necessary and reasonable for the accomplishment of the purpose expressed is clearly to be implied. This is a familiar rule of construction. And does not section 14 of chapter 39, Code 1906, which invests the county courts with certain power and authority in relation to courthouses and jails, clerks' offices, etc., in their respective counties, by implication and by reasonable intentment, confer upon county courts the power and right to dispose of such portions of the ground which they may have acquired for courthouse purposes as may not be necessary for the public use? County courts are expressly authorized to provide, at the county seats of their respective counties, a suitable courthouse and jail; they are also authorized to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, so much land as may be requisite or desirable for county purposes. The statute does not prescribe the quantity which a county court may so acquire; what tribunal, then, is to be the judge of how much is "requisite or desirable"? The county court, of course. Its discretion in this matter is without limitation, and its judgment thereon is not subject to review. In the very nature of things, and for the certain and convenient administration of the municipal government of the county, it was necessary for the Legislature to vest such discretionary power as relates to the selection of a location and quantity of ground requisite for courthouse purposes in some one person or tribunal; and the Legislature has seen fit to vest it in the county court.

The statute reads, in part, as follows: "The said court may, from time to time, as may seem to them proper, provide, at the expense of the county, new or other building or buildings, at the county seat of their county, to be used for the courthouse and jail or for either, together with convenient offices, as aforesaid, for the clerks of the circuit and county courts; and for that purpose may acquire, by purchase or otherwise, and hold any lands, or land and buildings, at the county seat of their county, which may be necessary, and may inclose, improve and embellish the same; when such new or other building or buildings shall be ready for occupancy, the said county court shall make an order declaring that on a day to be therein named, the said new or other building or buildings, shall become the courthouse or the courthouse and jail of their county, and shall cause copies of the order to be posted at the front door of the new as well as of the old courthouse, at least twenty days before the day named in the order; and on and after the day named in said order the said new or other building or buildings shall be and become respectively the courthouse and jail, or the courthouse or jail, of said county in all respects and for all purposes. After such change shall have been made the said county court may sell or otherwise dispose of, as may seem to them proper, the building, or buildings, previously used as a courthouse and jail, or either, and the land on which the same are, or either, is situated, and of the interest of the said county therein."

It is insisted that, inasmuch as the statute above quoted expressly authorizes the county court to sell or otherwise dispose of the old courthouse grounds after it has provided a new courthouse, it cannot dispose of any part of the grounds once acquired for courthouse purposes, unless and except in case of a relocation of the courthouse, and the acquisition of new grounds for that purpose; that, having once acquired ground for a courthouse, the county court is thereafter bound to retain the whole of it for all time to come, notwithstanding it may later determine that it is neither necessary, requisite, nor desirable to do so. This, in our opinion, is entirely too narrow and too restricted a view to take of the purpose of the statute. Such an interpretation would constitute the county court a veritable court of Persia, having no power or authority to correct its mistakes of judgment, and no power given to any higher tribunal to review its action. Such a construction of the law is not reasonable. The county court is not limited to any definite quantity of land which it may acquire for courthouse purposes, and it therefore necessarily follows that it must be the judge of how much is requisite or desirable. The amount requisite or desirable at one time, and under certain conditions, might not be requisite or desirable at another time and under different conditions. The county court is the sole judge of that question; it acts ministerially in providing a courthouse and grounds for its county, and is vested with legislative discretion in the matter. The authority to acquire so much land as is requisite or desirable for a certain purpose clearly implies the power to dispose of the surplus, if more than is requisite has been acquired. We do not mean to intimate that the county court is authorized, or would be justified under the statute, to enter into land speculations with the public moneys. It could not buy more land than, in its judgment, is requisite or desirable for the public purpose, simply with a view of making a profit by a resale of a portion thereof; but circumstances may easily arise where it is necessary for a county court to acquire more land than it needs for courthouse purposes, in order to secure a good location; and in such event we clearly think it would have the right to do so, and then to dispose of such portion as is not desirable for the public use.

In the present case the land was granted to the county court by the railroad company shortly after the formation of Summers county, and when the city of Hinton was in its infancy; the purpose of the grant was to secure the location of the courthouse at that place; and the quantity of land conveyed is more than two acres. Must we say that the county court cannot dispose of any part of this large square, but is compelled to hold on to every foot of it, even though it may not think it requisite for public purposes, and thereby obstruct and prevent the growth of the community? We do not say so. We think county courts are given a larger discretion than this by the statute. If the county court should acquire more land than is requisite for courthouse purposes, and is compelled to hold on to it, there is no law to compel it to expend the public money, in order to embellish and beautify it. Consequently it might happen in some cases—we do not intimate that it would so happen in this case—that the county court would suffer the ground to grow up in briars and brambles, and thereby to become a very undesirable public asset; and such a condition could be remedied only by act of the Legislature.

The power of county courts depends upon the construction of our own statute; consequently the decisions by the courts of other states in cases involving the powers of county courts in general furnish us with little light on the question with which we are dealing. Some of the cases cited in brief of counsel relate to the leasing of public property by county courts to private individuals. Such cases are not in point; they involve the misuse of public property. The want of power to let public property to private uses does not imply a want of power to dispose of so much of the public property as may not be requisite for the public use, especially when the tribunal which claims the right to make the absolute disposition is invested with the right and power to acquire, and is also the sole judge of the amount that is requisite for the public use. Allegheny Co. v. Parrish, 93 Va. 615, 25 S. E. 882, to which we are cited in brief of appellants, was decided under a Virginia statute very different from ours, and therefore that decision does not aid us in ascertaining the powers of county courts in this state under our present statute.

[2] It is insisted that the county court is proposing to sell this lot to the government at a very much less price than its real value; that the county court refused a bona fide offer of $12,000, made by private individuals, for the same lot. But it is not shown for what purpose the property would be used by the private individuals, if sold to them; and we think the county court has the discretion to limit the use which is to be made of the ground which it proposes to sell. It does not appear that, if they were limited in the use of the property, they would give even as much as the United States government proposes to give. They might want it for a livery stable, a canning establishment, a manufactory, or some other purpose equally as injurious, or detrimental to the enjoyment, by the public, of the remaining portion of the square. The government wants the lot for the purpose of erecting a government building thereon, and the use made of such buildings is well known. It may very properly be assumed that the government will erect a building on the lot that will be an ornament to it; and the county court may have been influenced by these considerations to sell it to the government at $5,000, rather than sell to private individuals at a much larger price. The county court clearly has the discretion to do so.

We find no error in the decree appealed from, and it will be affirmed.

On Rehearing.

After a careful reconsideration of this case, and an examination of the authorities to which we have been cited, we see no reason for changing our former decision. Allegheny County v. Parrish, 93 Va. 615, 25 S. E. 882, is not in point. That case was controlled by a very different statute from the one which we are now considering. The Virginia statute authorized the county court to acquire as much as two acres for courthouse purposes, and gave express direction as to how that portion of the ground not occupied by courthouse, clerk's office, and jail should be used. This, of course, affected as much as two acres with a public use, and negatived the authority of the county court to dispose of any part of it. In that case the county court of Allegheny county had less than two acres and attempted to dispose of a part of it. If it had had more than two acres, and had attempted to dispose of the excess above two acres, the case would have been more analogous to the present one. But, in view of the Virginia statute, the case is not in point. Our statute vests discretion in the county court to determine the quantity of land "requisite or desirable," and such discretion necessarily implies power to add to what land it may already have, or to dispose of the surplus, if it has too much. Suppose, for instance, the county court should accept a conveyance for more land than it should think requisite or desirable for courthouse purposes, say ten acres; is it compelled to retain it all for the public use? Is it forever bound, by accepting the deed, to hold it all for the public use, even though it may not think it requisite or desirable? Certainly not. Such a view is wholly inconsistent with the power, the discretion, expressly given, which is a continuous one. Whenever the county court may determine that it holds more land than is requisite or desirable, such determination, at once, relieves the surplus of the public trust, and it may be disposed of. The county court is, as it were, a trustee, with power to determine how much land shall be requisite or desirable for the trust purposes.

We find very little authority directly in point, because the powers of county courts depend upon statutes which are different in nearly every state of the Union. Under a statute of Illinois, which vests no greater power in the board of supervisors of the county than is given to county courts by the statute of our own state, the Supreme Court of that state, in Board of Supervisors, etc., v. Patterson, 56 Ill. 111, held: "The proper constituted authorities of a county have the power, under the statute, to sell and convey real estate owned by the county, although such real estate may have been purchased for the purpose of erecting thereon a courthouse and other county buildings." See, also, Lyman v. Gedney, 114 Ill. 383, 29 N. E. 282, 55 Am. Rep. 871; 11 Cyc. 462; Reynold's Heirs v. Commissioners, etc., 5 Ohio, 204.

We admit the proposition, so ably discussed by counsel for appellants, that the county court has only such powers as are expressly conferred upon it by the Legislature, and such as are necessarily implied in the full and proper exercise of those powers expressly given. But the point is, as we see it, that the power of the county court to dispose of whatever land it may determine is not requisite or desirable for the public use, is clearly and necessarily implied from the express grant of power to determine without restriction or limitation, not once for all, but as changing conditions may make it necessary, how much is requisite or desirable. Of course, the court would have no right to retain the ground and let it for private uses. Such would be a misuse of it, and a violation of the trust, for to retain the property would be, in effect, to say that it is requisite or desirable for public purposes, and it would continue to be affected with a public use, a public trust, and it could not be held for one purpose, and the use, at the same time, diverted to another.

Nearly all the cases cited by counsel, and by Judges BRANNON and ROBINSON in their dissenting opinion, involve the misuse of property, not the discretion of the county court to determine how much is requisite or desirable for the public use, and are, therefore, not in point. Herold v. Board of Education, 65 W. Va. 765, 65 S. E. 102, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 588, on which they rely, more especially, as controlling this case, we admit is more nearly in point than any other case to which our attention has been called. But, in our view, that case does not touch the point which we have herein decided. That case involved the misuse of public property. The board of education, still holding onto a schoolhouse lot for school purposes, had leased it for oil development, a clear case of misuse of public property.

The decree will be affirmed.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting). Judge ROBINSON and I dissent. We hold that a county cannot, without special legislation, sell land acquired for the site of a courthouse and occupied therefor. A county is a local organization, created by the state for limited purposes of government. The opinion by Judge Woods, in Bank v. Lewis County, 28 W. Va. at page 286, states the law thus: "The distinction between municipal corporations proper, such as cities and towns created by special charters or by general laws, and involuntary quasi corporations, such as counties, is this: The former are called into existence by the consent of the persons composing them for the formation of their own local, private advantage and convenience; while counties are at most local organizations, which for the purpose of civil administration are invested with a few functions of a corporate existence, created almost exclusively with a view to the policy of the state at large in the administration of justice, the support of the poor, and the establishment and repair of public highways. The public statutes confer on them all the powers they possess, prescribe all the duties they own, and enforce all the liabilities to which they are subject. As corporate bodies of limited powers, they rank very low down in the grade of corporate existence, and hence they are often called 'quasi corporations.' 1 Dill. Mun. Corporations, §§ 18, 25. In the construction of the powers granted to them, the courts adopt a strict, rather than a liberal, construction; the rule being that, where any ambiguity or doubt exists, arising out of the terms used by the Legislature, it must be resolved in favor of the public."

The county is not a trading corporation. Such property is held by the county in trust for the public use, and is not invested in the county for bargain and sale. Such is the principle held in Foley v. County Court, 54 W. Va. 16, 46 S. E. 246. All the authorities say this. I insist that the case of Herald v. Board of Education, 65 W. Va. 765, 65 S. E. 102, is decisive of this case in principle. I appeal to the authorities there given as sustaining the position of Judge ROBINSON and myself. It holds that a board of education is a quasi public corporation, existing only by statute, having only the powers given by statute, and such implied powers as are absolutely necessary to execute express powers, and cannot engage in business, or make contracts outside of its function touching education. We held that it could not lease a schoolhouse lot for production of oil and gas. Speaking of property held by a county for public use, the Supreme Court of the United States said, in Meriwether v. Jarrett, on page 513 of 102 U. S. (26 L. Ed. 197): "It holds them for public use, and to no other use can they be appropriated without special legislation." In County of Alleghany v. Parrish, 93 Va. 615, 25 S. E. 882, it was held: "County courts had no authority, either under the Code of 1819 (1 Rev. Code, c. 71, § 16), or the Code of 1849, c. 50, § 1, to authorize or permit the use of lands acquired for a courthouse, jail, and other public buildings for any other purpose than those mentioned in the Codes. The power of acquisition was for a special purpose, and the use was confined to the purpose for which authority to acquire was given, and subject to the restrictions imposed; and it is immaterial whether the land was acquired by gift, or purchase, if held under the general law. The use to which the court was required to put the land exhausted the purposes for which it could be used. It had no authority to authorize the erection of a law office on the land upon payment of a ground rent." We find that 11 Cyc. 465, conceding the power of counties to sell property owned by it for private use, says: "This power, however, is subject to the limitation that a county cannot alienate or dispose of, for its own benefit, property dedicated to or held by it in trust for the public use."

This subject is reviewed in Parrish v. Gaddis, 34 La. Ann. 923, holding as follows: "Property donated to a parish in fee simple, for its use and benefit, and upon which a courthouse was built and used, cannot be legally sold under a police jury ordinance, although the parish seat being changed the building was abandoned and threatened going to ruin. Such sale having been made without legislative authority is a nullity, and so conveyed no title. Real property thus dedicated to public use becomes extra commercium, and none but the sovereign can ever place it once more susceptible of private ownership." The court said it could never lose its public character without the action of the sovereign power. "A grant or dedication of land to use of the town removes it from commerce and individual appropriation." Lewis v. San Antonio, 7 Tex. 290. Roberts v. City, 92 Ky. 95, 17 S. W. 216, 13 L. R. A. 844, held that the city of Louisville could not alienate wharf land. "Jus disponendi is not incident to the ownership of property as a public trust." Roper v. McWhorter, 77 Va. 214. Municipal Corporations cannot sell public property. Dillon, Munic. Corp. §§ 575, 650. "A county is not a municipal corporation, proper, but only a quasi corporation, and as such has no power to sell land not applied to a public use." Jefferson v. Grafton, 74 Miss. 435, 21 South. 247, 38 L. R. A. 798, 60 Am. St. Rep. 516. The Mississippi court in that case denied the power even as to property not used for public purposes. In a note to that case are authorities showing that a county cannot sell property used for public purposes. These authorities, and many others, say that such property is held in public trust, and from that very fact cannot be sold, even not considering the limited power of a county, because it is for public purposes, which would be defeated by sale. But why quote more authority for this position? See the host of cases cited for the proposition supporting the text of Tiedeman, Munic. Corp. § 208.

But there is another consideration. It arises out of the nature of a county. It has not general powers. In 60 Am. St. Rep. 520, we find the law generally thus laid down: "Counties are municipal corporations created for the purpose of convenient local government, and possess only such powers as are conferred upon them by law. They must be called quasi municipal corporations, and their corporate powers are more limited than those of incorporated cities and towns. Stevens v. St. Mary's Training School, 144 Ill. 336 [32 N. E. 962, 18 L. R. A. 832], 38 Am. St. Rep. 438, and note. See monographic note to Leake v. Lacey, 51 Am. St. Rep. 119." Judge Woods said, in Bank v. County, 28 W. Va. 286: "As corporate bodies of limited power, they rank very low in the grade of corporate existence." He there distinguished them from municipal corporations. They have not the powers of municipal corporations, and we have seen that municipal corporations cannot sell the public property. "A county acts wholly under a delegated authority, and can exercise no power which is not in express terms or by fair implication conferred upon it." Thompson v. Lee County, 3 Wall. 327, 330, 18 L. Ed. 177. "The county court is a corporation created by statute, and can only do such things as are authorized by law, and in the mode prescribed." Goshorn v. County Court, 42 W. Va. 735, 26 S. E. 452. I have said that a county court is not a business, trading corporation. Its powers are derived from the Constitution and statute. It is not a trader in the real estate market. There is no power given it in the statute to sell the public property; it cannot be implied, first, because it is against public policy to sell the public property; and, second, because a county is only a kind of a corporation, of low degree as to power. In Supervisors v. Gorrell, 20 Grat. (Va.) 484, it was seriously questioned whether a county court could sell a courthouse lot, though no longer needed upon removal of the courthouse. It was so serious a question that the Legislature of our state provided a statute, now found in chapter 39, section 14, Code 1906, authorizing the county to sell the courthouse land upon a change of location of the courthouse. This impliedly forbids sale under any other circumstance. "The lands belonging to a county can be sold and conveyed only in the manner pointed out by statute." 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 937. "Proceedings of Public Bodies. Counties. There is no principle more firmly established or resting on sounder reasons than the rule which requires public bodies, when acting under special powers, to act strictly within the conditions prescribed." Douglas County v. Kellar, 43 Neb. 635, 62 N. W. 60.

I would not give county courts this important power by mere implication. To do so would militate against public policy. There is a sentiment that should not be lost sight of, in addition to the practical. The courthouse land was acquired to be held for generation after generation. Because so much ground may not be needed just now, those who come after will surely need it. Lots are sold from it. High houses and noisy manufactories are built up against or close to the courthouse, shutting off light and air and producing noise. In the Virginias, as elsewhere, the court green is historic and sacred. Upon it generations gone have met from all parts of the county in social and friendly intercourse. A great place for the communion of the people. Upon its green grass, under the shade of its trees, our people have thus met time out of mind, and rested during the sessions of the courts. Suitors, jurors, witnesses, instead of being tied down to benches in the hot, crowded courtroom, repair there to await the crier's call. There, too, the children play. It is a park for the poor, who have not the rich man's lawn. And where shall be held, in the hot summer, those great meetings of the people in the political canvass to hear the orators? How valuable within the experience of all of us is the courthouse ground for this important purpose. Away goes the old court green. Commerce is taking even it away.

Later, I find McIlhinny v. Trenton, 148 Mich. 380, 111 N. W. 1083, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 623, 118 Am. St. Rep. 583, 12 Ann. Cas. 23, and Peters v. City of St. Louis, 226 Mo. 62, 125 S. W. 1134, 21 Ann. Cas. 1069, and notes, which will support this opinion.

SHEPHERD v. CRAIG.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EQUITY (§ 22*)—SUIT AGAINST EXECUTOR—EQUITABLE JURISDICTION.

The bill by a general creditor against the administrator of a decedent's estate, alleging as the only grounds for equitable relief that decedent died leaving considerable personal estate, more than sufficient to pay plaintiff's debt, that the defendant, the sole heir, has appropriated all the estate of decedent to his own use; that he has sold and conveyed a part of the real estate of which the decedent died seized and possessed, and which prays simply, that provision be made for payment of plaintiff's debt out of said estate, for a reference to a commissioner, for a convention of creditors, and for general relief, is bad on demurrer, as showing no sufficient grounds for equity jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 51-62; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nicholas County.

Bill by Nellie Shepherd against John H. Craig. Decree for complainant, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

G. G. Duff and W. G. Brown, for appellant. Alderson & Breckenridge, for appellee.

MILLER, J. On appeal from a final decree adjudicating the principles of the cause, Craig, administrator and appellant, first, challenges the correctness of the decree below overruling his demurrer to the bill.

The demurrer was a general one; but in the brief of counsel two points are made here: (1) Want of equity, and; (2) want of parties.

Plaintiff alleges that she is a creditor of the estate of George Craig, deceased, defendant's intestate, to the amount of two hundred and fifty dollars; that defendant, his administrator, who was duly appointed and qualified by giving bond, &c., is also decedent's sole heir. She further alleges that she is not otherwise advised as to the indebtedness of said estate.

The only other grounds for equitable relief alleged are, first, that decedent died leaving considerable personal estate, and more than sufficient to pay plaintiff's said debt, but that defendant has appropriated to his own use all the estate of which decedent died seized or possessed and refuses to pay plaintiff; second, that said decedent, being also seized and possessed of three parcels of real estate or undivided interests therein, defendant since his death had conveyed two of said parcels to certain persons named, but not made parties to the bill.

And the prayer of the bill is that provision be made for payment to plaintiff of her said debts out of the estate of decedent; for a reference to a commissioner to settle the accounts of the administrator; for a convention of creditors, and for general relief.

Is the bill good on demurrer? We think it is not, and that the demurrer should have been sustained. Plaintiff was simply a general creditor, her debt not reduced to judgment, either against decedent in his life time, or against his administrator after his death. There is no allegation that there are other debts; or that defendant, administrator and sole heir, is insolvent; or that he has failed to make and return an inventory of the personal estate; or to settle his fiduciary accounts, or that he has neglected to perform any other duty devolved upon him by law; nor that by appropriating said estate to his own use he has misappropriated the same, except that he has refused to pay plaintiff's claim. If plaintiff has no valid debt it is not only his right but his duty to refuse to pay it. There is no allegation of concealment of assets, or the necessity for discovery, nor any prayer for such relief.

What are the rights of a creditor of a decedent's estate, and when and upon what grounds he may go into a court of equity, and what allegations are necessary to give a court of equity jurisdiction in such cases, have been the subject of numerous prior decisions of this court, and it is wholly unnecessary to reconsider the points adjudicated or to review those cases. We refer more particularly to Poling v. Huffman, 39 W. Va. 320, 19 S. E. 421, Hale v. White, 47 W. Va. 700, 35 S. E. 884, McConaughy & Co. v. Bennett's Ex'r, 50 W. Va. 172, 180, 40 S. E. 540, Price v. Laing, 67 W. Va. 373, 68 S. E. 24, and Gooch v. Gooch, 73 S. E. 56.

The principle controlling this case was distinctly decided in Price v. Laing, point 1 of the syllabus, viz.: "A general creditor of a deceased person cannot maintain a bill in equity against the personal representative, to charge, in his hands, the personal estate only, without showing some ground of equity jurisdiction, such as inadequacy of the legal remedies, inability to obtain satisfaction of his debt by pursuit thereof to judgment and execution, or necessity for discovery." In Hale v. White, supra, the third point of the syllabus is: "Where the bill shows that the estate is solvent and the assets superabundant, the mere pretext of the want of discovery will not give equitable jurisdiction against a personal representative who is not shown to have neglected any of the statutory requirements relating to his duties as such representative to the injury of the plaintiff." Tested by these decisions the bill is clearly bad, to say nothing of the defect of want of parties already alluded to.

Our opinion, therefore, is to reverse the decree appealed from, sustain the demurrer to the bill, and to remand the cause to the circuit court, with leave to plaintiff to amend her bill if she can do so in accordance with the principles of the cases cited, in a reasonable time, and if so advised; otherwise to dismiss the bill without prejudice, and it will be so ordered.

HANGER et al. v. CHESAPEAKE & O. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 23, 1912.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 415*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO ANIMALS ON TRACK—CARE REQUIRED.

It is negligence per se for a railroad company, in the night time, to run an engine backwards over its main track without a proper headlight on the tender sufficient to enable the enginemen, in the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care, to see ahead a reasonable distance, so as to avoid doing injury to dumb animals astray upon the track.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1476-1482; Dec. Dig. § 415.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 70*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where a railroad company in so operating an engine, in the night time, runs over and kills a horse astray upon its track, and the evidence is such that the jury may reasonably infer that had there been a proper headlight on the tender in front of the moving train the enginemen, in the exercise of due and reasonable care, would probably have discovered the horse on the track in time to avoid injuring him, the question of negligence is one of mixed law and fact for the jury, and the court should not for want of sufficient evidence to support it set aside a verdict in favor of the owner of the horse, and award defendant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 142, 143; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Action by K. E. Hanger and others, partners under the firm name of Hanger Bros., against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed and rendered.

Osenton & Horan, for plaintiffs in error.
Simms, Enslow, Fitzpatrick & Baker, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. Plaintiffs seek reversal of the judgment below, on appeal from the judgment of a justice, setting aside the verdict of the jury in their favor, for one hundred and seventy five dollars, and awarding defendant a new trial.

The action begun before a justice was for damages for alleged negligence of defendant in killing plaintiffs' horse.

One of the questions presented in the court below, on the evidence, and by instructions to the jury proposed by defendant, and in the petition filed in this court, is whether the alleged negligence, if any, in killing the horse was that of the defendant or of the White Oak Railway Company, operating the engine and cars that killed the horse.

The evidence shows that the railway track where the killing occurred, the engine, and at least one of the cars belonged to the defendant company, and that the movement of the train over said track was controlled by the train dispatcher of defendant company at Hinton. There is evidence that after the horse was killed servants of the defendant company took charge of its carcass and buried it, and that when other animals had been killed on the same branch the defendant settled the damages. The point does not seem to be relied on in argument here and we think we may properly regard it as having been abandoned.

[1] The main question presented is, whether it is negligence per se for a railroad company in the night time to run an engine backwards over its main track, as was done in this case, without a proper headlight on the tender sufficient to enable the enginemen, in the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care, to see ahead a reasonable distance and to avoid doing injury to dumb animals astray upon the track? It is conceded that the horse was not killed at a public crossing, and that it was a trespasser on the defendant's right of way, and that defendant owed it no duty except to observe ordinary care to not wantonly and willfully run it down and kill it. That this measure of duty is imposed by law upon a railway company with respect to stock astray upon its private right of way is fully established by prior decisions of this court. Layne v. Ohio River R. Co., 35 W. Va. 439, 14 S. E. 123, and the cases cited and reviewed therein.

This and other cases, with no less exactness, we think, require of a railroad company and its servants operating its trains, that they use like ordinary care in providing the means of discovering such stock on its track. Does this rule require of a railroad company operating trains at night, to equip its engines or cars with reasonably sufficient headlights and other appliances necessary to avoid doing injury to trespassing animals? It would clearly be negligence giving a passenger injured thereby right of action. But will it give right of action to the owner of animals killed by such negligence? By defendant's instruction number 3, given, the court below, in substance, told the jury that the railway company was not negligent in not having a headlight on the engine which ran over and killed plaintiffs' horse, unless the killing took place at a public crossing. As it was not killed at a public crossing the practical effect of the instruction, therefore, was to tell the jury that defendant was not negligent, and not liable. The jury evidently did not regard the instruction, for they found a verdict for plaintiffs notwithstanding the instruction.

In discussing the rule requiring of a railway company ordinary care and precaution to discover animals on its track and right of way, 3 Elliott on Railroads, section 1205, supported by numerous decisions cited, says: "It is held to be the duty of the company to use care to equip its locomotives with such headlights as would render a lookout effective." And in section 1206 this writer says: "The company is bound to use ordinary care to prevent injuries to animals and where ordinary care requires the use of signals the company may be guilty of negligence in omitting them although they are not required by statute." In Layne v. Railroad Co., supra, it is also held that the servants of a railway company are "equally bound to adopt the ordinary precaution to discover danger as to avoid its consequences after it becomes known." Our case of Kirk v. N. & W. R. Co., 41 W. Va. 722, 24 S. E. 639, 32 L. R. A. 416, 56 Am. St. Rep. 899, says: "If the servants of a railroad company in charge of a train, by exercise of ordinary care, can see and save domestic animals which have wandered on the railroad, it is their duty to do so; but this duty must be exercised consistently with the paramount duties they owe to the passengers on the train under their charge." What rule of reason or policy then could excuse a railway company, operating trains at night, from equipping its engines with proper headlights to aid its servants in the performance of their duty? If it is the duty of its servants by the exercise of ordinary care, to see and endeavor to save such animals, astray upon its track, there must certainly be a corresponding duty on the part of a railway company to use ordinary care in providing its trains with sufficient headlights in aid thereof. The proposition seems so fundamental and self evident as not to require further elaboration. It is sustained not only by the authorities already referred to, but by 33 Cyc. 1218, and cases cited in note 57.

As opposed to this rule defendant's counsel cite and rely on Melton v. Railroad Co., 64 W. Va. 168, 61 S. E. 39, point 2 of the syllabus, saying: "Signals or lights or watchmen are not required on a backing train elsewhere than at public crossings to warn trespassers using the track for their own convenience as a foot path." Does this rule, applicable to persons using the track, affirmed in this and in the prior decisions cited, apply also to dumb animals? In Melton v. Railroad Co., the fact is emphasized that it was not claimed that the trainmen saw or could have seen Myers, the deceased, before hitting him with the backing engine. In Huff v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 48 W. Va. 45, 35 S. E. 866, the same rule was applied to a trespasser in the yards of the defendant company. It is there held that unless guilty of wanton or gross negligence a railroad company can not be held liable in damages to persons so trespassing. In the present case the horse was not injured by a backing engine and tender, in the yards of the defendant, but outside, on the main track, and by an engine being operated in that way, in hauling a regular passenger train, and it was a dumb animal, not a live sentient person, of mature years, that was killed. Our decisions hold, with respect to dumb animals, as to helpless, insane or infant persons, that a railroad company owes a duty to the owner to keep a careful lookout ahead to discover them upon the track and to use ordinary care to avoid injuring them. Besides the cases already cited, see cases cited in 11 Cyc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Reports, pp. 586-599.

With respect to persons of mature years, possessed of all their faculties, a railroad company and its trainmen have the right to assume unless circumstances indicate the contrary, that they will hear the approaching train and get out of the way in time to avoid injury. Not so with respect to dumb animals and helpless persons. And as we have already said this duty must also include the corresponding duty to provide and keep in order sufficient headlights.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that a railroad company, in operating its trains in the night time over its main tracks owes a duty to the owner of domestic animals to provide and keep installed and in order sufficient headlights to enable its trainmen, by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care to see them on the track in time to avoid injuring them, and that it is negligence to omit this duty, for which an action will lie, if its omission be the proximate cause of the injury.

[2] If such be the law the remaining question is, did the court err in setting aside the verdict and awarding defendant a new trial? The evidence shows that there was a headlight on the tender of the backing engine, but that it had been broken, was out of repair, and that in place of having it repaired, the trainmen were using an ordinary train lantern hung out on the drawhead of the tender. The evidence is that this lantern did not enable the trainmen to see ahead for more than from twelve to fifteen feet, while with a proper headlight they could have seen about a hundred yards ahead, and that the track was straight for some four or five hundred yards back from where the horse was struck, with nothing intervening except the darkness of the night to obstruct their view, and that the distance from the point where the horse apparently went upon the track to the place where it was killed is about one hundred and seventy-five feet, a bridge or culvert intervening showing evidences of the horse's foot having slipped through the ties on the bridge. The trainmen say they were looking ahead but did not see the horse. At what rate the train was traveling and within what distance it could have been stopped is not clearly shown by the evidence. Defendant's counsel claim in their brief that the train was moving at about the rate of twelve miles an hour. We know from the evidence that the train was moving backwards on a dark night with a light in front that would not enable the trainmen to see more than from twelve to fifteen feet ahead, and we may safely conclude that they were not going at a very great rate of speed.

On this evidence was the court below justified in setting aside the verdict? Defendant's counsel rely on Toudy v. N. & W. R. Co., 38 W. Va. 694, 18 S. E. 896, Maynard v. N. & W. R. Co., 40 W. Va. 332, 21 S. E. 733, Lovejoy v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 41 W. Va. 693, 24 S. E. 599, and Kirk v. N. & W. R. Co., 41 W. Va. 722, 24 S. E. 639, 32 L. R. A. 416, 56 Am. St. Rep. 899, and characterize the killing of the horse in this case as one of inevitable accident, for which under these decisions, defendant can not be held liable. They say that the horse was killed because it was a very dark rainy night, and the vision of the trainmen obscured thereby, and by the fact that the lantern on the tender did not throw the light far enough ahead to enable them to see the horse in time to avoid hitting and killing it. This proposition as we see excludes the idea of negligence in failing to provide a suitable headlight which we hold to be negligence per se. Both engineer and fireman swear they were looking ahead at the time the horse was evidently struck by their train, but did not see him, and to that extent performing their duty to the owner of the horse. Why did they not see him on a straight track of some four or five hundred yards in time to avoid killing him? The jury might justly have inferred that it was because of the absence of a sufficient headlight. The question was one of mixed law and fact peculiarly within the province of the jury, and not one for the court, independently of the jury, to decide. As was said by Judge Snyder in Johnson v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 570, apropos to this discussion: "If the engineer had discovered them (the horses) promptly as he should and would have done had he exercised due care, he could, by blowing his whistle and stopping his train, have, perhaps, prevented any collision and saved the horses. This was at least a probability for the consideration of the jury." So we may say in the case, if the engine had been provided with a sufficient headlight, the trainmen, who claim to have been looking ahead, as it was their duty to do, consistent with their paramount duty to the passengers, would in all probability have seen the horse of the plaintiff in time to have avoided killing him. At all events the probability was one for the consideration of the jury, and which they evidently resolved, as they had the right to do, in favor of the plaintiff.

Our opinion, therefore, is to reverse the judgment below, and enter judgment here in favor of plaintiff for the amount of damages as found by the verdict of the jury, with costs incurred here and in the court below, and it will be so ordered.

DAVIDSON v. DAVIDSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 23, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RECEIVERS (§ 16*)—SUIT FOR APPOINTMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEADING.

A bill for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of real estate and rent it, pending a creditors' suit by the administrator to sell it for the payment of decedent's debts, which fails to allege that the rents and profits, as well as the corpus, of the land are necessary to pay debts, and which fails to allege insolvency of the party in possession, is demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. §§ 24, 28; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 71*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER.

An interlocutory decree appointing a receiver to take charge of and rent real estate is an appealable decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 400; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monroe County.

Bill in equity by W. A. Davidson, administrator, against George T. Davidson and others. From a decree appointing a receiver, C. E. Lynch appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Rowan & Meadows, for appellant C. E. Lynch. Clark & Keadle, for appellees W. A. Davidson and others. R. Kemp Morton, for appellees Julia W. Davidson and others.

WILLIAMS, J. This appeal is taken by C. E. Lynch from an order of the circuit court of Monroe county, made on the 19th of April, 1909, appointing a receiver to take charge of, lease and collect the rents, issues, and profits from the real estate of which C. H. Davidson died seised, pending a suit brought by his administrator against his heirs and creditors to subject the real estate to payment of debts, on the alleged ground that the personalty is not sufficient to pay same. Appellant is one of the creditors of said estate, and, as such, is made a defendant to the bill.

Pending suit, C. E. Lynch purchased a one-fifth undivided interest in both realty and personalty belonging to the estate. At the time of his purchase, he was in possession of a large part of the real estate, under a contract of lease from the administrator, who was also one of the heirs at law. Lynch set up these facts by petition filed in the case. Plaintiff then filed an amended bill, alleging "that there is danger of the loss or misappropriation of the rents and profits from the said lands, or a material part thereof," and prayed for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the lands, with authority to rent same and collect and account for the rents and profits. Some of the other heirs who had answered the bill joined in the motion for a receiver. Lynch demurred to the amended bill and also answered, denying the allegation that there was danger of loss or misappropriation of assets, and averred his ability to account for the rents and profits to those entitled to them. The amended bill was verified by the affidavits of plaintiff and S. S. Steele, and the answer of Lynch was verified by himself and by the affidavits of H. P. Tracy and L. E. Campbell. The motion was heard on no other proof, and a receiver appointed.

[1] Even granting that the administrator, who has brought a creditors' suit, might, under certain circumstances, have a receiver for the real estate appointed to protect the rights of creditors, a question which we do not decide, still the amended bill is bad for want of sufficient averments. It neither avers the insolvency of Lynch, nor that the rents and profits, as well as the corpus, of the real estate, are necessary for the payment of decedent's debts, both of which must appear before the court can, in any event, sequester the rents and profits. But none of the creditors are asking for a receiver; and, if they were, the facts alleged do not show grounds for his appointment. The amended bill shows on its face that Lynch is rightfully in possession. It alleges that he is assignee of one of the heirs, which makes him a joint tenant having equal rights with his cotenants to possession of the land. This is not a suit among cotenants. Their rights are determinable at law. The amended bill falls utterly to show any equitable grounds for the appointment of a receiver. This case is controlled by the principles announced in Sult v. Hochstetter Oil Co., 68 W. Va. 318, 61 S. E. 307, Wilson v. Maddox, 46 W. Va. 641, 33 S. E. 775, and Grantham v. Lucas, 15 W. Va. 425.

[2] Counsel for appellees insist that the order appointing a receiver was not appealable. But it has been too often decided by this court to admit of doubt that a decree or order of a court, changing the possession of property, is appealable under clause 7, § 1, c. 135, Code 1906. A decree appointing a receiver to take charge of real estate is certainly a decree changing the possession of such real estate. Robrecht v. Robrecht, 46 W. Va. 738, 34 S. E. 801; Hutton v. Lockridge, 27 W. Va. 428; Whyel v. Coal & Coke Co., 67 W. Va. 651, 69 S. E. 192.

The decree appealed from, appointing J. D. Beckett receiver, will be reversed, and this court will enter an order sustaining the demurrer to the amended bill and remanding the cause, with leave to plaintiff to make such further amendment as he may be advised is necessary and proper, and for further proceedings to be had therein according to the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

LANG v. LANG et al

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 23, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 289*)—SEPARATE MAINTENANCE—EQUITABLE JURISDICTION.

A court of equity, independently of proceedings for divorce, on the ground of inadequate remedy at law, may decree maintenance to a wife who has been deserted by her husband.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 1078; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

2. VENUE (§ 4*)—SUIT FOR SEPARATE MAINTENANCE.

The venue of a suit for maintenance without divorce is not governed by the divorce statutes, but by the laws relating to place of suit for the vindication of ordinary legal or equitable rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County.

Bill by Susan C. Lang against George W. Lang and others for alimony. Decree for defendants, and complainant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

F. E. Parrack and E. G. Smith, for appellant. John Bassel and Philip P. Steptoe, for appellee Lee J. Lang.

ROBINSON, J. May a court of equity, independently of proceedings for divorce, decree alimony or maintenance to a wife who has been deserted by her husband? The appeal in the case before us concretely presents this question. The bill is brought by a wife whose husband deserted her to live with another woman. The wife seeks alimony or maintenance, but no divorce, from the husband. The court below held that equity would not entertain such case. The bill was dismissed on demurrer.

In Chapman v. Parsons, 66 W. Va. 308, 66 S. E. 461, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1015, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1033, we noticed the question now presented, but reserved answer thereto. Now that it is squarely before us, we must answer the same in the light of reason and authority.

[1] We hold that equity has jurisdiction to decree alimony or maintenance to a wife, independently of our divorce statutes. Out of the great contrariety of opinion on the point, we choose that which seems best to accord with reason and justice. Indeed we adopt the view which is now recognized by the current of authority in the United States, whatever may be said in some of the older encyclopedias and text-books. An extended critical examination of the subject convinces us that the courts of this country have so rapidly accepted the view which we now approve that the weight of authority is in its favor, though only a few years ago the writers generally announced that the weight was the other way.

A most recent work, collecting all the adjudicated cases on the subject and announcing a text therefrom, says: "In the United States it is maintained, by much authority, that in the absence of legislation to the contrary, alimony should not be allowed in an independent suit in courts of equity. The proper remedy, at common law, where the husband deserted his wife and refused to supply her with necessaries according to her rank and condition, was an action at law by the person supplying such necessaries for her. But in many of the states alimony may be decreed independently of any proceeding for separation or divorce where the husband refuses to support his wife, or where she has separated from him, on the ground that in the absence of adequate relief or remedy at law, equity will interfere; and in other states where the rule was formerly that an independent action would not lie, it is now held that such an action will lie although no statute authorizes it. The inherent right of equity to entertain an action for alimony apart from any proceeding for divorce is not taken away by a statute authorizing the granting of alimony in an action for divorce, or by a statute making it a misdemeanor for a person willfully to neglect to provide support for his wife." 3 Enc. L. & P. 65. Then, showing that the trend of legislation has followed the reason and justice of a suit for maintenance without divorce, the same text proceeds: "In nearly all the states where the authority of courts to award alimony independently of divorce was denied at common law, statutes now exist authorizing an independent action for alimony, with limitations in some instances; and in several jurisdictions where the common-law authority of equity courts to award alimony without divorce is recognized, statutes now exist which are declaratory of the common law. In other states, where the common-law authority to award alimony without divorce has not been passed upon, statutes now exist authorizing the awarding of alimony in an independent action."

It is not our purpose in this opinion to treat of the subject in an original manner. Indeed we could not do so more ably than has been done by many courts and eminent text writers. That which we should say in justification of a well grounded jurisdiction in equity for alimony without divorce would only be repetition of what has been written time and again. That equity has such jurisdiction because of the want of an adequate remedy at law, we are satisfied. That the recognition of such jurisdiction has met the approval of most eminent minds, there can be no doubt. That the reasons for such recognition are sound, is made clear by a reading of the authorities. 2 Nelson on Divorce and Separation, §§ 1000-1003; 2 Story, Equity Jurisprudence, § 1423a. Some of the older cases are: Glover v. Glover, 16 Ala. 440; Galland v. Galland, 38 Cal. 265; Butler v. Butler, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 202; Garland v. Garland, 50 Miss. 694; Earle v. Earle, 27 Neb. 277, 43 N. W. 118, 20 Am. St. Rep. 667. The doctrine finds favor in new jurisdictions, by interesting opinions in the following: Bueter v. Bueter, 1 S. D. 94, 45 N. W. 208, 8 L. R. A. 562; Bauer v. Bauer, 2 N. D. 108, 49 N. W. 418; Kimble v. Kimble, 17 Wash. 75, 49 Pac. 216; Edgerton v. Edgerton, 12 Mont. 122, 29 Pac. 966, 16 L. R. A. 94, 33 Am. St. Rep. 557; Dole v. Dole, 14 Hawaii, 554. For collections of the cases generally, see: 3 Enc. L. & P. 66; 2 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 94; 14 Cyc. 744.

"The broad ground upon which these authorities rest is, that it is the duty of the husband to support the wife, and if, without fault upon her part, he refuses to do so, the courts will compel him to render her a reasonable support in accordance with his means, even though the wife does not seek or wish a legal separation dissolving the bonds of matrimony, and that an action for this purpose may be maintained, because of the inadequacy of ordinary legal remedies to enforce this duty. Again, the policy of the courts is to discourage, rather than encourage, divorces. The wife may be entitled to a divorce, but whether or not she will exercise that right is optional with her, and to hold that unless she did she could not maintain an action for support would be both unreasonable and unjust, for, although the conduct of the husband may be such that she could dissolve the marriage contract, he is not relieved from his duty of supporting her because she does not wish to pursue that course, and, besides, a case might arise where the husband withheld support, but not for a sufficient length of time to entitle the wife to a divorce upon that ground, and in the interim she would be without an adequate remedy, unless permitted to maintain an action for separate maintenance." In re Popejoy, 26 Colo. 32, 55 Pac. 1083, 77 Am. St. Rep. 222.

But there is direct Virginia authority on the subject. "In Virginia, not only is alimony granted as incidental to divorce of either kind, with the largest discretion as to the estates of the parties, but it may be granted by the court of chancery, independently of any divorce, or any application for one, as where the misconduct of the husband drives the wife from her home, or he turns her out of doors, or perhaps wherever a divorce from bed and board, or a restoration of conjugal rights would be decreed had they been asked for." 1 Minor's Inst. (4th Ed.) 308. A Virginia chancellor was perhaps the first to promulgate this doctrine. Purcell v. Purcell, 4 Hen. & M. (Va.) 507. Judge Tucker says the decision in that case is sound. Tucker's Com. book 1, ch. 9, page 101. Justice Story cites it and says: "There is so much good sense and reason in this doctrine, that it might be wished it were generally adopted." 2 Equity Jurisprudence, supra. The doctrine was again affirmed in Almond v. Almond, 4 Rand. (Va.) 662, 15 Am. Dec. 781. It is distinctly recognized in the opinion in Latham v. Latham, 30 Grat. (Va.) 307. Judge Johnson seemingly approves it in Stewart v. Stewart, 27 W. Va. 167. We have observed that Mr. Minor, in the last edition of his great commentaries, considered it the law of Virginia. Yet, the argument is made that the Purcell and Almond cases must be distinguished because there were no divorce statutes in Virginia when these cases were instituted. No such reason is given for the opinion in either of the cases. Plainly in them, equity was accorded jurisdiction on the ground that the wife had no adequate remedy at law to secure—not a divorce—but the maintenance due to her from the husband. These decisions are binding authority in this jurisdiction. We have already indicated that we have no disposition to overthrow them.

Our divorce statutes do not contain a word that either expressly or impliedly takes away the right of a wife to sue for maintenance without divorce. Those statutes grant the right to divorce—a thing entirely different from the right to mere maintenance. The latter right belonged to a wife long before the divorce statutes were passed. How the granting of an entirely different right can exclude the exercise of one already vouchsafed we cannot readily conceive. In this connection, the following is pertinent: "But there is no provision of the statute which authorizes an application for alimony, except in connection with a prayer for divorce; and it is claimed on behalf of the defendant, that, inasmuch as provision is made for the allowance of alimony only on an application for divorce, it was the intention of the Legislature to limit the power of the court to grant alimony to that class of cases. The maxim 'expressio unius est exclusio alterius' is invoked as applicable to this proposition. But, in my opinion, it has no application to the case. The main subject-matter of the statute was the regulation of divorce; and only as incidental to that subject the statute prescribes the power of the court in respect to alimony in that class of cases. The Legislature was dealing with the general subject of alimony, as an independent subject-matter of legislation; but, only, as one of the incidents of an application for divorce. It saw fit to define the power of the court over the allowance of alimony on an application for divorce; but was not considering the subject of alimony on any other class of cases." Galland v. Galland, supra. See also an able discussion of the same point in Edgerton v. Edgerton, supra.

[2] The venue of a suit for maintenance without divorce is in no wise controlled by the statute in relation to jurisdiction in divorce suits. The place of suit is governed by the laws applying to ordinary suits for the vindication of legal or equitable rights. The divorce statutes do not relate to an independent suit for maintenance and cannot control it.

Some minor grounds of demurrer to the bill are assigned, but they are plainly untenable. They call for no discussion here. Nor are cross-assignments of error, relating to the validity of the attachment proceedings, well taken. They must be overruled.

Pursuant to the foregoing observations, the order of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the bill will be reversed, the demurrer to the bill will be overruled, and the case will be remanded to be further proceeded in.

HILL v. HORSE CREEK COAL LAND CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 23, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DOWER (§ 49*)—RELEASE—EFFECT OF DEED.

A deed, signed, sealed, and acknowledged by a husband and wife, which, not naming the wife in the body thereof, makes her a grantor by the designation of wife of the other grantor, is the deed of the wife, as well as of the husband, and relinquishes her dower in the land.

2. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 37*)—SUFFICIENCY OF CERTIFICATE—ABBREVIATION.

Abbreviation of the word "wife" thus, "wi," in a certificate of the privy examination of a married woman, respecting her execution of a deed and her acknowledgment thereof, does not invalidate the certificate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Acknowledgment, Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

3. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 31*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—EFFECT OF PURCHASE IN GOOD FAITH.

Fraud in the procurement of a deed is unavailing, in a suit to set it aside, against a bona fide purchaser without notice and for value.

4. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 62*)—EVIDENCE TO IMPEACH.

Denial of the execution of a deed and acknowledgment thereof, unaided otherwise than by the facts that the signature is by mark, and the party could write, and denies having ever signed any papers by mark, is not sufficient to overcome a certificate of acknowledgment, nearly 30 years old, and pronounced genuine by the officer who certified the acknowledgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Acknowledgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 345-347; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Boone County. Bill by Mary A. Hill against the Horse Creek Coal Land Company. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and bill dismissed.

W. L. Ashby, for appellant. H. W. B. Mullins and L. Fulton, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. The decree here complained of sustained a bill for assignment of dower in a tract of land, despite and against the deed of the alleged complainant, on the theory of a fatal defect therein, apparent on its face, and forgery of the signature and certificate of acknowledgment.

The deed purports to, and did, as to the husband of the complainant, convey this land in exchange for three other tracts, which the deceased husband seems to have conveyed away in his lifetime by deeds in which his wife joined, so as to pass her inchoate right of dower, although the testimony leaves some doubt as to this. Assuming these lands not to have been so conveyed, the widow would have had the right to elect whether she would take her dower out of the land here in controversy or the lands obtained in exchange therefor, and could not be endowed of both. Stevenson v. Brasher, 90 Ky. 23, 13 S. W. 242, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 799; Mahoney v. Young, 3 Dana (Ky.) 588, 23 Am. Dec. 114; Hartwell v. De Vault, 159 Ill. 325, 42 N. E. 789; Wilcox v. Randall, 7 Barb. (N. Y.) 633; Towsley v. Smith, 12 U. C. Q. B. 555; Stafford v. Truman, 7 U. C. C. P. 41; White v. Laing, 2 U. C. C. P. 186. This being true, and dower not appearing to have been obtained or sought in the lands taken by way of exchange, this suit would be an election to take it out of these lands. Assuming the lands obtained in exchange for this tract to have been conveyed away, the joinder of the wife in the deeds by which they were disposed of seems not to have been an election to take dower therein. Such was the holding in Mahoney v. Young, cited, and Stevenson v. Brasher, cited, the only cases found bearing upon the question. We deem it unnecessary, however, to assert either of these propositions as matter of decision, since, in our opinion, the deed is good on its face, and the other objections to it unsustained.

[1] Omission of the name of the wife from the body of the deed is the basis of a contention that she was not a party to it, notwithstanding her signature and the certificate of acknowledgment, if both are genuine, since the mere signing, sealing, acknowledgment, and delivery of a deed, in the body of which the party is not mentioned, are insufficient to make him a grantor. Though her name was not inserted in the body of the deed, that instrument recites that it was made by Spencer Hill and —, his wife, and asserts that the said Spencer Hill and —, his wife, did grant the tract of land. The deed thus purports to have been made for and on behalf of two persons—Spencer Hill and his wife—and contains words of grant applicable to both of them. If, therefore, it is not operative as to the wife, it must be merely because her name is not used, despite the fact that it contains words by which she could be identified with absolute certainty as one of the grantors. We think this amply sufficient. In Laughlin Bros. & Co. v. Fream, 14 W. Va. 822, and Adams v. Medsker, 25 W. Va. 127, relied upon by the appellee, the parties signing the deeds, and held not to have been parties thereto, were not referred to in the bodies of the instruments in any manner whatever. They contained no language sufficient to connect them therewith. Hence these decisions do not sustain her contention. The conclusion here stated is in accord with the text of Washburn on Real Prop. (section 2115), reading: "The object of the names being merely to distinguish one person from another, it seems to be sufficient if this is effected, though the true name of the party be not used, or even no name at all. The general principle is, 'Id certum est quod certum reddi potest;' and a man may be described by his office or his relationship to a known person." Agreeably to this principle, a patent from the United States government to the heirs of Isabella Morrison, deceased, without further words of description or the insertion of any names, was held sufficient. Blomberg v. Montgomery, 69 Minn. 149, 72 N. W. 56. So a deed in which the grantors described themselves as "we, the heirs and devisees of Sarah Stearns," was held sufficient in Blaisdell v. Morse, 75 Me. 542.

[2] The certificate of acknowledgment is not informal nor defective in any respect, except in that it abbreviates the word "wife," thus, "wl." The justice certifies that Mary Hill, the "wl" of Spencer Hill, appeared before him in his county and was examined privily and apart from her husband, and, having had the writing fully explained to her, acknowledged the same to be her act, and declared that she had willingly executed the same and did not wish to retract it. We do not regard the abbreviation as anything more than a mere formal defect. Nobody could be misled by it, and it could have been intended for nothing other than the word "wife." Its context proves this. A substantial compliance with the statute is all that is required. Bensimer v. Fell, 35 W. Va. 15, 12 S. E. 1078, 29 Am. St. Rep. 774;

Pickens v. Kniseley, 29 W. Va. 1, 11 S. E. 932, 6 Am. St. Rep. 622.

[3] The deed was made on the 5th day of January, 1877, and was admitted to record on March 21, 1877. In 1883 the grantors therein conveyed to Julian Hill. In 1901 Julian Hill and wife conveyed to J. R. Wingfield, trustee. In June, 1904, Wingfield and others conveyed it to the Horse Creek Coal Land Company, a corporation, the defendant in this suit. The record contains no evidence whatever of any notice to the defendant of any fraud or imposition practiced upon the complainant. Except for fraud or collusion, the certificate of acknowledgment is conclusive upon the grantor, and such fraud, coercion, or collusion could not affect a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice, such as the defendant appears to be. Pickens v. Kniseley, 29 W. Va. 1-10, 11 S. E. 932, 6 Am. St. Rep. 622; Whitehorn v. Hines, 15 Va. 557. A deed fraudulently procured is not absolutely void, but voidable only. Hence it passes the title, and, if this reaches the hand of a person who is not a party to the fraud, and has no notice of it, and is a purchaser for value, the injured party has no remedy against the subsequent purchaser in good faith, without notice, and for value. We think it clear, therefore, that no relief can be had against this deed in the hands of the defendant, unless it is for some reason absolutely void.

[4] Though the bill charges forgery thereof, which would make it absolutely void, if proven (Middleton v. Findla, 25 Cal. 76; Cole v. Long, 44 Ga. 579; McGinn v. Tobey, 62 Mich. 252, 28 N. W. 818, 4 Am. St. Rep. 848; Pry v. Pry, 109 Ill. 466; Dev. on Deeds [3d Ed.] §§ 240, 726), the evidence does not sustain the charge. All we have is the denial of the signature and acknowledgment, accompanied by proof of the ability of the complainant to write, variation of the form of the signature from that generally used by her, and her protest that she had never signed a deed by mark, or had anybody write her signature to one for her. There is no proof of any fabrication of the deed by any person. It is the genuine deed of her husband. At the time of the institution of this suit, it had been in existence for 29 years, and the grantees and those claiming under them had never been disturbed, or their title to the land questioned. The husband had taken and held or disposed of the other lands obtained by way of exchange. The justice who took the acknowledgment testifies that the certificate thereof bears his signature, and is genuine; and that he would not have signed it, if the complainant had not appeared before him and acknowledged it in the manner and form certified. He does not remember the actual presence of the parties on the occasion; but this signifies nothing, in view of the long lapse of time. His failure of memory as to the circumstance indicates very strongly that the complainant herself may be laboring under a failure of recollection. After this long lapse of time, during which she never questioned the genuineness of the deed or certificate, her unsupported statement cannot be allowed to prevail over a solemn judicial record. The burden of proof is upon her. She is now 65 years old. Thirty years had elapsed from the date of the deed when she testified. Under such circumstances, it is fair to say failing and treacherous memory should not prevail over a solemn contemporaneous memorial, sustained by the testimony of a reputable citizen who made it. Some authorities hold that the official certificate of the officer cannot be overthrown by the unsupported evidence of the grantor that he did not make the deed. Sassenberg v. Huseman, 182 Ill. 341, 55 N. E. 346; Oliphant v. Liversidge, 142 Ill. 160, 30 N. E. 834; Swett v. Large, 122 Iowa, 267, 97 N. W. 1104. That a grantor can write is not sufficient to overcome the certificate of the notary as to the execution of a deed by mark. Gritten v. Dickerson, 202 Ill. 372, 66 N. E. 1090. The evidence to impeach a certificate must be clear and convincing, and establish the fact beyond a reasonable doubt. Pickens v. Kniseley, 29 W. Va. 1, 11 S. E. 932, 6 Am. St. Rep. 622; Dev. Deeds (3d Ed.) § 529. We have here no evidence of any facts or circumstances corroborating the denial of the plaintiff, except her ability to write. No motive in any person for the crime of forgery is shown; nor have we any evidence tending in the slightest degree to prove the commission thereof.

These conclusions and principles necessitate reversal of the decree and dismissal of the bill.

WOOLFOLK et al. v. GRAVES.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 25, 1912.)

JURY (§ 14*)—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—ENJOINING TRESPASS.

Where defendants, in a suit to restrain the cutting of timber on land, not only failed to make out a prima facie title to the land on which the trespass occurred, but their assertion of title clearly appears not to have been bona fide, they are not entitled to a trial of the issue by jury.

On rehearing. Former opinion adhered to. For former opinion, see 69 S. E. 1089.

PER CURIAM. A decree was rendered in this cause on the 12th day of January, 1911, which upon a petition to rehear was set aside.

As said in the opinion disposing of the case on the former hearing, "the appellants set up their own title to the land in question in their answer, and made a fruitless effort to support it by evidence. They nowhere denied the trespasses committed and threatened by them, as charged in the bill, nor did they attempt to meet the charge of insolvency, fully sustained by the proof of appellees."

Upon a careful consideration of the case upon the rehearing, the conclusion is irresistible that appellants not only failed to make out a prima facie title to the land upon which the trespasses were committed and threatened, but that their assertion of title is not bona fide; therefore they are not entitled, as has been so earnestly pressed in argument, to a trial of the issue by jury. Moorman & Hurt v. City of Lynchburg, 73 S. E. 987, just decided by this court.

For the reasons given and the authorities cited in this and in the opinion of this court filed at the former hearing of the case, the decree entered at that time is approved and will be adhered to.

Affirmed.

MEREDITH et al. v. TRIPLE ISLAND GUNNING CLUB, Incorporated.†

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912.)

1. GAME (§ 2½*)—RIGHT OF FOWLING—COMMON-LAW PRIVILEGES.

Code 1904, § 2070a, and Acts 1901-02, p. 107, in force in the county of Princess Anne, designed to regulate the killing of game for the benefit of all the citizens of the commonwealth, and Code 1904, § 1338, declaring that all the beds of the bays, rivers, creeks, and the shores of the sea within the jurisdiction of the commonwealth and not specially granted shall continue the property of the commonwealth, and may be used as a common by all the people for the purpose of fishing and fowling, are not arbitrary assumptions of power on the part of the commonwealth, but are declaratory of the common law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Game, Dec. Dig. § 2½.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 103*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—CRIMINAL ACTS.

Equity will not enjoin a violation of Code 1904, §§ 1338, 2070a, or Acts 1901-02, p. 107, in force in the county of Princess Anne, declaring that the beds of bays, creeks, and the shores of the sea not specially granted according to law, may be used as a common by all the people of the commonwealth for the purpose of fowling, etc., and protecting such right by making a violation subject to penalties, since equity will not restrain the commission of public offenses.

3. GAME (§ 2½*)—RIGHTS PROTECTED—FOWLING ON NAVIGABLE WATERS.

A gunning club acquired title to an island situated in a bay and valuable for shooting, and defendants obtained title to an island of about two square rods situated in the middle of a channel between the island belonging to the club and other islands and in a position to intercept flocks of ducks flying over the bay so as to prevent them from coming within range of the club's premises. Held, in the club's action for an injunction, alleging irreparable injury to its hunting rights, but no malicious interference therewith, that, in view of the rights of all citizens to shoot upon navigable waters in the jurisdiction of the commonwealth, equity would not restrain defendants' use of their island; the injury to the club being damnum absque injuria.

4. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 183*)—GRANTS BY STATE—REPEAL AT SUIT OF PRIVATE OWNER.

Under Code 1904, § 2368, which provides that the commonwealth, or any other party desiring to repeal any grant of land because obtained to the prejudice of such party's equitable right, may file a bill in equity for that purpose, no private citizen can maintain a suit to set aside such grant unless he can show that he has some right therein which is prejudiced by the grant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

5. NUISANCE (§ 72*)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—REMEDY OF PRIVATE PERSON.

Where acts constitute a public nuisance, a private person who has only suffered with the general public cannot complain thereof.

the state of Virginia, and in pursuance of the power granted it acquired title to Half Moon Island, situated in the waters of Back Bay, within the county of Princess Anne; that this island is chiefly marsh land and land covered by water, and valuable only for fishing and shooting; that Meredith, Fearing, and Whitehurst, who are afterwards named as defendants, had purchased a parcel of land containing $10/1000$ of an acre, for which a grant from the commonwealth appears to have been issued by the Governor of the commonwealth to George W. Whitehurst; that it consists only of a few stakes driven into the bed of the bay, connected by boards and filled in with earth and other material, thereby making an artificial island, distant between 200 and 300 yards from complainant's property; that the purpose of the defendants in constructing this artificial island is to shoot ducks and other game therefrom, all of which is in violation of the statute laws of the state, and will result in great injury to complainant; that owing to the location of the island, directly in the channel and almost equidistant between complainant's island and certain other islands used for shooting and hunting purposes, known as Dudley's Island and Horse Island, it will be in a position to intercept the fies of ducks and other game as they fly over the waters of the said bay; that these acts constitute a trespass, nuisance, or ouster as the case may be, involving oppressive litigation and a multiplicity of suits on the part of complainant in order to protect its rights; that, if respondents are allowed to continue the construction of the said island, it will result in ruining the value of complainant's property for the only purpose for which it can be used, namely, for hunting and fishing; and that the damages to complainant will be irreparable.

The defendants filed their demurrer and answer, in which they deny that the property owned by them is an artificial island, or that they or their predecessors formed or attempted to form an island at said place, or that it is an obstruction to navigation, or that it is within the legal bounds of complainant's land, or that it is land covered entirely by water, or that the public has a right to pass and repass over the same; but they admit that the waters of Back Bay are navigable and surround the property of complainant. They claim that the property granted to them is a natural island and was not formed by boards and stakes and by filling in with earth or other materials between said boards, as alleged by complainant. Respondents admit that it is their purpose to shoot ducks and other game from their island; but they deny that shooting therefrom is in violation of the laws of this state, and that shooting therefrom will injure complainant or its property. They say that, under the laws of the state of Virginia, the waters of Back Bay are open to all persons for hunting and shooting purposes, except in certain ways, and that the excepted ways in which shooting is forbidden are punishable as a crime, and equity has no jurisdiction to enjoin the commission of such acts. They deny that complainant has any exclusive right of hunting in the waters of Back Bay adjacent to or surrounding the property owned by complainant, but claim that the same is open to all the people of the commonwealth, and, even if respondents did disturb complainant or its members in shooting from its own land over the waters of Back Bay by preventing ducks from coming into said waters at said point, that would not have injured complainant or its members in any rights which they had except as individual citizens of the state. They deny that they have done any act constituting a trespass, nuisance, or ouster of or to the complainant, or were the cause of litigation or a multiplicity of suits, and they deny that any act of theirs will result in ruining the value of complainant's property, either for hunting or fishing purposes.

Upon the issues thus made evidence was taken, and a decree was entered by the circuit court perpetually enjoining the defendants, their agents and employes, from using the property claimed by them, known as "Duck Island," for shooting game or fishing, or for any other purpose whatsoever; and from this decree the defendants obtained an appeal.

Counsel for appellee, in their brief, state: "That no evidence concerning the title to the property was introduced, other than that showing the island's nonexistence. * * * The complainant in the court below confined itself to proving the sole and single fact that Duck Island is an artificial structure, and the respondents to disproving that fact." All questions of title, therefore, are eliminated.

[1, 2] On the part of appellee it is claimed that the parcel of land occupied by the appellants is an artificial blind, erected and maintained in violation of law, and that, while a court of equity has no criminal jurisdiction and cannot interfere to prevent the commission of criminal or illegal acts, yet that the act complained of constitutes a criminal offense does not defeat the jurisdiction of a court of equity, if it also constitutes an invasion of rights of property of a pecuniary nature, but that when there is such interference, and there is no adequate remedy at law, the criminality of the act will not divest the jurisdiction of equity to prevent it, citing 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. p. 363; Attorney General v. Utica, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 371.

In Beveridge v. Lacey, 24 Va. 63, it was said by Judge Cabell: "It is not the province of a court of equity to correct abuses merely public. It interferes on the ground of private injury only."

The principle, however, is well settled, and does not need authorities to support it.

Section 2070a of the Code of Virginia and the private acts governing hunting in the several counties, including the act in force in the county of Princess Anne (Acts 1901-02, p. 107), are designed to regulate and control the killing and capture of game of all sorts for the benefit, not of any individual, but for the good of all of the citizens of the commonwealth; and it is declared, by section 1338, that "all the beds of the bays, rivers, creeks and the shores of the sea within the jurisdiction of this commonwealth, and not conveyed by special grant or compact according to law, shall continue and remain the property of the commonwealth of Virginia, and may be used as a common by all the people of the state for the purpose of fishing and fowling," etc.; and it has been held that the rights declared by this section are not an arbitrary assumption of power on the part of the state, but are declaratory of the common law. Taylor v. Com., 102 Va. 759, 47 S. E. 875, 102 Am. St. Rep. 865.

[3] The right of fowling in these waters being common to all of the citizens of the commonwealth, and those rights being protected by laws which denounce the offenses and prescribe penalties for their violation, it is certain that those facts alone do not confer upon a court of equity jurisdiction to prevent their violation by injunction. The only inquiry, therefore, which it is necessary to make, is to ascertain whether or not the acts of appellants violate any of appellee's rights of property.

The Triple Island Gunning Club was organized and acquired the property which it holds for fishing and hunting thereon, and it alleges that the acts of appellants done and threatened upon the blind or artificial island which they have constructed will result in great injury to complainant, because, owing to the location of the said island directly in the channelway, almost equidistant between complainant's island and other islands used for hunting and shooting purposes, the artificial island of appellants will be in a position to intercept the flies of ducks and other game as they fly over the waters of said bay. The appellee leaves out of view the fact that appellants have rights equal to its own with respect to the waters of Back Bay for the purpose of fishing and fowling; that the Virginian statutes for the protection of game in force with respect to those waters were not intended for its peculiar behoof and benefit but for that of all the citizens of the commonwealth. If, then, appellants in the exercise of their rights of shooting game upon the waters of Back Bay, not with a malicious motive, but in the enjoyment of a privilege common to them with all other citizens, by the firing of guns frighten or intercept the flies of ducks or other game as they fly over the waters of the bay and prevent their coming within range of the premises of the Triple Island Gunning Club, it is damnum absque injuria.

ringill, 11 Mod. 74, 11 East, 574, note, the declaration, in an action on the case, that the defendant was possessed of a certain close, and a decoy therein, and that the defendant knowingly, and with intention to injure him by preventing ducks from coming to the decoy, did, on divers times, maliciously shoot off guns, etc., was held to be good, although it was not stated that the defendant entered the close. Lord Chief Justice Holt said that: "While the ducks are in the pond the plaintiff has a property, and the defendant was a wrongdoer to disturb him; but to intend that he entered, or that he came upon his ground, would be too material to intend, it being trespass. But suppose the defendant had shot in his own ground; if he had had occasion to shoot, it would have been one thing; but to shoot on purpose to damage the plaintiff is another thing, and a wrong." Justices Powys and Gould said: "A man may lawfully shoot in his own ground, as to kill venison, but not to destroy maliciously the property of another."

In the case before us we have neither charge nor proof that the acts complained of were done maliciously. On the contrary, it appears that they were done in an honest belief by appellants that they were doing what they had a right to do as citizens of the commonwealth, and, on the authority of the case just quoted, their conduct was not actionable.

To show that there has been such an invasion of its rights as a court of equity will enjoin, appellee relies upon certain Minnesota cases, among them Lambrey v. Danz, 86 Minn. 317, 90 N. W. 578. There it appeared that the United States surveyed, selected, and by its patent conveyed to the state of Minnesota as swamp and overflowed land the real estate in controversy, without meandering any of the waters thereon; that the plaintiff had acquired the title of the state thereto; and that in fact the land was covered by the waters of a lake, which it was impossible to use for the purpose of travel or commerce, or for pleasure other than hunting. It was held "that such acts of the United States are conclusive as to the character and title of such land, and that the plaintiff is the absolute owner thereof, and that the public have no right to fowl on the waters thereon." It is further said that "the facts found by the trial court justify its conclusion of law to the effect that the defendant be restrained from shooting on or over the plaintiff's land, or any of the waters thereof."

It is hardly necessary to point out the broad line of distinction between that case and the one under judgment. It was there held that the plaintiff was the absolute owner of the land, and that the public had no right to fowl on the waters thereon, while with us just the contrary appears.

In Realty Company v. Johnson, 92 Minn.

363, 100 N. W. 94, 66 L. R. A. 439, 104 Am. St. Rep. 677, the action was brought to enjoin the appellant from shooting wild fowl in their passage over and across a highway on respondent's premises. It was held that: "The owner of the soil has exclusive dominion over it, and the exclusive privilege of hunting, including the unqualified right to control and protect the wild game thereon; that, in granting an easement across his premises for the purposes of a public highway, the owner does not surrender to the public his right to foster and protect wild game on the land, and the public does not acquire any right to pursue and kill the same while it is temporarily passing to and fro across the highway."

In Whittaker v. Stangvick, 100 Minn. 386, 111 N. W. 295, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 921, 117 Am. St. Rep. 703, the plaintiff and appellant sought perpetually to enjoin defendants and respondents from constructing covers or blinds on the surface of a lake in front of a strip of land, to which plaintiff claimed ownership, separating two navigable lakes, and from shooting across or over the strip of land. The court entered judgment for the defendants, and this appeal was taken from the order denying a motion for a new trial. The essential question was whether the decision was justified by the evidence and was consistent with law. The court found the following facts:

"The plaintiff owned the long, narrow strip, and accretions, extending to a creek connecting the waters of the lakes, which formed what is known as a 'duck pass.' Although there was a public highway over the duck pass, by virtue of an agreement with the supervisors of the township the plaintiff had the right of fishing and hunting thereon to the same extent as though the road had not been laid out. The defendants and other persons wrongfully had previously gone on plaintiff's land at the highway and shot ducks and water fowl, and now threaten to continue to do so. The effect of the acts was to practically monopolize the shooting privileges and to largely impair the value of the privileges to the plaintiff and her guests. The defendants had been previously restrained by an order of the district court from going upon the highway for the purpose of hunting, and from hunting or shooting ducks or other water fowl upon the highway. That the defendants have heretofore erected, and intend and threaten to hereafter erect, upon the surface of Upper Ten Mile Lake, directly in front of the said pass, and at a distance of about 325 feet from the shore line thereof, certain covers or blinds, with the purpose and intention of shooting therefrom the wild ducks and other water fowl flying over said pass, and that in hunting said game defendants are liable to shoot over plaintiff's said land. That said lake is of large extent, and it is not necessary, for the mere purpose of hunting or shooting the said wild fowl, that said defendants should locate such cover or blinds at the place above mentioned. That the probable result of such acts on the part of the defendants will be to injuriously affect the facilities for shooting wild fowl afforded by said pass, and as a consequence thereof the value of said shooting privileges will be to a considerable extent impaired.' There was testimony to the effect that a shotgun would carry shot probably 400 feet, maybe more than that. In consequence, when persons in the blind would shoot towards plaintiff's place, the shot could not help but drop around plaintiff's place, on the point, in the woods, or in the timber, or across the point. A certain amount of the shot would go over the pass. From 30 to 50 per cent. of the shot would go over the land and on the pass. It depends on the winds, and which way the ducks fly. In shooting ducks flying from the north, south, some of these ducks in the ordinary course of shooting naturally would fall, when they were killed, on this pass.

"The first question is whether the facts found show a trespass. Defendants urge that the falling of the shot and of ducks on plaintiff's land, not having been shown to become a nuisance to her, certainly could not be sufficient to constitute a trespass on the part of the defendants. The old maxim that the law does not concern itself with trifles might well be invoked here. This contention involves a misapprehension of the law of trespass.

"With respect to damages as an essential, the common law recognizes two kinds of actions. In the first class there is a direct invasion of another's person or property without permission, which is actionable per se, or which gives rise to a presumption of at least some damage, without proof of any actual damage. Unpermitted contact with the person constitutes assault and battery. Unpermitted invasion of premises constitutes a trespass quare clausum fregit. In the second class, actions on the case, in which the damages are indirect and consequential, there can be no recovery unless the plaintiff shows, as an essential part of his case, that damages, pecuniary in kind, proximate in sequence, and substantial in extent, have resulted. In trespass quare clausum fregit, it is immaterial whether the quantum of harm suffered be great, little, or inappreciable. * * *

"The mere fact that damage from falling shot or birds would be insignificant, as has been shown, has no logical bearing at all upon the question. The record, besides, conclusively shows substantial damage to the premises. At common law, trespass on the case would have lain. The inherent danger to landowners from guns in the hands of hunters, often irresponsible and reckless, and sometimes malicious, must be adequately guarded against if the law is to be more than a name. As the hazard from the use or threatened use of dangerous instrumentalities increases, in all branches of the law, the responsibility of the person employing them becomes stricter and may amount to insurance of safety. All remedial resources of law and equity may be exercised to prevent such peril to person or property, or conduct likely also to result in breach of peace.

"The second question is whether or not an injunction will lie under the circumstances. It is elementary that equity will grant that relief to prevent a threatened trespass, especially where there can be no adequate pecuniary compensation, because it would be difficult or impossible to ascertain the damage resulting from such an act, and where otherwise a multiplicity of suits cannot be prevented. * * * There has been a material modification in such cases of the requirements that the injury should be irreparable and the legal remedy inadequate. The tendency of American authorities is to extend the application of the remedy"—and to grant it in many instances, and under many circumstances, where it would formerly have been refused.

In that case the injunction was issued upon the ground that the facts showed that the defendants shot over the plaintiff's land, which constituted a trespass.

[4] Appellee relies also upon section 2368 of the Code, which provides that: "The commonwealth or any other party desiring to repeal, in whole or in part, any grant of land, because it was obtained by fraud or issued contrary to law, or to the prejudice of such party's equitable right, may file a bill in equity for that purpose in the circuit court of the county or the circuit or corporation court of the corporation in which the land, or some part thereof, lies, exhibiting with the bill a certified copy of the patent, and making all the proper parties."

Argument is hardly necessary to show that the case of appellee does not come within the purview of this statute. Nowhere in the record does it appear that the appellee has any equitable right in the grant from the commonwealth of the land in question to George W. Whitehurst on the 15th of February, 1909, and we take it that no private citizen could maintain a suit in equity or otherwise to set aside that grant, unless he could show that he had some right therein which was prejudiced by the grant.

[5] Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that appellee has failed to show any such interference with its rights on the part of appellants as entitles it to the protection of a court of equity; that, if the acts complained of constitute a nuisance, it has only suffered with the general public; and that, if the acts complained of violate the criminal law, those guilty should be proceeded against and punished in the mode which the criminal law prescribes.

It follows that the decree of the circuit court must be reversed, and the bill dismissed, with costs to the appellants.

COX v. ORNDORFF.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 23, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

NEW TRIAL (§ 2*)—ON APPEAL FROM JUSTICE OF PEACE.

On the trial of an appeal in proceedings originating before a justice to try a claim to property levied on, the circuit court does not err in setting aside a verdict which is manifestly contrary to the very right of the controversy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by W. J. Cox against W. R. Orndorff. Verdict for defendant was set aside in the circuit court, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Taylor & Allen and W. B. Maxwell, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Baker and S. T. Spears, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. This case involves a trial of the right to property under levy in attachment proceedings. The issue was decided against the claimant by the justice before whom the petition claiming the property as not liable to the levy was originally filed. By appeal, the claimant transferred the case to the circuit court. There a trial before a jury resulted in a verdict against the claimant. On his motion, the verdict was set aside and a new trial was granted. From the order setting aside the verdict and awarding a new trial, the defendant in the issue—the attaching creditor—has obtained a writ of error. He insists that the verdict is in accord with law and the evidence and that he should have judgment accordingly.

The issue was tried on the theory advanced by the claimant that he had a conditional interest in the property at the time the levy was made. On this theory alone, there is evidence to support the verdict which denies the property to the claimant. But the evidence unquestionably shows that the debtors in the attachment proceedings had no interest in the property at any time. If the claimant had no interest in the property at the time of the levy, as indeed the jury found, it is clear that the property belonged to a third party, named in the evidence. Now, the evidence without contradiction shows that the claimant, very soon after the levy, acquired the title of this third party to the property in question. Even if the claimant had no title when the levy was made, he could rely on the title which he afterwards obtained from the real owner other than the attachment debtors, to secure a release of the property from the levy. It might be necessary for the claimant to amend his petition and proceedings seeking a release of the property from the levy, but such amendment of proceedings begun before a justice will be permitted with great liberality where the same is essential to the establishment of the very right of the case. Since the evidence without contradiction shows that in any event the claimant actually purchased and paid for the property, dealing with the true owner who was in no wise subject to the levy, the verdict was contrary to the right of the controversy, and the court properly set it aside and awarded a new trial. Let the order be affirmed.

BRIAR CREEK RY. CO. v. KANAWHA CENT. RY. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Jan. 23, 1912.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 79, 80*)—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION—WAIVER.

As the constitutional provision, inhibiting the taking of private property for public use without compensation, is a mere limitation upon the power of eminent domain, constituting no abridgement of the power of a citizen to dispose of his property or rights or interests therein by contract, the protection it affords from unlawful entries upon private lands by internal improvement companies may be waived by agreement or conduct creating an estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 205-214; Dec. Dig. §§ 79, 80.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 276*)—REMEDIES OF OWNERS OF PROPERTY—INJUNCTION.

If an owner of land permits a railroad company to build a railroad through his land, under an oral agreement for compensation, or, without protest and with full knowledge of the fact, permits a railroad to be built on his land, he is limited to his remedy for compensation for the land, and cannot prevent the operation of the road by injunction, nor compel removal thereof from the land.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 276*)—REMEDIES OF OWNERS OF PROPERTY—INJUNCTION.

A railroad company, claiming part of a common carrier railroad, built on private land, as a private enterprise, by the owners of adjacent lands, as successor in title to the owners of the land on which it was built, and under a location made by it in the manner prescribed by law, against another railroad company, claiming that part of it under a location made by it, is not entitled to an injunction to prevent the latter from taking possession of the road and operating it, pending condemnation proceedings to determine the legal rights of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 276.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

Action by Briar Creek Railway Company against the Kanawha Central Railway Company and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Price, Smith, Spilman & Clay and Linn & Byrne, for appellant. Avis & Hardy, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. In a contest between two railway companies for the same right of way, or rather a railroad already constructed, the appellant sought an injunction to prevent the appellee from taking possession of the property and from operating the railroad, or running its engine and cars over the same; and the court below refused the injunction, sustained a demurrer to the bill and dismissed it, without prejudice to the assertion of any rights the appellant may have in a court of law.

Following the general course of a stream known as Briar creek, crossing it at several points, and running partly on one side thereof and partly on the other, the right of way and railroad are at some places on the lands of the Emmons Tract Coal Company, a tract of about 5,000 acres, and at others on lands owned by Thomas L. and others of the Broun family and D. G. Courtney, a tract of about 4,200 acres; the stream being the line between the two boundaries of land. It was built by the Emmons Tract Coal Company under some sort of a loose verbal arrangement, as a means of developing the natural resources of said two tracts of land, and operated as a common carrier by the Coal River & Western Railway Company and its successor, the Coal River Railway Company. On this point, the bill says: "In the year 1904 and subsequent thereto, as plaintiff is informed and believes, certain negotiations were had between the said Brouns and Courtney on the one side, and the said Emmons Tract Coal Company on the other, for the construction of a railroad up and along Briar creek from Brounland, as a means of developing the coal upon the properties belonging to said parties, respectively; that, pending said negotiations, a railroad track was graded and constructed by or under the direction of the said Emmons Tract Coal Company, or some one connected with it, upon and along the said Briar creek from its mouth at Brounland for a distance of four miles, crossing and recrossing the said Briar creek at various points, and passing over and through the lands of the said Brouns and Courtney and of the said Emmons Tract Coal Company and small pieces belonging to other persons, substantially upon the same route as set forth on plaintiff's map and profile, hereinbefore mentioned; that the said railroad was built without any authority from, and without the consent of, the said Brouns and Courtney, or either of them, so far as it runs through their land, but that they took no steps to interfere with its building, believing, as plaintiff is informed and believes, that the negotiations aforesaid which were pending with reference to its construction with the Emmons Tract Coal Company would be carried out satisfactorily to them, so that the railroad could be operated in such way as to benefit their tract of land, giving them main line rates and other facilities which they were insisting upon in their said negotiations." Then follows this allegation: "After said railroad was built, the defendant the Coal River & Western Railway Company began to operate it by sending its cars and engines over said railroad and transporting freights and other articles along its line; that until very recently neither the Emmons Tract Coal Company, nor any other person by whom said railroad was constructed, so far as plaintiff is informed, claimed any right to the said railroad track and roadbed, or the right to operate the same, so far as it runs through the said Broun and Courtney land; but the Coal River & Western Railway Company, or its successor, the Coal River Railway Company, was allowed to operate it, as aforesaid, without interference from the landowners on either side."

Shortly before the institution of this suit, the Kanawha Central Railway Company, claiming the railway upon some ground not disclosed by the bill, notified the Coal River Railway Company to cease using the railroad, and itself took possession of the same, placing its engine and cars thereon, and transporting freight and passengers for compensation; and, on March 27, 1906, it instituted condemnation proceedings to obtain title to so much of the right of way as lies within the boundaries of the Broun and Courtney lands. The bill, without indicating the basis of the claim of the Kanawha Central Railway Company to title to the railroad or right to use it, denies such right, and yet sets up no claim of right in the plaintiff, except title to the right of way by virtue of prior location thereof and conveyances from the Brouns and Courtney. The latter obtained its charter January 6, 1906, and claims to have adopted a map and profile of a survey of its route, corresponding substantially with the location on which the railroad is already built, and filed them in the offices of the Secretary of State and the clerk of the county court of Kanawha county, January 9, 1906. On the following day, it purchased the right of way, as so surveyed, through the Broun and Courtney lands, which was conveyed to it by deed on March 21, 1906. It also commenced condemnation proceedings to acquire the right of way through the Emmons Tract Company lands. The Kanawha Central Railway Company was chartered January 22, 1906, and filed its map and profile, covering the same right of way, February 5, 1906, and on the 27th day of March, 1906, commenced condemnation proceedings to acquire the right of way on which the road is located through the Broun and Courtney lands, as stated. According to the allegations of the bill, these were the conditions under which the Kanawha Central Railway Company took possession of the road and began to operate it.

The allegations of the bill, respecting the construction of the railroad in controversy, fairly construed, show acquiescence in the use of the land on which it is built for general railroad purposes. It was built by the Emmons Tract Company while negotiations, looking to the accomplishment of that end, were pending. Hence it is reasonable and fair to say it was built in reliance upon the negotiations, and upon belief in final consummation of an agreement. In other words, not doubting their ability to reach a satisfactory agreement with the Emmons Tract people, the Brouns and Courtney, by their silence and noninterference, permitted them to build the road, for use as a common carrier, a public railroad, the ultimate ownership, management, and control of which were to be settled and determined by the pending negotiations. These having failed, the present contest for settlement or acquisition of title and control came on, in the form of rival and contending corporations prosecuting and defending actions in the legal forum, in which every question indicated by the bill can be determined, except that of possession of the railroad and right of way, including use and operation, pending disposition of the actions in the law court.

Thus the land and the fixtures, the rails and cross-ties, have been voluntarily devoted to a public use, subject to rights of compensation and title, susceptible of complete vindication, for aught that appears here, by legal proceedings. Under this tacit agreement, the road was built and actually operated as a common carrier. As to the details of the negotiations, the bill is silent. Whether the Brouns and Courtney expected to have stock or interests in the road for the right of way, or to contribute ratably or in some proportion to the cost of construction, or whether they did so, is not disclosed; but we think there is a clear admission of acquiescence in the building of the road, founded upon expectation of both rights and duties respecting the same as a public carrier, on the part of the Brouns and Courtney, to whose rights the Briar Creek Railway Company has succeeded.

[1] Under these circumstances, that company, by its bill, invokes the constitutional provision inhibiting the taking of private property for public use without compensation, notwithstanding the offer of such compensation and intent to pay it, manifested by the commencement of the condemnation proceedings. But for acquiescence in the construction of the road and devotion of the land to public use, subject to the right of compensation, and possibly some interest in the railroad, the case would clearly fall within the protection of the organic provision referred to and the remedy by injunction. The constitutional guaranty was intended, however, for the protection of such persons only as see fit to retain possession and title to their property until compensation therefor shall have been ascertained and paid. Those who voluntarily yield them to a railroad or other internal improvement company, or devote their land to public uses, necessarily waive and lose the benefit thereof. That provision does not abridge the right of a citizen to contract with his neighbor or an internal improvement company. It is only a limitation upon the sovereign power of eminent domain, provided and resorted to for procurement of private property for public use, when the owner thereof declines to yield it voluntarily, either denying the right of appropriation to the use contemplated, or unable to agree upon the amount of compensation.

[2] If a landowner sees fit to permit an entry upon his land by a railroad company or an adjoining landowner, under some sort of an oral agreement, and large expenditures upon the faith of such agreement or permission, carrying an assurance of a conveyance of the title to the land or an easement therein, his situation is similar to that of a vendor by verbal contract, when the vendee has entered into possession and made substantial improvements, or of a father who has orally given a son land, and the latter has entered upon it, and by his labor and outlay of money made improvements of which it would be inequitable and unjust to deprive him. Nothing in either the terms or purpose of the provision invoked imports any intention to destroy or abridge the right of contract on the part of a landowner. On the contrary, all internal improvement companies, as well as all municipal bodies, are empowered, and the state and all individuals have inherent right, to purchase land; and the exercise of these contractual powers is contemplated in all those cases in which the law of eminent domain is available, in case of necessity for the invocation thereof. The latter is supplementary to the contractual power through which most of the acquisitions of private property for public use are made. Logically, therefore, as held by numerous courts, if an owner of land puts a railroad company in possession of a right of way through it, or, without protest, sees a railroad company build its road on his land, he is estopped from asserting title to, or taking possession of, so much of it as is so used by the company. Roberts v. Railroad Co., 158 U. S. 1, 15 Sup. Ct. 756, 39 L. Ed. 873; Kakeldy v. Columbia R. Co., 87 Wash. 675, 80 Pac. 205; 33 Cyc. 155; 23

A. & E. Enc. L. 701; Elliott, Railroads, § 949.

[3] Here the entry was made and the work done by the Emmons Tract Coal Company, whose charter may not have extended its corporate powers to the building and operation of a railroad. As to the extent of its powers the bill is silent; but this does not affect the application of the principle. It was permitted to enter upon the land and lay out thereon large sums of money in building the road, and indirectly to operate the road as a public carrier, and this bill shows an express desire that it shall continue to be such a carrier. This plaintiff, chartered as a railroad company and claiming to be one, has bought the right of way, stands in the shoes of the former owners, and claims right to possession of the road for the purpose of operating it as a common carrier. That contemplated agreement, whatever its terms were, was consummated and executed to the extent of the construction of the railroad and employment thereof in the public service. All that remained was the determination by agreement, if possible, of the ownership thereof, or the interests and rights of the negotiating parties respecting it. The effort to do this having failed, they have resorted to other methods, including condemnation proceedings, in which their legal rights may be fully ascertained and declared. Under such conditions, we are clearly of the opinion that none of these proceedings should be aided or retarded, or the operation of the railroad interfered with, by injunction. There is no technical reason for it. Both the constitutional guaranty and the statute of frauds are eliminated by the conduct of the parties, amounting to an agreement pro tanto. In this class of cases, nothing sustains the remedy by injunction but the arbitrary inhibition of the constitutional guaranty. Viewed as a mere trespass or unlawful entry, the wrong is remedial by the ordinary legal possessory actions. There is no element of irreparable injury. Hence waiver of the constitutional guaranty destroys the sole ground of equity jurisdiction.

The decree complained of will be affirmed.

ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORPORATION v. LITCHFIELD et al.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 832*)—REHEARING.

A fact not called to the attention of the court on the original hearing is not ground for rehearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 8218; Dec. Dig. § 832.*]

On petition for rehearing. Dismissed, and former judgment modified.

For former opinion, see 73 S. E. 182.

PER CURIAM. At the hearing respondent's attorney admitted that the deed upon which this action is based falls within the rule of construction announced in the recent cases of Flagler v. A. C. L. Corporation and McClary v. A. C. L. Corporation, and that, if the court adhered to the decision in those cases, it would be conclusive of this appeal, and warrant reversal of the judgment below. The court was asked to review those cases, but declined to do so. Therefore the judgment below was reversed. 73 S. E. 184.

Counsel failed to bring to the attention of the court at that time the fact which is now brought to the court's attention in this petition, to wit, that upon the record in this case, under the authority of the cases above cited, the plaintiff was entitled to have the preliminary injunction maintained until the decision on the merits of the question whether plaintiff had allowed a reasonable time, within which its right must be exercised, to elapse before commencing to cut the timber in question. This, however, does not afford ground for a rehearing; but the court will now make the judgment which it would have made then, if the matter had been brought to its attention.

Therefore it is ordered that the former judgment of this court be modified to this extent, that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, in so far as it made the preliminary injunction permanent, and that the preliminary injunction remain in force until the hearing. Further ordered that the order staying the remittitur be revoked.

FLODING v. FLODING.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 117*)—VALIDITY—LEGALITY OF CONSIDERATION—RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

Where, by the terms of an agreement, upon a valuable consideration, one party to the agreement stipulates that he "will not again engage in the manufacture and sale of regalia, alone or in conjunction with others, within five years of the date of this agreement, under penalty of five thousand dollars liquidated damages, to be paid to the party of the second part if this agreement is violated," without any limitation as to space or territory, this stipulation cannot be enforced in a suit brought to recover the sum named as liquidated damages. The agreement is in general restraint of trade and void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

2. DAMAGES (§ 78*)—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—"THIS AGREEMENT."

One paragraph of a contract stipulated that the party of the first part "will not again engage in the manufacture and sale of regalia, alone or in conjunction with others, within five years of the date of this agreement, under penalty of five thousand dollars liquidated damages, to be paid to the party of the second part if this agreement is violated." Held, that the forfeiture named applies only to this paragraph of the agreement, and not to any other paragraph of the agreement. (Hill, J., dissents as to this headnote.)

3. DAMAGES (§ 80*)—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES OR PENALTY—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

Where a contract contains several stipulations, and the sum named in the contract as "liquidated damages" for a breach of the agreement can apply to the breach of any stipulation of the contract, and it is apparent that the damages which could result from the breach of some of the stipulations would be so small in comparison with the sum named as liquidated damages as to make the latter excessive and unjust, the amount of damages stipulated will be held to be in the nature of a penalty, and not "liquidated damages."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 170-175; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by W. E. Floding against G. A. Floding. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. W. Smith and M. A. Hale, for plaintiff in error. Slaton & Phillips, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. [1] 1. The court did not err in sustaining the general demurrer filed in this case. The contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant is as follows: "Articles of Agreement. Know all men by these presents, that I, Mr. Geo. A. Floding, of the county of Fulton, and the state of Georgia, party of the first part, in consideration of the sum representing the value of all regalia supplies, machinery, appliances, and materials used in the manufacture and sale of regalia, as determined by inventory, to be made at the earliest possible date, do hereby grant, bargain, sell, and convey unto W. E. Floding, party of the second part, his executors, administrators and assigns, forever all my regalia business, regalia supplies and equipment, used in the manufacture, sale, and prosecution of said regalia business as per invoice. I further covenant and agree to aid said party of the second part, during the first year following the date of this agreement, by all reasonable means to acquire a working knowledge of the business. Further, said party of the second part shall have full and entire right to the name, 'Floding,' as applied to the regalia business, it being intended that the said party of the second part shall enjoy all benefits whatsoever, derived from the publicity of the prior business of the said party of the first part. Terms of sale shall be as follows: One thousand ($1,000.00) dollars cash, to be paid on the completion of the invoice, and the balance to be paid in one year from that date. Deferred payments to draw interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the date of closing invoice. Further, said party of the second part agrees to pay to the said party of the first part 5 per cent. of the net earnings of the business, for the first year following the closing of the invoice. The said party of the first part further agrees that he will not again engage in the manufacture and sale of regalia, alone or in conjunction with others, within five years of the date of this agreement, under penalty of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars liquidated damages, to be paid to the party of the second part if this agreement is violated. As evidence of good faith ten ($10.00) dollars, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, is paid on the sale price of the said regalia stock. Said party of the first part agrees to lease to the said party of the second part, the first and second floors and a storeroom on the third floor in his business block, 155 Whitehall St., Atlanta, Ga., to be used for the transaction of the regalia business, for a period of three years, at a rental of fifty ($50.00) dollars per month, payable monthly, the said party of the first part reserving desk room in the office for his private use, and also reserving space in the vault for the filing of valuable papers. The said party of the first part hereby agrees to pay the said party of the second part twenty ($20.00) dollars per month for the first year following the closing of the invoice, for serving him in the capacity of private secretary, in the collection of accounts or other office work he may have to do. It is intended that the inventory shall be closed and the business turned over to W. E. Floding, party of the second part, on or about October 1, 1909. Signed in duplicate, July 29, 1909."

Is this a valid subsisting contract? If so, it should be upheld. But it is insisted by the defendant that it is in restraint of trade, against public policy, and therefore void. If this latter position is true, then the contract cannot be enforced. Where one, for a valuable consideration, solemnly agrees to do or not to do a particular thing, the law ought and will compel such person to comply with his obligation, unless the imperative mandate of the same authority declares the contract void, or for other reasons it cannot be enforced. Courts cannot make contracts, and can only enforce those that are legal. Is this contract sued on void? In the case of Seay v. Spratling, 133 Ga. 27, 65 S. E. 137, the contract sued on stipulated: "That whereas the said G. W. Seay is the owner of seventy-four shares of stock of the Warren Manufacturing Co., a corporation of said state and county, and is the president of said company; and whereas the said E. J. Spratling has offered to pay to the said G. W. Seay the sum of thirty-five hundred ($3,500) dollars for said seventy-four shares of stock of the Warren Manufacturing Co., providing said G. W. Seay will tender his resignation as president of the said Warren Manufacturing Co. to said company, and agree to neither directly nor indirectly, as an individual, member of a firm, stockholder in a corporation, or as an employé of an individual, firm, or corporation, engage or take part in any line of business, either selling or manufacturing, similar or like that now done by the Warren Manufacturing Co., which said offer the said G. W. Seay has accepted: Now, therefore, for and in consideration of the premises and the sum of thirty-five hundred ($3,500) dollars, the purchase price of said stock, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, said G. W. Seay does hereby agree and bind himself for a period of two years, beginning the 20th day of August, 1908, and ending the 20th day of August, 1910, neither directly nor indirectly, as an individual, member of a firm, stockholder in a corporation, or as the employé of an individual, firm, or corporation, to engage or take part in any line of business, either selling or manufacturing, similar or like that now or heretofore done by the Warren Manufacturing Company." It was held in the Seay Case that in the agreement sued on there was no limitation as to space or territory, and the contract was therefore against public policy and void. But the plaintiff in error here insists that the present case does not come within the ruling made in the Seay Case. He further insists that the contract here sued on is severable, and that, though the contract be void in part (which was not conceded), the remainder, if severable, could be enforced as to the part which is legal. After careful and painstaking consideration of the record, we are constrained to hold that that portion of the contract whereby the defendant agreed not to again engage in the manufacture and sale of regalia comes within the ruling made in the Seay Case, and numerous other authorities bearing on the same subject. The agreement is that the defendant "will not again engage in the manufacture and sale of regalia, alone or in conjunction with others, within five years of the date of this agreement, under penalty of five thousand dollars liquidated damages, to be paid to the party of the second part if this agreement is violated." Here the trade is lawful, but there is no limitation as to space or territory, and this portion of the contract comes clearly within the ruling made in the Seay Case.

[2] 2. Is the contract severable, and, if so, is the stipulation as to the forfeiture of the $5,000 to the plaintiff to be regarded as a "penalty," or as "liquidated damages"? If it is a penalty, then the plaintiff cannot enforce the payment of "liquidated damages," even if it be held that the contract is severable. And this involves the question, Is the sum stated as a forfeiture so unreasonable when applied to the other paragraphs of the contract (if it can be applied to them) as to render it void as being excessive and unreasonable? The majority of the court is of the opinion that the forfeiture is confined to that portion of the contract already held to be void as in restraint of trade, but the writer does not concur in this view, as the language is that the sum stated is "to be paid to the party of the second part if this agreement is violated." The writer thinks that the words "this agreement" were intended to refer to the entire agreement, and not to one paragraph of it. These words are previously used in the same sentence, wherein the defendant stipulates that he will not again engage in the regalia business "within five years of the date of this agreement." The words "this agreement," so previously used, can only refer to the contract as a whole, since no date of the contract is given except that immediately preceding the signatures thereto, which manifestly is inserted as the date of the execution of the contract as one instrument, and, where they again appear in the same sentence and closely following their use in referring to the entire contract as "this agreement," the writer thinks the second use of the same words must have been intended to have the same meaning; i. e., to denominate the entire agreement. And the argument now made only applies when the words "this agreement," as used in reference to the violation of the agreement, are construed as having application to all the stipulations of the contract which the defendant undertakes to perform.

[3] In the view we take of the entire case, however, the result is the same, whether the majority or the writer be correct in the construction which should be placed upon the words referred to. In the case of Swift v. Crow, 17 Ga. 609, the court held: "T. C. executed a bond by which, in consideration that S. would yield up to him a certain mortgage, given to secure payment of a promissory note due by T. C. to S., he bound himself to pay the sum of $100 to S., upon condition that he should fail to give to S. acceptable security on this note within 10 days, and should also fail, before the 1st of May then next, in giving to S. a mortgage on real estate as further security, and pay the recording fee for the same. Upon action brought for a breach of said bond, held, that the sum stipulated was in the nature of a penalty, and not liquidated damages." And Judge Starnes, in delivering the opinion, on page 611, said: "But where the covenant is to perform several things or pay the sum specified, and the claim may extend to the breach of any stipulation, in such case, it seems to be well settled that the sum specified should be considered in the nature of a penalty. Astley v. Weldon, 2 Bos. & P. 845;

Kemble v. Farren, 6 Bing. 141; Davies v. Panton, 6 B. & C. 210; Ch. on Con. 863, 854; Sedg. on Dam. 406, 407, 408. Now, the agreement in this case was first to give acceptable security on the note in 10 days; secondly, before the 1st day of May then next to give a mortgage on real property as additional security; thirdly, to pay the fee for recording the same. Here, then, are two or three stipulations, a failure in either of which would appear to be a breach of the bond. And yet, if that failure were only to pay the recording fee, would it not be most unreasonable that the sum of $100 should be paid as damages?" The doctrine laid down in the case just cited accords with that announced by text-writers on the subject. See 1 Sutherland on Damages, §§ 294, 295; Fetter on Equity, § 72. Assuming, in the present case, that the sum named as liquidated damages was intended to apply to any breach of the agreement, the contract contains a provision in reference to the lease of certain floors of a building and a store room, the rental for which during the term of the lease would amount to $1,800, and another stipulation whereby the defendant agrees to employ the plaintiff in a stated capacity for one year, and pay him a compensation for his services amounting to $240. With respect to at least these stipulations of the contract, under the ruling in Swift v. Crow, supra, the forfeiture named in the contract would be so disproportionate to the damages which would be occasioned by a breach of either that it must be construed to have been intended as a penalty and not as liquidated damages. It follows that on either view of the case the plaintiff could not recover in a suit brought for liquidated damages. If the sum named as a forfeiture be considered as applicable only to that paragraph of the contract in which the defendant undertook not to again engage in the business of manufacturing and selling regalia, and so considered would be regarded as liquidated damages for a breach of this undertaking, the plaintiff could not recover damages for such breach because of the invalidity of that portion of the contract. On the other hand, if applicable to all the stipulations of the contract, under the principles of law herein announced, the forfeiture would have to be treated as being in the nature of a penalty, and the plaintiff could only recover actual damages sustained from a breach of the legal provisions of the contract (which he does not lay claim to in his petition), and could not recover as liquidated damages the forfeiture specified in the contract and for which he brings suit.

Therefore the court committed no error in dismissing the petition on the demurrer thereto.

GORDAY et al. v. SCOTT & CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RECOVERY OF PERSONALTY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Under the evidence in this case the defendants were not entitled to a judgment against the plaintiffs, upon the demand of the former for the value of certain mules, and the hire of the same, delivered to the latter in payment of certain promissory notes due at the time of the delivery of the mules.

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

The evidence did not authorize the verdict directed by the court, and must for that reason be set aside and a new trial granted.

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—INSOLVENCY OF PLAINTIFFS.

No opinion is expressed as to the sufficiency of the evidence to show the insolvency of the plaintiffs, which was relied on by the defendants as a basis of their right to set off certain alleged damages against a liquidated demand of the plaintiffs.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)4. SALES (§ 347) — REMEDIES OF PARTIES — PAYMENT OF PRICE — DELIVERY OF PERSONALTY — RECOVERY BY BUYER.

Where plaintiffs sold defendants a sawmill outfit, taking their notes for the price, and, when certain of the notes became due, defendants, being unable to pay them in cash, agreed to deliver four mules which they were using in operating the sawmill at a stipulated price, and an agent of plaintiffs, to whom defendants delivered the mules, gave defendants notes not yet matured in place of the matured notes, which they were to receive under the agreement, and after maturity of the notes delivered to defendants, plaintiffs brought suit, and at the trial tendered to defendants the notes which should have been delivered to them, defendants were not entitled to recover the value of the four mules and their hire, but their delivery constituted a payment of the notes to the extent of their stipulated price, which payment the defendants might set up in defense to the suit on the notes.

5. JUDGMENT (§ 731*) — CONCLUSIVENESS — MATTERS CONCLUDED.

In an action on notes for the price of a sawmill outfit, a contention that a plea of partial failure of consideration was res judicata was not sustained by proof that in an action on another note of the same series the defendants set up failure of consideration, but that on the trial the plea was stricken on special demurrer, not going to the merits of the defense.

Action by Scott & Co. against S. T. and J. H. Gorday. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Haygood & Cutts, for plaintiffs in error. J. H. Pate and Crum & Jones, for defendants in error.

BECK, J. Scott & Co. brought suit against S. T. and J. H. Gorday on four promissory notes, each being dated January 27, 1906, and due, respectively, February 1, April 1, June 1, and August 1, 1907. The defendants admitted a prima facie case and assumed the burden of proof. It appears that the four notes sued on, together with certain others, were given for the purchase of a certain sawmill outfit, consisting of a boiler, engine, wagons, mules, a barrel of lubricating oil, and other articles of personal property going to make up the outfit. The defendants pleaded, among other issues, a partial failure of consideration, alleging that the plaintiffs failed to deliver to defendants one of the mules included in the outfit, which it is averred died in possession of the plaintiffs before it was delivered, being of the value of $175, and that a barrel of oil, worth $15, was not delivered; and they claimed a credit for the aggregate of these two amounts. Defendants in their plea alleged, further, that subsequently, after certain of the notes which they had given for the outfit became due, being unable to pay the same in cash, they agreed to deliver four mules, which they were then using in and about the business of operating the sawmill, at the stipulated price of $850; that this was to be in payment of the indebtedness to the plaintiffs which was past due, and the note next maturing, and the sum of $50 on one of the notes which became due subsequently; that the plaintiffs accepted the mules under this agreement, but when the plaintiffs sent an agent of theirs to take possession of the mules, he left with an agent of the defendants, who did not know of the terms of the contract upon which the mules were to be delivered to the plaintiffs, certain notes which were not then mature, instead of the notes which were past due, in violation of the contract between the parties; and that afterwards, on the 17th day of October, 1906, the plaintiffs maliciously and without probable cause instituted attachment proceedings for the purchase money of the property sold by them to the defendants, which they alleged to be due and unpaid, and the attachment was levied on the sawmill and other personal property constituting the sawmill outfit. The defendants further pleaded that possession of the four mules which were delivered by the defendants' agent to the plaintiffs was obtained by fraud; that they had tendered back to the plaintiffs the notes which had been left when the mules were taken away; that they had demanded the return of the mules by the plaintiffs, which demand was refused; and that this amounted to a conversion of the property. Defendants allege the insolvency of the plaintiffs, and say that they are entitled to recover the value of the mules and their hire, and also damages incurred in consequence of the suing out of the attachment and the seizure of the sawmill outfit. At the close of the evidence the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount of $897, principal, together with interest, costs, and attorney's fees.

[1,4] 1. We do not think that the defendants were entitled to recover the value of the four mules and their hire, as they contend in their plea. The suit was brought upon the four notes which were not due at the time the plaintiffs took possession of the four mules under the contract set forth in the plea, being the notes which were delivered to the defendants at that time. Plaintiffs in bringing this suit recognized the terms of the contract relied upon by the defendants to be as alleged by the defendants themselves; and when the notes, for the payment of which the mules were delivered to the plaintiffs, were tendered to the defendants at the trial as their property, the plaintiffs had complied with their part of the contract in reference to the payment of the past-due indebtedness at the time of the making of the contract. And even if they had never tendered these notes, the defendants were not and could not have been injured by the retention of the notes in the hands of the plaintiffs. By the delivery of the mules the defendants paid the notes past due and became entitled to a credit on the notes not then due in an amount in excess of the stipulated price of the mules over the aggregate of the past-due notes, and could have pleaded payment as a defense to a suit on the notes, whether brought by the plaintiffs themselves or by any one else to whom the notes might have been transferred, the notes not having been transferred before maturity.

[2, 5] 2. The defense of a partial failure of consideration, based upon the failure of the plaintiffs to deliver one of the mules and a barrel of oil included in the contract of purchase and sale between the parties, was met by a contention on the part of the plaintiffs that the defendants were not entitled to a credit equal to the aggregate value of the oil and the mule, because the matter of this credit was res adjudicata between them, and became so as the result of a suit between the parties in the city court of Ashburn on a note dated January 27, 1906, being one of the series of notes given for the purchase price of the property in controversy. The record of the suit just referred to was introduced in evidence. It appears from the plea filed in that case that the defendants set up a failure of consideration, based upon the non-delivery of a mule, of the value of $175, a yoke of oxen, of the value of $75, and a barrel of oil, of the value of $15. Upon the trial the plea of failure of consideration was stricken on special demurrer not going to the merits of the defense, and a judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs in an amount equal to the sum sued for, less $75; it being admitted on the trial by counsel for plaintiffs that the defendants were entitled to this credit of $75 "on account of oxen." Thus it appears that the issue raised in the present case by the plea of failure of consideration was not adjudicated in the case tried in the city court of Ashburn. The plea of failure of consideration here being considered was stricken from the plea in the former suit, and no evidence was introduced or could have been introduced to sustain it; and the court below erred in holding in favor of the plaintiffs' contention that the matter involved in that particular part of the defendants' plea now under consideration was res adjudicata.

[3] 3. Inasmuch as the case is to go back for another trial, it is unnecessary to pass upon the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the defendants' contention that plaintiffs were insolvent; their insolvency being the basis of defendants' right to plead, against plaintiffs' liquidated demand, damages alleged to have been sustained in consequence of the institution of the attachment proceedings, which was, according to the contention of the defendants, malicious and without probable cause.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

1. PERSONAL INJURIES.

The petition set out a cause of action.

2. TRIAL (§ 31*)—CONDUCT IN GENERAL—INSPECTION OF PREMISES—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

Whether or not, pending the trial of an action for damages to the plaintiff, the presiding judge can properly send the jury to inspect the place where the injury occurred, on motion of counsel for one party, and without the consent of the other party, yet where counsel for the latter is present when the motion is made, and interposes no objection, he will be considered as waiving any right to object which he may have, and mistrial will not be granted upon motion therefor made after the jury have been sent to the place and allowed to inspect it. On the subject of allowing the jury to inspect the premises see Broyles v. Priscock, 97 Ga. 643 (3), 25 S. E. 389; Johnson v. Winship Machine Co., 108 Ga. 554 (2), 33 S. 3. OPERATION OF RAILROADS—BLOW POSTS—SIGNALS AT CROSSING.

Under the pleadings and evidence, the duty of a railroad company to erect blow posts 400 yards from a public crossing, and the declaration that a failure to do so is a misdemeanor, as stated in Civil Code 1910, § 2676, was not relevant. But the facts authorized a charge as to the duty of engineers to signal the approach of their trains to public road or street crossings in the limits of cities, towns, and villages, contained in Civil Code 1910, § 2677 (Civ. Code 1895, § 2224).

4. RAILROADS (§§ 351, 325*)—CROSSING ACCIDENT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CARE REQUIRED OF INFANT.

In a suit by a minor nearly 10 years of age for a personal injury resulting from the operation of a railroad train, after giving in charge section 2781 of the Civil Code of 1910 (to the effect that no person shall recover damages from a railroad company for an injury done by his consent, or caused by his own negligence, and touching the doctrine of contributory or relative negligence), and section 4426 (to the effect that, if the plaintiff by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences to himself caused by the defendant's negligence, he cannot recover), it was inaccurate to add: "I charge you that this law applies to grown-up people." A railroad company is not liable to either a grown person or a minor for damages to him caused by his own negligence, or where he could have avoided the consequences of the defendant's negligence by the use of due care.

(a) The standard of due care on the part of an adult and a child of tender years is different, and this is what the presiding judge doubtless meant; and if the instructions as to diligence and negligence on the part of the plaintiff (a boy not quite 10 years of age) had been correctly given, they might have been construed in connection with this charge, and have rendered a reversal because of it unnecessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. §§ 351, 325.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§§ 85, 141*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CARE REQUIRED OF INFANT—"DUE CARE."

"Due care" in a child of tender years is such care as its capacity, mental and physical, fits it for exercising in the actual circumstances of the occasion and situation under investigation. Due care according to age and capacity is all the law exacts of a child of tender years. Neither the average child of its own age, nor the prudent man, is a standard by which to measure its diligence with legal exactness. Civil Code 1910, § 8474; W. & A. R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397, 7 S. E. 912, 12 Am. St. Rep. 320; Id., 83 Ga. 512, 10 S. E. 197.

(a) Charges which fixed the standard of care due by a child nine years of age as "what could be expected by a party of [the] age this plaintiff is proven to have been," and which stated that if both parties were at fault, but the jury could find "that the plaintiff, considering his age, could not have avoided the accident by the exercise of ordinary care," then he would not be prevented from recovering, did not correctly state the rule as to due diligence on the part of the plaintiff, there being an allegation in his petition and some evidence tending to throw light on his capacity.

6. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—ASSESSMENT—INSTRUCTION.

While the extent of pain and suffering arising from a physical injury is not susceptible of proof with exact certainty, and the measure of the amount of damages allowable therefor rests in the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors, the presiding judge should not have charged: "If you do not find that he is entitled to recover from permanent injuries, you would then determine what he would be entitled to recover from his pain and suffering, whether permanent or not; that is a matter not required to be proven." Such a charge was calculated to lead the jury to believe that they could find damages on account of pain and suffering, without any evidence to show that any had been endured in the past or would probably be endured in the future.

7. DAMAGES (§ 205*)—ASSESSMENT—DISCRETION OF JURY.

In a suit to recover for injuries to the person of a plaintiff, if damages are sought on account of expenses incurred, pecuniary losses which have resulted from the injury, and the like, such matters are susceptible of proof; and as to such elements of damage the standard is not to be left solely to the discretion of the jury. But where special damages of the character indicated are not sought to be recovered, but the damages claimed are for pain and suffering, the measure rests in the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors, seeking to do justice between the parties. Augusta & Summerville R. Co. v. Randall, 85 Ga. 297 (8), 11 S. E. 706; Crown Cotton Mills v. McNally, 123 Ga. 35 (6), 51 S. E. 13; Southern Ry. Co. v. Broughton, 128 Ga. 814, 58 S. E. 470.

8. INFANTS (§ 74*)—ACTIONS—PARTIES—NEXT FRIEND.

Where a suit is brought by a minor for a tort committed upon him, the proper method is for the petition to be brought in the name of the minor, by his guardian ad litem or next friend. A suit in the name of a person as next friend of the minor has been held to be substantially a suit by the minor, and amendable, so as to state the case correctly, and good after verdict. Lasseter v. Simpson, 78 Ga. 61, 3 S. E. 243; Walden v. Walden, 128 Ga. 126, 132, 57 S. E. 323; Hart v. Atlanta Terminal Co., 128 Ga. 764, 772, 58 S. E. 452; Van Pelt v. Chattanooga, etc., R. Co., 89 Ga. 706, 15 S. E. 622; Ellington v. Beaver Dam Co., 93 Ga. 55, 19 S. E. 21.

(a) Where the point is expressly raised by special demurrer that the suit is brought in the name of a person as next friend of the minor, instead of by the minor himself through his next friend, the better practice is to sustain the demurrer, and allow the petition to be amended, so as to proceed accurately.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. §§ 188-190; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

HARRELL v. FORSYTH COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION—ERROR CURED BY GIVING OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

The defendant having introduced no evidence, but the witnesses for the plaintiff having been cross-examined at length, and not being in exact accord in some respects, even if it were not entirely apt to charge that the plaintiff must show her right to recover by a preponderance of the evidence, and to give in charge section 5730 of the Civil Code of 1910 on that subject, this furnishes no ground for a reversal, where the court charged fully the law touching the right of the plaintiff to recover and the defense of the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-718, 715, 716, 718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

2. BRIDGES (§ 46*)—DEFECTIVE BRIDGES—INJURIES—ACTION—EVIDENCE OF REPAIRS.

Under the decisions in Georgia Southern & Florida R. Co. v. Cartledge, 116 Ga. 164, 42 S. E. 405, 59 L. R. A. 118, and L. & N. R. Co. v. Barnwell, 131 Ga. 791, 63 S. E. 501, on the trial of an action against a county, brought to recover damages on account of a personal injury alleged to have resulted from a defect tive bridge forming a part of a public road, one alleged defect being a want of proper guard rails, there was no error in rejecting evidence that when a new bridge was built, after the injury, banisters were placed on both sides from end to end of the bridge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bridges, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

8. INSTRUCTIONS.

The assignment of error on the ground that the court erred in failing to charge the jury with sufficient distinctness as to results of a failure of county authorities to repair a bridge forming part of a public highway within a reasonable time was without merit.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1006*)—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

No error of law requiring a new trial appearing, two verdicts having been rendered in favor of the defendant on successive trials of the case, there being sufficient evidence to authorize the finding, and it having been approved by the presiding judge, this court will not interfere.

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 153, 201*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO COMPENSATION—POSSESSION UNDER BOND FOR TITLE—EVIDENCE.

In Fulton County v. Amorous, 89 Ga. 614 (3), it was held: "One in possession of land under a bond for titles from the true owner, with purchase money partly paid, is the owner of the freehold relatively to all persons except the maker of the bond and those claiming under him. In case the premises are taken or damaged for public purposes, the possessor under the title is entitled to full compensation; certainly so by showing affirmatively the acquiescence of his vendor in his claim, and this may be done by producing in evidence a conveyance from the latter, made pending the action and passing the absolute title in fee simple." Held, that the ruling there made, upon application to review and overrule the same, after examination and consideration, is reaffirmed. Towaliga Falls Power Co. v. Washington, 136 Ga. 397, 71 S. E. 731. The ruling in L. & N. R. Co. v. Ramsay, 134 Ga. 107 (2), 67 S. E. 652, is not in conflict with what is held in the two cases cited above, as in the Ramsay Case the plaintiff was not in possession under a bond for title with part of the purchase price paid, but attempted to show title by a deed executed subsequent to the commission of the trespass and to the commencement of the action.

(a) In view of such holding, the court did not err in admitting in evidence a conveyance from the true owner to the plaintiff, who was in possession of the land under a bond for title, with the purchase money partly paid; such conveyance having been made pending the action and passing the absolute title in fee simple.

2. DEMURRERS.

The demurrers to the petition were so manifestly without merit that it is unnecessary to specifically deal with them. There was evidence to support the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§§ 473, 474*)—ACCOUNTING AND SETTLEMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict was not supported by the evidence, and the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial upon that ground.

Error from Superior Court, Burke County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. E. Roberts and another for an accounting and settlement against W. A. Roberts, Jr., administrator of W. A. Roberts, Sr. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

BECK, J. Mrs. M. E. Roberts, the widow of W. A. Roberts, Sr., and W. M. Fulcher, as guardian for James, Susie, Willie, and Ethel Roberts, minor children of W. A. Roberts, Sr., brought a petition for accounting and settlement against W. A. Roberts, Jr., the administrator of W. A. Roberts, Sr., in the court of ordinary of Burke county, Ga. The administrator made answer, and after trial and judgment the case was appealed to the superior court. The administrator answered that he had completely and legally disposed of all the estate left by his intestate, and that there was no money, property, or effects belonging to said estate in his hands as such administrator. The jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the widow the amount of insurance policy, less the premiums paid on same, and the premium due for the unexpected [unexpired] year." Thereupon it was adjudged that the plaintiffs recover of the defendant, W. A. Roberts, Jr. the sum of $3,000 principal debt, $297 interest to judgment, and all costs of court. The court overruled a motion for a new trial, and the defendant excepted.

The finding of the jury in this case and the judgment of the court was for the amount of an insurance policy issued by the Franklin Life Insurance Company, of Springfield, Ill., upon the life of the intestate of the defendant. There was some conflicting evidence as to the liability of the administrator to account for certain personal property which had gone into his hands, other than the insurance policy referred to. The finding of the jury seems to be in favor of the defendant's contention that he had accounted for the personal property referred to, and the verdict returned is based upon the contention that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the proceeds of the life insurance policy, less certain premiums.

We are satisfied, after an examination of the evidence in the record, that the verdict is not supported by the evidence. The defendant's intestate, as appears from the uncontradicted evidence, at the time of his death was indebted upon a promissory note to the defendant in the sum of $4,000; and it also appears from the uncontradicted evidence that the policy of insurance had been transferred to him as collateral security for the payment of the indebtedness of the intestate to the defendant, who became the administrator of the former. There is not, so far as we can discover, any evidence in this record impeaching the validity of the note representing the indebtedness of W. A. Roberts, Sr., to W. A. Roberts, Jr. It is true, as appears from the evidence, that the note had been given to the payee for an interest in a business in which the decedent and the defendant in this case were partners, and in the course of his testimony the defendant undertook to show that in the conduct of the enterprise or business in which they were interested as partners certain losses had occurred; and it is insisted in the argument of counsel that this testimony of the defendant was so vague, indefinite, and unsatisfactory that the jury, especially in view of other testimony in the case which tended to show that the defendant had not suffered all the losses claimed by him, could infer that the note did not represent any valid indebtedness of the maker to the payee. But after all the evidence in regard to the losses in the business referred to is considered, and the view thereof most favorable to the plaintiffs' contention is taken, nothing is found impeaching the validity of the note referred to. If that note was invalid for any reason, if it did not bona fide represent an indebtedness of the maker to the payee, the burden was upon the plaintiffs to show wherein or to what extent the note was invalid or unenforceable. This burden, so far as we can discover from reading the record, the plaintiffs failed entirely to carry; or, to speak more exactly, they did not attempt to carry it. It can serve no useful purpose to set forth, literally or in substance, the evidence contained in this voluminous record; but it is adjudged that the evidence did not support the verdict, and that the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial upon that ground.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

STEVENS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 47*)—MANSLAUGHTER—STATUTORY PROVISION.

If a wife has been suspected by her husband of infidelity, and some little time thereafter she stated to him that she had been guilty of adultery, and expressed an intention to see her paramour again, and if thereupon her husband seized a gun and killed her, such facts were not sufficient, under Penal Code 1910, § 65, to authorize the submission to the jury of the theory of voluntary manslaughter, though a charge on that subject was requested.

(a) The evidence for the state showed a plain case of murder. The statement of the accused alone raised the question determined in the preceding headnote.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 71; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

2. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS.

None of the grounds of the motion for a new trial are such as to require a reversal.

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Hezekiah Stevens was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Green & Michael and Geo. C. Thomas, for plaintiff in error. Clifford Walker, Sol. Gen., and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. Stevens shot and killed his wife. He was convicted of murder, moved for a new trial, and, upon the overruling of his motion, excepted.

[1] 1. The case turned upon one leading point, whether the evidence or the prisoner's statement involved the theory of voluntary manslaughter, so that a failure to charge on the subject, or a refusal to give in charge certain requests, requires a reversal. The evidence presented no such theory. It showed a shocking, brutal murder. Did the statement of the accused require a charge on that subject, on request? The statement was in brief as follows: He had received warnings that his wife was unfaithful to him. On a certain Tuesday evening he pretended that he was going to a neighboring town, but returned about half past 8 o'clock, and found the lamp turned low, his wife in the act of turning down the bedclothes, and the man with whom she was suspected of being intimate sitting down, with his slippers untied. The man left, and the wife made some excuse. On the following Sunday the wife left, saying she was going to see her mother, and remained away about three weeks. On her return she expressed an intention to pack up her personal property and leave. Some words followed as to the rumors in regard to her, and she said (referring to the man in question), "Yes, I had him, and there isn't a darn bit of help for it," and "if Jim can't come in the house you pay rent in, he can come in one you don't pay rent in." Thereupon the accused seized a gun and shot her. He did not know what he was doing. That is the reason he shot her.

Reduced to its finality, the question is whether a statement by a wife to her husband that she has been guilty of adultery and an expression of an intention to see her paramour again may suffice to reduce the killing of her by her husband to manslaughter. Penal Code 1910, § 65, declares: "In all cases of voluntary manslaughter, there must be some actual assault upon the person killing, or an attempt by the person killed to commit a serious personal injury on the person killing, or other equivalent circumstances to justify the excitement of passion, and to exclude all idea of deliberation or malice, either express or implied. Provocation by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures shall in no case be sufficient to free the person killing from the guilt and crime of murder." It was argued that while the words uttered by the wife would not justify the homicide, or amount to an assault, or an attempt to commit a serious personal injury on the accused, they might amount to "other equivalent circumstances to justify the excitement of passion," and suffice to reduce the crime to voluntary manslaughter. We cannot concur in this construction of the statute. Immediately following the words last quoted, it is declared that provocation by words shall in no case be sufficient to reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter, thus excluding words alone from amounting to "equivalent circumstances." Edwards v. State, 53 Ga. 428.

It is not necessary to undertake to define accurately that expression; but an illustration or two may not be out of place. An attempt to commit a serious personal injury on a member of one's family in his presence, the catching of a man in adultery with one's wife, or a violent trespass on one's property in his presence, and a killing then taking place, might authorize a submission to the jury of the theory of voluntary manslaughter. But mere words will not. In some cases, where it may appear at first glance that words were treated as authorizing a submission of that theory, a careful consideration will show some added fact or conduct on the part of the person slain. Thus, in Golden v. State, 25 Ga. 527, 533, the deceased seized a tumbler. In Mack v. State, 63 Ga. 693, the person killed had a knife in his hand, raised above the father-in-law of the accused, whom he held by the waist. In Mize v. State, 135 Ga. 291, 69 S. E. 173, there was evidence tending to show an absence from home of a little daughter of the accused, a boastful declaration by a boy indicating that he had had illicit relations with her, when questioned by her father, the presence of the boy's father with a gun, a firing by the accused at the boy, the presenting of a gun toward the accused by the boy's father, and the shooting of the father by the accused. While some broad language was used in the opinion, it was not ruled that words alone can reduce murder to manslaughter.

[2] 2. None of the other grounds of the motion were such as to require a new trial. The evidence fully sustained the conviction.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

WARWICK v. MADDOX.

MADDOX v. WARWICK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTION (§ 275*)—SALES—IRREGULARITIES—ESTOPPEL TO DENY VALIDITY.

In 1893 certain real estate was regularly offered for sale by the sheriff of Fulton county. The defendant in the fi. fa. had previously applied for a homestead covering the property, naming his wife as sole beneficiary. On the day of the sale, when the property was offered by the sheriff, the defendant and his counsel were present. The counsel, in the presence of the defendant, announced that there was a homestead application pending, and whoever bought the property would buy subject to this application. After such announcement the property was cried off, and C. D. Maddox, being the only bidder, became the purchaser for the price of $10. A sheriff's deed was regularly executed and recorded. After the sale the defendant continued in possession, residing on the property until 1910, when his wife died; there being no other beneficiary of the homestead estate. Immediately after the death of the beneficiary, Maddox demanded possession of the defendant in fi. fa., and upon a refusal to surrender possession instituted rule proceedings against the sheriff and the defendant in fi. fa. to be put in possession of the property. Held:

(a) The court correctly held that the applicant was entitled to possession of the property, although the fi. fa., which purported to be signed by the clerk of the superior court of Fulton county, had not been actually signed by him, and for that reason might have been invalid. Biggers v. Winkles, 124 Ga. 990, 53 S. E. 397.

(b) The defendant was estopped, by the conduct of himself and his counsel at the time of the sale, from contesting the validity of the fi. fa. on the ground that it had not been signed by the proper officer; there being no question as to the validity of the judgment on which the fi. fa. issued. Reichert v. Voss, 78 Ga. 54, 2 S. E. 558; Allagood v. Cook, 92 Ga. 570, 17 S. E. 920; Mock v. Stuckey, 96 Ga. 187, 23 S. E. 307; O'Kelley v. Gholston, 89 Ga. 1, 15 S. E. 123; *Rawles v. SPENCE v. MATHIS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DOWER (§ 14*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT.

Dower may be assigned in lands held under bond for title, or other instrument in writing having like effect, where a portion of the purchase money has been paid; but the estate in dower shall be liable for the unpaid purchase money. Civil Code 1910, § 5248.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 45, 54, 55; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. DOWER (§ 14*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT.

M. bought a tract of land from A., and took a bond for title. A. held under a bond for title from B., who held a bond for title from C. M. paid a portion of the purchase money to his vendor, A., paying some of it to C. by direction of A. When the debt for the purchase money to C., the original vendor, matured, an arrangement was entered into by the parties, by which M., A., and B. surrendered their bonds, and C. conveyed the land to a firm, who advanced the money to pay the balance of the purchase money due to C. The consideration expressed in this deed was $500. M. gave to the firm five notes for $80 each and one note for $100. The last-mentioned note was secured by a mortgage on cotton. The firm made to M. a bond to make title upon the payment of the five notes of $80 each. M. paid the $100 note to the firm. Later the firm transferred the remaining notes to a bank, and executed to it a deed to secure them, reciting the bond to M., and subject to it. M. paid to the bank $37.50 as interest on the notes, and afterwards died. Held, that this was a case falling within Civil Code 1910, § 5248, and the widow of M. was entitled to dower in the land, though subject to the payment of the debt due the bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 45, 54, 55; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

3. DOWER (§ 14*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Where, under such circumstances, the widow applied for dower, and a caveat was filed by the administrator of the decedent, and during the pendency of the case the administrator sold other lands of the estate than that in which the commissioners had assigned dower, and paid the debt due to the bank, this did not destroy the right of the widow to dower.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 45, 54, 55; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

4. NO CONFLICT WITH FORMER DECISION—REPAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY.

The ruling here made in no way conflicts with that in Harris v. Powers, 129 Ga. 74, 84, 58 S. E. 1038.

(a) No question was raised as to whether the widow should repay any part of the amount of purchase money paid to the bank.

KIGHT v. STEPHEN PUTNEY SHOE CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§§ 47, 228*)—NATURE OF TRANSACTION—SALES IN BULK.

A sale of a stock of merchandise in bulk, not in compliance with the provisions of Civil Code, § 3226 et seq., is void as to creditors, on the ground of fraud; and a creditor may proceed by attachment against his fraudulent debtor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 34, 665, 667; Dec. Dig. §§ 47, 228.*]

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 47*)—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 105*)—SALES IN BULK—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

Where a mercantile corporation turns over its stock of merchandise to its president and principal stockholder, who undertakes to buy up at a discount the claims against the corporation, and who, after purchasing a majority of such claims, sells the stock of merchandise in bulk to a third person, who knows that the corporation's president is buying up the claims against the corporation, and that some of the claims had not been purchased at the time of the sale, such a transaction falls within the operation of the sales in bulk statute; and the sale by the president of the corporation to such third person without complying with the terms of the statute is void as against creditors of the corporation. Any agreement between a traveling salesman of the creditor, who sold the goods for his principal and was authorized to collect the amount of his sales, and the president of the corporation, looking to the sale and transfer of the creditor's claim for less than the undisputed amount of the claim, is not binding on the creditor, in the absence of proof of the agent's authority to accept less than the full amount of the claim.

Error from Superior Court, Johnson County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Attachment proceedings by the Stephen Putney Shoe Company against the J. W. Johnson Company. B. T. Kight, administrator, filed a claim. Judgment for plaintiff, and claimant brings error. Affirmed.

Daley & Daley, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Thompson and Jno. R. L. Smith, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. E. A. W. Johnson, the president of the J. W. Johnson Company, a mercantile corporation, sold its entire stock of merchandise to N. J. Kight without complying with the terms of the sales in bulk statute. The Stephen Putney Company, a creditor of the corporation, sued out an attachment against the corporation as a fraudulent debtor, and upon the levy of the attachment Mrs. Kight filed a claim. On the trial of the case it appeared that the mercantile corporation, being financially embarrassed, entered into a conference with some of its creditors, looking to a possible composition of its indebtedness. At this meeting only a few of the creditors were present, and E. A. W. Johnson, president and principal stockholder of the corporation, was invited to make a proposition. He proposed to pay each creditor, for an assignment to him of the creditor's demand against the corporation, the sum of 50 cents on the $1, payable in cash, or 60 cents, if payment was accepted in notes. The defendant in error was an account creditor, and sent its claim to a local attorney for collection. Mr. Johnson submitted his proposition to the local attorney of the defendant in error, which was accepted, subject to the approval of his client, and the attorney transferred to Mr. Johnson his client's account against the debtor, and received from Mr. Johnson his notes for 60 cents on the $1, which he transmitted to his client. The defendant in error promptly refused to accept the notes and returned them to its attorney, who delivered them to Mr. Johnson. Pending these negotiations Mr. Johnson, who had purchased a majority in amount of the claims against the corporation, sold its entire stock of merchandise to the agent of the claimant, who knew of the financial stress of the Johnson Company, and that the corporation's president and principal stockholder was buying up the claims against the corporation, and that some of the claims had not been purchased at the time of the sale to him. The sale was made in bulk, without any attempt at compliance with the sales in bulk act, as contained in Civil Code, § 3226 et seq. The traveling salesman of the defendant in error was present at the meeting of the creditors, when Mr. Johnson was invited to make his proposition. He testified that he happened to be in town, and was called in to the conference, but accepted no proposition. Mr. Johnson testified that the traveling salesman did accept his proposition. It was undisputed that neither the traveling salesman nor the attorney of the defendant in error had authority to compromise or sell at discount the claim of the defendant in error. At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff.

[1] 1. A sale of merchandise in bulk, without complying with the statute providing for such sales (Civil Code, § 3226 et seq.), gives to a creditor the right to proceed against the vendor as a fraudulent debtor. Carstarphen v. Fried, 124 Ga. 544, 52 S. E. 598. Such sale is declared to be fraudulent by the statute.

[2] 2. Under the evidence the verdict was demanded. The only conflict in the testimony related to a transaction between the creditor's traveling salesman and the president of the debtor corporation. But that is immaterial, as no authority of the agent to accept less than the full amount of his principal's debt was shown. An agent to collect cannot accept a less sum in settlement of his principal debt, nor sell at discount his principal's claim, without authority from his principal. Kaiser v. Hancock, 106 Ga. 217, 32 S. E. 123.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

WADLEY SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. STATE.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. STATUTES (§ 113*)—SUBJECTS AND TITLES—RAILROAD COMMISSION ACT.

The Railroad Commission act of 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 72) does not offend article 3, § 7, par. 8, of the Constitution of Georgia on the ground that the twelfth section of the act contains matter different from what is expressed in the title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 141-144; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 10*)—REGULATION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Section 6 of the Railroad Commission act of 1907 (Civil Code 1910, § 2663) contemplates that notice and an opportunity of a hearing be given to persons, railroads, or other corporations interested in the orders issued by the Commission, and that provision may be made for such notice either by statute or rule of the Commission. This section is to be construed to mean that the Commission shall not issue a special order in a particular case and directed to a person or corporation, without first giving notice and an opportunity for hearing to the person or corporation so to be affected thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 241, 297*)—CARRIERS (§ 2*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—EQUAL PROTECTION OF LAW—POWER OF RAILROAD COMMISSION.

A state statute, which confers on a Railroad Commission the power to require railroads to afford the usual and like customary facilities for interchange of freight to patrons of each and all routes or lines alike, and to make just and reasonable rules for preventing unjust discriminations, and provides for notice and an opportunity of a hearing of the railroad company to be affected by any order of the Commission, and for a violation of an order of the Commission imposes a penalty on the corporation in a sum not to exceed $5,000, in the discretion of the trial judge, and also subjects any person violating or abetting the violation of the order to punishment for a misdemeanor, does not offend the constitutional guaranties of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws, in that the railroad to be affected by the order is prevented from testing the validity of the statute of the order of the Railroad Commission because of excessive penalties.

4. CARRIERS (§ 13*)—REGULATIONS—VALIDITY.

The Georgia Railroad Commission act invests the Railroad Commission with power to require railroads to afford the usual and like customary facilities for interchange of freight to patrons of each and all routes or lines alike, and to make reasonable rules for preventing unjust discriminations. Under this power it is competent for the Commission to declare as an unlawful discrimination a course of conduct, whereby a railroad company, connecting with other railroad companies at each of its termini, which converge to a common point, affording a choice of routes from the common point to stations on its own line, receives from one of its connections freights destined to points on its own line without requiring prepayment of the earned charges of the favored carrier, and declines to receive from the connecting carrier at the other terminus freight destined to points on its own line without prepayment of the freight charges earned by that connecting carrier, where the conditions are substantially similar, and the effect of the course of conduct is to seriously curtail competition in rates and service to the patrons on its own line.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATIONS—PENALTIES—ACTIONS TO RECOVER.

The action was properly authorized by the Governor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 41*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The admission of irrelevant and immaterial evidence, not prejudicial to the losing party, is not cause for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 692*)—EXCEPTIONS—SCOPE AND SUFFICIENCY—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

An exception to the refusal of the court to allow a witness to answer a stated question is insufficient where the answer expected to be elicited is not given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2905-2909; Dec. Dig. § 692.*]

8. CHARGE OF COURT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The charge was adjusted to the law and facts and free of substantial error, and the evidence authorized the verdict.

Error from Superior Court, Jefferson County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by the State against the Wadley Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The action is by the state of Georgia against the Wadley Southern Railway Company to recover a penalty for disobedience to an order of the Railroad Commission of Georgia. The Central of Georgia Railway Company, a domestic corporation, owns and operates a line of railroad from Macon to Wadley and beyond. The Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company owns and operates a railroad from Macon to Rockledge. The Stillmore Air Line Railway Company operated a railroad from Wadley to Collins, where it connected with the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. The Wadley & Mt. Vernon Railroad Company operated a line of railroad from Wadley to Rockledge. In 1906 the Stillmore Air Line Railway Company and the Wadley & Mt. Vernon Railroad Company merged into a new corporation called the Wadley Southern Railway Company, and which was duly chartered under that name. The Central of Georgia Railway Company is the owner of all the stock and bonds of the Wadley Southern Railway Company. Adrian is a station on the Wadley Southern Railway Company between Wadley and Rockledge, being 27 miles distant from Wadley and 10 miles distant from Rockledge. On August 17, 1909, certain merchants and business men of Adrian addressed a petition to the Railroad Commission of Georgia representing that "the Wadley Southern refuses to handle freights delivered them at Rockledge by M. D. and S. without freight charges being fully prepaid to Rockledge," and praying the interposition of the Railroad Commission in aid of interchange of freights at that point. A hearing was had upon this petition, and on March 16, 1910, the following order was passed by the Railroad Commission of Georgia: "In re refusal of the Wadley Southern Railway Company to accept freight from the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company, at Rockledge, Georgia, without the prepayment of freight charges. * * * The Commission having heard evidence and argument of counsel in the foregoing complaint as to discrimination alleged to be practiced by the Wadley Southern Railway Company as against shippers to Adrian, Ga., over the line or route of the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company via Rockledge, Ga., and in favor of shippers over the line or route of the Central of Georgia Railway Company, at Wadley, Ga., and it appearing that the alleged unlawful discrimination arises out of the requirement of the Wadley Southern Railway Company that shippers shall prepay charges via Rockledge before it will receive freight at that point from the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company for Adrian, but does not require like prepayment of charges on freight via the Central of Georgia Railway Company at Wadley, thus affording facilities to patrons of the Central of Georgia Railway Company's line or route, for the interchange of freight, denied to patrons of the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company's line or route, and it appearing that the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company's line or route via Rockledge is a competitor of the Central of Georgia Railway Company's route or line via Wadley for freight moving to Adrian and other points on the Wadley Southern Railway Company between Rockledge and Wadley, and that the rule or requirement of the Wadley Southern Railway Company complained of is intended to afford and does afford to patrons of the Central of Georgia Railway Company facilities denied to patrons of the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company, a connecting line of the Wadley Southern Railway Company, and a competitor of the Central of Georgia Railway Company for Adrian business, which interferes with the exercise of the freedom of choice in routes by shippers, the Commission is of the opinion that the practice complained of is, under the law of Georgia, an unlawful discrimination, and such a discrimination as the Commission is required by law to forbid. It is therefore ordered that the Wadley Southern Railway Company at once desist from the discrimination specifically complained of in this case. Ordered further, that the Wadley Southern Railway Company, on and after the receipt of this order, afford to patrons or shippers over the line of the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company via Rockledge, the same facilities for the interchange of freight afforded to patrons or shippers over the line of the Central of Georgia Railway Company via Wadley." Notice of this order was duly communicated to the general freight agent of the Wadley Southern Railway Company, and the attorneys of the Wadley Southern corporation replied that they had advised that company that "the order of the Railroad Commission is not legal, and that the railroad company is not legally bound to observe it." Whereupon his excellency, the Governor, passed the following order: "In re Wadley Southern Railway Company refusal to accept at Rockledge, Ga., freight from the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railway Company, unless freight charges are prepaid. Whereas, the Railroad Commission of Georgia having notified me that the Wadley Southern Railroad Company had refused to obey the order of said Commission directing that said railway company should receive freight from the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company without requiring prepayment of freight charges, which refusal it is claimed by such Commission is an unauthorized and illegal discrimination under the facts, and subjecting the said company to a penalty for a violation of the Commission's orders. It is therefore ordered in conformity with the act approved August 23, 1907, that suit be instituted by the special attorney of the Railroad Commission in the name of the state of Georgia for the recovery of such penalty."

In pursuance of this order a petition was filed in the name of the state to recover of the Wadley Southern Railway Company $5,000 penalty as provided by the act approved August 23, 1907. The petition contained two counts. The first count alleged that the railroad company had failed and refused to obey, observe, and comply with the order of the Commission, whereby they became indebted to the state of Georgia in a sum not to exceed $5,000. The second count alleged that since July 6, 1909, the Wadley Southern Railway Company had refused and still refuses to receive freight from the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company at Rockledge, Ga., for points on its line, without prepayment of the freight, while during all this period the company had received and still receives from the Central of Georgia Railway Company at Wadley, Ga., freights shipped from Macon, Ga., and other points along its line of railroad without prepayment of the freight, and in this way the Wadley Southern Railway Company had discriminated against the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railway Company, one of its connecting lines, in favor of the Central of Georgia Railway Company, another of its connecting lines, and thus fails and refuses to afford the usual and customary facilities for the interchange of freight to the patrons of each of said routes and lines alike, contrary to the provision of the statute in such cases made and provided. The Wadley Southern filed its answer, denying its liability under either count, and attacked the constitutionality of the law providing for the penalty. A trial was had and a verdict was returned finding the railroad company subject to the penalty. A new trial was refused, and a bill of exceptions was sued out, complaining of the judgment refusing a new trial and various interlocutory rulings.

Lawton & Cunningham, for plaintiff in error. Jas. K. Hines, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. [1] 1. We will first consider whether the Railroad Commission Act of 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 72) contains any of the constitutional infirmities urged against it. The title is "An act to increase the membership of the Railroad Commission of Georgia, * * * to prescribe and fix penalties and punishments for failure and refusal to obey any order, rule or regulation of the Railroad Commission; to prescribe the form of procedure for enforcing the same * * * and for other purposes." The twelfth section (Civil Code 1910, § 2667) provides that "any common carrier * * * which shall violate any provision of this act or the acts heretofore passed, or which fails, omits or neglects to obey, observe or comply with any order, direction or requirement of the Commission * * * shall forfeit to the state of Georgia a sum not more than five thousand dollars for each and every offense, the amount to be fixed by the presiding judge." It is contended that article 3, § 7, par. 8, of the Constitution of Georgia, to the effect that no law shall pass which contains matter different from what is expressed in the title, has been violated by the inclusion in the twelfth section of matter not referred to in the title—in so far as it undertakes to give to the state a right of action for a violation of "any provisions of this act or of the acts heretofore passed, whereas the title refers only to penalties for the failure and refusal to observe any order, rule or regulation of the Railroad Commission." The general scope of this legislation was to retain to the Railroad Commission the power and authority heretofore conferred upon it by law, except as changed by the act, and to confer additional powers upon the Commission, with the view that the Commission should be vested with a general supervision over public service corporations, with power to require them to establish and maintain such public service and facilities as may be reasonable and just. Some of the rules for the regulation of railroads which were designed to be enforced by the Commission were in the form of statutes; but they were nevertheless binding on the Commission and all parties to be affected, as rules, just as much so as if such rules had been promulgated by the Commission. It was competent for the Legislature to deal with these statutory provisions as rules prescribed for the Commission to enforce, and the act did not offend the constitutional provision as contended. Richardson v. Macon, 132 Ga. 122, 63 S. E. 790.

[2] 2. It is said that the statutes giving validity to the orders of the Railroad Commission, which is the basis of this suit, do not provide for notice and hearing, nor do the rules of the Commission so provide, and therefore due process of law is not afforded. The Commission act of 1907 enlarged the powers of the Railroad Commission so as to give it jurisdiction and power over practically all public service corporations. In defining the jurisdiction the sixth section of the act (codified in Civil Code 1910, § 2663) declares that the Railroad Commission shall have and exercise all power and authority heretofore conferred on it by law and shall have general supervision over railroads and other public service corporations. In the exercise of its powers it was provided that it may proceed on its own initiative or on the complaints of others, and may require all common carriers and other public service companies under their supervision to establish and maintain such public service and facilities as may be reasonable and just, either by general rules or by special orders in particular cases, "provided that nothing in this section shall be so construed as to repeal or abrogate any existing law or rule of the Commission as to notice or hearings to persons, railroads or other corporations interested in their rates, orders, rules or regulations issued by said Commission before the same are issued, nor to repeal the law of this state as to notice by publication of a change in rates." The most casual reader of this section cannot fail to be impressed that the legislative purpose was to afford parties affected by any order in a particular case an opportunity to be heard in advance of its promulgation by the Commission. While the literal application of the proviso concerns the preservation of existing statutes, and orders of the Commission, with respect to notice and hearings, yet the implication is so pregnant of the legislative conception that such specific orders of the Commission must be made only after notice and hearing, that it would be doing violence to the legislative plan of supervision by the Commission to construe the act so as to impute a contrary purpose and intent. It was contemplated that provision for notice should be made by statute or rule of the Commission. Special statutory provision was made as to notice of a hearing for joint rates to roads that are not under the management of the same company, and as to the requirement about the location of depots (Civil Code 1910, § 2631); but as to other matters the Legislature left it to the Commission to formulate rules respecting notice and hearing. Although the reference in the clause relating to notice was to the preservation of existing statutes and rules of the Commission, there is no negation that the Commission might not from time to time amend or enlarge its rules so as to give other or additional notice. There is nothing in the present record contradicting the existence of a rule of the Commission providing for notice at the time of the passage of the act of 1907, nor is there any contention made that the Wadley Southern Railway Company did not in fact have notice of the hearing in the particular case. The defendant pleaded that the law did not provide for a hearing on the facts, and for that reason it violated the constitutional guaranties of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. The burden was on the railroad company to sustain its plea by submitting proof of the absence of any rule of the Commission providing for notice and a hearing. Civil Code, § 2626. It wholly failed in this particular, and we are bound to assume that there was a rule of the Commission as contemplated in the statute.

With regard to the complaint in the plea that the act made no provision for an appeal, it has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States that the due process of law guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment does not require that an appeal shall be provided for a party who has had one hearing before a competent tribunal, with full notice as to the time and place of hearing. Mich. C. R. R. Co. v. Powers, 201 U. S. 301, 302, 26 Sup. Ct. 459, 50 L. Ed. 744.

It will be observed that the point raised in the plea is the nonexistence of any rule of the Commission, and not any deficiency of the rule. As the defendant failed to show the nonexistence of any rule of the Commission, or, if there was a rule, that it was faulty in any respect, the latter question cannot arise in this case.

[3] 3. It is urged that the provisions of the act of 1907 (Civil Code 1910, §§ 2667, 2668) prescribing penalties are unconstitutional as being a denial of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws as guaranteed by the Constitutions of the state of Georgia and of the United States because of their excessive penalties. The first of these sections subjects a public service corporation to a penalty not to exceed $5,000 for each and every violation of any provision of that section, or of acts heretofore passed, or of any order of the Commission; the amount of the penalty to be fixed by the presiding judge. The latter section declares that every officer, agent, or employé of the corporation violating or abetting the violation of any statute, or of any order of the Commission, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. The general policy of the act of 1907, as well as the previous acts pertaining to the regulation of railroads, etc., is to devolve upon the Railroad Commission the duty of formulating rules and regulations, rather than doing so by direct enactment. The Legislature has not undertaken by statute to establish either passenger or freight rates, but has referred the ascertainment of just and reasonable rates to the Railroad Commission.

The penal feature is the force of the law, and to deny the right of the Legislature to impose appropriate penalties for violations of orders of the Commission, which the Commission is authorized to issue after due notice to the corporation to be affected, and on the fullest investigation, would in effect be a denial of the power of the state to regulate public service corporations by commissions or other administrative agency. The power of the Legislature to create a commission to regulate public service corporations and to prevent unjust discriminations by them is too well established in the jurisprudence of this state to be contested at this late day. Ga. R. R. v. Smith, 70 Ga. 694. The distinction is obvious between a case where the statute imposes a penalty for disobedience to an order of the Commission, made after notice and an opportunity to be heard, and the case of a statute which imposes serious and heavy penalties for its violation, where the validity of the statute depends upon the existence of facts and their effect, which can only be determined after an investigation of a most complicated and technical character. An illustration of the latter instance may be found in the case of Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 23 Sup. Ct. 441, 52 L. Ed. 714, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 932. In that case the Legislature of the state of Minnesota enacted a statute fixing passenger tariffs and commodity rates for railroads much lower than existing schedules, and subjected the carrier, its agents and employes, to serious and heavy penalties for each violation of the statute; and it was held that the statute was unconstitutional because the penalties for its violation are so enormous that persons affected thereby are prevented from resorting to the courts for the purpose of showing the tariff schedules provided in the statute would yield so little revenue that their observance would practically confiscate the carrier's property. It will hardly be doubted that a state may impose penalties, such as will tend to compel obedience to its mandates. If the penalties are imposed for the violation of an order, passed after notice and an opportunity for a hearing, it cannot be said that the parties affected have been denied due process of law or the equal protection of the law.

[4] 4. The point is made that the order of the Commission is null and void because it is neither just nor reasonable, in that it undertakes to exact of the defendant unreasonable and unlawful requirements. It is therefore important to ascertain exactly upon what state of facts the order was intended to operate, and in reaching a conclusion upon the matter it is proper to consider the application of the merchants of Adrian in connection with the order of the Commission made thereon. These merchants represented to the Commission that the Wadley Southern Railway Company refused to handle freights delivered to them at Rockledge by the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company without freight charges being fully prepaid to Rockledge, and the commissioner's order recited that after investigation the Commission found that the alleged unlawful discrimination arose out of the requirement of the Wadley Southern Railway Company that shippers shall prepay charges via Rockledge before it will receive freight at that point from the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company for Adrian, but does not require like prepayment of charges on freight via the Central of Georgia Railway Company at Wadley, thus affording facilities to patrons of the Central of Georgia Railway Company's line or route, for the interchange of freight, denied to patrons of the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company's line or route; that the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company's line or route via Rockledge is a competitor of the Central of Georgia Railway Company's route or line via Wadley for freight moving to Adrian and other points on the Wadley Southern Railway Company between Rockledge and Wadley; that the requirement of the Wadley Southern Railroad Company complained of is intended to afford, and does afford, to the patrons of the Central of Georgia Railway Company facilities denied to patrons of the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company, a connecting line of the Wadley Southern Railway Company for Adrian business, which interferes with the exercise of the freedom of choice in routes by shippers; and that the practice complained of is an unlawful discrimination, and such as the Commission is required by law to forbid. From these findings of fact it is clearly apparent that the act condemned as an unlawful discrimination was the practice of the Wadley Southern Railway Company to receive from the Central of Georgia Railway Company at Wadley, one of its termini, shipments of freight destined to Adrian without prepayment of freight, and to refuse to receive shipments of freight destined to Adrian from the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company at Rockledge, its other terminus, unless the charges were prepaid. The order prohibited the defendant from declining freight shipped over the Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company to Adrian with freight charges to be paid and collected at points of destination, or furnishing different facilities in this matter to the Central of Georgia Railway Company.

Given this construction, does the order exact of the defendant an unreasonable and unlawful requirement? In the original act establishing the Railroad Commission it was enacted that the Commission shall make just and reasonable rules and regulations as may be necessary for preventing unjust discriminations in the transportation of freight and passengers on the railroads of this state. Civil Code, § 2630. The supplementary act of 1907 clothes the Commission with power and authority "to require all common carriers and other public service companies under their supervision to establish and maintain such public service and facilities as may be reasonable and just either by general rules or by special orders in particular cases." Civil Code, § 2663. The contention is that even under these broad powers it is not competent for the Commission to pass the order complained of. It is argued that the Commission is not vested with power to force the defendant into contractual relations with other lines, or to prevent it from selecting those with whom it shall deal on preferential terms, or terms of mutual confidence and trust. It is true that railroad companies cannot be required to issue through bills of lading or to contract to forward goods beyond their own lines. Coles v. Central R. R., 86 Ga. 251, 12 S. E. 749; State v. W. & T. R. R. Co., 104 Ga. 437, 30 S. E. 891. Neither the purpose nor the effect of this order is to require the defendant to issue a through bill of lading beyond its own line. Nor is its purpose and effect to require any independent contractual relation between the defendant and another carrier. Though the collection of the entire freight charge at destination implies an obligation to account for the connecting carriers' share of it, nevertheless this is but one incident of a course of business voluntarily adopted by the carrier, whereby facilities respecting the interchange of freight is afforded to one connecting carrier, and denied to another connecting carrier, in contravention of the statute against unjust discrimination. The imperative quality of the order is to prohibit the defendant from favoring one carrier to the injury of another, and the public, where conditions as to the service are substantially alike in both cases. It is to prevent a discrimination which practically deprives the merchants of Adrian of any competition in rates and service because of the defendant's favoritism to the carrier on one end of the line, and the refusal of the same privileges to the carrier at the other end of the line. Where conditions are substantially the same, the denial by a carrier to one of its connections of the same facilities for the interchange of freight accorded to another connecting carrier, and which practically deprives points on its line of the opportunity of competition in service and rates, is an unjust discrimination. A. T. & S. R. R. v. D. & W. O. R. R., 110 U. S. 667, 4 Sup. Ct. 185, 28 L. Ed. 291; B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Adams Express Co. (C. C.) 22 Fed. 404; A. & V. Ry. Co. v. Miss. R. R. Co., 203 U. S. 496, 27 Sup. Ct. 163, 51 L. Ed. 289; Diamond Mills Co. v. B. & M. R. R. Co., 9 Interst. Com. R. 311. And it is within the power of the Commission to make rules and regulations for preventing unjust discriminations in the transportation of freight. Augusta Brokerage Co. v. Cen. of Ga. Ry. Co., 121 Ga. 48, 48 S. E. 714.

A case much in point is that of Logan v. Central R. R. Co., 74 Ga. 684. The Central Railroad Company operated a road from Savannah to Macon, with branches to other points in the state. It adopted a rule that no shipments of salt or other merchandise from Brunswick in competition with Savannah would be received from local stations on its line unless charges were prepaid and shipments delivered by drays as local business. There was another railroad from Brunswick to the interior of the state, from which the Central Railroad refused to receive merchandise unless charges were prepaid and delivered in drays. This court held that this rule of the railroad was in the very teeth of the act of 1874 (Civil Code, § 2657), in that it did not "afford the usual and like customary facilities for interchange of freights to patrons of each and all routes or lines alike." And this court also held in Macon, Dublin & Savannah Railroad Company v. Graham, 117 Ga. 555, 43 S. E. 1000, that "a common carrier cannot, in this state, lawfully discriminate against one of two or more connecting carriers as to facilities afforded, or the charges made touching an interchange of freight."

It is contended that section 2657 does not require the Commission to afford the facilities of the character required by this order of the Commission, but that its requirement is only applicable to physical connections and physical appliances. We do not think the section should be so restricted in its application. It applies to every facility necessary for the safety and convenience of passengers and for the prompt transportation of freight. Besides, the more recent act of 1907 (Civil Code, § 2630) confers on the Railroad Commission the power to require all railroads to maintain such public service and facilities as may be reasonable and just. It does not require argument to prove that a preferential discrimination by a carrier in favor of one of its connections, which has the effect to stifle competition to points on its own line, because the same facilities are not extended to another of its connections under substantially the same conditions, is neither just nor reasonable. At common law common carriers were allowed to discriminate in favor of some of its patrons so long as the bestowal of favors did not violate their duty to the public. Ocean Steamship Co. v. Savannah Supply Co., 131 Ga. 834, 63 S. E. 577, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 867, 127 Am. St. Rep. 265, 15 Ann. Cas. 1044. But railroad companies of the present day are not only common carriers charged with the performance of their common-law duties as such, but they are also quasi public institutions, and in this relation owe additional duties to the public and are subject to governmental regulation. Certainly a regulation is just and reasonable which requires a carrier not to enter into a specific contract with a connection, but, if it voluntarily extends facilities and privileges to one of its connections, that it must also, under substantially the same conditions, give the same facilities and privileges to the other connections, where the result of its favoritism is the injury of its patrons at intermediate points on its own line.

[5] 5. The suit was for a violation of the order of the Commission. That order was based on the acts of 1874 and 1907, as has already been pointed out. A suit for a penalty for disobedience to the order of the Railroad Commission must be brought in the name of the state by direction of the Governor. Civil Code, § 2667. As the order of the Commission is based on the violation of the acts of 1874 and 1907, the violation of the Commission's order is likewise a violation of the statute. The Governor ordered a suit to be instituted in the name of the state for the violation of the Commission's order, and even if the second count was necessary there was no demurrer interposed to it, and it is not made to appear that any evidence was received but what was admissible under the first count.

[6] 6. Objection was made to certain evidence as being irrelevant and immaterial. Granting the objection should have been sustained, this is not cause for a new trial where the evidence was not of such character as to prejudice the defendant.

[7] 7. Exception is also taken to the refusal of the court to permit a witness to answer a certain question. But as the expected answer is not set out, the assignment of error is insufficient.

[§] 8. The court's charge was in substantial accord with the principles of law herein enunciated and sufficiently comprehensive to cover the real issues in the case, and the evidence authorized the verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

NIXON et al. v. LEHMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RECORDS (§ 17*)—ESTABLISHMENT OF LOST RECORDS—COURT OF ORDINARY.

After an action of complaint for land is filed, if it becomes necessary to perfect any muniment of title by a proceeding in another court to establish one of its lost records, a party may apply to such court for any proper order, upon giving notice to the adverse party.

(a) The court of ordinary, being a court of general jurisdiction concerning the administration of estates, has the inherent power to establish a copy of one of its own orders (pertaining to such administration) which has been recorded, where both the order and the book containing its record are lost.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Records, Cent. Dig. §§ 25, 26, 29, 30; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 15*)—DOCKETS—ORDER OF CALLING AND HEARING CAUSES.

The judge of the superior court is not required to peremptorily call the trial docket in its order; and where two cases between the same parties are on the docket he may, in his discretion, give precedence in trial to the case last on the docket. There was no abuse of discretion in this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 34, 35; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

3. RECORDS (§ 17*)—ESTABLISHMENT OF LOST RECORDS—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING.

In a proceeding to establish a copy of a lost record, the date of the record, as alleged in the pleading, may be changed by amendment. There was no error in refusing a continuance in this case because of the allowance of the amendment.

4. RECORDS (§ 17*)—ESTABLISHMENT OF LOST RECORDS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding to establish a copy of a lost record of an order granting an administrator leave to sell the land of his intestate, it is competent to receive in evidence the newspaper containing the notice of the application, the newspaper containing the advertisement of sale, the ordinary's receipt for the fee for granting the order of sale, and the administrator's return of the sale of the land. While a recital in an administrator's deed that he sold the land affords no direct evidence of the truth of the facts recited, nevertheless the deed with such recital is competent evidence, as tending to show that the administrator was not acting independently of the court of ordinary, but conformably to an order of that court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Records, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 337*)—SALE OF PROPERTY—NOTICE OF APPLICATION.

The statute does not require that notice of an application by an administrator for leave to sell the land of his intestate shall be in the form of a citation by the ordinary; it may be signed by the administrator. The form of the notice in this case was substantially that required by the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1397-1409; Dec. Dig. § 337.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTIONS—PERFORMANCE OF OFFICIAL DUTY.

An administrator's return must be under oath. Where a return was made, and upon it was indorsed: "Examined and approved, and ordered to record. July 1, 1873. John M. James, Ordinary"—and the return was recorded without the vouchers which were filed with it, and the vouchers are subsequently recorded under a nunc pro tunc order, the record of such return will not be rejected, on the ground that it does not appear that the return was made under oath. It is to be presumed that the ordinary did his duty in requiring that the administrator make oath to his return before he received it, in the absence of aliunde evidence to the contrary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

7. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence examined, and found to demand the verdict.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

8. CONTINUANCE (§ 30*)—GROUNDS—SURPRISE—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING.

In proceedings for the establishment of a lost record, a continuance, on the ground of surprise in allowing a pleading to be amended as to the date of the record, was properly refused, where the application did not measure up to the requirement of Civ. Code 1910, § 5714, stating the requisites of an application for continuance on the ground of surprise in allowing amendments to pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-112; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; Price Edwards, Judge.

Action by E. E. Nixon and others against J. S. Lehman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

J. S. James, for plaintiffs in error. L. R. Ray, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The heirs at law of John W. Nixon instituted an action of complaint for land against J. S. Lehman in Douglas superior court. The defendant claimed title through mesne conveyances under a deed from Z. A. Rice, administrator of John W. Nixon, purporting to have been executed on December 25, 1872. Lehman then filed a petition to the court of ordinary to establish a copy of an order of sale, alleged to have been granted by the ordinary, and the plaintiffs in the ejectment suit resisted the application. By consent, the case was appealed to the superior court; and the exceptions are to the direction of a verdict establishing the lost original, and to certain pendente lite rulings made on the trial.

[1] 1. After an action of complaint for land is filed, if it becomes necessary to perfect any muniment of title by a proceeding in another court to amend or add to its records thereof touching such muniment, a party may apply to such court for a nunc pro tunc order, upon giving notice to the adverse party. Wimberly v. Mansfield, 70 Ga. 783. The application was by the defendant in the ejectment suit, who alleged: That he was the owner of the land (which was described); that one of his muniments of title was an order, granted at the September term, 1872, of the court of ordinary of that county, authorizing Z. A. Rice, the administrator of John W. Nixon, to sell the land for the purpose of paying the debts of his intestate and making distribution; that the order, copy of which was attached, was lost, and the record book wherein it was recorded was also lost; that the administrator was dead, and there was no representation of his estate; and that the plaintiffs in the ejectment suit were the heirs at law of John W. Nixon. The prayer was to establish the lost order and record. Service of notice on the heirs at law of John W. Nixon was acknowledged by their attorney. The court of ordinary is a court of record, and has power to establish its lost records; and the allegations of the application presented a proper case for the exercise of this power.

[2] 2. When the case on appeal was called, counsel for the plaintiffs in the ejectment suit objected to its being called out of its order, in advance of the ejectment suit, which was docketed earlier on the court's calendar. The judge overruled this objection. A judge of the superior court is not required to peremptorily call the cases on his docket in their order; he may exercise a discretion in calling the docket. Wood v. Wood, 135 Ga. 385, 69 S. E. 549. The court did not abuse his discretion in this case.

[3, §] 3. On the trial the court alleged several amendments to the application, changing the date of the granting of the alleged order. There was no error in allowing the pleadings to be amended in this respect. The various dates ranged between August and October, 1872, and the final amendment fixed the date of the grant of the alleged order at the September term, 1872. A motion was made for a continuance on the ground of surprise; but, as the showing did not measure up to the requirement of the Civil Code of 1910, § 5714, the court did not err in refusing to continue the case.

[4] 4. The order was alleged to have been granted at the September term, 1872, of the court of ordinary of Douglas county, and the proceeding to establish it was filed on December 15, 1903, a little more than 31 years thereafter. Not only was it alleged that the order was lost, but also that the record book which contained it could not be found. From this great lapse of time, necessarily circumstantial evidence must be resorted to; and any circumstance legitimately offering an inference that the order was granted, as contended, may be considered. The newspaper containing the advertisement of notice of the application for leave to sell, the return of the administrator that he had sold the land and distributed the proceeds, a receipt by the ordinary for his costs for granting the order, and similar evidence may be looked to in determining whether the order was in fact granted by the court of ordinary. Attaway v. Carswell, 89 Ga. 343, 15 S. E. 472. When the applicant tendered in evidence the administrator's deed, it was objected to, on the ground that it recited that the order was granted on August 24, 1872, and that the land was insufficiently described. With reference to the first objection, the recital in the deed of the order of sale affords no direct evidence of the truth of the facts recited; but the deed is receivable in evidence, as showing a consistency with the contention that the administrator was acting under power of the court of ordinary, and not independently of it. Attaway v. Carswell, supra. If, in point of fact, the ordinary granted the administrator power to sell, a misrecital of the date of the order will not invalidate the deed, nor require its exclusion from evidence. And, although the description of the land may be lacking in definiteness, so as to give efficacy to the deed as a conveyance of title, yet, as the contention is that the order was to sell all of the lands of the estate, and the deed purports to convey land under such order, the deed is not inadmissible for lack of a full description of the land it purports to convey.

[5] 5. The court allowed in evidence several issues of the Atlanta Daily Sun, which contained the following advertisement: "Georgia, Douglas County. Notice is hereby given to all persons concerned, that application will be made to the court of ordinary of said county, at the first regular term after the expiration of sixty days from the date of this notice, for leave to sell the lands belonging to the estate of John W. Nixon, late of said county deceased. June 29, 1872. Z. A. Rice, Administrator." Four of the issues of the paper were dated in July; the first bearing date July 9, 1872. Six issues were dated in August; and several were dated in September and October. There was proof that there was no newspaper published in Douglas county at that time, and that the county advertisements were published in the Daily Sun newspaper, which circulated in Douglas county. The form of the notice was in compliance with the statute. Civil Code, § 4026; Davie v. McDaniel, 47 Ga. 195; Reese on Executors, 402. The fact that the paper contained the advertisement beyond the time the application was to have been made does not in any way affect the legality of the notice. Several issues of the Atlanta Daily Sun, containing an advertisement of the sale of "the tract of land in said county [Douglas] whereon John W. Nixon resided at his death," and reciting that it was to be sold by his administrator, pursuant to an order of the ordinary of Douglas county, were admitted in evidence. The advertisement purported to have been dated September 2, 1872. This evidence was competent to show that the administrator purposed to sell under an order of the ordinary, and was not open to any of the objections thereto.

[8] 6. The applicant introduced in evidence the record containing what purported to be the annual return of Z. A. Rice, administrator of the estate of John W. Nixon, wherein the administrator charged himself with the proceeds of the sale of the land and credited himself with certain items, including payments to the heirs of their distributive shares and to the ordinary for his costs for granting the order to sell the land of the deceased. The original return was also introduced, and upon it was indorsed: "Examined and approved, and ordered to record. July 1, 1873. John M. James, Ordinary." The original return was not signed; nor was the approval of the ordinary recorded with the return. Subsequently, in 1906, the original return and vouchers were found in the ordinary's office, and the ordinary passed an order nunc pro tunc, amending the record of the return by adding the approval of the ordinary which appeared on the original return, and by recording the vouchers. This evidence was competent. While the statute requires that returns by an administrator shall be made under oath, and contemplates that the return shall be signed by the administrator, and shall disclose that it was made under oath, yet, where the return is made to the ordinary, accepted and approved by him, and entered of record, it will be presumed prima facie that the ordinary did his duty, and would not have approved and ordered the return to record, except they were sworn to by the administrator.

[7] 7. There was no error in the various rulings complained of, and the evidence demanded the verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

COHEN v. MEADOR et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

EXECUTION (§ 171*)—JUDGMENT (§ 138*)—EQUITABLE RELIEF—GROUNDS.

A court of equity will not enjoin the enforcement of an execution issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, where it appears that the parties to the suit have had their day in court, and the defendant in execution offered no evidence on the trial of the case, and it not appearing that he was prevented from so doing by fraud or accident, or the act of the other party, unmixed with negligence or fraud on his part.

(a) The judgment of the court, in such a case, adjudicated that all the elements necessary to a valid judgment were had at the trial, and that all the issues made between the parties were adjudicated.

(b) Where a suit was filed by the trustee of a bankrupt, as such, to recover a debt due by the defendant to the bankrupt, and pending the suit in court the trustee was discharged by the bankrupt court, but defendant offered no evidence on the trial, and judgment was taken in favor of the trustee against the defendant by default, held, that the plaintiff and defendant are concluded by the judgment, which adjudicated the rights of the parties as shown by the pleadings, among which are that the trustee as alleged, is trustee; and it is too late, after judgment, to ask a court of equity to open the judgment and let in defenses which could have been made before judgment.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Morris Cohen against T. D. Meador, trustee in bankruptcy for the J. J. & J. E. Maddox Grocery Company, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jno. Clay Smith, Morris Macks, and R. O. Lovett, for plaintiff in error. Tindall & Silverman, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. T. D. Meador, as trustee in bankruptcy for the J. J. & J. E. Maddox Grocery Company, filed a suit to the January term, 1911, of the Fulton superior court, against Morris Cohen, on a contract of guaranty for the debt of one Loeb. At the appearance term Cohen filed an answer, which was stricken on motion. No exception was taken to the order striking the defendant's answer. Pending this case in the superior court, the assets of the bankrupt were sold, and some of the defendants in the present case became the purchasers of such assets, including the claim in suit against Cohen. The trustee was discharged by the bankruptcy court, and after the order of discharge, the case being in default, judgment was taken in the name of Meador, trustee, against the defendant, and no attack was made thereon until the present suit was filed, other than an affidavit of illegality to the fi. fa. issued on the judgment, made by Cohen, which the sheriff refused to accept. Cohen then filed the present petition, praying for injunction and relief from the enforcement of the judgment, on the ground that prior to the filing of the suit against him he had settled in full the debt for which the judgment was obtained, and because the judgment was obtained in the name of T. D. Meador, trustee, when in fact, while the suit was pending, Tindall & Silverman became the transferees and true owners of all the assets of the J. J. & J. E. Maddox Grocery Company, and Meador as trustee had been discharged. On the interlocutory hearing, the court declined to grant the injunction prayed for, and the plaintiff excepted.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The controlling question made by the record in this case is whether the judgment taken in the name of Meador, as trustee, after he had been discharged as such by the bankruptcy court, was a valid judgment. This suit was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover an amount claimed to be due to the parties for which the plaintiff was trustee. It is elementary that necessary parties are essential in the trial of every case, before a valid judgment can be rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction. But where such a court has the necessary parties before it, and the proper subject-matter within the jurisdiction of the court, a judgment rendered adjudicates the rights of the parties to the suit. Where there is a real party plaintiff, and a real party defendant, and the plaintiff recovers in the cause of action against the defendant the amount sued for, such a judgment adjudicates that the defendant owed the plaintiff the amount recovered. And such a suit settles the further fact that every element necessary in the suit was present which enabled the plaintiff to recover, and when that appears the parties to the suit are concluded by the judgment. What are the elements here? The defendant was alleged to owe the bankrupt, and the trustee in bankruptcy was the representative of the interest of the bankrupt. The plaintiff was therefore a proper party to sue. The defendant was alleged to owe the plaintiff and was a proper party to be sued. The amount sued for was awarded by the judgment. Rightly or wrongly, the judgment adjudicates these facts. It does not matter what the real fact is; the judgment cannot be upset by saying that some element necessary to a recovery is lacking, or is untrue, after the judgment is rendered. The judgment is attacked as void because these elements necessary to the suit and judgment are lacking, but the judgment settled those contentions against the defendant. In the case of Roberts v. Martin, 70 Ga. 186, 197, 198, it was said: "When, therefore, the order of the court of ordinary was shown, granting leave to Jarrell Beasely, the administrator, to sell the lands belonging to the estate of Robert C. Beasely, the law presumed that all had been done which was necessary to have been done, before the same was granted, and the court should not have gone behind the judgment. This includes not only the necessity of the sale, and that it would be for the benefit of the heirs and creditors, but of the fact that Jarrell Beasely was the administrator, and authorized to make the sale. [Davie v. McDaniel] 47 Ga. 195; [Patterson v. Lemon] 50 Ga. 231."

It is also insisted that the judgment was void because no evidence was introduced on the trial; but under our system of procedure a judgment by default is the same as where proof is offered, and the judgment here is by default. The discharge of a bankrupt prevents the enforcement of a debt against him, covered by such discharge; but, if he fails to plead it in an action on the debt, he is bound by the judgment rendered against him. The judgment adjudicates all issues between the parties to the case. The judgment involved in this case finds that the plaintiff was the trustee of the bankrupt, and that the defendant owed the plaintiff as the trustee of the bankrupt. Whether it was so in point of fact before the judgment, it is too late after the judgment to enjoin it, if the defendant did not avail himself, on account of his own laches, of whatever defense he might have had at the trial. Anything affecting the plaintiff's right to recover ought to be set up before judgment, and not after it is rendered. There would be no end to litigation if any other rule obtained. No sufficient reason appears why the defendant did not appear and make whatever defense he might have legally or equitably set up at the trial. He was duly served and had his day in court, and it is too late after judgment to seek the aid of a court of equity in order to make the defense he should have made at the trial. That he did not appear in court and make his defense is due to his own laches. The plaintiff in error insists that he had suffered bodily and mentally for many months, that all of his business was in bad shape and very much disorganized, and that this is the real reason he could not recall the circumstances and produce the receipt for payment at the trial. But we do not think this state of facts furnished a sufficient excuse for a court of equity to interfere, and, besides, there was evidence in this case from which the trial court could have reached the conclusion that the receipt on which the plaintiff in error relied to show payment of the debt on which the judgment was based had been given to the plaintiff because of a payment by him of another and entirely distinct account. No motion was made to open the judgment or set it aside, and after the proper parties have had their day in court, and the subject-matter of the suit was adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction, a court of equity will not interfere to enjoin the execution issued upon the judgment from proceeding according to law. It nowhere appears that the defendant was prevented from making his defense at the trial by fraud, accident, or mistake, or by the act of his adversary, unmixed with any negligence or fraud on his own part; and the well-established rule in such cases is that a court of equity will not interfere. Civil Code 1910, § 4585; Pollock v. Gilbert, 16 Ga. 398, 60 Am. Dec. 732; Moore v. Gill, 43 Ga. 388; Thomasson v. Fannin, 54 Ga. 361; Lamar v. Knott, 74 Ga. 379; McWilliams v. Walthall, 77 Ga. 9; *Gentle v. (Syllabus by the Court.)1. CORPORATIONS (§ 519) — TRANSFER OF NOTE—EXECUTION—EVIDENCE.

The execution of a written transfer of a promissory note by a corporation as the payee, denied on oath, is proved by the undisputed evidence of the president of the corporation that he, as president and duly authorized agent of the corporation, executed the written transfer of the note for and in the name of the corporation. In such case the testimony of a subscribing witness to the written transfer was not necessary to prove its execution. Civil Code 1910, § 5833 (5).

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 465*)—NOTES—TRANSFER—USE OF SEAL.

A written transfer of a note by a corporation as the payee named therein is sufficient to pass title to the transferee, although the corporate seal is not affixed to the transfer. In this case, however, the record is silent as to whether the written transfer had or had not the seal of the corporation attached. The note, with written transfer, was properly admitted in evidence. Almand v. Equitable Mortgage Co., 113 Ga. 983, 39 S. E. 421.

3. COSTS (§ 260*)—FRIVOLOUS APPEAL—DISMISSAL—DAMAGES.

No defense whatever was made to the suit on the merits, and the special assignments of error dealt with in the foregoing rulings are so manifestly frivolous that the judgment of the lower court is affirmed, with 10 per cent. on the amount of the judgment as damages for delay in suing out and prosecuting the writ of error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 538) — ACTION ON NOTE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a suit on a promissory note, where the defendant admitted the execution of the note and that the plaintiff was the lawful holder, and assumed the burden of establishing an affirmative defense, it was erroneous to charge that the burden was on the plaintiff to make out his case by a preponderance of the evidence. A prima facie right to recover having been admitted, and the burden assumed by the defendant, this instruction was calculated to mislead and confuse the jurors, and induce them to solve any doubts against the plaintiff, especially as the evidence was close, and a verdict for either party would have been authorized.

2. WITNESSES (§ 393*)—IMPEACHMENT—CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS.

The evidence of a party as a witness on a previous trial of the case, contained in a brief of the evidence agreed to by his attorney and approved by the court and filed as a part of his motion for a new trial, is competent and admissible for the purpose of impeachment; proper preliminary proof for its introduction having been made.

Action by J. M. Cox against M. D. McKinley. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

M. C. Few, for plaintiff in error. Thos. W. & Watt. H. Milner, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Cox sued McKinley on two promissory notes, alleged to have been given for the rental of land therein described for the year 1909. The defendant admitted the execution of the notes, and set up as a defense that, before the time arrived when he was to take possession of the land rented, he notified the plaintiff that he would be unable to carry out his contract, and thereupon the plaintiff re-rented a portion of the land to other tenants, and cultivated the remainder of the land himself; and the defendant sets up these acts of the plaintiff as amounting in law to a rescission of the rental contract, and says that he was thereupon released from all liability on the note. On the trial the testimony in behalf of the defendant tended to prove his defense. This defense was met by evidence in behalf of the plaintiff which tended to show that he had refused to release the defendant from the rental contract, and that in re-renting the land and cultivating the portion not rented he did so under the express direction and authority of the defendant, who promised him that he would be responsible for any balance that might be due on the rent notes over and above what the plaintiff had realized from the re-rental of the land. The plaintiff further contended that, even without this direction and promise, it was his duty under the law to lessen the damages, and that in pursuance of this obligation he had lessened the damages to the defendant to the extent of half of the amount of the rent notes, by renting some of the land, and now only claimed the other half due on the notes. The issue thus presented by the evidence was in sharp conflict, and a verdict for either party would have been authorized. The law applicable to this issue was correctly charged.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r indexes

Unquestionably the plaintiff, after the renunciation of the rental contract by the defendant, was at liberty to treat such renunciation as a breach of the contract, and to sue for any damages he might have sustained by reason of the breach, treating the contract as still binding. Smith v. Georgia Loan, Savings & Banking Co., 113 Ga. 975, 39 S. E. 410. If, without authority or direction of the defendant, upon the renunciation of the contract by the defendant, the plaintiff had consented either expressly or constructively to the renunciation of the contract, it would have amounted in law to a rescission; but if, on the contrary, he did not by his conduct rescind the contract, but simply endeavored to lessen the damages under the consent and direction of the plaintiff himself, he would have been in law and equity entitled to recover any balance due on the rental notes. But, as before stated, the law applicable to this issue made by the evidence was fairly and correctly presented to the jury, and the verdict on this issue would have settled the conflict, and in the absence of any material error, leading the jury to find for one party rather than for the other, would not be disturbed by this court. We think, however, that the court in the trial of the case committed two errors, which, in view of the close character of the case on the evidence, entitled the plaintiff in error to another trial.

[1] 1. On the trial the defendant admitted the execution of the rent notes and that the plaintiff was the lawful holder thereof, and he assumed the burden of proving his affirmative defense. Nevertheless the court charged the jury to the effect that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to make out his case by a preponderance of the evidence. A prima facie case was admitted by the defendant, and in view of this fact it was misleading and confusing to the jury to instruct them that the burden still remained upon the plaintiff to prove his case to their satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence. The court should have instructed the jury that, under the admission of the defendant as to the prima facie right of the plaintiff to recover, the burden was upon the defendant to meet this prima facie right by establishing his affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence. The evidence on the controlling issue in the case presented by the defendant's affirmative plea was close, and it was presumptively prejudicial to the plaintiff, under this state of the evidence, to place upon him a burden from which he had been relieved by the admission of the defendant, and it may have led the jury to decide the wavering balance in favor of the defendant.

[2] 2. The controlling question in the case was whether, upon the renunciation of the contract by the defendant, he had been released from further performance by the conduct of the plaintiff, or whether he had, upon renouncing the contract, authorized the plaintiff to re-rent the land, agreeing to pay any balance that the plaintiff might not receive from the re-renting. The plaintiff offered to prove, in support of his contention that he was simply acting under the authority of the defendant in re-renting a portion of the land, an admission which the defendant made on the former trial of the case, contained in the brief of the evidence which had been agreed to by his counsel and approved by the court. This admission is as follows: "I could not move on the land, and he would not release me. In January Mr. Lynch came to me and said there was a man down there who wanted to rent part of this land. I told him to go back and tell Mr. Cox to rent the land out to the very best advantage; to let Will Williams have what land he wanted, and do the best he could with the rest. I had repeatedly told him that he should not lose anything, and I told Mr. Lynch so." The defendant, as a witness, denied that he had made this statement on a former trial, and the record was offered to impeach him by the contradictory statement, and the judge excluded it, and plaintiff excepted. We think this was error (Cox v. Prater, 67 Ga. 588); and more especially error in view of the evidence introduced on the trial that the Will Williams mentioned in this record had in fact re-rented from the plaintiff a portion of the land after the defendant's renunciation of his contract, and the Mr. Lynch referred to was apparently authorized by the defendant to make this statement for him to the plaintiff.

Other than as above discussed, we find no material error of law; but, because of these two errors, a new trial is granted.

Judgment reversed.

BROOKS v. GRIFFIN. (No. 3,658.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 241*)—PROPERTY OF WIFE—EXECUTION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize the conclusion that the claimant, though she was the wife of the defendant in fi. fa., was the true owner of the horse levied upon. In considering transactions between husband and wife, slight circumstances, under certain conditions, may be sufficient to satisfy a jury of the existence of fraud; but in all such cases the bona fides of the transaction is to be determined by the jury. In the present case it cannot be said that the evidence demanded a finding other than that returned by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 29*)—CONDUCT OF JUDGE—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE.

It is not error for a trial judge, in ruling upon the validity of objections to testimony, to repeat, as he remembers it, the substance of a material portion of the testimony of the witness then upon the stand, and to inquire of the witness whether the court's recollection of the testimony is correct. Nor does the fact that the judge, in ruling upon the admissibility of testimony, states its substance as being what has been testified, without, however, intimating in any way the weight or credit to be attached to it, sustain an assignment of error complaining that the court "intimated and expressed an opinion as to the facts of the case."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 80-84; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—MATTERS OF FACT OR CONCLUSIONS.

Evidence on the part of a purchaser of a horse that another person, designated by him, had never owned it, is not objectionable as being the conclusion of the witness, but is to be treated as the statement of a substantive fact, which would naturally rest in the knowledge of the witness as the owner of the horse. As title to personal property may pass by mere delivery, the nature of the title of one in possession of personal property, under such circumstances, is not an opinion, but a matter of fact, resting peculiarly within the knowledge of the party in possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149-2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

4. CHARGE OF COURT—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE—REQUESTS.

The excerpts from the charge of the court to which exceptions are taken are adjusted to the evidence, and, though one of these excerpts is erroneous, the exception is not addressed to the error, which is apparent, but not necessarily harmful. The requests to charge, so far as they were pertinent and appropriate, are covered by the general charge.

5. TRIAL (§ 256*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY FOR REQUESTS—REQUISITES AND SUFFICIENCY.

It will not be held reversible error, in the absence of a timely and appropriate request, to omit to instruct the jury upon the burden of proof. Central Railway Co. v. Manchester Mfg. Co., 6 Ga. App. 254, 64 S. E. 1128. Aliter, if the court charges the jury upon the subject of the burden of proof, and errs in placing the burden upon the wrong party. Cox v. McKinley, 73 S. E. 751, this day decided. The court is not required to charge the jury upon the preponderance of the testimony, unless requested so to do.

6 TRIAL (§ 255*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

The court was not required to charge that, if it was shown that the title to the property levied upon was vested in the defendant in fi. fa. at a time prior to the judgment, it was presumed to remain in him until the contrary was shown by the evidence, even though it was undisputed that the defendant in fi. fa. originally bought the horse claimed by his wife. If it was desired that the attention of the jury be directed to this specific point, an appropriate instruction upon the subject should have been requested.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF FITZGERALD v. SPICER. (No. 3,668.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§§ 49, 157*)—REQUESTS AND VALIDITY—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—QUESTIONS OF LAW OR FACT.

The question of the sufficiency of description of property in a mortgage is one of law for the court; that of the identity of the property mortgaged is one of fact to be decided by the jury. In the present case the court erred in permitting the jury to decide as an issue of fact whether or not the description of the property mortgaged was sufficient to charge the claimant with notice.

(a) The description, "one mouse-colored mare mule, five years old," was, as matter of law, sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 90-92; Dec. Dig. §§ 49, 157.*]

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 284*)—FORECLOSURE—CLAIMS BY THIRD PERSON.

Where a mortgage has been duly recorded, and no question is raised as to the validity of the record, it is error upon the trial of a claim case based upon a levy of the mortgage fi. fa., to permit the claimant to testify that he had no notice of the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

3. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 284*)—FORECLOSURE—CLAIMS BY THIRD PERSON.

In the trial of such a case it is also error to permit the mortgagor to testify that at the time the mortgage was executed the mortgagee made an express warranty as to the soundness of the property mortgaged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

4. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 284*)—FORECLOSURE—CLAIMS BY THIRD PERSON.

In the trial of such a case it was inaccurate and misleading to charge the jury that the burden was on the plaintiff, the transferee of the mortgage, "to prove every material allegation which they allege in their action, or mortgage foreclosure, levies, and so forth, which you now have before you for your consideration."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

5. FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Construing the evidence all together in the light of the principles laid down in the foregoing headnotes, the verdict in favor of the claimant was unauthorized.

Error from City Court of Fitzgerald; E. Wall, Judge.

Claim by J. T. Spicer to property levied on by the First National Bank of Fitzgerald under a mortgage fi. fa. Judgment for claimant, and the mortgagee brings error. Reversed.

Haygood & Cutts, for plaintiff in error.
H. J. Quincey, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. A claim was filed by Spicer to the levy of a mortgage fi. fa. The mortgage described the property as "one mouse-colored mare mule, five years old." The execution and the levy followed this description. The mortgage was duly recorded, and had been transferred for value before maturity to the bank. The claimant prevailed at the trial, and the plaintiffs' motion for new trial was overruled.

[1] 1. It is not essential that the description of property in a mortgage should be so definite as that the property can be identified upon such description alone. It is sufficient if the description can be made certain by the aid of extrinsic evidence. The description in a contract of conditional sale of "one sorrel horse, seven years old," has been held to be sufficiently definite to charge with notice one who purchased the horse which was the subject-matter of the sale. Beatty v. Sears, 132 Ga. 516, 64 S. E. 321. The sufficiency of the description was a question of law for the court, and should not have been submitted as an issue of fact to the jury. It was conceded that the mule levied on in the present case was the one described in the mortgage. Had there been any issue as to this fact, it would have been proper for the court to submit to the jury the question of the identity of the mule levied on. Collier v. Vason, 12 Ga. 440 (3), 58 Am. Dec. 481; Farkas v. Duncan, 94 Ga. 27, 20 S. E. 267; Reynolds v. Jones, 7 Ga. App. 123, 66 S. E. 395. The court should have held, as a matter of law, that the description in the mortgage involved in the present case was sufficiently definite to charge the claimant with notice that the property in dispute had been mortgaged by the defendants in fi. fa. to Crawley, and it was error to charge the jury that it was for them to say whether or not the description was sufficiently definite to enable the claimant to have ascertained that the mule which he bought was the mule which passed under the mortgage from the defendants in fi. fa. to Crawley.

[2] 2. The mortgage having been duly recorded before the purchase by the claimant, it was error to permit him to testify that at the time of the purchase he had no notice of the mortgage. The law charged him with notice, and it was entirely immaterial whether or not at the time of his purchase he had actual notice that the mortgage had been given.

[3] 3. The undisputed evidence showed that the bank was a purchaser for value of the mortgage before its maturity. The bank was not bound by any contract or agreement not expressed in the mortgage made between the mortgagors and the mortgagee, unless, of course, it had actual notice of such agreement at the time of the transfer of the mortgage. In the present case it was prejudicial error against the bank to permit one of the mortgagors to testify that at the time the mule was purchased from Crawley he made an express warranty as to its soundness. This testimony was entirely irrelevant, and did not illustrate the real issue in the case, which was whether or not the property was subject to the mortgage fi. fa.

[4] 4. The claimant being in possession of the property at the time of the levy, the burden was on the plaintiff to show either title or possession in the defendant in execution, since the debt of the former became a lien upon the property of the latter. Civil Code 1910, § 5170; Southern Mining Co. v. Brown, 107 Ga. 264, 33 S. E. 73. It was inaccurate and confusing to charge the jury that the burden was on the bank "to prove every material allegation which they allege in their action, or mortgage foreclosure, levies, and so forth, which you have now before you for your consideration."

[5] 5. We have carefully read the evidence, and to our minds, in light of the rulings laid down in the course of the opinion, it is not sufficient to authorize the verdict. Judgment reversed.

HICKS v. MOYER et al. (No. 3,647.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 20*)—LIMITATIONS APPLICABLE—RECOVERY OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.

Neither section 4172 of the Civil Code (1910), providing that adverse possession of personalty for four years gives a title by prescription, nor section 4496, providing that action for injuries to personal property shall be brought within four years, nor any other provision of the Code of 1910, properly construed, limits the period within which suits to recover personal property may be brought.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 167*)—REPEAL—ADOPTION OF CODE.

A valid statute of this state in existence at the date of the adoption of the Code, but omitted therefrom through mistake or oversight, is still of force, unless expressly or by necessary implication repealed by a subsequent statute, or by some provision of the Code.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes. Cent. Dig. §§ 242, 243; Dec. Dig. § 167.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 3*)—REPEAL—ADOPTION OF CODE.

Section 2 of the limitation act approved March 6, 1858, providing that "all suits for the recovery of personal property, or for damages for the conversion or destruction of the same, shall be brought within four years after the right of action accrues, and not after," is still of force, having been omitted from the Code by mistake or oversight, and there being nothing in the Code, or in any subsequent act which expressly or by necessary implication reveals this section.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 9, 12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

4. TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 9*)—RIGHT OF ACTION—DEMAND AND REFUSAL.

In a trover case, demand and refusal are necessary only as evidence of conversion, and need not be proved where conversion is otherwise shown.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trover and Conversion, Cent. Dig. §§ 58-83; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

5. STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—DISMISSAL OF PETITION.

No facts sufficient to relieve the action from the bar of the statute of limitations are alleged, and the court did not err in dismissing the petition upon a demurrer raising the point that the action was barred.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

6. TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 13*)—NATURE AND FORM OF ACTION.

The action of trover in Georgia is purely statutory, and is available in any case in which trover, conversion, or detinue could have been employed at common law.

7. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 178*)—PLEADING—ANTICIPATION OF DEFENSE.

The statute of limitations began to run against an action of trover where the possession of the property had been voluntarily surrendered for an indefinite time from the date of the demand and refusal, and the averment that it was not until the year 1910 that plaintiff discovered the fraudulent removal of his property cannot save the petition as against demurrer setting up limitations, in view of another allegation that in 1905 he examined the trunk, saw that the documents sued for had been removed, demanded their return, and the defendants refused to comply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 667; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Archie Hicks against I. P. Moyer and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

L. C. Greer, for plaintiff in error. Moore & Branch, for defendants in error.

POTTLE, J. On February 23, 1911, Hicks filed an action of trover in the city court of Atlanta against Moyer and his wife, seeking to recover possession of certain insurance policies and other documents alleged to be the property of petitioner. The petition averred that about June 15, 1905, the petitioner left with the defendants for safekeeping a trunk containing the property in question; that about five weeks later he called for the trunk and contents, and, upon inspection, discovered that the property sued for had been removed. "Petitioner then and there demanded the return of the same which said defendants refused, and it was not until the year 1910 that he discovered that the fraudulent removal of the same was perpetrated by said defendants."

The trial judge dismissed the petition on a demurrer raising the point, amongst others, that the action was barred by the statute of limitations, and error is assigned on this judgment.

[6] 1. The action of trover in this state is purely statutory, and is available in any case in which trover, replevin, or detinue could have been employed at common law. Mitchell v. Georgia & Alabama Railway, 111 Ga. 760, 36 S. E. 971, 51 L. R. A. 622.

[1] The question is whether the period within which this statutory action may be brought is limited by any statute or law of this state. Section 4172 of the Civil Code (1910) providing that adverse possession of personal property for four years shall give a title by prescription is manifestly not a statute limiting the period within which suit can be brought, since a prescriptive title to personalty by four years possession, like a claim of prescription to realty, must be specifically pleaded as a substantive defense. Section 4496 of the Civil Code (1910) is confined to suits "for injuries" to personalty, and does not limit the right to sue for the recovery of such property. The wrongful conversion of personal property does not necessarily cause injury to the property. On the contrary, property may enhance in value while in the hands of one who tortiously withholds it. See Blocker v. Boswell, 109 Ga. 237, 34 S. E. 289. There is in the Code no provision which undertakes to fix a period within which suits to recover personal property must be brought.

[2,3] 2, 3. The act approved March 6, 1856 (Acts 1855-56, p. 233), was a general limitation statute, fixing the periods of time within which suits of various classes must be brought. Section 4 of that act is now embodied in the Civil Code (1910) § 4496. Section 1 provided that suits for the recovery of real estate shall be brought "within seven years after adverse possession commences, and not after." Section 2 provides: "All suits for the recovery of personal property, or for damages for the conversion or destruction of the same, shall be brought within four years after the right of action accrues, and not after." Neither section 1 nor section 2 of this act appears in the Code. The codifiers evidently rightly thought that, in view of other provisions of law in reference to title to land by prescription, it was unnecessary to codify section 1 of the act in the phraseology there set out. It seems that they also thought that the law now embodied in Civil Code (1910) § 4172, in reference to four years' adverse possession of personalty, and in section 4496, in reference to suits for injuries to personalty, rendered proper the omission of section 2 of this act from the Code. That the compilers of the Code of 1895 were of the opinion that the law embraced in these two sections created a limitation upon the right to sue in trover seems to be clear from the fact that in the index under the title "Trover," and subtitle, "Within what time to be brought," the sections of the Code of 1895, containing the provisions of law now in sections 4172 and 4496 of the Code of 1910 are cited. The same is true of the Codes of 1873 and 1882. It is to be noted that Judge Hopkins in his Code of 1910 omitted this reference, as did the compilers of the first two Codes (1861 and 1867). In Blocker v. Boswell, supra, Mr. Justice Lewis called attention to the fact that section 2 of the act of 1856 was omitted from the Code, and said: "We think, therefore, that the codifiers purposely left out the statute of limitations as to trover, considering it was for all practical purposes embodied in the section of the Code on the subject of adverse possession of personalty for four years. There is as much reason in saying that section 3898 of the Civil Code, fixing a limitation for actions of trespass upon or damages to realty, applies to suits for the recovery of realty, as there is to say that the following section, with reference to injuries to personalty, applies to suits for the recovery of personalty. While this court, as above indicated, has recognized that an action of trover is barred in four years, yet none of these decisions were based upon the fact that the question was controlled by the section of the Code relating to injuries to personalty."

It seems to us that the codifiers acted under a misapprehension. The radical difference between the verblage of section 1 of the act of 1856, relating to real property, and section 2, relating to personalty, is apparent. In order for a suit to recover realty to be barred after seven years, the possession must have been adverse; whereas there was no such limitation in reference to suits to recover personalty. The codifiers evidently did not give due weight to the difference in language between these two sections of the act. It does not follow, however, that, because section 2 of the act of 1856 was omitted from the Code, it is not still the law. The codifiers had no authority to omit from the Code a valid existing statute. While every constitutional provision in the Code became law by virtue of the adopting act, nevertheless, a valid statute omitted from the Code, either purposely or by oversight, is still the law, unless expressly or by necessary implication repealed by some provision of the Code or subsequent statute. Georgia R. Co. v. Wright, 124 Ga. 608 (5), 53 S. E. 251. As there is nothing in the Code or in any subsequent act which conflicts with section 2 of the act of 1856, we hold that this section is still of force.

[4, 5] 4, 5. In a trover case, demand and refusal are necessary only as evidence of a conversion. Thompson v. Carter, 6 Ga. App.

606, 65 S. E. 599. [7] In the present case, possession having been voluntarily surrendered for an indefinite time, demand and refusal were necessary to show conversion. The statute began to run from the date of the demand and refusal, and, as the petition was filed more than four years after the date of the demand and refusal, the action was barred. The petition must be construed most strongly against the pleader. The averment that it was not until the year 1910 that the plaintiff discovered the fraudulent removal of his property cannot save the petition, in view of the other allegation that in 1905 he examined the trunk, saw that the documents sued for had been removed, demanded their return, and the defendants refused to comply. Without reference to other grounds of demurrer, the trial judge rightly held that the action was barred.

Judgment affirmed.

PEAVY v. CLEMONS et al. (No. 3,677.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 513*)
—ACCOUNTING—CONCLUSIVENESS OF RETURN.

The return of an executor, administrator, or guardian, made to the court of ordinary and allowed by that court, is only prima facie evidence, in his favor, of its correctness, and may be impeached by evidence, not only in the court to which it was made, but in any other court having jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter. The burden of proof is upon the party who seeks to impeach the correctness of the return.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2267-2291; Dec. Dig. § 513.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 513*)
—ACCOUNTING—CONCLUSIVENESS OF RETURN.

Where, on appeal to the superior court from the court of ordinary, a paper probated in solemn form as the will of the decedent is declared not to be his will, and by a consent verdict and decree the executor named in the paper purporting to be the will is permitted to make a final return to the court of ordinary as such executor, and, in pursuance of the consent verdict and decree, he does so, and no objection is made to the return, and it is approved and allowed by the court of ordinary, the correctness of the return can nevertheless be subsequently attacked and impeached by evidence, not only in that court, but in any other court in this state having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties. The consent verdict and decree in no sense changes the rule of law as announced in the foregoing headnote.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2267-2291; Dec. Dig. § 513.*]

3. TRIAL (§§ 314, 193*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1069*)—DELIBERATIONS OF JURORS—COERCING AGREEMENT—INSTRUCTIONS—INTIMATION OF OPINION—PREJUDICE FROM ERROR.

On the trial of this case, the jury, having been charged by the judge, had remained out several hours, considering their verdict. They were brought into court by direction of the judge, for the purpose of ascertaining whether a verdict could be reached, and the following colloquy occurred: "The Court: Mr. Foreman, have you reached a verdict? Foreman: No, sir. The Court: How do you stand as to numbers? Foreman: Ten to two. The Court: How long have you stood that way? Foreman: Some half an hour, I reckon. The Court: How did you stand previously to that time? Foreman: About seven to five. The Court: That is encouraging. You seem to be making progress towards a conclusion of the case, and I am glad to hear that you are. Of course, gentlemen, you realize the importance of making verdicts. While I understand at the same time that occasions may arise when jurors are honestly unable to agree, it is the duty, however, of the court, wherever the court has a reasonable hope that you may arrive at a unanimous conclusion, to give you all reasonable opportunity to do that; and that I am glad to do in this case. You can retire, gentlemen." Held, error: (1) The tendency of the language used by the judge was to encourage the ten jurors to adhere to their view of the evidence, and to discourage the two jurors in adhering to their view. (2) The two jurors might reasonably have inferred from the language used that in the opinion of the judge it would be their duty to surrender their individual convictions and agree with the majority. (3) Its tendency was to suggest that the jurors might arbitrarily compromise, divide, and yield, merely for the sake of agreement. (4) It amounted to an undue pressure by the judge upon the jury to agree to a verdict. (5) It was a violation of the spirit of the statute which mandatorily prohibits the trial judge from expressing or intimating any opinion on the facts. (6) The evidence was in conflict and about equally balanced on the issues of fact, and a verdict would have been authorized for either party. Hence the error is of sufficient gravity to require another trial.

Error from City Court of Vienna; E. F. Strozler, Judge.

Action by J. T. Clemons and another, administrators, against W. B. Peavy. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

This was a suit by the administrators of the estate of D. C. Clemons, deceased, to recover from W. B. Peavy money and property which they allege he received from the estate of D. C. Clemons while acting as an executor under the will of the decedent, and which it is alleged he had not, as executor, accounted for. A verdict was returned in favor of the plaintiffs for a portion of the money sued for, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted. It appears, from the evidence, that, soon after the death of D. C. Clemons, the defendant produced an alleged will and probated it in solemn form as the will of D. C. Clemons. On a caveat filed to the probate of this will, there was an appeal from the court of ordinary to the superior court, and in the superior court a consent verdict was taken, finding that the paper offered for probate as the will of D. C. Clemons, deceased, was not the will of D. C. Clemons; and, after allowing certain commissions and expenses to Peavy as executor of the will, it was further found that "said W. B. Peavy, executor as aforesaid, shall make out a final return to the ordinary of Houston county, showing the money and property that has come into his hands as such executor, together with vouchers for all moneys expended and allowed by this verdict." And a decree was entered accordingly. Peavy made his final returns to the ordinary of Houston county in pursuance of this verdict. There were objections filed to the correctness of the returns, and in due time they were formally approved and allowed by the ordinary. The defendant in the present suit sets up the verdict and the returns made by him in pursuance thereof as res judicata, and also insists that these returns of his, made to the court of ordinary and allowed by the ordinary, could only be attacked in the court of ordinary, or by bill in equity in the superior court. At the conclusion of the evidence the trial judge submitted to the jury only two items claimed against the defendant, holding that there was no evidence to justify a finding against him as to the other items. The jury found in favor of the plaintiffs as to only one of the items submitted. This item was for $1,030 alleged to have been paid by the widow of the decedent to Peavy while he was acting as executor of the estate. The evidence as to this item was in direct conflict. The widow testified that, five days after the death of her husband, she turned over to W. B. Peavy, as executor, $1,030 belonging to the decedent; that this money consisted of "$1,000 in gold and $30 in greenbacks," and was in a "shot sack," where she found it after the death of her husband; and that subsequently she saw the same money in the possession of the defendant's wife, who was counting it. In corroboration of this testimony, a grandson of the decedent testified that he "saw a pretty good bulk of gold money in a shot sack" in the possession of the decedent some time before his death. The defendant testified positively that he had never received this money from the widow, and he further proved that the widow had stated to several persons after the death of her husband that she found no money among his effects; that all the money they had in the house had been stolen therefrom previous to his death; and that since this larceny he had not kept his money in his house, but had put it all in the bank at Unadilla. After the jury had received the instructions of the court and had been out for several hours considering of their verdict, the trial judge had them brought into court for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a verdict was likely to be reached, and thereupon the colloquy quoted above, in the third headnote, took place.

The motion for a new trial, in addition to the usual general grounds relied upon, specially assigns error on the refusal of the court to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant, because, as a consent verdict and a decree thereon were established, the matter was res judicata; that the returns of the defendant as executor, made to the court of ordinary in pursuance of the consent verdict and decree, and duly approved and allowed by the ordinary, no defense having been filed thereto, could not now be attacked; that all the heirs, and the plaintiffs as administrators, were parties to this consent verdict and decree, and were estopped from pressing their suit in this court; and that the judge's language, in the colloquy which took place between him and the foreman of the jury, was an improper invasion of the province of the jury, and unduly influenced the jurors in their deliberations.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] 1. The verdict and decree relied upon as establishing the defense of res judicata is manifestly insufficient for that purpose. Its only effect, after the paper offered for probate had been declared not to be the will of the decedent, was a consent that W. B. Peavy, who had been acting as executor, should make his final returns to the ordinary of the county showing the money and property that had come into his possession as such executor. This probably would not only have been his right, but his duty without the consent verdict. There is nothing in this consent verdict which in the remotest degree indicates that these returns were to be accepted as true by the parties at interest. These returns as filed do not show this item of $1,030 of money which it is alleged the executor had received from the widow, and the executor denied that he had ever received it. The law is well settled that the final return of an executor, guardian, or administrator to the court of ordinary of his county, although it may have been approved and allowed by the ordinary, is only prima facie evidence in his favor of its correctness, and may be impeached by evidence, not only in the ordinary's court, but in any other court having jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter; the burden of proof being upon the party who seeks to impeach the correctness of the return. Civil Code (1910) § 3994; Brown v. Wright, 5 Ga. 29. Judge Warner, in discussing the rule in the Brown Case, supra, that returns of executors, guardians, and administrators made to the court of ordinary and allowed by that court are to be considered only as prima facie evidence in favor of such trustee, declares that "creditors, legatees, distributees and wards may impeach such returns by evidence in other courts, the burden of proof being on the party who seeks to impeach them. This we have no doubt is the safe and correct rule, for it will not do to say that because an executor, administrator, or guardian, by false and fraudulent accounts, supported by ex parte acts and statements, and thereupon allowed by the court, shall be held conclusive in his own favor. Such a rule would be allowing the party to protect himself, and derive a benefit to himself, from his own fraudulent conduct. In Fermere's Case, Lord Coke said: 'Fraud vitiates all judicial acts, whether ecclesiastical or temporal.' The rule as here announced by the learned judge remains the same in this state, and is in substance embraced in the section of the Code above cited. The consent verdict and decree which is relied upon as proving the defense of res judicata and estoppel does not by its terms preclude the right of parties interested to attack the returns made by the executor in the court of ordinary; and this attack could be made, not only in the court of ordinary, but in other courts having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties. Dowling v. Feeley, 72 Ga. 557; Crawford v. Clerk, 110 Ga. 735, 36 S. E. 404; and Baber & Wife v. Woods, Adm'r, 39 Ga. 643.

[3] 2. We come now to discuss the assignment of error based on the colloquy between the judge and the jury which is set out in full in the foregoing statement of the case. It is contended that the language of the judge, and especially the latter part of it, where he said on being informed that although the jury had previously stood seven to five, but then stood ten to two: "That is encouraging. You seem to be making progress towards the conclusion of the case, and I am glad to hear that you are"—was an unwarranted invasion of the exclusive province of the jury to determine all issues of fact and to reach a unanimous verdict without any encouragement or assistance from the judge, except such assistance as might be derived from instructions applicable to the issues made by the evidence; that this statement either influenced, or had a tendency to influence, the minority of the jury to surrender their convictions and accept the opinion of the majority, and tended to impress both minority and majority of the jury with the fact that the judge approved of the conduct of those jurors who previously stood with the minority in going over to the majority; that this statement by the judge not only tended to commend the conduct of those jurors who had left the minority and gone over to the majority, but also tended to discourage the remaining two jurors in holding to their convictions as to what was the truth under the evidence, and to persuade them to abandon their individual convictions and go over to the ten jurors.

We think that the language of the trial judge is justly subject to the criticism made against it. Each case must be determined by its own facts; the true test being that wherever the language of the trial judge reasonably permits any interpretation or construction that could influence any one of the jurors to yield his convictions of the truth for the mere sake of an agreement and accept the views of the majority, or wherever the judge suggests that the jurors might arbitrarily compromise, divide, or yield their individual views in order that a verdict might be found, it constitutes reversible error, since it in some degree detracts from that absolute fairness intended to be secured by jury trials. Neither an individual juror nor the minority of the jury should be unduly pressed to surrender his or its convictions merely for the purpose of unanimous agreement. The verdict should be the result which all the jurors have unanimously come to, unaided and unassisted by the slightest intimation or suggestion by the trial judge; and the measure of the trial judge's discretion in asking for information from the jury in order to enable him to determine the likelihood of an agreement and the proper exercise of discretion in the declaration of a mistrial should be limited to the general inquiry: Is there an agreement, or is there likely to be an agreement? Beyond this formal and general communication between the judge and the jury relating to an agreement "evil cometh." Especially is this true in this state, where, under the mandatory terms of the "dumb act," a trial judge is forbidden to express or intimate any opinion as to the facts of the case. The spirit of this act contemplates that during the progress of the trial, and until the verdict is finally received, the trial judge shall say nothing indicating any opinion as to which side should prevail, and do nothing that could in any manner unduly press the jury to agree upon a verdict. What we here contend for cannot be regarded in the light of a mere technicality. It is a right vital to the value of jury trial, imbedded in the jurisprudence of this state, and secured by the mandatory terms of the statute.

The Supreme Court has on several occasions had before it cases involving the question here discussed. A consideration of some of these cases will demonstrate how zealously that court has guarded the right of a unanimous verdict which should be reached by the jury, uninfluenced by any expression by the trial judge, either of a coercive or a persuasive character. In Alabama Great Southern Railroad Co. v. Daffron, 136 Ga. 555, 71 S. E. 799, the following language is used: "The court should not unduly press a jury to agree upon a verdict; and, in the use of any remarks designed to impress the desirability of reaching a verdict, he should be careful to refrain from any expression of a coercive nature or which possibly may mislead them into an erroneous method of reaching a verdict." In that case the language objected to was as follows: "Gentlemen of the jury, have you agreed upon the question as to the right to recover? Juror: We have, but differ as to the amount. The Court: It does look like you might agree upon that. You ought to agree upon the amount. I might be going a little too far, but verdicts are mostly all compromises. No man gets all he wants in things of that kind; and, having agreed upon the essential point, the question of whether or not there should be a recovery, it does look like you all might get together on some amount—that is, you might make a conjunction, as defined by an old rural school teacher, who, when asked what a conjunction was, said, 'A conjunction is the coming together of two or more persons or things, as John and James met.' You may retire and see if you can come together." The Supreme Court held that this language was improper and was prejudicial to the defendant. Its tendency was to suggest that the jury might arbitrarily compromise, divide, and yield for the mere sake of agreement. In the course of the opinion the learned justice, speaking for the court, cites with approval the language of the court in Goodsell v. Seeley, 46 Mich. 623, 10 N. W. 44, 41 Am. Rep. 183. In that case, in response to an inquiry by the judge, the jury said that they "had not agreed, but stood eleven to one, and divided on $200." The judge, in reply, told them: "If that is the only difference, it would be better for the county and the parties on both sides that one or both sides yield so as to come together. It would be unfortunate for all to have a disagreement when the difference is so small." And he asked them to get together if possible. A new trial was granted upon this ground, and in the opinion Judge Cooley said: "It is no doubt true that juries often compromise in the way here suggested, and that by 'splitting the difference' they sometimes return verdicts with which the judgment of no one of them is satisfied. But it is an abuse. The law contemplates that they shall, by their discussions, harmonize their views if possible, but not that they shall compromise, divide, and yield for the mere purpose of an agreement. The sentiment or notion which permits this tends to bring the jury trial into discredit and to convert it into a lottery. It was no doubt very desirable to the public and to the parties that the jurors should agree if they could do so without sacrificing what any one of them believed were the just rights of the parties; but not otherwise."

In Georgia Railroad v. Cole, 77 Ga. 77, a suit to recover damages on account of personal injuries, which was closely contested on the facts, after the jury had been charged and had retired, the judge had them brought back into the courtroom, and asked them if they were likely to agree upon a verdict. One of the jurors replied that they were not. The court thereupon inquired whether the trouble was upon a point of law or fact, and the juror responded that it was upon a question of amount, and the judge said: "I cannot aid you in that, as I know of, in any way, further than to say that, upon that matter, the jury ought to make a very earnest effort to agree upon the amount. Of course, a juror ought not to give up his convictions, if they are so strong; but there ought to be an effort to come to an agreement. You can retire and see if you cannot agree upon the amount." It was held that this was error, and a new trial was granted. "The jury might have understood the court as favoring a finding for the plaintiff, and his remarks might have induced some of them to give up an opinion in favor of the defendant." This was a unanimous decision; but one of the judges concurred dubitante. It is apparent, from the opinion of the court, that a new trial would not have been granted in the case if it had not been a close one on the facts, in which a verdict for either party would have been authorized.

In Parker v. Railway Co., 83 Ga. 540, 10 S. E. 233, Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley, speaking for the court, held that while the following language did not unduly press the jury to a verdict, "it went perhaps to the allowable limit": "This jury is, in the eye of the law, as capable of deciding this case and reaching a verdict as any that may be impaneled hereafter, and I am disposed to give you some further opportunity to consider your verdict. Go to your room and make an honest effort to agree on a verdict, and follow the rule I have given you, and I do not think it will trouble you in agreeing." The rule which the trial judge referred to was that they would have no trouble in agreeing, under the law he had given them in charge, that they should reconcile the testimony of conflicting witnesses if they could without imputing perjury to any of them, and that they should find a verdict according to the preponderance of the evidence.

In White v. Fulton, 68 Ga. 513, the trial judge stated to the jury substantially the language above quoted, that if the jury would follow the rule as to the preponderance of the testimony, and would endeavor to reconcile the testimony of witnesses, there would never be a necessity for mistrials, and that there had been no mistrial in his circuit for three years. The court held that this was no invasion of the province of the jury, but disapproved the remarks on the subject of mistrials, and used the following language: "Under our view the court should abstain from making any remarks to a jury that would bear even the semblance of coercion to secure a result. Juries should be left free to act without any real or seeming coercion on the part of the court, and the verdict should, as to the facts, be the result of their own free and voluntary action."

In Golatt v. State, 130 Ga. 18, 60 S. E. 107, after the jury had been deliberating for some time, the judge had them brought into the courtroom and asked them if they had agreed on a verdict, and, upon being answered in the negative, stated to them that "it was their duty to agree in the case; that it had been fairly submitted to their consideration; that no juror should "stick out" in a spirit of stubbornness; that it was no credit to a juror to do that; but that if any juror had honest, abiding convictions which he found it impossible to reconcile, after due consultation with the other jurors, let him stand by them; and that it was the duty of the jurors to confer together and make an honest effort to agree. A majority of the court held that this language was very near the limit, or quite to the limit, of what is permissible, and indicated that if the case was one of conflicting evidence or closely contested issues of fact, or of circumstantial evidence, or if there was any error in the charge or rulings of the court on other subjects, it would grant another trial on account of the use of this language; but they declined to do so, because "the case before us is one of shocking murder, with no conflict in the evidence, and no apparent ground for palliation." Justices Atkinson and Holden, however, held that this language was improper and was reversible error, and that it "was of such a character as to mislead the jury as to their duty and press them too hard toward the finding of a verdict."

In the case of Ball v. State, 9 Ga. App. 162, 70 S. E. 888, this court held that the principle that a verdict must be the unanimous conviction of all the jurors was imbedded in the jurisprudence of this state, and this unanimity must be the voluntary conclusion of the jurors, uninfluenced by any instruction or suggestion from the judge that might induce one juror to surrender his individual conviction of the truth, and to accept the opinion of the other jurors. In the Ball Case a majority of the court held that it was of doubtful propriety for the trial judge ever to inquire how the jury stands numerically, and that it was presumptively hurtful to the defendant for the judge, on information that the jury stood eleven to one, even remotely to suggest to the one juror that he ought to surrender his convictions to that of the majority. The language used by the trial judge to the jury in the Ball Case was that: "Usually, where the jury stands eleven to one, the one juror comes to the eleven; but, of course, you must be guided by your own consciences, as the one might be right and the eleven wrong." In that case the majority of the court, entertaining the view that the evidence was doubtful as to the identity of the accused as being the guilty party, reversed the judgment refusing a new trial, because of the language used by the judge to the jury, stating, however, that they would not do so for this error if the evidence had demanded the verdict.

We apprehend that there can be little doubt of the soundness of the general rule stated in the foregoing opinions. Doubt arises only on the application of the rule to the particular facts. In the light of the general rule and of analogous cases decided by our Supreme Court herein cited, and in view of the fact that the evidence in this case was almost equally balanced between the plaintiff and the defendant, and that a verdict would have been authorized for either party, we are constrained to grant another trial, because of the presumptively harmful character of the language used by the judge to the jury. The defendant in error relies upon the case of Winn v. Ingram, 2 Ga. App. 757, 59 S. E. 7. An examination of the language used by the trial judge in that case does not disclose any material variance from that used by the trial judge in the present case. In so far, however, as the opinion in the case of Winn v. Ingram, supra, is in conflict with the views here expressed, that case is overruled.

Judgment reversed.

W. W. STOVALL CO. v. W. E. SHEPHERD CO. (No. 3,664.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 47*) — TRANSACTIONS INVALID—SALES IN BULK—GENERAL SETTLEMENT WITH CREDITOR.

The purpose of the act approved August 17, 1903 (Civil Code of 1910, § 3226 et seq.), regulating the sale of "goods, wares, and merchandise in bulk," was to protect creditors against fraudulent sales by debtors. It has no application to a general settlement made by a debtor with creditors, where, by the terms of the settlement, all the creditors agree that the debtor's stock of goods, wares, and merchandise shall be turned over to a third person, who shall sell the same solely for the benefit of the creditors, and where the third person, in pursuance of the common agreement, does sell the stock in bulk and pays over to the creditors, according to the agreed pro rata, all the proceeds of the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

2. COMPOSITIONS WITH CREDITORS (§ 20*)—EFFECT OF AGREEMENT—ESTOPPEL.

Where a creditor had consented to the agreement set out in the above headnote, and actually aided the common agent of the debtor and creditors in making the sale of the debtor's stock of goods in bulk for the purpose of carrying out the agreement, he could not, after the sale had been made, but before the money arising therefrom had been paid over by the purchaser to the common agent and distributed to the creditors, recede from the agreement and, by process of garnishment, subject to the payment of his debt any part of the proceeds of the sale in the hands of the purchaser. The doctrine of estoppel would apply and forbid the dissatisfied creditor from in any manner interfering with or preventing the consummation of the agreement to which he had been a consenting party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Compositions with Creditors, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

3. OBJECTIONS TO CONSTITUTIONALITY—DECISION NOT NECESSARY—FORMER DECISIONS CONTROLLING.

A decision upon the constitutional objections raised to the act of 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 92) is not necessary to an adjudication of the case, and, besides, is fully controlled by the previous ruling of the Supreme Court in Jaques & Tinsley Co. v. Carstarphen Warehouse Co., 131 Ga. 1, 62 S. E. 82.

Error from City Court of Madison; K. S. Anderson, Judge.

Action by the W. W. Stovall Company against the Anderson Dry Goods Company and another defendant and the W. E. Shepherd Company, garnishee. Judgment for garnishee, and plaintiff excepts. Affirmed.

The evidence necessary to illustrate the decision of the questions raised is in substance as follows: The Anderson Dry Goods Company was insolvent. By consent of its creditors E. W. Butler took charge of its stock of goods, and, after notice to all the creditors and by their consent, sold the stock of goods to W. E. Shepherd Company, which paid the purchase price to Butler; and he disbursed it, according to an agreed pro rata, among the creditors. After the consummation of the sale, but before the payment of the money to the creditors, W. W. Stovall Company declined to abide by the agreement which it had made with the other creditors to accept 25 cents in the dollar of the proceeds of the sale in settlement of its debt, and brought suit against the Anderson Dry Goods Company and Mrs. Anderson, claiming that she was a member of the partnership, and had summons of garnishment served upon W. W. Shepherd Company. Before the summons of garnishment was served, the garnishee had paid over the money to E. W. Butler for disbursement to the creditors of the Anderson Dry Goods Company and had resold all the goods, and the answer to the summons of garnishment set up these facts. On proof of these facts, the court directed a verdict in favor of the garnishee on a traverse filed to the garnishee's answer, and this judgment is excepted to.

M. C. Few and Wm. H. Fleming, for plaintiff in error. Saml. H. Sibley, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. It will be seen from the evidence as above stated that the Anderson Dry Goods Company was no party to the sale of its stock of goods to Shepherd Company; that this sale was made by Butler acting for the creditors, and by the consent of all the creditors for the purpose of carrying out their agreement in the premises. The Anderson Dry Goods Company was not to receive any part of the proceeds from the sale of its stock of goods, and did not in fact receive $1 of the money. It was all paid by Shepherd Company to Butler, and he prorated it according to the agreement made with and between the creditors. Stovall Company agreed with the other creditors of the Anderson Dry Goods Company to accept 25 cents in the dollar from the proceeds of the sale in settlement of its debt against the Anderson Dry Goods Company, and not only knew of the sale which Butler made to Shepherd Company of the stock of goods, but assisted him in making the sale. Stovall Company took no steps to stop the sale, and did not actually object to its consummation by Butler, but, after the sale, refused to stand by the agreement as to the general settlement. These facts being true, under the general rule of law applicable to cases of garnishment, there could not have been a recovery against the garnishee, for Stovall Company, as a creditor, could only enforce against Shepherd Company, as garnishee, such rights as the Anderson Dry Goods Company had against Shepherd Company; and certainly the Anderson Dry Goods Company had no claim against Shepherd Company except for the 25 cents in the dollar which the creditors had consented to accept under the agreement in pursuance of which Anderson Dry Goods Company had turned over the stock of goods to Butler as agent and representative of the creditors. And, besides, according to the undisputed evidence, all the money which Shepherd Company had agreed to pay for the stock had been paid to Butler before summons of garnishment was served.

It is said, however, that the sale was fraudulent as to the creditors under the act of 1903 (Civil Code of 1910, §§ 3226, 3227, 3228), and that the garnishee was liable, although it had paid out the funds. The general rule is, as above stated, that the garnishee's liability to the creditor of the principal defendant is conditioned upon his liability to the latter. In other words, a creditor cannot reach by garnishment process any assets which his debtor could not recover from the garnishee. In Jaques & Tinsley Co. v. Carstarphen Warehouse Co., 131 Ga. 1, 62 S. E. 82, the exception to this rule is said to be where the garnishee is in possession of the effects of the defendant under a transfer fraudulent as to his creditors. "In such a case, though the defendant can maintain no action against the garnishee, yet a creditor of the defendant may subject the effects in the garnishee's hands by garnishment." And it is insisted that, as the sale of the stock of goods belonging to the Anderson Dry Goods Company was "in bulk," it was void for want of compliance with the act of 1903, supra, and therefore Shepherd Company was liable as garnishee. The act of 1903 referred to, being in derogation of the common law, is to be strictly construed, and is applicable only to cases which fall clearly within its purview. Taylor v. Folds, 2 Ga. App. 453, 58 S. E. 683; Cooney v. Sweat, 133 Ga. 511, 66 S. E. 257, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 758. The purpose of the Legislature in the enactment stated was to protect creditors against a class of sales frequently fraudulent which left the creditors of the vendor without any assets with which to pay his debts; or, as expressed in the case of Cooney v. Sweat, supra: "When merchants sell their entire stock of goods to one person, without notice of any kind to their creditors, a fraud is frequently perpetrated upon the creditors; and it was the intention of the Legislature to afford a remedy to the victims of these fraudulent sales." The evil sought to be remedied was the prevention of sales by debtors of their stock in bulk, thus depriving creditors of assets or property out of which to make their claims. The statute is aimed at the fraudulent conduct of the debtor as a vendor. It has no application whatever to an honest bona fide arrangement on the part of the creditors with the debtor to protect themselves by agreeing to a composition of their debts, or to an honest assignment on the part of the debtor for the benefit of his creditors. Under the facts of the present case, the Anderson Dry Goods Company did not make the sale of its stock of goods in bulk to Shepherd Company. By agreement of all the creditors it consented that Butler, acting for the creditors, and in a sense for the debtor, should make the sale of the debtor's stock to Shepherd Company. So far as Shepherd Company, the garnishee, knew, Butler was alone the vendor. The Shepherd Company dealt with him alone. There is no evidence that he owed any one, and, as Shepherd Company, in the rôle of purchaser, dealt exclusively with him, there was no creditor to be notified of the sale. But even if the Anderson Dry Goods Company is regarded as a vendor, although unknown to the Shepherd Company as a purchaser, the case is not within the terms of the statute that "It shall be the duty of every person who shall bargain for or purchase any stock of goods, wares, or merchandise in bulk, for cash or credit, before paying or delivering to the vendor any part of the purchase price therefor, to demand and receive from the vendor thereof * * * a written statement under oath of the names and addresses of all the creditors of said vendor," etc. Civil Code 1910, § 3226. And in section 3228 it is provided that: "Whenever any person shall purchase any stock of goods, wares, or merchandise in bulk, and shall pay the price or any part thereof, or execute or deliver, to the vendor thereof * * * any promissory note or other evidence of indebtedness for said purchase price," without complying with the act, "such sale or transfer shall as to any and all creditors of the vendor, be conclusively presumed to be fraudulent."

Under the facts of this case no part of the purchase price was to be paid to the Anderson Dry Goods Company, or was in fact ever paid to it as a vendor, and it is undisputed that there was no collusion between any creditor and the debtor. The purchase price was paid to the creditors of the Anderson Dry Goods Company who were entitled to receive it under the agreement made by them as to a general settlement. To hold that a sale thus made was within the terms of the act would be equivalent to holding that a sale made substantially by creditors, where they had actually received the proceeds of the sale of the stock of goods, would be in conflict with the only purpose of the act—to protect creditors—and this, too, at the instance of one of the creditors who had agreed with all the other creditors as to the terms of settlement with the debtor, and who had actively co-operated in carrying out these terms. As stated, the purpose of the act is to protect creditors from fraudulent sales of debtors, and not to prevent creditors from making a general settlement with their debtors, nor to protect one creditor at the expense of all the other creditors. Such construction of the act would render void any bona fide general settlement of creditors with their debtors, and would make invalid any lawful assignment made by a merchant of all of his assets in good faith for the benefit of his creditors.

[2] 2. Besides, we think that Stovall Company by every principle of estoppel was precluded from setting aside the sale made by Butler to Shepherd Company, or from breaking up the general settlement with the creditors. It had agreed to the sale. According to the evidence, it had aided Butler in making the sale as the representative of all the creditors. It had agreed to accept 25 cents in the dollar in settlement of its claim against the Anderson Dry Goods Company, and had also agreed that the sale should be made of the stock of goods through Butler to the Shepherd Company, and should mutually bind all the creditors. One creditor could not, in the absence of fraud or mistake, recede from this agreement to the injury of other creditors, or for the purpose of breaking up the arrangement which had been accepted and agreed to by all of them. Stewart v. Langston, 103 Ga. 290, 30 S. E. 35. To permit Stovall Company, after entering into the agreement, to recede from it, would not only injure the other creditors by breaking up the settlement, which was presumably to their interest, but would probably leave Butler, who represented Stovall Company and the other creditors, under some legal obligation to Shepherd Company and it certainly would be inequitable and unfair to Butler to permit Stovall Company to leave him in this position after having agreed to the entire transaction and aided him in making the sale of the goods to Shepherd Company. It would be equally unfair to Shepherd Company to require it to pay in full as garnishee the debt of Stovall Company against the Anderson Dry Goods Company in view of the fact that Stovall Company had been instrumental in inducing Shepherd Company to buy the stock of goods. The doctrine of estoppel is fully applicable to the facts of this case. Civil Code 1910, § 5736.

[3] 3. The views entertained as above expressed render immaterial the objections raised to the constitutionality of the act of 1903. Civil Code 1910, § 8226 et seq.

Besides, this court has previously certified to the Supreme Court the same constitutional objection, and the act has been fully sustained (Jaques & Tinsley v. Carstarphen, 131 Ga. 1, 62 S. E. 82), and there is nothing in the decision in the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 239, 31 Sup. Ct. 145, 55 L. Ed. 191, which contravenes the ruling of the Supreme Court of this state in upholding the act in question.

Judgment affirmed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al. v. PARHAM.
(No. 3,704.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER ALIGHTING FROM MOVING TRAIN.

It is not negligence as a matter of law to leave a moving train, unless it clearly appears that the danger in attempting to do so is obvious to a person of common prudence and ordinary intelligence; and whether the attempt to get off, or the alighting from a moving train, is negligence, is generally a question of fact for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1346-1397; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 304*)—LICENSES—PERSONS ACCOMPANYING PASSENGERS—DUTY OF EMPLOYEES.

One who goes upon a train for the purpose of assisting a lady and her young children, who intend to become passengers thereon, is in no sense a trespasser, but a licensee; and when his presence thereon and his purpose to get off become known to the employees of the railroad company in charge of the train, he is entitled to the duty of ordinary diligence on their part.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 572*)—EXPERTS—IMPEACHMENT.

A witness who testifies as a medical expert cannot be impeached by showing that in other cases he had made mistakes in his diagnosis. Testimony as to his general reputation, and not as to his success or failure in special cases, is admissible for the purpose of impeachment.

4. TRIAL (§ 251*) — APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICATION TO ISSUES.

The trial judge should only charge principles of law applicable to the issues made by the pleadings and evidence; but where the judge charged a correct abstract principle of law, not required by the pleadings, but injected into the case by the defendant, on which evidence had been introduced by both sides without objection, and in this connection distinctly instructed the jury that the plaintiff could only recover on the allegations of the petition, the error was immaterial and harmless.

5. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—NECESSITY.

In a suit brought against a railroad company to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the running of its "locomotives or cars," where an employe was joined as codefendant, it was not erroneous for the trial judge to charge the jury on the statutory presumption against the railroad company, and to fail to charge that such statutory presumption did not arise against the individual codefendant, in the absence of a specific timely request to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 628-641; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

6. DAMAGES (§ 205*) — ASSESSMENT—DELIBERATIONS OF JURY.

As a general rule no exact method of measuring damages is laid down. In cases of permanent injuries the jury may, but are not compelled to, adopt and use the mortality tables as a basis of calculation. The jury should give such compensation by their verdict as would be just and reasonable to both parties, and in arriving at this standard may consider the evidence on the subject in the light of experience and common sense.

7. TRIAL (§ 247*) — INSTRUCTIONS — CORRECTION BY JUDGE.

Trial courts have not only the right, but it is their duty, to correct any erroneous instructions, and court and counsel should co-operate to prevent injustice through erroneous instructions. It cannot be erroneous for the court, after having charged the jury, to call attention to certain parts of the charge as incorrect and to withdraw them from their consideration.

8. EVIDENCE (§ 127*)—RES GESTÆ—EXCLAMATIONS OF PAIN—ADMISSIBILITY.

Testimony as to involuntary exclamations manifesting the existence of pain is admissible. Such exclamations are symptomatic, a part of the res gestæ, and not self-serving declarations, and the evidence relied upon to prove them is not hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 377-382; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

9. CARRIERS (§ 318*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—EVIDENCE.

No material error of law appears, and the evidence supports the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 318.*]

Error from City Court of Elberton; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by G. W. J. Parham against the Southern Railway Company and another.

Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Thos. J. Brown and A. G. & Julian McCurry, for plaintiffs in error. Smith, Hastings & Ransom, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Parham sued the Southern Railway Company, joining as codefendant the conductor of the train, and recovered a verdict for $3,750. The defendants' motion for a new trial was overruled, and the case is here for review.

The evidence in behalf of the plaintiff is in substance as follows: On the date alleged in the petition the plaintiff went to the depot of the railway company at Dewyrose, a station in Elbert county, for the purpose of assisting a lady and her two little children, who intended to take passage on the train. It was night, and one of the children was asleep, and the plaintiff took the child in his arms into the car. The train stopped a shorter length of time than usual, and before the plaintiff could place the sleeping child on a seat the train started, although the plaintiff acted with all possible promptness. When the train started, the plaintiff, after placing the child on a seat, hurried to the platform of the coach to get off. A negro porter of the railway company was standing on the steps of the coach from which the plaintiff expected to alight, and was blocking the steps, so that the plaintiff could not get off at that point. The conductor of the train, the individual defendant in the case, cursed the porter for blocking the steps, and called to the plaintiff to cross over to the platform of the next coach and to leave the train from that point. At the depot at Dewyrose there was no wood platform, but the ground between the adjoining tracks was leveled up even with the rails, forming a smooth dirt landing, extending a little on each side of the depot. Beyond this dirt landing in the direction in which the train was going there was a ditch on each side of the railroad, and an embankment across the ditch. The plaintiff attempted to leave the train under the direction of the conductor and at the point where the conductor directed him to get off. It was dark at the time, and the plaintiff could not see that the train had passed the dirt platform, and could not tell the speed that the train had acquired. He relied upon the directions given to him by the conductor, assuming, because of such directions, that it was safe to leave the train at that point. The train had passed the dirt platform above described, and was running faster than the plaintiff had supposed. The train was behind time, was a light train, consisting of only two coaches and an engine, and because of being behind in its schedule acquired considerable speed in a short space of time and could move very much farther than an ordinary railroad train in the time taken by the plaintiff. When the plaintiff attempted to alight he stepped into the ditch above referred to, and because of so stepping into the ditch, and because of the speed of the train, was given a violent wrench, and was thrown against the embankment, and received the injuries stated in the petition, and for which he sought to recover damages.

The evidence of the defendant conflicts sharply with the evidence of the plaintiff, both as to how the accident occurred and as to the extent of the injuries received. The conductor testified that he did not see the plaintiff, did not know that he had gotten on the train for the purpose of assisting passengers, did not give the plaintiff any direction to cross from the platform of one coach to the platform of another, or to get off at that point, and did not curse the negro porter, and, in short, contradicted every statement made by the plaintiff as to the manner in which he had received his injuries, and also denied the existence of any ditch at that place, and said that the train had stopped an unusual length of time that night at Dewyrose, and that the plaintiff had ample time in which to go into the coach and get off without injury by the exercise of ordinary diligence. The conductor's evidence is corroborated by other employes of the defendant.

According to the evidence of the plaintiff, and expert testimony in his behalf, he received very severe and probably permanent injuries. According to the testimony for the defendant, both lay and expert, he received very slight, if any, injuries. This court will not discuss the evidence, except as it may be necessary to do so to illustrate the decisions on special assignments of errors of law. The verdict of the jury settles the conflicts in the evidence, and so far as this court is concerned establishes the truth of the testimony in behalf of the plaintiff, not only as to the manner in which he was injured, but also as to the extent of his injuries, and unless the trial judge committed a material error on some question of law, which was presumptively prejudicial to the defendant, the verdict will not be disturbed.

Many cases are cited from the Supreme Court of this state in the elaborate brief of counsel for plaintiff in error which it is claimed sustain this view of the law, some of them being Jones v. Georgia, Carolina & Northern Ry. Co., 108 Ga. 570, 29 S. E. 927, Barnett v. East Tenn., Va. & Ga. Ry. Co., 87 Ga. 766, 13 S. E. 904, W. & A. R. Co. v. Earwood, 104 Ga. 127, 29 S. E. 913, Whatley v. Macon & Northern Ry. Co., 104 Ga. 764, 30 S. E. 1003, Roul v. East Tenn., Va. & Ga. Ry. Co., 85 Ga. 197, 11 S. E. 558, and many others. It would be unprofitable to consider each one of these cases. It is sufficient to say that we have examined each one, and find that none of them sustain the view urged by learned counsel. Nowhere does the Supreme Court lay down the proposition of law that, regardless of the facts, it is such negligence on the part of a passenger or licensee to leave a moving train as would preclude a recovery. The question of negligence in each particular case is one of fact, which must be determined by the jury alone, and the court cannot as a matter of law lay down any inflexible rule on the subject.

[2] In the present case the negligence on which a recovery is predicated is the negligence of the conductor in telling the plaintiff to get off a moving train under the circumstances proved by the plaintiff. It must be remembered in this connection that, while the plaintiff was not a passenger, neither was he a trespasser. He was lawfully on the train for the purpose of assisting a woman with two infant children, who were passengers thereon. Conceding that the defendant was under no duty to anticipate his presence on the train, or to foresee his purpose to leave the train, yet when his presence and his intention became known to the employes of the defendant company, it was their duty to exercise ordinary care to prevent his injury. The principles of law embraced in the foregoing statement are well settled by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of this state. In Suber v. G. C. & N. Ry. Co., 96 Ga. 42, 23 S. E. 387, it is held that a person going upon a train to assist his sister and children, who expected to become passengers, was lawfully on the train, and when his presence was known was entitled to the duty of ordinary care on the part of the employes of the railway company. And in the case of Macon, Dublin & Savannah R. Co. v. Moore, 108 Ga. 84, 33 S. E. 889, the Suber Case, supra, is cited with approval, and the doctrine reaffirmed that a person on a train under such circumstances is there lawfully, and is entitled to ordinary care by the employes of the railway company when his presence becomes known. In the case of S. A. L. Ry. Co. v. Bradley, 125 Ga. 193, 54 S. E. 69, 114 Am. St. Rep. 196, the Suber Case is again approved, and the doctrine therein stated reaffirmed. These decisions establish the rule that the plaintiff was lawfully upon the train, and that, when the conductor discovered his presence and his purpose to leave the train, the duty of exercising ordinary care devolved upon him to prevent injury to the plaintiff. Whether the conductor did so under the facts proved in behalf of the plaintiff was a question for the determination of the jury.

Under these facts it was the province of the jury to say whether the act of the conductor in directing the plaintiff to leave the train at that time and place was or was not an act of negligence, or whether under the circumstances the danger of doing so was so manifest and clear that, notwithstanding the directions of the conductor, the plaintiff was guilty of such negligence in attempting to alight at that time and place as would prevent a recovery. If the conduct of the conductor was negligent, and if the obedience to the directions of the conductor was not negligence of a culpable character, then these facts under the law would have authorized a recovery. This proposition is conclusively established by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court. W. & A. Ry. Co. v. Wilson, 71 Ga. 22; Southwestern R. Co. v. Singleton, 67 Ga. 306; Coursey v. Southern Ry. Co., 113 Ga. 297, 38 S. E. 866. In the Coursey Case the plaintiff had by mistake gotten upon the wrong train. Upon discovering that fact she told the conductor of her mistake, and after the train was leaving she was directed by him to get off. Obeying this direction, she was hurt. The sole negligence alleged in the petition was the negligence of the conductor in telling her to get off. The court below granted a nonsuit and the Supreme Court reversed this judgment, holding that it was a question of fact. In Turley v. A., K. & N. R. Co., 127 Ga. 594, 56 S. E. 748, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 695, it is held in effect that it is not negligence as a matter of law to leave a moving train, unless it appears that the danger attending the attempt to alight is so great as to be obvious to a person of common prudence and ordinary intelligence, and that ordinarily in cases of this kind the question of what is or is not negligence is a question for the jury. In the Turley Case, Mr. Justice Beck, speaking for the court, says: "We cannot agree with counsel for the defendant, who insists that the plaintiff 'knew the train was running at a speed that made it hazardous to attempt to alight therefrom in the prevailing darkness,' and 'knew more than this, that the train was not stopping, but was increasing its speed, and with this situation clearly before him, chose not to avoid, but to risk, the danger,' and that consequently the plaintiff's injury was not the result of the defendant's negligence, but of his own recklessness."

The case of Simmons v. S. A. L. Ry. Co., 120 Ga. 225, 47 S. E. 570, which apparently supported the proposition here contended for by the plaintiff in error, was expressly overruled, and it was announced that the Suber Case, supra, stated the correct rule, on the subject. We conclude that the contention of the plaintiff in error on the point above discussed is not supported by the decisions of the Supreme Court, and the proper rule on the subject, deduced from all the decisions, is that the question of negligence is one of fact, to be determined by the jury under the circumstances of each particular case.

[3] 2. A medical expert, introduced by the plaintiff, testified as to the character and extent of the plaintiff's injuries. The defendants introduced a witness by whom they sought to impeach and discredit this medical expert, by showing that on a previous occasion he had examined this witness and had stated that the witness was suffering from spinal concussion or "railway spine," the same diagnosis which the expert had made of the plaintiff's injuries, when in fact the witness had never been in a railroad accident and had never suffered from any spinal trouble. This testimony was excluded by the court. We hardly think that the value of the testimony of a medical expert can be impeached by instances of special cases in which he might have been mistaken in his diagnosis. To so hold, it seems to us, would bring in issue the question as to whether or not in each particular case the diagnosis was correct or incorrect. The correct rule is laid down by Mr. Wigmore in his work on Evidence (volume 2, p. 1148): "Proof of such particular instances of error by other witnesses is generally regarded as inadmissible, and for reasons analogous to those of the character rule, namely, confusion of issues by the introduction of numerous subordinate matters, controversies involving comparatively trivial matters and unfair surprises, by leaving the impeached witness unable to surmise the tenor or the time of the supposed conduct which might be attributed to him by false testimony." While it might strike the ordinary mind that a medical expert could not be safely relied upon in his diagnosis, where he had stated upon an examination that a person was suffering from spinal concussion, or "railway spine," when in fact the person had never been the victim of any railroad accident, or had never suffered from any spinal complaint, and while it might be argued that this medical expert, in making a similar diagnosis of the plaintiff's injuries, was indulging somewhat in a fad or a favorite theory, yet it must be manifest to any thinking mind that it would be unsafe, as well as unjust to the medical expert, to allow such special method of attack, unless at the same time the expert thus attacked were allowed an opportunity of meeting the attack, by showing that the witness who testified that he was not injured had been in fact injured and was testifying falsely, and that as a matter of fact his diagnosis of the witness' condition was correct. In the administration of practical justice by the courts, this method of impeachment should not be permitted.

3. In support of the medical expert who testified in behalf of the plaintiff, testimony was admitted in evidence that the expert had held many positions in different sanitariums and hospitals, where he had had extensive experience in medicine and surgery. This testimony was objected to. One method of proving expert knowledge is to show expert opportunities and experience, and clearly the testimony was admissible for this purpose.

[4] 4. Two of the grounds in the amended motion for a new trial assign error upon the charge of the court to the effect that the railway company was under a legal duty to allow the plaintiff a sufficient time in which to get off the train after his intention to leave had become known to the conductor. It is contended that this charge was hurtful to the defendant, and was not on any one of the issues made by the pleading, as no negligence was alleged in this respect. An inspection of the brief of evidence discloses the fact that the defendant contended that the plaintiff did have time to get off the train and that the railroad company in this respect had performed its duty; and this testimony was met by the plaintiff by showing that he was not given sufficient time in which to get off. No objection was made by either side to the introduction of this evidence on the ground that it was not covered by the pleading. The judge stated a correct abstract principle of law, and while not required by the pleading, it was covered by the evidence introduced on both sides. Consequently it was not reversible error to charge on the subject, and certainly the defendant should not be heard to complain of the charge covering an issue which it had injected by its evidence. However, the court subsequently instructed the jury that the plaintiff could only recover under the allegations of negligence charged in the petition.

[5] 5. Objections are made to instructions of the court as to the presumption against a railroad company on proof of injury, and to the failure to charge that this presumption did not arise against the individual defendant. As to the railroad company, the charge on this subject is based upon the statutory presumption. Civil Code 1910, § 2780. It is insisted that, even as against the railroad company, this charge was improper, as the plaintiff was not hurt by "the running of the locomotive, cars, or machinery of the railroad company." We do not concur in this opinion. It would be entirely too restricted a view to take of the statute, and would limit its application to cases where persons were hit or run over, or came in physical contact in some other way with the locomotive, cars, or machinery of the defendant while they are actually in movement. The statutory presumption applies to injuries received by persons alighting from trains or locomotives. The momentum imparted to the body of a person alighting from a moving train, which throws him against an obstacle on the outside, is as much a cause of the injury as the violent contact with the obstacle or obstruction.

The case of Georgia Ry. & Electric Co. v. McAllister, 126 Ga. 447, 54 S. E. 957, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1177, relied upon by plaintiff in error, is not in point. In the McAllister Case plaintiff had actually left the car, had crossed to the sidewalk, and was walking home when the injury occurred. In other words, he had entirely severed all connection with the operation of the street car when he was hurt. In Georgia Railway & Electric Co. v. Reeves, 123 Ga. 697, 51 S. E. 610, and S. A. L. Ry. Co. v. Bishop, 132 Ga. 71, 63 S. E. 1103, it is clearly ruled that a person injured in alighting from a moving train, or even from a stationary train, by the running of the company's locomotive, cars, or machinery, is entitled to the statutory presumption.

As to the objection that the court did not instruct the jury that this presumption did not apply to the individual defendant: The court did tell the jury that it applied to the railroad company, and under the maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," this was in effect telling the jury that it did not apply to the individual defendant. In the usual general statement made in the charge on the subject of presumption, the court did charge the jury that the burden was upon the plaintiff to make out his case against the defendant, and the only exception stated to this general rule was the presumption against the railway defendant. Assuming that the jury were men of ordinary intelligence, they must have understood from this statement and the exception that the presumption applied only to the railway company, and not to the individual defendant. However this may be, we think that, if the defendant desired a more specific charge on this subject, he should have requested it in writing.

[6] 6. The following excerpt from the charge is objected to: "If you are in possession of facts that will authorize you to estimate in dollars and cents any branch of injury received, the loss of ability to work or otherwise, you can fix that amount at whatever the testimony authorizes for damages along that line." It is objected that this charge did not present to the jury any fixed and certain rule by which the damages should be estimated, and in elaborating this ground of the motion learned counsel insists that it was the duty of the judge to charge as to the use of the mortality and annuity tables, and that the judge erred in failing to charge as to reducing to its present value the plaintiff's entire future loss. It has been held by the Supreme Court that the jury, in estimating damages, are not compelled to use the mortality and annuity tables, and the court is not required to give them in charge unless requested. In the standard charge prepared by the Supreme Court in Florida Central & Peninsular R. Co. v. Burney, 98 Ga. 1, 26 S. E. 730, it is expressly stated therein that these tables "are not binding on the jury." The jury are at liberty to use in estimating the damages the result of their own observation and experience, aided by the testimony as to the extent of the injuries and the resulting damages. R. & D. R. Co. v. Allison, 86 Ga. 145, 12 S. E. 352, 11 L. R. A. 43; Southern Ry. Co. v. Scott, 128 Ga. 244, 57 S. E. 504. The size of the verdict in the present case would indicate either that the jury did in fact reduce the future damages to present value, or did not consider the question of permanent damages at all. Without a more specific request to charge on the subject of damages, the general charge as given was not prejudicial.

[7] 7. After the court had concluded the charge to the jury, and had directed them to retire and make up their verdict, counsel for the plaintiff arose, and in the presence of the jury suggested that a certain portion of the charge according to the practice in the United States court be corrected, whereupon the court sent the jury out, and, after an argument covering this part of the charge, the court brought the jury back and corrected his charge on the subject of punitive damages, distinctly and expressly withdrawing from their consideration that portion of the charge as not applicable to the case under the evidence. Of course, that portion of the charge referring to punitive damages was inapplicable to any of the issues made by the pleading or the evidence, and the court very properly corrected it on suggestion of counsel for the plaintiff. It is immaterial that in doing so he followed a practice pursued in the United States court, and it is wholly immaterial that counsel for the plaintiff in the presence of the jury asked him to do so, according to the practice in such matters in the United States court. The only material question was: Was this portion of the charge erroneous? If it was, it was the duty of the court to correct it, and as to that matter it was incidentally the duty of counsel to consent to the correction. Judges rely upon attorneys in a case to aid them in giving proper instructions on the issues submitted and to assist them in preventing as far as possible any injustice through erroneous instructions.

[8] 8. The court admitted, over objection of the defendant, the evidence of the wife of the plaintiff that after his injuries had been received, frequently during his sleep, he was heard to "moan and groan." It is objected that this testimony was irrelevant, and that the moaning and groaning took place long after the accident. It has been held that involuntary exclamations of pain, made soon after an injury has been received, cannot be regarded as self-serving declarations, but as symptoms, and are admissible in evidence. Georgia Ry. & Electric Co. v. Gilleland, 133 Ga. 621, 66 S. E. 944. It would seem to follow that, as long as the injured person was still suffering from the effect of injuries which he had received, any involuntary exclamation made by him, indicating that he still suffered from the effects of such injuries, would be admissible for what they were worth. Whether the moans and groans of a man in his sleep are caused by pain due to physical injuries or not, it certainly cannot be claimed that they are in any sense self-serving declarations. They would seem to be more in the nature of subjective symptoms of physical suffering. Certainly, where the evidence is clear, irrespective of this moaning and groaning while asleep, that the plaintiff had incurred injuries of a severe character, it would be absurd to grant a new trial on the ground that the court had erred prejudicially in admitting evidence of these involuntary exclamations made by the plaintiff while asleep.

[9] 9. We have examined the record very carefully in connection with all the assignments of error, and we find no reason for reversing the judgment refusing to grant another trial.

Judgment affirmed.

McDONALD v. FLOYD et al.

PROCESS (§ 166*)—WAIVER OF DEFECTS—FAILURE TO OBJECT.

Defendant, by not appearing for trial on the day fixed, and objecting to jurisdiction of his person on the ground that the summons required him to answer within less than 20 days after service, contrary to Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 88, subd. 16, waived his right to object on that ground; the objection not going to the subject-matter of the action, but to the jurisdiction of the person.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by T. C. McDonald against W. A. Floyd and another. From an order denying a motion made in the original cause to set aside a judgment, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Nelson, Nelson & Gettys, for appellant. Frank G. Tompkins, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The following statement appears in the record: "This was a motion in the original cause, on behalf of the defendant W. A. Floyd, to stay execution and vacate and set aside a judgment originally rendered against J. W. and W. A. Floyd, on the 1st day of April, 1903, by Robert Moorman, Esq., magistrate for Richland county, a transcript of which was filed, and judgment entered thereon, in the court of common pleas for Richland county, and was heard in open court by his honor, Robert Aldrich, presiding judge, at the summer term, 1911, of the court of common pleas." The motion was refused, whereupon the defendant appealed to this court, and, in the language of the appellant's attorneys, the sole question presented by the exceptions is whether there was error, on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in refusing the motion on the ground that the judgment was void, because the magistrate was without jurisdiction; the summons being fatally defective, in that it was issued and served on November 26, 1902, and required the defendant to appear and answer on December 16, 1902, less than 20 days after service.

Section 88, subd. 16, of the Code, provides that, "when twenty-five or more dollars is demanded, the complaint shall be served on the defendant not less than twenty days * * * before the day therein fixed for trial." Prior to the decision in the case of Jenkins v. Railway, 84 S. C. 343, 66 S. E. 409, the question of jurisdiction as to the person and the subject-matter of the action was in much confusion, arising from the fact that there were numerous decisions which could not be reconciled, as will be seen by reference to the opinion of the court and the dissenting opinion in said case. In order to settle the law, the circuit judges were called to the assistance of the Supreme Court, and when they sat en banc it was held that "the provision that an action for the recovery of a penalty must be tried in the county where the cause or some part thereof arose is a mere statutory requirement as to procedure; but it cannot be successfully contended that it constitutes the subject-matter of the action." And no strong reason can be urged why the time prescribed for the trial of the case should be regarded as the subject-matter of the action. The question of jurisdiction herein relates to the person, and when the defendant was served with a copy of the summons and complaint, and did not even attend, on the day fixed for the trial, for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court, he thereby waived the right to interpose such objection. We shall not undertake to review the cases prior to that of Jenkins v. Railway, 84 S. C. 343, 66 S. E. 409, as all those that cannot be reconciled with the principles therein stated must be regarded as overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE ex rel. TAYLOR et al. v. BLEASE et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 26, 1912.)

1. COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES (§ 9*)—SCHOLARSHIPS—PERSONS ELIGIBLE.

Act Feb. 17, 1911 (27 St. at Large, p. 113), provides for the award of scholarships in the University of South Carolina, Clemson Agricultural College, etc., by the State Board of Education upon the recommendation of the faculties, provided that "no applicant for a scholarship shall be eligible to stand an examination for a scholarship if such applicant has already attended the institution for which the scholarship is intended, or any other institution of higher learning known as a college or university," provided such condition shall not apply where there is no other applicant. Held, that an applicant who had been a student in the preparatory classes of Clemson College, which was a department of the college, and received free tuition from the trustees, was not eligible to receive a scholarship in the college.

George R. Rembert and C. S. Monteith, for relators. J. Fraser Lyon and W. H. Sharpe, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The statute of February 17, 1911, provides for the award of scholarships in the University of South Carolina, Clemson Agricultural College, the Citadel, and Winthrop Normal and Industrial College "by the State Board of Education upon the recommendation of the faculties of the respective institutions, or of such committees as may be appointed for that purpose by the boards of trustees of those institutions." Among other conditions of eligibility the statute imposes the following: "No applicant for a scholarship shall be eligible to stand an examination for a scholarship if such applicant has already attended the institution for which the scholarship is intended, or any other institution of higher learning known as a college or university: Provided, that this condition shall not apply where there is no other applicant."

The relator Guy B. Taylor stood the examination and was recommended by the faculty of Clemson College for appointment to a scholarship in that institution; but the Board of Education refused to appoint him, on the ground that he had already attended Clemson College, and was therefore ineligible under the terms of the statute. Thereupon a petition was filed, praying for a writ of mandamus requiring the Board of Education to make the appointment. Without stating the pleadings in detail, it is sufficient to state that the cause depends on the admitted fact that Guy B. Taylor was a student in the preparatory class, a department of Clemson College, during the college year of 1910-11, and received free tuition at the hands of the trustees. The appeal is from an order of the circuit judge refusing the writ, on the ground that attendance as a student in a preparatory class at Clemson College fell within the terms of the statute, and that Taylor was therefore ineligible to appointment.

[1] We think there can be no doubt that the State Board of Education and the circuit judge correctly construed the statute. The several state institutions of learning are distinct entities, and the name of one of them, used without limitation in a statute or elsewhere, is understood by everybody to mean the entire institution, including all its departments as organized and conducted under the law. Certainly there is no authority for the Board of Education or the court to undertake to cut Clemson College into parts, and say that the General Assembly, in legislating for "Clemson Agricultural College," meant to exclude its preparatory classes.

[2] The court cannot give such a meaning to the statute on the ground that there was no reason for the General Assembly to make preparatory students ineligible to scholarships, and that therefore their exclusion could not have been intended. When the terms of a statute are perfectly plain, it is not for the court to find reasons for its enactment, or for a failure to make its language less general. Moreover, it would be very bold for the court to say that there was no reason for making the rule of ineligibility so broad as to include attendance in the preparatory department of the college; for it may have been the design of the General Assembly to give the advantage of scholarships exclusively to those boys and girls whose opportunities were limited to the ordinary schools of the state.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 23, 1912.)

CARRIERS (§ 20*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—LOSS OF OR INJURY TO GOODS—PENALTY.

Under the statute providing a penalty for failure of a carrier to adjust a claim for loss of goods within a stated time, and requiring the filing of the claim with the agent at the point of destination, the claim may be filed with the nearest agent who keeps the station open during reasonable business hours, and the claimant is not bound to file the claim with a nearer agent who leaves his station closed most of the time.

Bluff having an agent was Oswego, S. C. The circuit judge held that the agent at Oswego must be a 'regular' agent, and not an agent who stays at depot, and meets the trains, and receives and delivers freight, and who is sometimes absent during the day. He affirmed the judgment for the penalty, holding that the claim was properly filed. This appeal alone involves the penalty awarded, and whether the penal statute was complied with; it being undisputed that Oswego was the nearest station to Rocky Bluff, the point of destination."

His honor the presiding judge found the facts as follows: "I find from testimony, as matter of fact, that the agent at Oswego did not remain at station, but only met trains, and sometimes delivered freight; he being absent from station more than present, and left no one at station in his place, but would lock it up. I find, as matter of fact, that there was no agent at Rocky Bluff, point of destination of goods. I find, as matter of fact, that plaintiff filed its claim with agent at the nearest station to such point of destination having an agent, as contemplated under the statute, which I hold is such an agent as can be found at such station during reasonable business hours."

The first question raised by the exceptions is whether there was any testimony tending to show that the defendant waived the right to insist upon the objection that there was a failure upon the part of the plaintiff to comply with the statutory requirement; that when there is no agent at the point of destination then the claim shall be filed with the agent at the nearest station to such point of destination having an agent. It is only necessary to refer to the testimony set out in the first exception, which raises this question, to show that it cannot be sustained. It is not necessary to say whether there was any competent evidence of waiver, as the judgment must be sustained on other grounds.

The material question is whether his honor the presiding judge erred in ruling that the statute contemplated such an agent as could be found at the station during reasonable business hours. The statute contemplates the filing of the claim with the agent at the point of destination. If he fails to keep reasonable business hours, such conduct would naturally tend to cause great inconvenience and loss of time to the party filing the claim. The defendant has not the right to impose inconvenience and loss of time upon such party, and, if he files his claim with the agent at the nearest station where reasonable business hours are kept, it is estopped from raising the objection that the claim should have been filed at a nearer station.

Judgment affirmed.

"To be officially reported."

Charles H. Barber was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Gwynn and John Gary Evans, for appellant. J. Cotts, Sol., for the State.

WOODS, J. The defendant, Charles H. Barber, appeals from the conviction and sentence on an indictment charging that he "did willfully commit a breach of trust, in that he received from one Sallie Harrison the sum of one hundred dollars, good and lawful money of the United States of America, the denominations, issues, and coinage thereof being to the grand jurors aforesaid unknown, for and upon the special trust that he would pay said one hundred dollars in settlement and satisfaction of a commuted fine, which had been imposed by the court of sessions upon one Richard Harrison, and willfully and fraudulently refused to pay said fine, when commuted to the sum of one hundred dollars, by the Governor, in the willful and fraudulent breach of his said trust, and fraudulently misappropriated said one hundred dollars, a trust fund, to his own use."

There are several exceptions, but the single point pressed in argument was that the circuit judge should have directed a verdict of acquittal on the ground that no evidence was introduced tending to prove the charge made in the indictment. Stated more specifically, the position taken by defendant's counsel was that the entire evidence was to the effect that the sum of $100 was paid to defendant to indemnify him as surety on the bail bond of Richard Harrison pending his appeal from the conviction of some criminal offense in the court of general sessions for Spartanburg county, and not to pay the fine imposed on Harrison, and that the bail bond has been estreated and defendant's liability fixed by the estreat. The deposit with the defendant of $100 by Mrs. Sallie Harrison came about in this way: After Harrison's conviction and sentence, his counsel, C. P. Sims, Esq., obtained from the solicitor a promise to request the Governor to commute his sentence to a fine of $100 or service on the chain gang for three months. To prevent the execution of the sentence imposed by the court pending the application to the Governor for commutation, counsel for Harrison gave notice of appeal, and induced the defendant to go on his bail bond. After testifying that he explained to the defendant the expected reduction of the fine to $100, Mr. Sims thus states his arrangement with the defendant: "The agreement was that it was to be cut down to $100, and with that understanding I turned $100 over to Mr. Barber, and gave him some chattel mortgages or some kind of papers to secure him for going on this bond for this $300." We think it was a fair inference from this and other similar evidence, looked at in the light of the circumstances, that, in view of the expected commutation, the $100 deposit would be a sufficient protection for signing the bond, and that, when the commutation was made, the defendant would pay it and satisfy the sentence and his obligation as surety. Such an inference finds strong support in the admissions of the defendant that, after the sentence of Harrison was commuted, he repeatedly promised to apply the money to the payment of the fine. The testimony of the defendant tended to show, further, that the solicitor made most earnest efforts to get him to pay the $100 deposited with him in settlement of the whole matter—the bail bond as well as the fine—telling him that he would estreat the bond unless the fine was paid, and still further, that the bail bond was estreated against the defendant only after his long persistence in retaining the money with which he had been intrusted had indicated that he had fraudulently converted it to his own use. It thus appears that there was evidence to support the offense charged.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

Woods, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County.

Action by Julius Mills against the Southern Railway Company, Carolina Division. From an order of the circuit court dismissing defendant's appeal from a judgment for plaintiff in magistrate's court, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The third exception was as follows:

"(3) It is submitted that his honor, the presiding judge, erred in not sustaining the defendant's third exception, which was as follows, for the reason therein stated: 'That his honor erred in admitting in evidence the alleged bill of lading without having the same properly proven by the party who issued the same in St. Louis, Mo.'"

Hendersons, for appellant. Claude E. Sawyer, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This action was commenced in a magistrate's court, and is for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the wrongful acts of the defendant.

The allegations of the complaint are as follows: "That the plaintiff is, by trade, a barber, and desiring to engage in his trade at Langley he rented a house at a rental of $5 per month, and announced to the public that he would open a place of business, commonly called a 'barber shop,' on or about the 1st day of April, 1906, and for that purpose he purchased an outfit for his shop, consisting of chairs and mirrors, which was delivered to the defendant by the August Kern Barber Supply Company, in the city of St. Louis, in the state of Missouri, on the 24th day of March, 1906, and reached Langley on the 3d day of April, 1906, and the defendant, through its agents and servants, willfully, maliciously, wantonly, negligently, and in utter disregard and violation of the plaintiff's rights, failed and refused to deliver the said articles to the plaintiff, without any reason whatever, for a long space of time, in consequence of which failure to get possession of his aforesaid appliances he was unable to open his barber shop and engage in his business, and his landlord, the Langley Manufacturing Company, in consequence of such long delay, has rented and let the barber shop to another party, and thus deprived this plaintiff of carrying on his business, because there is no other suitable house which can be obtained in that locality; and plaintiff further alleges that that particular place is the best and most desirable stand for the barber business in the village of Langley, averaging an income of $15 a week with one chair; by reason of all of which willful, wanton, malicious, and negligent conduct of the defendant this plaintiff has been greatly damaged in the sum of $100."

The defendant denied generally the allegations of the complaint. The magistrate rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $100, whereupon the defendant appealed to the circuit court; but the appeal was dismissed, and the defendant again appealed upon exceptions which will be reported.

Section 368 of the Code provides that, upon hearing an appeal from an inferior court, the circuit court shall "give judgment according to the justice of the case, without regard to technical errors, which do not affect the merits." Therefore those exceptions assigning errors that are merely technical and do not affect the merits will be disregarded. We proceed to the consideration of the exceptions, in the light of this provision.

[1-3] First exception:

The following statement appears in the record: "Defendant's counsel objects to any testimony as to what the plaintiff thinks, believes, or calculates that he could have made in his business as barber during the alleged delay in the delivery of the freight in question, on the grounds that the same are both special and speculative damages, and hence inadmissible." Special damages are recoverable when the carrier receives notice at the time of the shipment that the loss of the property or delay in its delivery will result in such damages. The testimony was in response to the allegations of the complaint; and while the magistrate might have objected to proof of such damages, unless it appeared that the carrier had notice thereof at the time of shipment, the appellant had no such right. Martin v. Railway, 70 S. C. 8, 48 S. E. 616. Furthermore, the objection to the testimony was not based upon the ground that the carrier did not receive notice of such damages at the time the goods were shipped.

[4] Second exception:

In the first place, there was other testimony of the witness Knox, to which there was no objection; and, in the second place, the testimony was in response to the allegations of the complaint.

[5] Third exception:

In the first place, this ground of objection is too technical, as the question arose in a magistrate's court; and, in the second place, the appellant has failed to show that there was prejudicial error.

[6] The next question that will be considered is whether there was any testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was entitled to punitive damages.

The plaintiff testified as follows: "When I found that my goods were in the depot, I went to see about them, and the agent would not let me have them; said he did not have any freight bill. The agent (Mr. Gaillard) told me just a day or two before I got the goods that I could have the goods if I would give him $10 to hold. I did not give it to him; he wanted it to hold; did not tell me how much freight was due on them. I thought he had as much right to trust me as I him. I went to see about my goods two or three times a day, to see about them. I worked at carpentering in the meantime. My material stayed in there a month or more. About the last time I went to ask Mr. Gaillard about it, he said he had quit fooling with it all. I paid $9.88 on these goods; that was May 1st last. The goods came about the 9th day of April, and 'twas May 1st before I got my goods, and the shop was rented at that time. While I was waiting for my goods, Mr. Corley held the key. He was holding the shop for me. Just before I got my goods out, Mr. Corley rented my shop to Mr. Knox. I had the money to pay freight all the time while I was waiting. I paid rent for the month of April, 1906, $5."

There was a delay from the 9th of April until the 1st of May. The defendant knew that the plaintiff was being greatly inconvenienced by such delay. The defendant had knowledge of all freight charges, except those due the Terminal Railroad Association for transporting the articles of merchandise from St. Louis city to East St. Louis, just across the Mississippi river—a very inconsiderable portion of the distance between St. Louis city and Langley, S. C. It was the act of the defendant, and not of the plaintiff that caused the delay in the delivery of the goods, the plaintiff merely stood upon his legal rights. When the defendant realized that it was unable to ascertain the amount of the freight charges due the Terminal Railroad Association, it was very unreasonable for it to delay the delivery of the goods. They must have known that such freight charges would be almost unappreciable for so short a distance. Under these circumstances, the testimony tended to show a reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights.

[7, 8] The remaining exceptions either involve questions of fact, which cannot be reviewed by this court, or were not raised in the magistrate's court.

Judgment affirmed.

HYDRICK, J. (concurring). The character of the shipment was sufficient notice that special damages might result from its delay to admit evidence of such damages. The record shows that defendant issued the bill of lading. Therefore the Terminal Railroad Association must be held to have been defendant's agent (Salley v. Seaboard, 76 S. C. 173, 56 S. E. 782), for whose failure to promptly furnish the rate on request defendant is responsible. The long delay in ascertaining the correct freight charges, after defendant's agent at Langley knew of plaintiff's situation, and that loss was daily occurring to him because he could not get his goods, is evidence of negligence so gross as to warrant an inference of indifference to the plaintiff's rights. Therefore punitive damages were properly awarded.

WOODS, J. (dissenting). There was evidence warranting the inference by the magistrate that the defendant's freight agent was mistaken in his duty, and that he should have delivered the plaintiff's goods on payment of the freight charges of his own road, when the connecting carrier, after being allowed a reasonable time, failed to respond to his demand for a statement of its charges. The magistrate's inference of negligence in this respect entitled the plaintiff to recover actual damages. As to the measure of damages, the fact that the shipment was a single barber's outfit, directed to an individual, was sufficient to warrant the inference that the carrier was put on notice that the outfit was probably for use by a barber, and not for sale, and that delay would injuriously affect the barber's business by causing him to lose the earnings of a barber for a period of delay. The plaintiff was therefore not precluded from the recovery of special damages to this extent by the rule laid down in Towles & Arnett v. Atlantic C. L. Ry. Co., 83 S. C. 501, 65 S. E. 638, and other cases, that there can be no recovery for special damages without notice before shipment to the carrier of the circumstances of the plaintiff and of the special damages which would result to him from delay. But there was nothing to put the defendant on notice that the delay would cause the plaintiff to lose the opportunity to secure a particular shop, which, on account of the delay, was rented to another barber; and hence there could be no recovery for this item.

The earnings of a barber, as shown by the evidence of the plaintiff, were $15 per week; but the plaintiff testified that during the period of delay in the delivery of his outfit he actually earned, as a laborer, $1.25 per day. The actual damages were thus definitely shown to be $15 per week, less $7.50 per week, earned from April 9th, when the goods arrived, until May 1st, when they were delivered.

I am unable to discover any evidence of willful or wanton disregard of the rights of the plaintiff. When the defendant's agent could not procure promptly the freight charges of a connecting carrier, he made a careful estimate of the freight charges as $10, and offered to accept the sum so estimated and adjust the difference with the plaintiff when informed of the exact amount, which turned out to be $9.88. This offer the plaintiff refused. There was no evidence whatever that the plaintiff was responsible, and it would be very harsh judgment to infer that the defendant's agent was guilty of wanton or willful disregard of plaintiff's rights in not crediting him for the amount of the freight charges. Nor is such an inference to be drawn from the remark imputed to the agent that "he was done fooling with it." The evidence is undisputed that he had made diligent effort to ascertain the exact freight charges, and had failed on account of the negligence of a connecting carrier, and, under the circumstances, the remark meant nothing more than that, having exhausted his efforts, he could do nothing more.

The judgment should, in my opinion, be modified by reducing the recovery to $22.50, the actual damages ascertained in the method above indicated.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; R. E. Copes, Judge.

Action by Alice V. Whitcomb against Edward E. Manderville. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Duncan C. Ray and W. B. De Loach, for appellant. L. A. Wittkowsky and T. J. Kirkland, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This action was commenced in the court of common pleas for Kershaw county in July, 1909, and after issue joined by consent the case came on for a hearing before his honor, Judge Copes, presiding judge, without a jury, in Columbia, upon the pleadings and testimony. The action was on a judgment rendered by the district court of Lancaster county, in the state of Nebraska.

The plaintiff alleges in her complaint that an action was commenced in the district court of Lancaster on July 30, 1884, by Thomas J. Whitcomb, against E. R. Deyo and Edward E. Manderville, and both were duly served, and Deyo made default, and judgment was rendered against him and entered on June 26, 1885; that Manderville duly appeared and filed an answer, and was represented by his attorney; that on June 26, 1885, a decree was duly rendered against the defendant in favor of plaintiff, finding and adjudging "that there was due from defendant, E. E. Manderville, to the plaintiff, Thomas J. Whitcomb, the sum of $1,700." The said decree also finds that the defendant, Manderville, is insolvent, and orders Mellick, as sheriff of Lancaster county, Neb., to be appointed receiver to take charge of the assets and property of the firm of Manderville & Whitcomb, and sell the said property in the same manner as if sold on execution, and upon this proceeding plaintiff have judgment against the defendant, Manderville, for the amount unpaid by the sale of the partnership property aforesaid; and it is further adjudged that plaintiff have judgment against each of the defendants for the costs of this action, taxed at $22.95, and that execution issue accordingly. That, pursuant to said decree, Mellick, as sheriff or receiver, took possession of the assets and property of the firm of Manderville & Whitcomb, and on October 8, 1885, filed his return in the office of the district court in said county and state, reporting the sale of said property, and the amount realized to be applied on the judgment was $135.05. That on June 23, 1890, an execution upon the judgment was issued to the sheriff of said county, commanding him to cause to be levied upon the goods and chattels of said Manderville the sum of $1,700, with interest from June 26, 1885, until paid, and the further sum of $44.70, costs. That said execution was returned wholly unsatisfied on June 26, 1890. That afterwards, on April 2, 1895, an alias execution was issued to enforce payment of the judgment, which was returned unsatisfied on April 6, 1895. That thereafter, on March 21, 1900, a pluries execution, to enforce payment of the judgment, was duly issued and returned wholly unsatisfied on March 24, 1900, and on February 21, 1905, a second pluries execution, to enforce payment of the judgment, was duly issued and returned wholly unsatisfied on February 25, 1905. That the suing out and issuance of said execution within five years from the date of said judgment, and within five years of date of each execution, revived the said judgment, and that said judgment is now in full force, virtue, and effect in the said state of Nebraska, as provided by section 1480 (482) of the 1901 Annotated Code of Nebraska and the law in such cases, as declared by the decisions of the Supreme Court of said state. That plaintiff avers and alleges on information and belief that shortly after rendition of the judgment, and before execution issued, that Manderville left the state of Nebraska and has remained absent ever since, or kept himself concealed, and is now a resident of the state of Pennsylvania, and is seised and possessed of valuable real estate in Kershaw county, S. C., which he purchased some time after the year 1889, and prior to the commencement of this action. That by the law of the state of Nebraska, it is enacted: "If when a cause of action accrues against a person he is out of the state, or shall have absconded or concealed himself, the period limited for the commencement of the action shall not begin to run until he come into the state, or while he is absconded or concealed, and if after the cause of action accrues, he depart from the state, or absconds or conceals himself, the time of his absence or concealment shall not be computed as a part of the period within which the action must be brought." Annotated Code of Nebraska 1901, § 1019. That by the law of the state of Nebraska the presumption of payment from lapse of time may be overcome by the proof that the judgment has never been paid; and proof of the departure, continued absence, and concealment of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint, will rebut the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time. That during the year 1899, plaintiff is informed and believes, defendant became a citizen and resident of the state of South Carolina, without any previous residence in said state, and remained a citizen and resident of said state until the year 1905, when he departed from the state and has remained continually absent therefrom ever since. That on April 29, 1885, the aforesaid judgment was duly assigned to plaintiff for value, and he is now the legal owner and holder thereof. That no part of the said $1,700, decreed to be due Whitcomb by Manderville, has ever been paid, by discount or otherwise, except the sum of $135.05, as set out in the return of Mellick, sheriff-receiver, October 8, 1885, and there is now due and owing thereon the sum of $1,596.68, with interest from October 8, 1885; it being provided by laws of Nebraska that judgments and decrees for the payment of money bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent.

Defendant answers complaint, and admits that he was served, appeared, and defended by counsel the cause in court at Lancaster, Neb., alleged in complaint, but specifically denies the allegations that the judgment referred to is in full force, virtue, and effect in the state of Nebraska. He admits that in 1885 he left the state of Nebraska and has been absent therefrom ever since. He alleges he is in business in the state of Pennsylvania, and has been compelled to reside there the greater part of the last three years, but denies that he is a permanent resident of that state. He admits he owns real estate in Kershaw county, S. C., which he purchased in the year 1905. He admits that he became a resident and citizen of South Carolina in 1898, and before that time he was not a resident; that he departed from the state in 1906, but denies that he has been continuously absent therefrom since, and alleges that he has a home in South Carolina, wherein his family resides every winter. All allegations not admitted he denies. He alleges further that as 20 years have elapsed since the alleged date of the alleged judgment the same is presumed paid, and further alleges that, more than 20 years having elapsed since the alleged date of the judgment, all right of action is barred by the statute of South Carolina, in such cases made and provided. At the trial before his honor, Judge Copes, the records of the court of Lancaster county, Neb., alleged in the complaint, and certain sections of the Annotated Code of the state of Nebraska, and volume 17, Nebraska Reports, and certain depositions, were introduced in evidence by the plaintiff.

At close of plaintiff's case, a motion was made for a nonsuit on eight grounds, to wit: (1) Because there is no evidence of any judgment against the defendant, such as alleged. (2) Because the record of the Nebraska court offered to sustain the judgment alleged shows on its face a complete variance from the judgment described in the complaint. (3) Because the record of the Nebraska court offered in evidence and relied on by plaintiff shows on its face that the same was a proceeding in equity, and the decretal order therein authorized future entry of judgment only for such deficiency as remained after sale by receiver of specific property, and no unconditional judgment for an ascertained amount was rendered or entered against defendant. (4) Because the record offered in evidence by plaintiff shows the sale of only a portion of the property ordered to be sold and applied to defendant's debt, and shows no ascertainment of deficiency, as required by decretal order, was arrived at, nor any judgment rendered for such deficiency. (5) Because no evidence has been adduced of judgment against defendant for any ascertained definite amount, but instead the record shows a decretal order for a contingent conditional amount, to be ascertainable by methods which were not pursued or complied with. (6) Because the decretal order of the Nebraska court offered to sustain the allegation of judgment appears to have been rendered in equity, and is not such a judgment as would support an action at common law. (7) Because no proof has been offered of the laws of Nebraska authorizing any action upon a decree, such as that adduced in evidence, upon which, at common law, no action would lie, and the common law will be presumed as applicable, and because, by the very terms of the said decree and the record accompanying the same, it appears that no valid judgment could have been entered thereon, nor has been. (8) Because it appears that the alleged judgment or debt upon which plaintiff seeks to recover has been presumptively paid, as more than 20 years have elapsed since right of action accrued, and there has been no proof of any written promise to pay, or acknowledgment of the debt or entry of payment upon the record of such alleged judgment, and that there is no sufficient evidence that the alleged judgment has not been paid, or that any part thereof remains unsatisfied.

His honor, Judge Copes, passed the following order, granting nonsuit: "The above-entitled action was tried before me by consent, without a jury, at my chambers in Columbia, S. C., on March 14, A. D. 1911. After plaintiff had introduced evidence, mainly documentary, and rested, a motion for nonsuit was made, on behalf of defendant, upon various grounds, which were submitted in writing, and which need not here be enumerated, and to which reference is sufficient. After argument and careful consideration, I concluded to grant the nonsuit, upon the grounds that the record of the Nebraska court introduced, upon which plaintiff relies, shows that the terms and conditions provided in the decree therein rendered for ascertaining the amount for which plaintiff therein should have judgment were not complied with, except in part, and the record discloses no account of a considerable portion of the property ordered sold, and specifically described, and the proceeds of sale of which were ordered applied to the defendant's indebtedness. It does not appear from the record that any definite, ascertained amount was legally or properly determined as prescribed by the decree, and for such reasons I hold that the allegations of the complaint are not supported by evidence, and I grant the nonsuit. The other grounds submitted are overruled." From this order plaintiff appeals, questioning the correctness of the court's ruling, and defendant gave notice that he would ask the court to sustain the order of nonsuit upon all the grounds submitted on trial below, in addition to the grounds assigned by his honor in his order of nonsuit.

[1] It has been so often decided by this court that, where there is any competent relevant testimony to go to the jury, nonsuit cannot be granted that citation of authority is unnecessary. Was there any competent relevant testimony to go to the jury in this case?

[2] We find a decree of the Nebraska court which was, in our opinion, a final judgment, because it disposed of the whole merits of the cause, and left nothing for the further consideration of the court. The law of Nebraska introduced in evidence has this: "The district courts shall have and exercise general, original and appellate jurisdiction in all matters, both civil and criminal, except where otherwise provided." Cobbey's Annotated Statutes of Nebraska, vol. 2, § 4784. "All presumptions are in favor of the jurisdiction of district court." Bedford v. Ruby, 17 Neb. 98, 22 N. W. 76. The decree finds:

"That there is due from defendant, Manderville, to the plaintiff, Thomas J. Whitcomb, the sum of $1,700. The court further finds the value of the partnership property of the firm of Manderville & Whitcomb is of the value of not to exceed $1,500.00; that the defendant, Manderville, is insolvent; and that the property of the said firm of Manderville & Whitcomb should be sold by the receiver, hereafter named, upon the same advertisement and terms and in the manner of conducting an execution sale of personal property, and the proceeds of such sale be applied to the payment of the above amount found due from Manderville, the defendant, to plaintiff, Thomas J. Whitcomb. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the injunction issued in the cause be made perpetual, and that each of the defendants be restrained from in any manner asserting any right or interest in the partnership assets of the firm of Manderville & Whitcomb, and especially this decree applies to the property described in the pretended chattel mortgage, executed by Deyo to Manderville, which said property is described, to wit, etc. It is further ordered that S. M. Mellick, as sheriff of Lancaster county, Neb., be appointed receiver to take charge of the assets and property of the firm of Manderville & Whitcomb wherever the same may be found, and for that purpose to search for, collect, and take possession of the same wherever found, and said receiver is hereby ordered to sell said property in the same manner as if sold on execution, and to give the purchaser a bill of sale of the same, and that upon the return of his proceedings plaintiff have judgment against the defendant, E. E. Manderville, for the amount unpaid by sale of partnership property aforesaid; and it is further adjudged that plaintiff have judgment against each of the defendants for the costs of this action, taxed at $22.95, and that execution issue accordingly."

[3] On the 8th day of October, 1885, the receiver did make a return, and reported the amount to apply on judgment was $135.05, and which was applied thereon. By decree immediately upon return of receiver's proceedings, Thomas J. Whitcomb was to have judgment for the amount unpaid by the sale of the partnership property; so by this decree we find that on October 8, 1885, Thomas J. Whitcomb had a judgment for $1,700, with interest from June 28, 1885, less the sum of $135.05, applied by receiver. His honor, Judge Copes, holds, however, that the receiver did not sell all of the goods and chattels ordered to be sold, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment until this was done. The record shows instructions to the receiver were that he was to take charge of the assets, property, etc., of the firm of Manderville & Whitcomb wherever the same may be found, and for that purpose search for, collect, and take possession of the same wherever found, and then sell them. Apart from that, the law presumes that "the presumption is always in favor of the correct performance of his duty by an officer, and every reasonable intentment will be made in support of such presumption." Throop on Public Officers, § 559. Also by the same author: "The presumption is that no official person, acting under oath of office, will do aught which is against his official duty to do, or will omit aught which his official duty requires to be done." "All persons are presumed to have duly discharged any duty imposed by law." Douglass v. Owens, 5 Rich. 536.

By examination of the Nebraska record, it will be found that Whitcomb alleges that Deyo is in possession of the assets, and is about to dispose of the same. Manderville later, under oath, asserts that said chattels specifically described have already been sold, and that officers cannot find them, and again, in his sworn answer, says "that the property has been sold." The Nebraska court recognized the fact that the property and assets of the firm of Manderville & Whitcomb had been taken away and secreted, and the order to recover was to sell what he could find.

[4] Plaintiff introduced the following law from the Nebraska Annotated Code, § 1019, which reads: "If when a cause of action accrues against a person he be out of the state, or should have absconded or concealed himself, the period limited for the commencement of the action shall not begin to run until he come into the state, or while he is absconded or concealed; and if after the cause of action accrues he departed from the state or absconds or conceals himself, the time of his absence or concealment shall not be computed as any part of the period within which the action must be brought." The complaint in this case alleges that shortly after rendition of judgment in Nebraska defendant left that state and has remained absent ever since. Defendant in his answer herein admits that about the year 1885 he departed from Nebraska and has been absent therefrom ever since. The Nebraska record shows that execution was duly issued upon judgment on June 23, 1890, which was returned wholly unsatisfied on June 26, 1890; that an alias execution was issued on judgment on April 2, 1895, which was returned wholly unsatisfied on April 6, 1895; that on March 21, 1900, a pluries execution was issued on said judgment and returned wholly unsatisfied on March 24, 1900, and on February 21, 1905, a second pluries execution was issued thereon, and was returned wholly unsatisfied on February 25, 1905. From this it will be seen that there was sufficient testimony on the part of the plaintiff to prevent the granting of a nonsuit, and we think his honor, Judge Copes, was in error in so doing. He was in error in granting it on the grounds he based his order on. Neither can his order of nonsuit be sustained on additional grounds relied on by defendant.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of nonsuit appealed from be reversed, and the case remanded for trial.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF RICHMOND, IND.,
v. BADHAM.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 23, 1912.)

1. COSTS (§ 236*)—ON APPEAL—RIGHT OF
CIRCUIT COURT TO VACATE.

Judgment for defendant in an action on notes was reversed on plaintiff's appeal, and a new trial granted, and plaintiff then gave notice of the costs on appeal, and a judgment for such costs was entered. On motion of defendant, the circuit court set aside the judgment to the extent of $250, on the ground that that amount had been furnished and paid by a party other than the plaintiff. Held, that the setting aside of the judgment was erroneous, since, under the statutory provisions as to costs of appeal, it made no difference who advanced the money for costs.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 162*)—RIGHT TO APPEAL—ESTOPPEL.

Where the court reduced the amount of a judgment theretofore entered, the acceptance by the judgment creditor of the reduced amount, which was not disputed, was not sufficient to preclude an appeal from the act of the court in reducing the amount.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; R. E. Copes, Judge.

Action by First National Bank of Richmond, Ind., against V. C. Badham. From an order of the Court of Common Pleas for Richland County, setting aside in part a judgment for plaintiff against defendant for the costs of an appeal to the Supreme Court, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lyles & Lyles, for appellant. D. W. Robinson, for respondent.

WATTS, J. [1] This is an appeal from the order of the court of common pleas for Richland county, setting aside in part a judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for the costs of an appeal to the Supreme Court. The action was commenced some years ago upon two promissory notes, made by Samuel J. Huffman of Richland county, S. C., and indorsed and delivered by him before maturity to the Richmond City Mill Works of Richmond, Ind., and upon its first trial resulted in a judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed, and said judgment was reversed, and a new trial granted. Plaintiff gave notice of its costs, and a judgment for said costs was duly entered and recorded in the office of the said clerk of court of the court of common pleas for Richland county, with cross-references, as provided in rule 40 of the rules of the circuit court. Said judgment amounted to $344.40, and was entered on the 4th day of August, 1910, the judgment roll being on said day filed in the office of said clerk of court for said county, and the number of the roll is 9,642.

On the 12th day of December, 1910, the defendant served and filed a notice of motion to set aside said judgment, upon the grounds set forth in the petition and affidavit attached to the notice, which were: "That at the time said judgment was taken and entered the defendant supposed that the said costs and disbursements making up the same had been advanced and paid by the plaintiff, and that the same were due to the plaintiff; that since the entry of said judgment, and within the past few days, to wit, on the 11th day of December, 1910, this defendant has ascertained, through copies of the records of the circuit court of Wayne county, state of Indiana, which has been duly certified in accordance with the acts of Congress, and are in his possession, that the costs of preparing and printing the record on appeal of this action were furnished and paid by Henry S. Burns, receiver of the Richmond City Mill Works, and not by said plaintiff bank; and that said costs and disbursements are not due said plaintiff bank, but, if they are due to any one, are due to the said Richmond City Mill Works." The motion came up before Hon. Robert E. Copes, circuit judge, who thereafter filed his order, finding, among other things, as follows:

"That $250 of the costs and expenses taxed against the defendant, as part of said Supreme Court costs, and for which judgment was entered against said defendant by the clerk of this court, under rule 40 of the circuit court, on August 4, 1910, being judgment roll No. 9,642, was furnished and paid by the Richmond City Mill Works, and not by the plaintiff. Indeed, the plaintiff has not denied these allegations, or offered anything in reply or explanation thereof; and this seems to be practically an undisputed fact. So far as the Richmond City Mill Works is concerned, the defendant claims he has a good defense as to any claim which might or could be brought against him; and that said Richmond City Mill Works is indebted to said defendant in a much larger sum, but has no assets in this state. The main case was also tried before me, and on that trial an agreement, signed by counsel for both parties, was introduced in evidence, showing that the Richmond City Mill Works went into the hands of a receiver in March, 1907, and that such receiver filed his final report on October 28, 1908.

"I am of the opinion, and so find, that the plaintiff has not expended the said sum of $250 of said costs, so taxed and entered, and is therefore not entitled to have judgment for, and to receive, the said $250, under rule 40, of this state; and, further, that the defendant is entitled to relief from so much of said judgment as embraces the said sum of $250, under section 195 of volume 2, part 1, of the Code; and therefore ordered and adjudged that the judgment heretofore rendered and entered in this court, by the clerk thereof, on August 4, 1910, being judgment roll No. 9,642, in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, be, and the same is hereby, set aside and vacated as to $250 thereof, but retained in full force and effect as to $84.40 thereof."

The action in which judgment for costs was rendered was upon two promissory notes, made by Samuel J. Huffman, dated July 12, 1907, payable to order of V. C. Badham, one for $785, payable on January 1, 1908, and the other for $790, payable on February 1, 1908. These notes were both indorsed before maturity, and delivered by Badham to the Richmond City Mill Works of Richmond, Ind., and were likewise indorsed before maturity and delivered to the plaintiff, the First National Bank of Richmond, Ind. Both Samuel J. Huffman and V. C. Badham were residents of the state of South Carolina, and the notes sued on contained a reservation to title to the property. The Richmond City Mill Works, not being a resident of South Carolina, could not be made a party to the action here upon these notes. The action in which judgment in question was rendered was commenced in 1905. While action was pending, it appears by proof, furnished by Badham himself, that the Richmond City Mill Works became insolvent, and that the receiver of that corporation, on January 8, 1908, paid to the plaintiff $800 on account of these claims, and on November 4, 1908, paid a final dividend of, $279.60. It also appears that on June 10, 1907, the plaintiff made demand on the receiver of the Richmond City Mill Works for $250, to pay the cost of printing case for appeal to this court, which resulted in the reversal of a judgment for the defendant and a new trial of the cause. This amount was paid over to the plaintiff, the First National Bank, and the plaintiff, having obtained a new trial, in the Supreme Court, duly taxed its costs and entered judgment therefor. The plaintiff appeals from the order of Judge Copes, and questions the right of the circuit judge to vacate the judgment, which has been duly entered up for the plaintiff against the defendant, Badham, to the extent of $250 referred to.

A few days after the order was made by Judge Copes, on April 19, 1911, the attorney for Badham forwarded to the attorneys for plaintiff a check for $84.40, given by the Dorchester Lumber Company, by V. C. Badham, treasurer, and indorsed by attorney for the defendant, being the amount specified in the order of Judge Copes to be paid by said defendant. The indorsement on the check showed it was for the payment of costs in this case, and the letter accompanying the same explicitly states that it was "in payment of the balance of the judgment for costs of the Supreme Court in this case, under and in accordance with the order made by Judge Robert E. Copes, on Saturday last, the 15th inst., copy of which you have. I will thank you to mark this judgment satisfled in accordance with that order." This check was collected by attorneys for the plaintiff, who subsequently appealed from the order of Judge Copes. Attorney for Badham gave notice that he would move to sustain Judge Copes' order, and dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the attorneys for plaintiff accepted, retained, and used this check after receiving it, with the letter, and by so doing the judgment was satisfied, and plaintiff precluded from appealing from said judgment by said acts.

Did Judge Copes have the right to vacate the judgment, which had been duly entered up for the plaintiff against the defendant, Badham, to the extent of $250? We think not. It has been distinctly held in Cunningham v. Cauthen, 47 S. C. 168, 25 S. E. 87, Sullivan v. Latimer, 43 S. C. 262, 21 S. E. 3, and other decisions of our courts, that the statutory provisions as to costs of appeal to the Supreme Court were intended to allow such costs to the prevailing party in the appeal, without regard to the final result of the action. The plaintiff, having prevailed in the Supreme Court in the appeal, was entitled to tax its costs and disbursements; and it made no difference where it got the money from, or who furnished it. That could not concern the defendant. The plaintiff was entitled to its costs and disbursements, under statutory provisions as to costs of an appeal, and defendant was liable.

[2] As to the acceptance of the check by plaintiff's attorneys, it was for the amount only not vacated by the order of Judge Copes, and was not accepted in accord and satisfaction of the judgment. Judge Copes only undertook to reduce the judgment by $250, and in express terms provided that "it be retained in full force and effect as to $84.46 thereof." The judgment was unaffected to that extent, and gave the plaintiff the right to demand that amount from the defendant, and there is no evidence to justify us in holding that the taking of this amount, adjudged and admitted to be due, was a waiver of the additional amount which, it was claimed, had been erroneously stricken from the judgment.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

KIRBY v. KELLY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 23, 1912.)

1. PLEADING (§§ 11, 354*)—STRIKING OUT PLEADING—ALLEGATION OF EVIDENTIARY MATTER.

In an action for dower, the defendants interposed as a defense that the grand jury had found a true bill against plaintiff and a person named for adultery, and that thereupon the plaintiff had fled the state, and remained away until after the death of her husband. Held, on motion to strike, that this defense merely contained evidentiary matter, and therefore did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, and was properly stricken out.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 81, 1092-1095; Dec. Dig. §§ 11, 354.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 103*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—ORDER STRIKING OUT PLEADING.

The striking of a pleading setting up evidentiary matter does not involve the merits, and is not appealable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 704; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 460*)—SUPERSEDEAS—OPPORTUNITY OF APPEAL.

The taking of an appeal from an order not appealable does not act as a supersedeas.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 460.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 352*)—SPECIAL INTERROGATORIES—FORM.

In an action for dower, where it was set up in defense that, while her husband was living, plaintiff willingly left him and lived in adultery with a person named, and so continued until the death of her husband, the submission together of the issue as to the plaintiff's adultery and the issue as to whether she had willingly left her husband and lived in adultery into one interrogatory, requiring but one answer by the jury, was not prejudicial to defendants, as it was necessary for the jury to find both issues in favor of the plaintiff before they could render a special verdict in the negative.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 883*)—WAIVER AFFECTING RIGHT—ACQUIESCENCE IN DECISION.

Where defendant in the course of a trial called the attention of the court to the fact that the next day was a legal holiday, and the court, on inquiry and consent of the jurors, ordered the hearing to proceed on that day, at which time defendant appeared without objection, defendant thereby waived the right on appeal to insist upon his objection to the trial on that day.

6. DOWER (§ 76*)—ACTION—PARTIES.

An action for dower may be brought jointly against all persons who may be in possession of any of the lands out of which dower is claimed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 267-276; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

7. VENUE (§ 16*)—ACTION FOR DOWER—LAND IN DIFFERENT COUNTIES.

In an action for dower brought against all persons in possession of the lands in which dower is claimed, the fact that a part of the lands may be in a county other than that in which the action is brought does not deprive the county court of jurisdiction.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by Annie E. Kirby against Orlando D. Kelly and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. B. Stuckey, Walter H. Wells, and Lee & Moise, for appellants. J. H. Clifton, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for dower. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff was lawfully married to the late Daniel Kirby in 1880, and thereafter lived with him as his wife; that Daniel Kirby died on or about the 6th of November, 1908; that during such coverture Daniel Kirby was seised and possessed of an estate of inheritance, in the following tracts of land (then follows the description of five tracts of land, four of which are situate in the county of Sumter and one in Lee county); that she is entitled to dower in each of said tracts, which are now in the possession of the respective parties, who are made defendants in this action. The defendants, after denying certain allegations of the complaint, set up the defense that some years prior to the death of the said Daniel Kirby the plaintiff willingly left her husband, and lived in adultery with one William Hinson and others, and continued with her said advourter or advourters until the death of her husband; and for these reasons they claim the benefit of section 2387, 1 Code of Laws. They also interposed as a fourth defense that the grand jury for Florence county in 1907 found a true bill against the plaintiff and William Hinson for adultery, and that thereupon the plaintiff fled the state and remained away until after the death of Daniel Kirby. After the filing of the answer, both the plaintiff and the defendants gave notice that they would make motion to submit certain issues to the jury. Thereafter, to wit, on the 5th day of July, 1910, the plaintiff gave notice that, upon the call of the case, she would make a motion to strike out the fourth defense on the ground that it was irrelevant and redundant, which motion was granted. Immediately thereupon the defendants served notice of intention to appeal from said order. When the case was called for trial, the defendants contended that the notice of intention to appeal acted as a supersedeas, and made a motion to stay proceedings, until the case was finally determined, but the motion was overruled. Thereupon the motions to frame issues for trial by a jury were called up, and the defendants formally withdrew their motions.

His honor the presiding judge, upon the plaintiff's motion, then ordered that the following issues be submitted to the jury: "Did the plaintiff prior to the death of her husband, Daniel Kirby, have an advourter, and willingly leave her husband, and go away and continue with him in adultery?" The defendant's attorneys objected to the form of the order, on the ground that the issues as to her having an advourter, and the issue as to her willingly leaving her husband, and going away and continuing with her advourter in adultery, should have been separately submitted to the jury, but the objection was overruled. The following statement appears in the record: "The trial thereupon proceeded upon the issues set out in the order above stated, which trial began, Tuesday, November 22, 1910. The examination of witnesses consumed all Tuesday, November 22d, Wednesday, November 23d, and still in progress, at the hour for adjournment of the court, on the evening of the 23d of November. Thereupon the defendants' counsel called the attention of the court to the fact that the following day Thursday, November 24th, was Thanksgiving Day, a legal holiday, and suggested that the court adjourn further hearing of the cause until Friday morning, November 25th, upon the ground that Thursday was a legal holiday, and that the court had no right to continue the trial on Thanksgiving Day, and that the proceedings would be null and void. Whereupon the court inquired of the jurors whether they wished the case adjourned over until Friday, and, being by them assured that they unanimously preferred to proceed on Thursday, ordered the further hearing of the case to proceed on Thursday morning, November 24th, to which the defendants did not except. The cause thereupon did proceed on Thursday morning Thanksgiving Day, consuming the entire day, and was concluded on the afternoon of that day, the counsel for the defendants making no further objections." The jury found for the plaintiff upon the issues submitted to it. Thereupon the court proceeded to hear the cause upon the remaining issues, which were decided in favor of the plaintiff. During the hearing of the case, the defendants' attorneys raised the question that the court did not have jurisdiction of the tract of land lying in Lee county, but the objection was overruled.

[1] The defendants appealed upon exceptions, the first of which is as follows: "Because the presiding judge erred in striking out the fourth defense of the answer of the adult defendants, the same being a valid legal defense, based upon a public record, and the ruling of the presiding judge thus precluding the defense from offering any evidence upon the same, or of placing said record in evidence." The so-called fourth defense merely contained evidentiary matter, and therefore did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. It was therefore properly struck out. Bolin v. Railway, 65 S. C. 222, 43 S. E. 665.

[2] The second exception is as follows: "Because the defendants, having served notice of intention to appeal from the ruling and order of the presiding judge striking out their fourth defense, moved that all further proceedings be stayed pending said appeal, upon the ground that the notice of appeal operated as a supersedeas. His honor erred in not sustaining the motion, and in ordering the trial to proceed."

[3] The striking out of evidentiary matter does not involve the merits, and is not appealable. An appeal in such case does not therefore act as a supersedeas. Rhodes v. Railway, 68 S. C. 494, 47 S. E. 639.

[4] The third exception is as follows: "Because the presiding judge erred in combining two separate important issues of fact in one issue, to wit, the issue numbered 'first,' submitting the issue of adultery and the issue of the wife going away and continuing with her advouter in one query, requiring but one answer by the jury, and thereby denied the defendants the right to separate findings upon the separate issues raised by the statute to their inquiry, in that it is not known to which issue the answer 'no' by the jury is responsive." We fail to see wherein the form of the issues was prejudicial to the rights of the appellants, as it was necessary for the jury to find both issues in favor of plaintiff, before they could render a verdict in the negative.

[5] The fourth exception is as follows: "Because the presiding judge erred in not sustaining defendants' motion to adjourn the trial over from November 23, to November 25, 1910, on the ground that the 24th of November 1910, Thanksgiving Day, was a legal holiday, and the further progress of the trial on that day rendered the same null and void under the statute of this state." A careful reading of the statement in the record shows that the intention of the appellants' attorney was merely to call to the attention of the presiding judge the fact that the next day was a legal holiday in order that he might determine whether the trial should then proceed, but it does not appear that they interposed an objection to the trial of the case next day. They therefore waived the right to insist upon such objection.

[6] The fifth exception is as follows: Because the presiding judge erred in holding that he had jurisdiction in this action, to adjudge the rights of the plaintiff and the defendants in a separate tract of land described in the complaint, situate wholly within the county of Lee, in said state, and in making his decree thereon." The court in the case of Bostick v. Barnes, 59 S. C. 22, 37 S. E. 24, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice McIver, uses this language: "So far as we are informed, we have no distinct authority upon the subject, though our statutes upon the subject seem to imply that the action for dower may be brought jointly against all persons who may be in possession of any of the lands out of which dower is claimed. * * * The case of Shelton v. Shelton, 20 S. C. 560, while not deciding the point which we have been considering, does seem to imply that a widow might bring a joint action against all persons who are in possession of any of the tracts of land, out of which dower was demanded."

[7] If an action for dower may be brought jointly against all persons who may be in possession of any of the lands out of which dower is claimed, as seems to be the law in this state, then the fact that part of the lands may be in one county and part in another would not deprive the court of jurisdiction. Barrett v. Watts, 13 S. C. 441.

Judgment affirmed.

McDOWELL v. BURNETT, County Sup'r, et al.

1. MANDAMUS (§ 107*)—SALARY OF PUBLIC OFFICER—AWARD TO CONTESTANT.

Where the court issues mandamus to require the salary attached to a public office to be paid to one of the claimants to the office, it necessarily decides against the other claimant, since there is only one salary, and as between two claimants it belongs by law to the rightful claimant, or the de jure officer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 151*)—PROCEEDINGS—PARTIES DEFENDANT—PARTY CONTESTING CLAIM—PUBLIC OFFICE.

Petitioner was appointed and commissioned to the office of city magistrate, and the incumbent to that office, who had been duly appointed and commissioned by the Governor until his successor was appointed and qualified, claimed to be a magistrate, and continued to exercise the duties of the office. Held, on application by petitioner for a writ of mandamus against county officers to compel them to pay to him the salary attached to the office of city magistrate, without making the adverse claimant a party, that the merits of the application would be reserved, and the adverse party be allowed to make his answer thereto.

Gary, C. J., and Watts, J., dissenting.

Application by B. L. McDowell against T. C. Burnett, County Supervisor, and F. Graham Payne, County Treasurer, of Greenwood county for a writ of mandamus to require them to pay to the petitioner the salary attached to the office of magistrate for the city of Greenwood. Ordered that W. H. Kerr be made a party to the proceeding, and that he be allowed to make his answer to the petition within 10 days after the service of the petition on him, and that all questions relating to the merits be in the meantime reserved.

D. H. Magill, for petitioner. Giles & Ouzts, for respondents.

WOODS, J. In this application for a writ of mandamus, requiring the respondents to pay to the petitioner the salary attached to the office of magistrate for the city of Greenwood, the petitioner alleged:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep. Indexes

"That on the — day of —, 1910, W. G. Austin, who was a magistrate duly appointed and qualified for Greenwood, in the county of Greenwood, died, and thereafter, to wit, on the — day of February, 1910, * * * W. H. Kerr was appointed, pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the said W. G. Austin, as magistrate at Greenwood, and entered upon and held such office until the adjournment of the General Assembly at the regular session next after such appointment, to wit, the adjournment of the regular session of the year 1911, when, his term having expired by law, J. W. Canfield was duly appointed and commissioned as magistrate for Greenwood by the Governor, duly qualified and entered upon the duties of said office, and, on the — day of May, 1911, the said J. W. Canfield resigned the office of magistrate at Greenwood, whereupon, on the 8th day of May, 1911, the Governor appointed and commissioned your petitioner to fill the unexpired term of the said J. W. Canfield, as magistrate for Greenwood, and your petitioner duly qualified as such magistrate and entered upon the duties of said office."

An order to show cause having been issued, the respondents made the following return: "That they deny each and every allegation and statement made in said petition, not hereinafter admitted. That W. H. Kerr was duly appointed and commissioned, on January 27, 1910, by the Governor of this state, magistrate at Greenwood for the unexpired term of W. G. Austin, deceased, and until his successor was appointed and qualified. That at the regular session of the General Assembly of this state for the year 1911 W. H. Kerr was duly recommended by the Senate to the Governor for reappointment, and the Governor, in disregard of the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed and commissioned J. W. Canfield magistrate at Greenwood. That the said W. H. Kerr refused to surrender the said office to J. W. Canfield, but held the same office of magistrate, and continued to hold the same and to perform the duties thereof. That subsequently the said J. W. Canfield was appointed by the Governor auditor of Greenwood county, and upon his acceptance of said office the Governor thereupon appointed and commissioned the petitioner, B. L. McDowell, and the said W. H. Kerr refused to surrender the said office to the petitioner, and he has continued to hold the said office and to perform the duties thereof."

The petitioner demurred orally to the return, so that the question is whether, taking as true the allegations of the return, the writ of mandamus should issue, requiring the salary to be paid to the petitioner.

By the return, it appears that W. H. Kerr was the legally appointed magistrate before the appointment of Canfield and the subsequent appointment of the petitioner by the Governor, and that Kerr still claims to be the magistrate, and is exercising the duties of the office; that the respondents have no interest in the controversy; and that Kerr is not a party to these proceedings.

The first inquiry is whether the court should, in any case, issue its writ of mandamus, requiring the salary attached by law to the office to be paid to one of two claimants of the office, before the right to the office and the salary has been determined by quo warranto, or the statutory action provided by section 424 of the Code of Procedure.

[1] There is no doubt that the writ of mandamus may be issued to compel recognition by one officer of the official character of one in possession of an office as a de facto officer. In Delgado v. Chavez, 140 U. S. 586, 11 Sup. Ct. 874, 35 L. Ed. 578, the petitioners had been adjudged to be de facto county commissioners, and the probate clerk, whose duty it was to record the proceedings of the board of county commissioners, refused to record the proceedings of the petitioners, or to recognize them as county commissioners, on the ground that others persons claimed to be de jure commissioners. It was held that the petitioners were entitled to the writ of mandamus, requiring recognition of their official character by recording their proceedings. The decision was based on the ground that the public interests require that the duties of an office shall be performed, and that those who are in possession as de facto officers must be recognized or entitled to perform such duties until they are legally ousted by other claimants under proper proceedings. The doctrine of the case is obviously sound, and it has been generally recognized. The principle was applied in State ex rel. Bruce v. Rice, 66 S. C. 1, 44 S. E. 80, and Id., 67 S. C. 236, 45 S. E. 153, where it was held that the court should not restrain de facto public officers in the exercise of public functions on a mere rule to show cause, pending the trial of title to the office.

[2] But a very different principle is involved when the court is asked to issue its writ of mandamus to require the salary attached to a public office to be paid to one of the claimants of the office. There is only one salary, and as between the two claimants it belongs by law to the rightful claimant—the de jure officer; and necessarily when the court orders the salary to be paid to one of the claimants it decides against the other claimant. Hagan v. City of Brooklyn, 126 N. Y. 643, 27 N. E. 265; Lee v. Mayor of Wilmington, 1 Marv. (Del.) 65, 40 Atl. 663.

The courts, in the public interest, may by mandamus require the recognition of the actual incumbent of a public office, in order that the public business may be transacted, even without requiring an adverse claimant to be made a party, because in doing so it does not adjudicate the right of the adverse claimant, but leaves him to test his right in another proceeding. But it seems perfectly clear that no court should, in a mandamus proceeding, indirectly adjudge one of two claimants to be entitled to an office, by ordering the salary paid to him, without having the other claimant before it as a party to the proceeding. There may be exceptions to this rule, where it is perfectly clear that the adverse claim is merely pretensive, or where the adverse applicant for the writ of mandamus is clearly the actual incumbent and has performed the duties of the office, and the adverse claimant has failed to institute proper proceedings to assert his right after full opportunity to do so. But the court would be going to extreme lengths in holding that a claim to office, based on the action of the state senate, was so clearly pretensive, that the title to the office may be adjudged to be in the petitioner, without allowing the claimant, under the authority of the Senate, an opportunity to be heard in support of the legality of the Senate's action. This is not the case of a person demanding a mandamus for the payment of his salary on a showing that he is the sole incumbent of the office, performing its duties, and having in possession the rooms and records appertaining to the office. On the contrary, it appears by the return that Kerr entered upon the office under a valid appointment; that he has refused to surrender and still holds the office, and performs the duties thereof.

If this were all, it would seem clear that the court should not adjudge the claim of Kerr to be invalid, and practically oust him, as incumbent, from the office, without allowing him an opportunity to be heard. But it not only appears that Kerr is exercising the duties of the office, but the court must, under the demurrer, take as true the denial of the return that the petitioner is exercising the duties of the office of magistrate. The case, then, comes to this inquiry: Will the court, by its writ of mandamus, order the respondents to pay the salary of magistrate to one who claims the office under a commission, but is not exercising its duties, and thus adjudge such claimant to be the lawful magistrate, without giving another claimant, who is the actual incumbent, refusing to surrender the office, and performing the duties, an opportunity to be heard? To this inquiry, we are unable to see how anything but a negative answer could be proposed.

We do not think, however, it follows from this conclusion that the proceedings should be dismissed; on the contrary, Kerr should be made a party, and the whole controversy determined. It is true the general rule is that courts will not adjudge the title to public office in a mandamus proceeding, when the parties have another adequate remedy. Runion v. Latimer, 6 S. C. 126. Many of the authorities so holding are collected in High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, § 49, and in the note to State v. Gardner, 98 Am. St. Rep. 858. There may be sound reason for the rule where the facts are in dispute; for issues of fact might be more conveniently tried by an action instituted under the Code of Procedure to test the title of office. But where the facts do not seem to be in dispute, and the issue is one of law only, no good reason is apparent why the court may not settle the right to an office under proceedings in mandamus, as well as in any other proceeding. To hold otherwise would be to attach too great importance to the mere form in which an issue is presented to the court. It concerns the public peace and safety that this unfortunate controversy should be settled. The preservation of law and order depends in large degree on the office of magistrate, and it is of great public importance that his authority in the community should be unquestioned. The conclusion that the right to the office under such conditions as here exist should be adjudicated in mandamus proceedings is supported by high authority. Luce v. Board of Examiners, 153 Mass. 108, 26 N. E. 419; Keough v. Board of Aldermen, 156 Mass. 403, 31 N. E. 387; Lawrence v. Hanley, 84 Mich. 399, 47 N. W. 753.

It is therefore ordered that W. H. Kerr be made a party to these proceedings, and that he be allowed to make his answer to the petition within 10 days after the service of the petition on him, and that all questions relating to the merits be in the meantime reserved.

HYDRICK, J., concurs.

FRASER, J. I concur, because I do not think this court can pass upon the right of removal in a proceeding to which the officer removed (if he was removed) is not a party.

WATTS, J. (dissenting). This is an application to the court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, for a writ of mandamus, requiring the respondents to pay the salary alleged to be due the petitioner as magistrate for Greenwood.

The allegations of the petition, material to the questions involved, are as follows: "That on the — day of —, 1910, W. G. Austin, who was the magistrate duly appointed and qualified for Greenwood, in the county of Greenwood, died, and thereafter, to wit, on the — day of February, 1910, and during the regular session of the General Assembly for the year 1910, W. H. Kerr was appointed, pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the said W. G. Austin, as magistrate at Greenwood, and entered upon and held said office until the adjournment of the General Assembly at the regular session next after such appointment, to wit, the adjournment of the regular session of the year 1911, when, his term having expired by law, J. W. Canfield was duly appointed and commissioned as magistrate for Greenwood by the Governor, duly qualified and entered upon the duties of said office, and, on the ——— day of May, 1911, the said J. W. Canfield resigned the office of magistrate at Greenwood, whereupon, on the 8th day of May, 1911, the Governor appointed and commissioned your petitioner to fill the unexpired term of the said J. W. Canfield, as magistrate for Greenwood, and your petitioner duly qualified as such magistrate and entered upon the duties of said office."

The return of the respondents is as follows: "That they deny each and every allegation and statement made in the said petition, not hereinafter admitted. That W. H. Kerr was duly appointed and commissioned, on January 27, 1910, by the Governor of this state, magistrate at Greenwood for the unexpired term of W. G. Austin, deceased, and until his successor was appointed and qualified. That at the regular session of the General Assembly of this state for the year 1911 W. H. Kerr was duly recommended by the Senate to the Governor for reappointment, and the Governor, in disregard of the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed and commissioned J. W. Canfield magistrate at Greenwood. That the said W. H. Kerr refused to surrender the said office to J. W. Canfield, but held the same office of magistrate, and continued to hold the same and to perform the duties thereof. That subsequently the said J. W. Canfield was appointed by the Governor auditor for Greenwood county, and upon his acceptance of said office the Governor thereupon appointed and commissioned the petitioner, B. L. McDowell, and the said W. H. Kerr refused to surrender the said office to the petitioner, and he has continued to hold the said office and to perform the duties thereof."

Section 20, art. 5 of the Constitution, contains this provision: "A sufficient number of magistrates shall be appointed and commissioned by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for each county, who shall hold their office for the term of two years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified."

Section 27, art. 3, of the Constitution, is as follows: "Officers shall be removed for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty, in such manner as may be provided by law, when no mode of trial or removal is provided in this Constitution."

Section 4, art. 15, is as follows: "For any willful neglect of duty, or other reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the Governor shall remove any executive or judicial officer, on the address of two-thirds of each house of the General Assembly: Provided, that the cause or causes for which said removal may be required, shall be stated at length in such address, and entered on the journals of each house; and provided further, that the officer intended to be removed, shall be notified of such cause or causes, and shall be admitted to a hearing in his own defense, or by his counsel, or by both, before any vote for such address; and in all cases the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays, and be entered on the journal of each house respectively."

Conceding that section 4, art. 15, of the Constitution, provides a remedy for the removal of a minor officer, such as a magistrate, it is not inconsistent with the provisions of section 27, art. 3, of the Constitution. If the remedy afforded by section 4, art. 15, had been intended to be exclusive, there would have been no necessity for section 27, art. 3, of the Constitution. The law favors a construction that will give force and effect to all the provisions of a constitution, rather than an interpretation that would render nugatory another part thereof.

After the adoption of the Constitution, a statute was enacted, providing that "the Governor shall have authority, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint magistrates in each county of the state, who shall hold their office for the term of two years, and until their successors are appointed and qualified. * * * Such magistrates may be suspended by the Governor for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty; and the Governor shall report any suspension, with the cause thereof to the Senate at its next session, for its approval or disapproval." Code of Laws, § 982. Also that "the Governor shall have authority, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill any vacancy caused by death, removal, or otherwise, of any magistrate for the unexpired term." Code of Laws, § 983. Also that, "in the event of a vacancy, at any time, in any of the offices of any county of the state, whether from death, resignation, disqualification, refusal or neglect to qualify, of the person elected or appointed thereto, expiration of the term of office, removal from the county, or from any other cause, the Governor shall have full power to appoint some suitable person who shall be an elector of the county, and upon duly qualifying according to law shall be entitled to enter upon and hold the office, to which he has been appointed, if it be an elective office, until the next general election, when an election shall be held to fill the unexpired term, and the officer so appointed or elected, shall hold office for the term of said election or appointment, and until his successor shall qualify; and if it be an office which was filled originally by appointment, until the adjournment of the General Assembly, at the regular session next after such appointment; and shall be subject to all the duties and liabilities incident to said office during the term of his service therein." Code of Laws, 254. Also that "the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint the following officers: * * * Magistrates. * * * Any vacancy which may happen in any of the said offices, during the recess of the Senate, may be filled by the Governor, who shall report the appointment to the Senate at its next session, and, if the Senate do not advise and consent thereto, at such session, the office shall be vacant." Code of Laws, § 624.

Also that "the following officers shall be appointed by the Governor: * * * Any vacancy in a county office, by reason of death, resignation, refusal or neglect to qualify, of the person elected or appointed thereto, expiration of the term of office, or any other cause. The person so appointed to hold his office, in all cases in which the office is elective, until the next general election, and until his successor shall qualify; and, in cases of offices which are originally filled by appointment and not by election, until the adjournment of the session of the General Assembly, next after such vacancy has occurred. The Governor may remove for cause any person so appointed by him, to fill such vacancy." Code of Laws, § 625.

Turning to the statutory provisions hereinbefore mentioned, we find, in section 982, that magistrates may be suspended by the Governor for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty; and, in section 625, that the Governor may remove, for cause, any person appointed by him to fill a vacancy. These two sections must be construed together, and confer upon the Governor the power to suspend or remove a magistrate for certain causes, to wit, incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty. But there is no statute providing that the magistrate is entitled to a hearing before he can be removed.

In the case of State v. Ansel, 78 S. C. 395, 57 S. E. 185, this court had under consideration the power of the Governor to remove certain dispensary commissioners, without affording them an opportunity to be heard before removing them from office. In that case the court used the following language: "Article 3, § 27, of the Constitution, provides: 'Officers shall be removed for incapacity, misconduct, or neglect of duty in such manner, as may be provided by law, when no mode of trial or removal is provided in the Constitution.' As no mode of trial or removal is provided in the Constitution applicable to dispensary officers, it is clear that the Legislature, under the section above quoted, had plenary power to provide for the removal of dispensary officers with or without trial. Section 556, Criminal Code, provided, that 'the term of office of the members of said board [directors of the state dispensary] shall be for two years, unless sooner removed by the Governor.' In the absence of any direction as to the particular procedure by which removal was to be made, the statute conferred on the Governor the power to remove at his discretion, under such procedure as he chose to adopt, for his own satisfaction. It is not contended that the Governor had no power of removal in this case; but the objections go to the manner in which he exercised his jurisdiction. If, however, he had discretion to remove without a hearing, petitioners were not denied any legal right, but received favor, in so far as they were allowed opportunity to make defense after notice and specification of charges. They accepted their office, subject to the power of summary removal by the Governor." We see no difference in principle between that and the present case touching this question.

Our conclusion is that the petitioner is entitled to the writ of mandamus, and that it should be so adjudged.

ROBERTSON v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 29, 1912.)

VERDICT—VALIDITY—TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES.

In an action against a telegraph company for mental anguish sustained by plaintiff because of the delay of the company in transmitting a message in reply to plaintiff's message inquiring when her husband would be home, plaintiff held not entitled to recover.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Edgefield County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Sallie Robertson against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a verdict for plaintiff and an order denying its motion for new trial, defendant appeals, and also appeals from an order denying its motion to set aside the verdict upon newly discovered evidence. Reversed and remanded.

The exceptions referred to in the opinion were as follows:

"I. In that his honor erred in permitting the plaintiff to testify as follows: 'Q. You expected a reply to your telegram about 6:30 that day? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, from 6:30 on the date you sent your telegram to Edgefield, state, whether or not, were you uneasy? A. Yes, sir. Yes, sir; I suffered a great deal. Q. And you thought you would get a reply to your telegram about 6:30? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, from 6:30 until 10:30 that night, were you uneasy about your husband? A. Yes, sir. Q. Had you suffered much in your mind? A. Yes, sir. Q. How did you feel from 6:30 until 10:30 that night? A. I had a severe headache and suffered a great deal. Q. Uneasy about your husband? A. Yes, sir—the reason being that the testimony was irrelevant, the complaint alleging that the plaintiff suffered from 7:00 o'clock p. m., July 18, 1910, until 10:30 o'clock p. m., on the same date, to which hours the testimony should have been confined, and for the further reason that the plaintiff had testified that she had expected her husband on the 8 o'clock train, and her anguish, therefore, could not have commenced until she had been informed that her husband did not arrive on said train.

"II. In that his honor erred in allowing the witness M. A. Taylor to testify as follows: 'I think if the day operator goes off duty at 6 o'clock, that they should have an operator to take messages after 6 o'clock. Q. What would be a reasonable closing time? A. I think 8 o'clock would be a reasonable closing time, in the evening. Q. A regulation closing the office at 6 o'clock, and not sending any telegram after that time, you would consider that an unreasonable rule? A. Yes, sir.'—the reason being that the witness was testifying as to the reasonableness of hours in a town, the conditions existing in which he knew nothing, and that said testimony was the expression of an opinion of the witness without facts being stated upon which to base the same, and it was therefore irrelevant and incompetent.

"III. In that his honor refused to direct a verdict for the defendant on the ground that the office hours of the defendant company in the town of Ninety-Six were proved to be from 8 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock in the afternoon and that there was no evidence tending to show that such office hours were unreasonable, and the undisputed testimony shows that the telegram about which complaint is made was not received and could not have been received at the office of Ninety-Six until said office was closed for business and for the further reason that the interstate commerce law prohibits railroads and telegraph companies from keeping their employes in such offices on duty for a longer time than nine consecutive hours.

"IV. In that his honor erred in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant for the reason that if there was any mental anguish or suffering on the part of the plaintiff, it was not the direct and proximate result of any delict on the part of the defendant company.

"V. In that his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'The statute as to mental suffering includes damages for anxiety and for negligence which prolongs anxiety'—the same being the seventh request of plaintiff, the error being that the statute does not allow damages for anxiety, but only for mental anguish or suffering in the absence of bodily injury.

"VI. In that his honor erred in refusing to charge the sixth request of the defendant, which is as follows: 'The undisputed evidence shows that the plaintiff expected her husband to arrive on the 4 o'clock train, or on the 8 o'clock train, and that he actually arrived at 10:30 o'clock, then you are only to consider such suffering as was the direct and proximate result of the failure of the telegraph company to deliver the message that would have relieved her suffering. I charge you thus far, but I refuse to charge you the remainder of that request, which is: 'After the 8 o'clock train until the time her husband actually arrived,' because I charge you gentlemen, that she is entitled to recover any damages by way of mental anguish or suffering that she suffered after a reasonable time had elapsed for the delivery of the telegram which is alleged to have been sent from Edgefield some time around about 6 o'clock'—the error being that said request was the law applicable to the undisputed facts of the case.

"VII. In that his honor erred in refusing to charge the eighth request of the defendant, which is as follows: 'I charge you that the business hours of the telegraph company at Ninety-Six from 8 o'clock a. m. until 6 o'clock p. m., established by the telegraph company, are reasonable; and if you find from all the circumstances and evidence that it was impossible to transmit the message from Edgefield to Ninety-Six, before the office closed in Ninety-Six and before the husband of the plaintiff arrived, then your verdict should be for the defendant'—the error being that the evidence as to reasonableness of the office hours was undisputed.

"VIII. In that his honor erred in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a new trial upon the following grounds: (1) Because the verdict is absolutely excessive and capricious. (2) Because the verdict is contrary to the evidence adduced. (3) Because it is contrary to the charge of the court as to the law of the case. (4) Because there is no testimony whatever that the suffering was the direct and proximate result of any act or delict on the part of the telegraph company. (5) Because, as to office hours, there is not a scintilla of evidence to contradict the fact, which was proven on the part of the defendant, that the office hours at Ninety-Six from 8 a. m. to 6 p. m. were reasonable hours. (6) On the ground that telephone, railroad and telegraph companies, engaged in interstate commerce, cannot keep their employes in the service over nine hours a day and the testimony is that the office hours were from 8 a. m. to 6 p. m. The testimony is uncontradicted that the office there would not warrant the employment of a night operator. (7) On the further ground that there is no evidence of any waiver as to office hours at Ninety-Six. (8) On the ground that your honor refused to charge our eighth request."

John Gary Evans and N. G. Evans, for appellant. Thurmond & Nicholson, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, through the negligence of the defendant, in failing to deliver a telegram within a reasonable time. The plaintiff and her husband lived at Ninety-Six, S. C., and worked in the factory. The husband went to Edgefield, S. C., on a bicycle, to visit his sister, Mrs. Kate Waits, and, becoming suddenly ill, sent the following telegram to his wife on the 17th of July, 1910, "I am sick we will be home to-morrow on train." He failed to arrive at home on the 18th of July, and his wife on that day sent to him the following message: "When will you be home?" And, in reply thereto, Mrs. Kate Waits (in whose care the telegram was addressed), on the 18th of July, 1910, at 6 o'clock p. m., delivered to the defendant, for transmission, the following telegram: "Jerry is on way on bicycle, left at ten." The said telegram was not delivered to the plaintiff until the next day at 10 o'clock a. m., July 19, 1910, and, as the result of the failure to deliver the last-mentioned telegram, the plaintiff alleges that she suffered mental anguish.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported.

First Exception. The ground of objection to the admissibility of the testimony is that it was irrelevant. Even conceding that there was error, the appellant has failed to satisfy this court that it was prejudicial.

Second Exception. The appellant has failed to show that, if there was error, it was prejudicial to its rights.

Third Exception. His honor, the presiding judge, could not have directed a verdict without invading the province of the jury.

Fourth Exception. What was said in disposing of the third exception is conclusive of this question.

Fifth Exception. When the charge is considered in its entirety, it will be seen that this exception cannot be sustained.

Sixth Exception. The presiding judge could not have charged the request as presented, without invading the province of the jury.

Seventh Exception. What was said in considering the sixth exception is conclusive of this question.

Eighth Exception. There was testimony tending to sustain all the material allegations of the complaint, and there does not appear to have been an abuse of discretion on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in refusing the motion for a new trial.

The second appeal is from the refusal of "a motion before his honor, R. W. Memminger, presiding judge, at the October term of the court of Edgefield, to set aside a verdict for the plaintiff rendered in this case, upon after-discovered evidence, showing that the foreman of the jury that found the verdict was the uncle of the plaintiff."

The defendant introduced certain affidavits in support of the motion, but it will only be necessary to reproduce the following:

Affidavit of Amos Eubanks, in which he says: "That he sat at a juror and foreman of the same in the case of Mrs. Jerry Robertson against the Western Union Telegraph Company. That he is the uncle of the father of Mrs. Jerry Robertson. That at the time the circuit judge asked if any of the jurors were related to the plaintiff, deponent did not answer, because he did not know who Mrs. Robertson was at that time, and 'the same had no influence on me.'"

Affidavit of Mr. John Gary Evans, which was as follows: "That he is attorney for the Western Union Telegraph Company, defendant in this action, and that his brother, N. G. Evans, was associate counsel. That deponent had no knowledge of any relationship existing between the plaintiff, Mrs. Robertson, and the foreman of the jury, Mr. A. Eubanks. That deponent requested the court to ask the jurors before they were sworn whether they were related by blood or marriage to the plaintiff or her husband in this action. That such question was asked and no response whatever was made by any juror, and that the case went to trial, and A. Eubanks appears upon the record as the foreman of the jury. That, several months after the trial of the case and verdict rendered, deponent was informed that the foreman of the jury was the uncle of the plaintiff, Sallie Robertson, whereupon deponent instituted an inquiry, and ascertained through an affidavit of A. Eubanks himself, which affidavit is herewith submitted to the court, that it was true that he was the great-uncle of the plaintiff. That the Western Union Telegraph Company had no knowledge, so far as this deponent is able to ascertain, of any relationship existing between Mrs. Robertson and the foreman of the jury prior to or at the trial of said cause."

The plaintiff introduced the following affidavits in reply:

Affidavit of Jerry Robertson, who says: "That he is the husband of Mrs. Sallie Robertson, the plaintiff in the above-entitled action, and was present at the trial of said case. That deponent never lived near Mr. Amos Eubanks, but married at Edgefield and moved from there to Ninety-Six, S. C., and didn't know of any relationship whatsoever between his wife and Mr. Eubanks, when the jury was selected, and never heard of any relationship between them until right recently."

Affidavit of Mr. J. W. Thurmond, who says: "That he is a member of the firm of Thurmond & Nicholson who represented the plaintiff in the above-entitled action; and, when said case was tried, he had no knowledge or information of any relationship between Mr. A. Eubanks, the foreman of the jury in said case, and the plaintiff in the action, and this deponent never heard of any such relationship until since the verdict in said case was rendered. Deponent walked into the office of N. G. Evans, Esq., just as Mr. A. Eubanks had signed the affidavit offered by the defendant on this motion, and Mr. Eubanks remarked to deponent that he thought the affidavit ought to contain the statement that no relationship between him and the plaintiff had any influence on him in agreeing to the verdict in that case, and then deponent suggested to Mr. Eubanks that this statement should be incorporated in the affidavit, and so it substantially was. That deponent has known Mr. A. Eubanks for a number of years, and knows him to be a man of integrity and honor, and is satisfied that his statement is true to the effect that he did not know of the relationship of the plaintiff to him, as mentioned in his affidavit, and, besides, deponent is satisfied that, if it had been otherwise, the said juror would not have been influenced thereby in his verdict in said case."

Affidavit of Mr. B. E. Nicholson, which is to the same effect as that of Mr. J. W. Thurmond.

Section 2944 of the Code of Laws is as follows: "The court shall, on motion of either party in suit, examine, on oath, any person who is called as a juror therein, to know whether he is related to either party, or has any interest in the cause, or has expressed or formed any opinion, or is sensible of any bias or prejudice therein, and the party objecting to the juror may introduce any other competent evidence, in support of the objection. If it appears to the court that the juror is not indifferent in the cause, he shall be placed aside as to the trial of that cause, and another shall be called."

The rule is thus stated in the case of State v. Brock, 61 S. C. 141, 39 S. E. 359: "While the circuit judge committed error in stating that jurors related by blood or connected by marriage within the sixth degree to either of the parties were disqualified from sitting as such, and that both consanguinity and affinity, within the sixth degree, were grounds for legal exceptions, under the statutes, still he stated a very salutary rule. Certainly the Legislature has interdicted judges from sitting in cases of such relationship, and it is a good guide to the exercise of a sound discretion by a circuit judge to observe the same degree of relationship."

In the case of State v. Perry, 73 S. C. 199, 53 S. E. 169, the principle was announced that the relationship of a jury commissioner to a party, which would invalidate the finding of a grand jury, must be such as would reasonably lead to the presumption that the commissioner would be thereby affected in such manner as to impair the proper discharge of his duties, and that fact must be determined by the trial judge in the exercise of a sound discretion.

If the practice prevailed of allowing a person related to a party litigant, either by consanguinity or affinity, as a great-uncle, to sit as a juror, especially as foreman, the administration of justice would be brought into disrepute.

The following language of the court, in the case of State v. McQuaige, 5 S. C. 429, is applicable to this case: "The obligation resting on one engaged in drawing a jury involves a duty of such a high, important, and delicate character that its exercise must be free even from a suspicion of partiality. It is true that no charge of wrong is imputed to the commissioner. Courts must be governed by general principles. It is better for the community that a definite and established rule should prevail, not affected by any condition or provision, to be applied by any inquiry as to intention or motive, the ascertainment of which is almost impossible, save through the oath of the party, whose act may be the subject of challenge and examination."

The uncontradicted testimony shows that the defendant's attorney requested his honor, the presiding judge, to ask the jurors before they were sworn whether any of them were related by blood or marriage to the plaintiff or her husband, in this action. That the question was asked, and no response whatever was made by any juror.

Although the motion for a new trial, on the ground that the plaintiff and the foreman were related within the sixth degree, was addressed to the discretion of his honor, the presiding judge, nevertheless it was erroneously exercised, and the motion should have been granted.

The case of Senterfelt v. Shealy, 71 S. C. 259, 51 S. E. 142, upon which the respondent's attorneys principally rely, was materially different from the present case in the important particular that in the case of Senterfelt v. Shealy the presiding judge was not requested to ask the jurors if they were related to any of the parties.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ., concur in the result.

DARLINGTON COUNTY FAIR & DRIVING ASS'N v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE
R. CO.†

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 1, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 229*)—DELAY OF FREIGHT—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

A shipper was not entitled to recover punitive damages for delay in delivering a horse on a special train, hired for the purpose under a special contract, caused by the necessary repair of a trestle, resulting from quicksand filling into the trestle timber holes when timbers were removed to put in new timbers.

2. DAMAGES (§ 91*)—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Punitive damages are not recoverable unless defendant was guilty of a conscious failure to observe due care.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Darlington County.

Action by the Darlington County Fair & Driving Association against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed in part and rendered.

W. F. Dargan and J. B. White, for appellant. J. Monroe Spears and Miller & Lawson, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This action was for actual and punitive damages against defendant for its delay in delivering a horse in Darlington according to an alleged special contract made with plaintiff on July 7 and 8, 1909. The Darlington County Fair & Driving Association held a race meet in Darlington, and as a special attraction had advertised that "Alphonso," a horse noted for his speed, would be entered. It was found to be impossible to get the horse to Darlington by the ordinary means in time to enter the races on the morning of July 8th. The plaintiff, through one of its stockholders, Mr. McLeod, approached defendant's agent, at Darlington, with the request that a special car be run to Bennettsville to bring the horse from there in time to enter the races that afternoon. With respect to the contract made between the parties, one of the issues of fact in the case was whether or not the defendant's agent guaranteed the delivery in Darlington by a certain time; plaintiff alleging that the agreement was an absolute one to have the horse in Darlington by 1 o'clock. It is certain that the sum of $40 was paid to the defendant as a consideration and a special train, in charge of Mr. Orrell, left Darlington for Bennettsville about 11 o'clock. The horse was taken on board at Bennettsville, and the party started on their return trip to Darlington. Arriving at Swift Creek, about two miles from Darlington, between 12 and 1 o'clock, they found that a force of hands had taken out a span of the trestle across the creek for the purpose of repairing it, and that it was impossible for the train to cross. Though effort was made, it was several hours before the track was again in shape, and the horse was not delivered until that afternoon, too late for him to enter the races. There was evidence to show that the delay at the creek was caused by a peculiar formation in the bed; it consisting of quicksand which, when decayed timbers were removed, flowed in and rendered it difficult to put in new timbers. But for this the trestle would have been repaired in ample time. On the trial of the cause in the circuit court, at close of plaintiff's testimony, defendant moved for a verdict to be directed in favor of defendant, which motion was refused. The court was then requested to charge the jury the same requests that motion to direct verdict was made on, and later, after verdict was rendered, a motion for a new trial was made on the same grounds. The jury found verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $500. Defendant appeals and asks for a reversal of verdict as to exemplary or punitive damages on two exceptions. One is that this is an action "ex contractu, based solely upon defendant's violation of its agreement to deliver a horse in Darlington by a certain time; that the contract was a special one entered into voluntarily by both parties, the defendant, in its private, as distinguished from its public, capacity, binding itself to the performance of an act in which the public was not interested or public policy concerned. Defendant for this suit must be regarded as a private and not as a common carrier, and that there is no evidence to sustain a finding by jury of punitive damages."

[1] We think the verdict as to punitive damages must be reversed, on the ground that there is no evidence to sustain it. It is unnecessary to consider the other exception. There is no testimony in the case showing any conduct on the part of the defendant, its agents or servants, to justify a finding of willfulness or wantonness. The testimony shows the delay was caused by the necessary repair of defendant's track, one of the imperative duties imposed upon it by the law to protect the safety and lives of its passengers. The delay was caused solely by an unavoidable accident—something beyond the power of defendant to prevent or control.

[2] Punitive damages are never given unless the evidence shows there was on part of defendant a conscious failure to observe due care. This court, in the case of Gwynn v. Telegraph Company, 69 S. C. 444, 48 S. E. 463 (67 L. R. A. 111, 104 Am. St. Rep. 819), quoting from Southerland on Damages, says: "If a wrong is done willfully—that is, if a tort is committed deliberately, recklessly, or by willful negligence with a present consciousness of invading a man's rights or of exposing him to injury—a case is presented for exemplary damages. There damages are allowable only when there is misconduct and malice or what is equivalent thereto." There is no contention in this case but that plaintiff is entitled to actual damages. That is conceded by defendant. The actual damages proven were $50, $40, and $12.50, aggregating the sum $102.50. The verdict was for $500, allowing for punitive damages the sum of $397.50.

† Rehearing denied April 17, 1912.

As to punitive damages the judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and plaintiff have judgment only for actual damages, namely, $102.50.

MIDGETT v. GRAY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

1. OFFICERS (§ 55*)—VACANCIES—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Under Const. art. 14, § 7, which provides that no person who shall already hold an office shall hold any other office, the acceptance and qualification for a second office ipso facto vacates the first.

2. QUO WARRANTO (§ 24*)—ACTION TO TRY RIGHT TO OFFICE—PARTIES.

Under Revisal 1905, § 826 et seq., civil actions in the nature of quo warranto to try title to a public office may be instituted in the name of the state, on the relation of the Attorney General, or of any individual who is a citizen and taxpayer of the jurisdiction where the officer is to exercise his duties and powers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quo Warranto, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

3. QUO WARRANTO (§ 44*)—ACTION TO TRY RIGHT TO PUBLIC OFFICE—USE OF NAME OF STATE.

A civil action in the nature of quo warranto, instituted in the name of the state on the relation of an individual citizen, will not be considered and determined by the Supreme Court, where it does not appear as required by Revisal 1905, §§ 826, 829, that the relator ever obtained the leave of the Attorney General, either to institute or maintain the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Dare County; Cline, Judge.

Civil action in the nature of quo warranto, instituted in the name of the state, on the relation of S. E. Midgett, against W. R. Gray. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Action dismissed.

There was evidence on the part of plaintiff tending to show that defendant, duly qualified and holding the office of clerk of the superior court of Dare county and during his term of said office, was appointed to the office of school committeeman for public school district No. 15, for said county, and was qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of the last-mentioned office. There was allegation, with evidence, on part of defendant, to the effect that said defendant had not duly qualified as school committeeman, nor had he acted as such officer. On the issue joined, there was verdict for defendant, and plaintiff excepted and appealed, assigning errors.

B. G. Crisp, E. F. Aydtlett, and J. C. B. Ehringhaus, for appellant. Ward & Grimes and D. M. Stringfield, for appellee.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Our Constitution (article 14, § 7) provides that, with certain stated exceptions, not applicable to present case, "no person, who shall hold any office, or place of trust or profit, under the United States, or any department thereof, or under this state, or under any other state or government, shall hold or exercise any other office, or place of trust or profit under the authority of this state, or be eligible to a seat in either house of the General Assembly," etc.; and, interpreting the provision, we have held, in reference to officers of this state, that the acceptance and qualification for a second office ipso facto vacates the first. Connor and Cheshire on the Constitution, p. 445; Barnhill v. Thompson, 122 N. C. 493, 29 S. E. 720.

[2] Authority, with us, is also to the effect that actions of this character may be instituted in the name of the state on the relation of the Attorney General or of any individual who is a citizen and taxpayer of the jurisdiction where the officer is to exercise his duties and powers. Revisal, § 826 et seq.; Barnhill v. Thompson, supra; Houghtalling v. Taylor, 122 N. C. 141, 29 S. E. 101; Hines v. Vann, 118 N. C. 3, 23 S. E. 932; Foard v. Hall, 111 N. C. 369, 16 S. E. 420; Saunders v. Gatling, 81 N. C. 298.

[3] We are not at liberty, however, to consider and determine the questions principally involved in the present appeal, for the reason that it nowhere appears that the relator has ever obtained the leave of the Attorney General either to institute or maintain the present suit. The statute applicable—Revisal 1905, c. 12, §§ 826-829—clearly provides that, before an action may be instituted or maintained on the relation of a private citizen, such leave shall be obtained, and that satisfactory security must be furnished, indemnifying the state against all costs and expenses which may accrue in consequence of bringing the action. True, the court has held, in Shennonhouse v. Withers, 121 N. C. 376, 28 S. E. 522, that it is not absolutely essential that the leave should be had before suit commenced, provided it is obtained afterwards and supplied; but it must always be made to appear, pending the proceedings, that the leave of the Attorney General has been given to prosecute the action. An inquiry of this nature primarily concerns the public interests, and we may not overlook an omission in plain disregard of the statutory requirement. This view is strengthened by the subsequent section (830), which provides that, even after leave given and action commenced, the same may, under certain conditions, be withdrawn, and, on certificate to that effect being properly filed, the judge shall, on motion, dismiss the action.

For the reasons given, we are of opinion that the present action should be dismissed; and it is so ordered.

Action dismissed.

FORBES et al. v. BURGESS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

1. MARRIAGE (§§ 47, 48*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Evidence of the general reputation in the community that a man and woman were married, and of the statement of the man that he was going on a designated day to be married to the woman, and afterwards that they had been then married, was competent to prove marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. §§ 75, 76; Dec. Dig. §§ 47, 48.*]

2. MARRIAGE (§ 42*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On the issue of the marriage, the refusal to admit in evidence the indictment for illegal cohabitation, unless the whole record was admitted to show the disposition of the case, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. §§ 70-78; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1057*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where, on the issue of the marriage, the clerk of the court testified that the entry on the docket showed that a prosecution for illegal cohabitation was dismissed, the error, if any, in excluding the indictment for illegal cohabitation, was harmless.

4. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE—MARRIAGE.

Where, on the issue of a marriage, there was evidence that the woman had been previously married, and no direct evidence of divorce between her and her former husband, and a witness testified that the former husband was dead at the time of the alleged second marriage, established by cohabitation and reputation in the community and by statements of the man, the error, if any, in a charge that, if there was a lawful ceremony of marriage, the burden shifted to the party asserting the illegality to prove it, by proving that the woman's former husband was still living and that she had not been divorced from him, was cured by another charge that the presumption of death or divorce would not be indulged in favor of the second marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-718; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden County; Cline, Judge.

Action by Emmie Forbes and others against J. M. Burgess. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Worth, H. S. Ward, and G. W. Ward, for appellant. E. F. Aydlett and J. O. B. Ehringhaus, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action by the children of Nancy and Dempsey Wilson to recover the land described in the complaint. The defendants deny that Dempsey and Nancy were ever married to each other, and claim that they themselves have title to the land by virtue of conveyances to them from the brothers and sisters of Dempsey, who were his heirs at law. It was in evidence that Nancy was married in 1856 to Jarvis Wilson. There was no direct evidence of a divorce between Jarvis Wilson and Nancy, nor any direct evidence of the marriage ceremony having been performed between Nancy and Dempsey.

[1] Several neighbors testified to the general reputation that Dempsey and Nancy were married, and that Dempsey called her his wife and treated her as such. One witness testified that Dempsey told him that he was going down to Elizabeth City that day to be married, and upon his return stated that he had been married. Evidence of the general reputation in the community that Dempsey and Nancy were married, and the above statement made by Dempsey, and that they recognized each other as man and wife, were competent. Long v. Barnes, 87 N. C. 329; State v. Whitford, 86 N. C. 636; Jones v. Reddick, 79 N. C. 291; Archer v. Halthcock, 51 N. C. 421; 28 Cyc. 872. Proof of such reputation may be made by any party having knowledge thereof. 28 Cyc. 877.

[2, 3] The court properly declined to admit the bill of indictment against Dempsey and Nancy for illegal cohabitation, unless the whole record was admitted, to show the disposition of the case. The clerk of the court testified that the entry on the docket showed that the case was dismissed; so, if there had been error, it was harmless.

[4] The court charged the jury "that if they found from the evidence, from its greater weight, that there was a lawful ceremony of marriage entered into between Dempsey and Nancy, then the burden shifted to the defendants to prove the illegality thereof, by showing by a preponderance of the evidence that her first husband was still living at the time the plaintiffs contend that she was married to Dempsey, and that she had not been divorced from her first husband." The court further charged, as prayed by the defendants: "Although, where a marriage is established by a proof of the fact in any competent way, it raises a presumption that any prior marriage which is relied on to invalidate the second marriage has been dissolved by death or divorce, the presumption of death or divorce will not be indulged in favor of an alleged second marriage, the proof of which rests only on cohabitation and reputation." If there was any error in the paragraph of the charge above given and excepted to, it was cured by this instruction. There was evidence which tended to show that Jarvis Wilson was dead at the time of the alleged second marriage. There was one witness who testified that Jarvis was living at the time of Nancy's death. The prayer and the charge cannot be said to be conflicting, but the charge given in the prayer is explanatory of the previous instruction.

The jury found that the plaintiffs were entitled to the land as the legitimate children of Dempsey Wilson.

No error.

CLARK et al. v. EAST LAKE LUMBER CO.

1. PLEADING (§ 21*)—COMPLAINT—INCONSISTENT CAUSES OF ACTION.

A complaint, alleging in one count that plaintiff was entitled to a commission as a real estate broker for finding a purchaser ready, willing, and able to take the land, but that defendants refused to sell, and in another that plaintiff, relying upon defendant's false representations that the title was good, secured a purchaser for the land, who, after examination, refused to buy, because the title was defective, and compelled plaintiff to refund certain expenditures made by him, contains two inconsistent causes of action.

2. BROKERS (§ 63*)—REAL ESTATE BROKERS—COMPENSATION—RIGHT TO COMPENSATION.

Where real estate brokers were given an agency to sell land at certain terms and upon certain notice, they were entitled to their commission upon giving the notice and producing a purchaser able, ready, and willing to buy the land at the terms fixed, since, while the owner can prescribe the terms of sale, plaintiffs cannot be deprived of commission because of the owner's failure to convey.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 81; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 16*)—CONTRACTS—OPTION CONTRACTS.

A contract, whereby prospective purchasers were given the right to purchase the land within a stated time on given notice, is no more than a proposition to sell until accepted, and the acceptance must be identical with the offer, in order to give the purchaser any rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 18*)—CONTRACTS—OPTION CONTRACTS—ACCEPTANCE.

Where an option contract provided for the sale of 167,555 acres, "more or less," the vendor to execute a deed with general warranty, and the sale to be closed at a certain place, the purchasers giving the vendor at least five days notice prior to the date when they would be ready to close, an attempted acceptance by the purchasers of 167,555 acres, provided a clear and undisputed title could be made for the whole, and which did not give the notice provided for, was insufficient to give the purchasers any rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

5. FRAUD (§ 60*)—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—DAMAGES.

Where an option contract falsely represented that the vendor's title to the land was good, a prospective purchaser cannot recover as damages for such false representations expenses which he incurred in examining the land prior to the time he secured the option.

6. FRAUD (§ 20*)—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—RELIANCE.

In an action for false representations as to title in an option contract, the plaintiff must prove reliance on the representations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

7. FRAUD (§ 58*)—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action for damages for false representations in an option contract, evidence held not to show reliance on such representations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 55-59; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

8. FRAUD (§ 50*)—BURDEN OF PROOF—AMOUNT OF DAMAGES.

Damages for work done in reliance upon false representations in an option contract cannot be recovered in the absence of proof of the amount or value of the work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

9. FRAUD (§ 25*)—INJURY FROM FRAUD.

Damages for false representations in an option contract cannot be recovered where no connection is shown between the representations and the damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Dare County; Cline, Judge.

Action by O. H. Clark and another against the East Lake Lumber Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiffs allege two causes of action. The first is that on or about the 24th of May, 1905, the defendant employed the plaintiffs to sell for it a certain tract of land, particularly described, and agreed to pay them 5 per cent. commission on the purchase price, which should not be less than $220,000; that they procured a purchaser at said price who was ready, able, and willing to buy; that the defendant was duly notified thereof, and it refused to make title to said purchaser, and refused to pay the plaintiffs their commissions. The second alleges the contract of May 24, 1905; that the defendant represented that they had a perfect title to said lands; that, relying on this representation, the plaintiffs represented to the prospective purchasers that the title was good; that it became necessary for said purchasers to expend $9,752 in the examination of said lands, which they did; that after this expense was incurred it was found that the title was not good, and said purchasers would not accept it; and that the plaintiffs had paid to said purchasers the amount expended.

On the 23d of January, 1905, the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff Silver commissions to negotiate a sale of its Dare county lands, containing 167,555 acres, more or less, and on the same day executed its option to William O'Brien, a prospective buyer, procured by said Silver, which option, unless accepted, expired on February 28, 1905. The plaintiffs offered evidence tending to prove that the plaintiff Clark was equally interested with the said Silver in said commissions, and that F. W. Helmick and M. H. Alworth were equally interested with O'Brien in said option. Also that said option was extended by mutual consent, and was used as a basis for an option given in May, 1905.

On the 24th of May, 1905, the defendant gave an option to buy said lands to said Alworth and Helmick, the material parts of which are as follows: "That for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar ($1.00) to the party of the first part in hand paid by the parties of the second part, and for other good and valuable considerations, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, the party of the first part has granted unto the parties of the second part the exclusive option or right to purchase from the party of the first part all of the land owned by the party of the second part in Dare county in the state of North Carolina, said lands consisting of one hundred sixty-seven thousand five hundred fifty-five (167,555) acres, more or less, being the same premises particularly described in a deed given to the said party of the first part by the People's Bank of Buffalo et al., and recorded in the office of the register of deeds in Dare county, December 6, 1904; said purchase to be for the sum of two hundred twenty thousand dollars ($220,000.00), payable in manner as follows, to wit: Forty thousand dollars ($40,000.00) cash at the date of the deed under this option, the balance of the purchase price to be paid as follows. [Terms omitted.] This agreement or exclusive option is also given to the parties of the second part upon the express condition that the parties of the second part shall at once employ a competent attorney and commence an examination of the title of all of said property without delay. One of the attorneys to be employed by the said parties of the second part shall be W. D. Pruden of Edenton, North Carolina, if possible, and it is expressly agreed by the parties of the second part that if they shall not have notified the said Pruden by telegram or otherwise within three days from the date hereof of their employment of him, the said Pruden, for such purpose, then this option shall be and become null and void. The purchase when consummated shall be closed at Manteo, North Carolina. It is agreed that the parties of the second part shall give notice by telegram to R. E. Johnston of Greenville, South Carolina, and to G. S. Van Gorder of Buffalo, New York, at least five days prior to the date when they will be ready to close the said purchase, of their election to close the said purchase at that time. It is understood and agreed that the said conveyance to the parties of the second part shall be by general warranty deed, subject only to the said mortgage of one hundred twenty thousand dollars ($120,000.00) above described."

Mr. Pruden was employed to examine the title, and on the 15th day of June, 1905, the said Helmick and Alworth sent to R. E. Johnston, at Greenville, S. C., and to G. S. Van Gorder, at Buffalo, N. Y., the following telegram: "We elect to exercise the option heretofore granted by the East Lake Lumber Company to M. H. Alworth and F. W. Helmick, dated May twenty-fourth, nineteen hundred and five, and purchase the property described in said option for the sum of two hundred and twenty thousand dollars, under the terms of payment stated therein, provided you can give us a clear and undisputed title to the whole of the one hundred and sixty-seven thousand five hundred and fifty acres of land and timber in Dare county, heretofore represented by you to us to be owned by the East Lake Lumber Company."

F. W. Helmick was examined as a witness, and, among other things, testified as follows: That when he sent the telegram to Van Gorder he was staying at the Atlantic hotel in Norfolk. That he did not stay more than about a day after sending the telegram before he left for home. That the only notice he gave of acceptance was by this telegram. That he never furnished any copy of the estimate made by the timber estimators. That he expected a reply by wire or letter. That he received no reply to his telegram. That he went back to his home in Duluth. That ended the matter until the plaintiffs started this suit. That he did not receive any letter from Johnston or Van Gorder, replying to the telegram sent. Had no conversation with them afterwards. That he got from Mr. Pruden an unsatisfactory report of the title. That Mr. Pruden said there was a great deal of litigation over it, but he thought it could be ultimately cleaned up, and witness told him he was not buying a lawsuit. This is the only reference in the evidence to the result of the investigation of the title.

The plaintiffs also offered evidence that Helmick was worth $250,000, O'Brien $6,000,000 and Alworth $20,000,000. The plaintiffs also offered evidence that the defendant verbally represented the title to said land to be good, and that in consequence thereof they made the same representation to O'Brien, Alworth, and Helmick, who, after the execution of said option of January 23, 1905, went on said lands with a large number of employes, spent several weeks examining said land and the timber thereon, and incurred much expense therefor, which, the plaintiffs claimed, amounted to $9,752, and which they offered to prove they had paid. The examination of the property was completed between April 15, 1905, and May 1, 1905. No evidence was offered as to the number employed to examine the lands, or as to the value of the services. Nothing was done between the parties after the telegram of June 15th, and there was evidence that the title to large parts of the land was defective.

At the conclusion of the evidence, there was judgment of nonsuit, and the plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

E. F. Aydtlett and J. C. B. Ehringhaus, for appellants. Pruden & Pruden, Ward & Grimes, and W. M. Bond, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1] The two causes of action set out in the complaint are inconsistent, and both cannot be true. In the first, the plaintiffs seek to recover commissions because they contend they found a purchaser for the land of the defendant, who was ready and able to pay the purchase price, and so notified the defendant, who refused to convey, and, in the second, to recover damages because the defendant represented the title to the land to be good; that they relied on these representations and found a purchaser for the land, who, after examination, refused to buy, because the title was defective. We will, however, consider the causes of action separately.

[2] The right of the plaintiffs to recover commissions is dependent upon proof that they had found a purchaser for the land ready, able, and willing to buy upon the terms contained in the paper of May 24, 1905, and that notice of this fact was given to the defendant. The defendant had the right to prescribe the terms of sale, and is not liable for commissions, unless those imposed were complied with, and, on the other hand, the plaintiffs cannot be deprived of compensation because of failure by the defendant to convey, if they found a purchaser who notified the defendant of his readiness and ability to comply with the option. Martin v. Holly, 104 N. C. 38, 10 S. E. 83; Mallonee v. Young, 119 N. C. 552, 26 S. E. 141; Trust Co. v. Adams, 145 N. C. 166, 58 S. E. 1008.

In the last-cited case, Justice Walker, speaking for the court, says: "It is now the established doctrine of the courts that, in the absence of any usage or contract, express or implied, to the contrary, or conduct of the seller preventing a completion of the bargain by the broker, an action by the latter for his commissions will not lie until it is shown that he has procured and effected a sale of the property upon the terms fixed by the vendor. It is not enough that the broker has devoted his time, labor, or money to advance the interests of his employer. Unsuccessful efforts, however meritorious, afford no ground of action. Where his acts bring about no agreement or contract between his employer and the purchaser, by reason of his failure in the premises, the loss of expended and unremunerated effort must be all his own. He loses the labor and skill used by him which he staked upon success. If there has been no contract, and the seller is not in default, then there can be no reward. His commissions are based upon the contract of sale."

We must, then, inquire into the terms of the contract of May 24, 1905, and see what was required of the purchaser before the defendant was under any legal obligation to convey.

[3] The contract of May 24th is an option, which is a right acquired by contract to accept or reject a present offer to sell (Trogden v. Williams, 144 N. C. 199, 56 S. E. 865, 10 L. R. A. [N. S.] 867), and is no more than a proposition to sell until accepted (Hardy v. Ward, 150 N. C. 391, 64 S. E. 171), and the acceptance must be identical with the offer, to be effective. Gregory v. Bullock, 120 N. C. 262, 26 S. E. 820; Tanning Co. v. Telegraph Co., 143 N. C. 378, 55 S. E. 777; Green v. Grocery Co., 153 N. C. 412, 69 S. E. 412.

In Tanning Co. v. Telegraph Co., supra, it was held that an acceptance for 1,500 barrels of oil was not good when the offer was to sell about 1,500 barrels; and in Green v. Grocery Co., supra, it is said, quoting from the Supreme Court of the United States: "It is an undeniable principle of the law of contracts that an offer of a bargain by one person to another imposes no obligation upon the former until it is accepted by the latter, according to the terms in which the offer was made. Any qualification of or departure from those terms invalidates the offer, unless the same be agreed to by the person who made it."

[4] Applying these principles to the evidence, we are of opinion that there has been no acceptance of the offer to sell on the terms contained in the option, and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover commissions: (1) The offer is to sell 167,555 acres, more or less; the acceptance is to buy the whole of 167,555 acres. (2) The offer is to sell and to execute a deed with general warranty; the acceptance is to buy, provided a clear and undisputed title can be made for the whole. (3) The offer provides that the purchase, when consummated, shall be closed at Manteo, and the purchasers shall give notice to the defendant, at least five days prior to the date when they will be ready to close said purchase, of their election to do so at that time, and such notice was not given.

We do not hold that there must be an acceptance in the exact language of the offer, but must recognize the right of parties to impose the terms upon which they will enter into a contract of sale, and, in our opinion, the acceptance of June 15th differed materially from the offer of May 24th. If the defendant had acted upon the acceptance, and had tendered a deed to the purchaser, he might refuse to pay the purchase money, because of a discrepancy in the acreage, as his acceptance was for the whole; or, if the title to the whole was good, he could still decline to pay because of a dispute. There is a vast difference between a good title, and one that is undisputed, and the purchaser had a clear conception of this, as shown by his statement to his attorney that he was not buying a lawsuit, when told by him that the title was in litigation, but he thought it could be cleared up.

The notice was also material, and contemplated that the purchaser should fix a date at Manteo, not less than five days from the time of the notice, when the parties could meet and consummate the sale, which was not done. There is no evidence that the purchasers went to Manteo after June 15th; and one of them testified that he remained in Norfolk one day after sending the telegram, and then went to his home in Minnesota and heard no more of the matter until this action was instituted.

The objections to the maintenance of the second cause of action are equally fatal:

[5] (1) The complaint alleges the execution of the contract of May 24, 1905, and that the damages sought to be recovered were on account of expenses incurred pursuant thereto, while the evidence of the plaintiff is that they finished the work causing the expense by May 1st, before the contract was made.

[6, 7] (2) The cause of action is based upon a false representation as to title, and in any event it was necessary to prove that the representation was relied on. The contract and the evidence offered by the plaintiffs show conclusively that this could not be so. The contract gives time to the prospective purchasers for an examination of the titles, and requires them to employ a competent attorney and commence an examination of the title of all of said property without delay; and one of the purchasers testified that the report of the attorney was unsatisfactory, and that he told him he was not buying a lawsuit.

[8] (3) No evidence was offered to show the amount of work done or the value thereof.

[9] (4) No connection is shown between the representation alleged to have been made by the defendant and the damages claimed.

Upon the whole record, we find no error. Affirmed.

ROUNTREE et al. v. COHN-BOCK CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALE OF STANDING TIMBER—TITLE ACQUIRED.

A deed of standing timber, with a right to cut and remove the same within a specified period, conveys all the timber which the purchaser may remove within the prescribed time, and the timber remaining after that time belongs to the vendor or his grantee of the premises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALE OF STANDING TIMBER—TITLE ACQUIRED.

A clause in a deed of standing timber, with the right to cut and remove the same within a specified period, extending the time to remove the timber, not exceeding a specified time, on the payment of a specified sum, and authorizing the purchaser "during period last aforesaid to enter on the land to cut and remove the timber," requires the purchaser, claiming the privilege, to notify the grantor of his intention to exercise it, and to pay or tender the stipulated amount within the original period; and where no notice is given or payment or tender made before the expiration of the period the purchaser acquires no interest in the timber not removed during the original period.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gates County; Cline, Judge.

Action by L. A. Rountree and another against the Cohn-Bock Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to restrain the defendant from entering upon certain land and cutting timber thereon. The defendant claims under a certain timber deed, executed by the plaintiffs on the 9th day of September, 1904, to the Gay Lumber Company, which conveyed certain timber on said land and contained the following provisions: "The said parties of the second part shall cut and remove the timber hereby bargained and sold and conveyed within five years from date of contract. And should said second parties be unable to remove said timber within the time above specified, they shall have further time to remove said timber as they may require, not exceeding three years, upon payment to said parties of the first part of a sum equal to six per cent. per annum for the additional three years of time required on the purchase price as above stated. The said parties of the second part, their heirs or assigns, shall have power, and are hereby authorized at any time during period last aforesaid, to enter upon the lands above described for the purpose of cutting, removing or doing whatsoever they may elect with the timber hereby conveyed, and are hereby authorized and empowered to build and construct such roads, tramroads or railroads over and across the above described lands or any other lands owned by them, and may use such brush, trees and undergrowth upon said lands as they may need in the construction of said road, tramroads and railroads, and are hereby empowered to exercise full, perfect and absolute ownership and control of the same to prosecute each and every person cutting or removing said timber, or in any manner interfering with it, whereby its growth will be affected, or its value depreciated." There was no tender of any amount to the plaintiffs under the extension clause in the deed until more than five years after the execution thereof. There was a judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendant excepted and appealed.

ALLEN, J. [1] It is well settled that the legal effect of the first clause in the deed to the Gay Lumber Company, conveying the timber with the right to remove the same in five years, is to convey all the timber which the vendee should remove within the prescribed time, and that such as remained thereon after that time would belong to the vendor, or to his grantee of the premises. Hornthal v. Howcott, 154 N. C. 223, 70 S. E. 171; Powers v. Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 407, 70 S. E. 629.

[2] It was also decided at the last term, in Bateman v. Kramer Lumber Company, 154 N. C. 248, 70 S. E. 474, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 615, that the correct interpretation of a clause, extending the time within which the timber may be removed, requires of the grantee, claiming the privilege, that he notify the owner of the property of his intention to exercise it, and that he pay or tender the stipulated amount on or before the expiration of the first period, granted for the purpose of removal of the timber. It follows, therefore, from these authorities and upon the admissions that no notice was given to the grantors in the deed to the Gay Lumber Company of an intention to exercise the privilege of extending the time for the removal of the timber, and that no money was paid or tendered on or before the expiration of the first period; that the defendant has no title to nor interest in the timber, unless there is something in the deed which requires the application of a different doctrine.

The defendant contends there is a clause in the deed, not to be found in any of the timber deeds considered by this court, which distinguishes it from the cases cited, and relies upon that part providing that, "The said parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns, shall have power, and are hereby authorized at any time during period last aforesaid to enter upon the lands," etc. In our opinion, that clause does not have the effect of waiving any of the conditions necessary to make the extension clause effective, but does define what may be done under it after the conditions have been performed. The "period last aforesaid" has never had any existence because of failure to give notice and to pay or tender the stipulated amount, and the defendant cannot justify an entry on the lands thereunder.

We therefore conclude that there is no error in the judgment restraining the defendant from entering on said lands and cutting the timber therefrom.

Affirmed.

LAMB v. COPELAND et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 274*)—DECLARATIONS BY DECEDENT.

Oral declarations as to the particular limits of private tracts of land are admissible when made ante litem motam by declarant, who was disinterested when the declarations were made, and who died before the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1121-1134; Dec. Dig. § 274; Boundaries, Cent. Dig. § 156.]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 35*)—EVIDENCE—REPUTATION.

Evidence of common reputation, the origin of which is remote and also ante litem motam, is admissible on the question of private boundaries on the principle of necessity, but evidence of common reputation not shown to have originated at such a remote time that direct evidence could not be procured is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. § 155; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1057*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

The rejection of evidence as to the location of a boundary corner is harmless, though erroneous, where both parties recognized the location of the corner to be as shown by the rejected evidence.

4. TRESPASS (§ 68*)—TRESPASS ON LAND—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In trespass, where no actual occupation of the locus in quo was shown by plaintiff or those under whom he claimed, and the record does not show that the description in any of his mesne conveyances differed from that of the original conveyance, or that it covered any more land, a charge confining plaintiff to proof of the land covered by the original conveyance was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass, Cent. Dig. § 151; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Chowan County; Cline, Judge.

Action by T. M. Lamb against Thomas Copeland and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action, trespass quare clausum, etc., tried fall term, 1911. Plaintiff alleged ownership of the Caleb Winslow farm, and as a part of his proof offered in evidence a deed from Miles Perry to Caleb Winslow bearing date in 1798, a line of mesne conveyances of said farm to plaintiff. Plaintiff offered evidence further tending to show that the deed of Miles Perry covered the land in controversy, and that defendants through their agents had wrongfully cut some juniper timber on said land. Defendant, admitting ownership of the Winslow farm by plaintiff and the cutting of the timber, alleged and offered evidence tending to show that the Caleb Winslow farm and the deeds under which plaintiff claimed the same by correct location did not cover the land in controversy. On issues submitted there was verdict for defendant, judgment, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

Aycock & Winston and W. M. Bond, for appellant. Ward & Grimes, for appellees.

HOKE, J. [1, 2] In presenting his evidence a witness testifying for plaintiff said that in 1897 he made a survey of the Winslow farm and began at A, a pine stump, which by common reputation was a corner of the Caleb Winslow land. On objection the court excluded this testimony as to common reputation on the ground that the "same was not ancient," and plaintiff excepted. We are of opinion that his honor made the correct ruling. It is well established with us that, under certain restrictions, evidence of this character will be received on questions of private boundary. Its admission is based on the principle of necessity, and is to a large extent subject to what is sometimes termed the "best evidence rule"; that is, it is competent when from lapse of time or unusual conditions better evidence of a relevant fact is not likely to be attainable. The case of declarations of deceased individuals as to particular corners, etc., is in illustration of the same principle; that is, they are admissible when made ante litem motam by a declarant who was disinterested when they were made, and is dead at the time of trial. Here the lapse of time is not always controlling, but the evidence is held competent by reason of the death of the declarant, and when more direct evidence is not likely to be procurable. Lumber Co. v. Triplett, 151 N. C. 409, 66 S. E. 343; Bullard v. Hollingsworth, 140 N. C. 634, 53 S. E. 441; Bland v. Beasley, 140 N. C. 631, 53 S. E. 443; Yow v. Hamilton, 136 N. C. 357, 48 S. E. 782; Shutte v. Thompson, 82 U. S. 151-163, 21 L. Ed. 123; Stroud v. Springfield, 28 Tex. 649; 2 Wigmore, §§ 1582-1583. In Bland v. Beasley, supra, the court said: "In Hemphill v. Hemphill, 138 N. C. 504, 51 S. E. 42, the court, in speaking of this character of evidence, said: 'It is the law of this state that, under certain restrictions, both hearsay evidence and common reputation are admissible on questions of private boundary'—citing Sasser v. Herring, 14 N. C. 340, Shaffer v. Gaynor, 117 N. C. 15, 23 S. E. 154, and Yow v. Hamilton, 136 N. C. 357, 48 S. E. 782. And in the same opinion, speaking of the restrictions placed upon evidence of common reputation, the court said: 'This reputation, whether by parol or otherwise, should have its origin at a time comparatively remote and always ante litem motam; second, it should attach itself to some monument of boundary or natural object, or be fortified by evidence of occupation and acquiescence tending to give the land some fixed and definite location'—citing Tate v. Southard, 8 N. C. 45; Dobson v. Finley, 53 N. C. 496; Mendenhall v. Cassells, 20 N. C. 43; Westfelt v. Adams, 131 N. C. 379, 42 S. E. 823; Shaffer v. Gaynor, 117 N. C. 15, 23 S. E. 154." And in more especial reference to reputation evidence the court further said: "But the decisions are also to the effect that, to justify the reception of such evidence, the time at which the common reputation had its origin should be at a remote period. 'Comparatively remote' is the term used in Hemphill v. Hemphill, supra. It was so used for the reason that as the principle was established of necessity, when from changing conditions and the absence of permanent monuments better evidence of boundary could not be procured, so the time may vary to some extent, as the facts and circumstances may show that the necessity does or does not exist. On the admission of such testimony as to the time required, and the test to be applied, it is held in Nieman v. Ward, 1 Watts & S. (Pa.) 68, that 'reputation and hearsay is such evidence as is entitled to respect when the lapse of time is so great as to render it difficult to prove the existence of original landmarks.' This being the correct principle, there was nothing to show that the common reputation offered in this instance had its origin at any former time or at a period so remote that direct evidence as to the correct placing of this corner in question could not have been procured and the court as we have stated made correct decision in excluding the evidence.

[3] A perusal of the record will disclose, however, that in the development of the case both sides recognized and treated the corner in question as one of the corners of the Caleb Winslow farm, so that, in any event, no harm came to plaintiff by this ruling of the court.

[4] It was objected, further; that the charge of the court confined plaintiff to the correct placing of the deed from Miles Perry to Caleb Winslow, whereas, the plaintiff might have recovered by showing that one of his mesne conveyances covered the land, to wit, that from Caleb Winslow to C. H. Hostetter bearing date January 14, 1890, but we do not see that the objection is open to plaintiff on the evidence. There was no actual occupation of the locus in quo shown by plaintiff, or those under whom he claimed. The issue was made to depend on the correct placing of his boundaries, and there is nothing in the record to show that this deed to Hostetter in any way differed from that of Miles Perry, or that the one covered more land than the other.

We find no reversible error, and the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

No error.

(158 N. C. 270)

WESTON v. JOHN L. ROPER LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 219*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—DEFINITENESS.

Where the complaint in a suit involving the boundary of land described the land in dispute by metes and bounds, and alleged that defendant wrongfully trespassed on the land claimed by plaintiff, a temporary order, restraining defendant from going on the land, except for enumerated purposes, was sufficiently definite to justify the punishment of defendant for contempt for going on the land for a purpose not permitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 441; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 223*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—VIOLATION.

A party restrained by a temporary order must obey it according to its spirit, and may not, directly or indirectly, do anything that will render the order ineffectual.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 448-473; Dec. Dig. § 223.*]

3. INJUNCTION (§ 226*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—VIOLATION.

The motive of a party violating a temporary injunction restraining him from trespassing on land in dispute is immaterial in passing on his guilt of contempt for trespassing; and he may not justify a trespass by showing that he honestly believed that the land belonged to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 478; Dec. Dig. § 226.*]

4. INJUNCTION (§ 223*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—VIOLATION.

The court, in contempt proceedings for the violation of a temporary injunction, will consider the objects for which relief was granted and the circumstances attending it in determining whether there has been an actual breach; and a violation of the spirit of an injunction, though its strict letter may not have been disregarded, justifies punishment for contempt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 448; Dec. Dig. § 223.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—HARMLESS ERROR—DEFECTS IN JUDGMENT.

A party adjudged guilty of contempt for violating a temporary injunction may not complain because the finding is not more specific, or more in accordance with the probative force of the evidence; the defect in the finding being favorable to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4052-4062; Dec. Dig. § 1033.*]

6. INJUNCTION (§ 227*)—TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—VIOLATION—ADVICE OF COUNSEL.

Advice of counsel does not justify a party in violating a temporary injunction; but it may be considered in imposing punishment for the violation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 479; Dec. Dig. § 227.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden County; Cline, Judge.

Action by Cary P. Weston against the John L. Roper Lumber Company. From a judgment adjudging defendant in contempt for violating a temporary injunction order, it appeals. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding for contempt. Respondents were attached for contempt, convicted, and fined $250 each for disobeying an injunction order of the court. The complaint alleges ownership by plaintiff of two tracts of land, known as "Lots Nos. 1 and 4," in the division of New Lebanon. It is conceded that the defendant owns lots, designated as "Nos. 2 and 3," in the division, and upon the complaint, used as an affidavit, Judge Whedbee restrained defendant, its servants, agents, and employes, from going upon the land, described in the complaint, for any purpose. It was further ordered that the defendant appear before Judge Ward and show cause why the restraining order should not be continued. At the hearing, the injunction was modified by Judge Ward, as follows: "It is ordered that the temporary restraining order heretofore granted be changed and modified, so that the defendant, its servants and agents, may continue the use and operation of its logging railroad as now located over and upon the land described in the complaint, pending the hearing of this cause upon its merits, and said restraining order is vacated, in so far as it prevents the use and operation of said railroad by the defendant. On motion of the plaintiff, it is ordered that the injunction heretofore granted, as to the cutting and removal of the timber from the land described in the complaint, be continued to the hearing, except the defendant may remove the logs cut and now lying upon the land."

It appears from the case that, upon application of the plaintiff, which was supported by affidavits to the effect that the respondents had violated the injunction order by cutting timber on the land in dispute, Judge Ward issued an order to the respondents to show cause, before Judge E. B. Cline, why they should not be attached for contempt. This order was served, and at the hearing Judge Cline found the facts, and, among others, that the respondents had cut timber on land claimed by the plaintiff, "being the land covered and protected by the former order of injunction; and, further, that they continued to cut the timber on said land after the order of Judge Ward had been served upon them." Judge Cline therefore adjudged them in contempt, and imposed a fine of $250 upon each of them. Respondents excepted and appealed.

A. D. MacLean, J. K. Wilson, and W. M. Bond, for appellant. Aycock & Winston, for appellee.

WALKER, J. [1] It is apparent from the findings of Judge Cline that the respondents undertook, by themselves, and without the acquiescence of the plaintiff or the sanction of the court, to survey and locate the lines of tract No. 1, and upon their own location of the boundaries to cut timber within what his honor designates in his findings as "disputed territory." There was a contest between the parties as to the location of the land, and the injunction was issued in order to preserve the status quo until the dispute could be settled. It cannot well be questioned that respondents knew that they were cutting timber on the land claimed by the plaintiff; that is, on the land in controversy. The plaintiff, in his complaint, alleged that he owned lots 1 and 2 of the land, known as "New Lebanon," and that defendants had entered thereon and cut therefrom a large quantity of timber, and were still engaged in doing so. The land claimed by the plaintiff, if we stop at the complaint, is that described as the land upon which the defendant and its co-respondent and superintendent, at that time, were cutting timber. They were restrained by the order of Judge Whedbee from cutting any more on that land, and, by the modified order of Judge Ward, from cutting any timber from that land, or removing any, except that already cut. In the affidavits of J. T. Ansell and J. J. Watson, it was alleged that they were still cutting timber at that place, and upon those affidavits Judge Ward issued his second order, requiring them to show cause why they should not be attached for contempt for disobeying the order in the manner stated in said affidavits. Even after this warning, they continued to cut at the same place. In addition to this, Judge Cline has found, as facts, that they proceeded arbitrarily to locate the line and then cut timber on tract No. 1, as claimed by the plaintiff, and in disregard of the order forbidding them to do so. If such a proceeding should be permitted, the orders of the court could easily be set at naught and the rights of parties litigant greatly prejudiced.

This case is not unlike Davis v. Fiber Co., 150 N. C. 84, 63 S. E. 178, in which, referring to a similar state of facts, Justice Hoke said: "The court finds, and there was ample evidence to sustain the finding, as follows: 'I find that, since the restraining order, made as aforesaid, was duly served upon the said Champion Fiber Company, it and its superintendent of the woods department, Harry Rotha, under the advice of counsel, have undertaken to, arbitrarily locate the Cathcart line to suit their own purposes, and have willfully and intentionally continued to cut and carry away timber trees situate and being on the land claimed by plaintiffs and embraced in the restraining order, just as they were doing before the issuing of said order.' And on this finding we are of opinion that the defendants were properly adjudged guilty of contempt. It is contended that the preliminary restraining order is not sufficiently definite in its terms to authorize the judgment; but we cannot take that view of the order, when considered in connection with the evidence in the case and the findings of the judge thereon. The description of the land was fully set forth in the complaint by metes and bounds. The allegations in the complaint, that the 'defendants had wrongfully entered and trespassed upon said lands,' by fair and reasonable intendment could only refer to the location as claimed by plaintiffs."

[2] We have high authority for saying that a party enjoined must not do the prohibited thing, nor permit it to be done by his connivance, nor effect it by trick or evasion. He must do nothing, directly or indirectly, that will render the order ineffectual, either wholly or partially so. The order of the court must be obeyed implicitly, according to its spirit, and in good faith. Rapalje on Contempt, § 40.

[3] The motive for violating the order is not considered in passing upon the question of contempt, and the respondent cannot purge himself by a disavowal of any wrong intent. It is the fact of his obedience that alone will be considered. Section 42; Baker v. Cordon, 86 N. C. 116, 41 Am. Rep. 448.

[4] In deciding whether there has been an actual breach of an injunction, it is important to consider the objects for which relief was granted, as well as the circumstances attending it; and it is to be observed that the violation of the spirit of an order or writ, even though its strict letter may not have been disregarded, is a breach of the mandate of the court. 2 High on Injunctions (4th Ed.) § 1446; Campbell v. Tarbell, 55 Vt. 455; Loder v. Arnold, 15 Jur. 117. The respondents may have honestly believed that the land upon which they cut the timber belonged to the defendant; but that is not the question. They had been forbidden to cut on land in dispute until the controversy was settled, and this order they violated. Having found this fact, the motive, whether good or bad, for doing the forbidden thing became immaterial.

[5] The court might well have found from the affidavits that the respondents had cut timber on lot No. 1, as described in the complaint; but they cannot complain that the finding was not more specific, or more in accordance with the probative force and full significance of the evidence, as the finding, if thus defective, is, in that respect, favorable to them.

[6] Nor will the advice of counsel avail the respondents in justification of their conduct. It may be considered by the judge in imposing punishment for the disobedience of the order; but it is no defense to the rule. Rapalje, § 49. When a party acts upon the advice of his attorney in such a case, he does so at his peril. It was suggested by plaintiff's counsel that the respondents did not make a full disclosure to their attorney; but, however this may be, they cannot profit by the advice, if they actually violated the order.

No error.

MIDGETT v. VANN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

Plaintiff's Appeal.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1195*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—JUDGMENT OF APPELLATE COURT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A judgment of the Supreme Court, on dismissing defendant's appeal, that defendant was liable for certain costs, was final and could only be corrected or reversed by the Supreme Court, and hence the superior court's ruling that defendant was entitled to recover back such costs was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4661-4665; Dec. Dig. § 1195.*]

2. COSTS (§ 169*)—ITEMS—PERSONAL EXPENSES.

A defendant is not entitled to recover as costs the sum paid as personal expenses in attending the hearing upon an injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 652, 653, 657, 658; Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

3. INJUNCTION (§ 252*)—ACTION ON BOND—DAMAGES.

Under the express provision of Revisal 1905, § 817, the only damages recoverable upon an injunction bond are such damages as may be sustained by the party enjoined, by reason of the injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 586; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

Defendant's Appeal.

4. INJUNCTION (§ 188*)—DISMISSAL—COSTS—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Attorney's fees are not recoverable as costs for damages by defendant in an action for an injunction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Dare County; Cline, Judge.

Action for an injunction by S. E. Midgett against Thomas S. Meekins, former fish commissioner, in which C. S. Vann, successor to Meekins, became party defendant. Motion for judgment for damages against sureties on injunction bond, heard upon exceptions to report of referee. Exceptions overruled, and report confirmed, and both parties appeal. Reversed on plaintiff's appeal and affirmed on defendant's appeal.

B. G. Crisp and E. F. Aydlett, for plaintiff.
J. C. B. Ehringhaus, for defendant.

Plaintiff's Appeal.

BROWN, J. There were seven actions brought in the superior court of Dare county against Thomas S. Meekins, former fish commissioner, to enjoin him from removing certain fish nets from the waters in which they were set upon the ground that they were not set within prohibited territory. The present defendant, C. S. Vann, succeeded Meekins as fish commissioner and took his place as defendant in said actions. The cases were considered together and heard by his honor Judge Justice, who continued the restraining order to the hearing. Defendant Vann appealed. This appeal was dismissed at August term, 1911, for failure upon part of defendant, appellant, to have the record printed, as required by the rule of this court, and the judgment of the Supreme Court required defendant to pay costs of appeal. At May term, 1911, of the superior court, plaintiff submitted to a judgment of nonsuit. There was a motion for judgment for damages, which was heard by a referee, whose judgment was affirmed by the superior court. The defendant claims damages as shown by the report: (1) For $6.35, cost in the Supreme Court, and which was adjudged against the defendant by this court at August term, 1911. (2) For $12.50, expenses of the fish commissioner in attending the hearing of the cases. (3) Two hundred dollars attorney fees in the cases. There were seven of these actions brought, and it was agreed that all should abide the decision of one case. The referee held: First. That the defendant was entitled to recover back the $6.35 cost. Second. That the defendant is entitled to recover the $12.50 personal expenses of the defendant in attending the hearings. The court overruled both exceptions and gave judgment against plaintiff. Plaintiff excepted. The referee refused to allow defendant attorney fees. Defendant excepted. Court overruled defendant's exceptions.

[1] 1. The ruling of the court that the defendant is entitled to recover back the costs taxed against the defendant by the judgment of the Supreme Court is erroneous. That judgment was final and could only be corrected or reversed by this court. To permit defendant to recover back costs of his dismissed appeal would in effect nullify the judgment of this court.

[2] 2. The defendant is not entitled to recover the sum paid as personal expenses in attending the hearing upon the injunction before Judge Justice. A party to an action is not entitled to recover his personal expenses in attending court. Hyman v. Devereux, 65 N. C. 589.

[3] The only damages recoverable upon an injunction bond given in pursuance of our statute (Revisal, § 817) are such damages as may be sustained by the party enjoined by reason of the injunction. Hyman v. Devereux, supra.

There is no evidence that defendant Vann has sustained any damages because he was not allowed to remove plaintiff's nets from the disputed waters, and therefore he can recover nothing upon the injunction bond.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Upon plaintiff's appeal his honor's rulings confirming report of referee are reversed.

Defendant's Appeal.

The defendant assigns error because the court below sustained the ruling of the referee refusing to allow counsel fees to defendant.

[4] Attorney's fees are not recoverable as costs or damages in cases like this in our state. Formerly a tax fee of $5 and in some cases $10, in the superior court, and $15 in this court, were taxable as costs in favor of the successful party. But they were abolished by statute in 1871. In many states attorney's fees are allowed to the successful litigant; but it is not so in this state and some others, nor in the federal courts. Railway Co. v. Elliott, 184 U. S. 530, 22 Sup. Ct. 446, 46 L. Ed. 673; Hyman v. Devereux, supra; Stringfield v. Hirsch, 94 Tenn. 425, 29 S. W. 609, 45 Am. St. Rep. 733. The opinion in this latter case is an elaborate discussion of the subject and gives the states where attorney's fees are recoverable and those where they are not, placing North Carolina in the last-named class. See, also, Donlan v. Trust Co., 139 N. C. 212, 51 S. E. 924.

The judgment on defendant's appeal is affirmed.

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—SETTING FIRES—QUESTION FOR JURY.

On the evidence in an action for burning timber on plaintiff's land, held, that whether defendant acted with ordinary care in setting a fire on its own property, and whether, when the danger to plaintiff's property became imminent, it resorted to such means as the situation presented to prevent the injury, were for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 311; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 121*)—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where the plaintiff shows damages from an act of the defendant which with proper care does not ordinarily cause damage, he makes out a prima facie case of negligence, which cannot be repelled but by proof of care or of some extraordinary accident which makes care useless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 217-220, 224-228, 271; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 21*)—FIRES—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—"SET FIRE TO ANY WOODS."

Revisal 1905, § 3346, which provides that if any person shall "set fire to any woods" on his own property, without notice to adjoining landowners, and without taking effectual care to extinguish the fire before it reach adjoining lands, he is liable in an action to any one injured, refers to setting fires upon woodland, and does not apply unless the firing is voluntary or intentional; and hence has no application to the case of a manufacturing company, burning off its right of way, where straw, tree tops, etc., had accumulated, and negligently allowing the fire to escape to land of an adjoining owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Justice, Judge.

Action by I. M. Mizell against the Branning Manufacturing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. No error.

This action was brought to recover damages for burning timber on the plaintiff's land. The defendant's servants, under the instructions of the section master of its railway, were "burning off" the right of way, where much straw, trash, tree tops, and stubble had been allowed to accumulate. It was in March, 1910, when it was very dry, and a high wind arose and swept the fire into the dry tree tops near by, from which and the right of way it was carried to the plaintiff's land, and burned over his land. One of the plaintiff's witnesses testified: "It was very dry, and the wind got up about 12 o'clock. Fire got out from where we were burning. We were firing and whipping out. It got out behind us in tree tops and made a big fire. We tried to put it out, but couldn't. It got out about 12 o'clock and burned till night. This fire burned on plaintiff's land. White and others stopped it by firing against it. White is superintendent of defendant's road. He brought his hands. Foreman was there and three others." He also said that it was a big fire and the wind caused the trouble. There was other evidence in the case not necessary to be stated. The charge of the court is not set out in the record, except the special instructions given at the request of the defendant. Its counsel asked the court to charge the jury as follows: "(1) If they believe the evidence, they will answer this issue in favor of the defendant—that is to say, the second issue—'No.' (2)

Under the evidence the plaintiffs cannot recover in this cause. (3) The defendant is no more liable than any other citizen of Bertie county would be under the same circumstances; and if the defendant was ordinarily careful in burning over its right of way, and the fire got out by reason of an unforeseen wind, then there can be no recovery against the defendant, and you will answer the second issue, 'No.' (4) If the jury find from the evidence in the case that the employees of the defendant exercised reasonable and prudent care in burning off the right of way, and by unexpected rise of wind the fire got beyond their control and burned over the lands of the plaintiffs, you will answer the second issue, 'No.'" The court gave the instructions contained in the third and fourth prayers, and refused the others, and defendant excepted. We find this statement in the case: "The other evidence was as to the amount of damages, and is not pertinent to this appeal, as only one question is presented, and that is the refusal of the judge to nonsuit the plaintiff." The jury returned the following verdict: "(1) Are plaintiffs the owners of the land described in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (2) Did defendant wrongfully and negligently injure the plaintiffs' land, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes. (3) What damages, if any, are the plaintiffs entitled to recover of the defendant? Answer: $750." A motion for a new trial having been overruled and judgment entered upon the verdict, the defendant appealed.

WALKER, J. [1] The case does not make it very clear whether the expression, "the other evidence was as to the amount of damages," refers only to the plaintiff's evidence or to the entire evidence. If the former is the true meaning, we could not decide that there is no evidence of negligence, without knowing what was the evidence introduced by the defendant, for, on a motion to nonsuit, the plaintiff has the right to have all of the evidence considered by us in the view most favorable to him. The appellant should have relieved us of any uncertainty in this respect.

[2] But the evidence, as stated in the case on appeal, was properly submitted to the jury, and under proper instructions, as we must assume; the charge of the court not having been made a part of the case. The defendant's counsel seem to have understood that it was necessary for the jury to find, upon the evidence, that the burning on the right of way was done carefully, and that there was no negligence of the defendant in burning the stubble and other combustible material, which contributed to the injury of which the plaintiff complains. The instructions asked for as regards the rising of the wind, which carried the live sparks into the dry tops of the trees and to the plaintiff's land, where his timber was burned, were given as requested by the defendant, and the court, in the general charge, may have instructed the jury even more favorably for the defendant.

[3, 4] Whether, upon the evidence, the defendant acted with ordinary care and prudence, was a question for the jury, and they could consider all the circumstances, the condition of the right of way, the time of the year, the state of the weather, the fact that defendant's servants left fire behind them that might spread to plaintiff's land by force of the wind or otherwise, and any other fact or circumstance bearing upon the question of due care. The evidence of negligence may have been slight, but we cannot say that there was none. It was the province of the jury to weigh it, under proper instructions of the court as to what would constitute negligence. "When the plaintiff shows damage resulting from the act of the defendant, which act, with the exercise of proper care, does not ordinarily produce damage, he makes out a prima facie case of negligence which cannot be repelled but by proof of care, or some extraordinary accident which makes care useless." Chaffin v. Lawrance, 50 N. C. 179; Aycock v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 321; Haynes v. Gas Co., 114 N. C. 203, 19 S. E. 344, 26 L. R. A. 810, 41 Am. St. Rep. 786; and especially Moore v. Parker, 91 N. C. 275. Whether, in dealing with a dangerous agency, the defendant used ordinary precaution to protect adjacent property, and whether, when the danger became imminent, it resorted to such means as the situation suggested to prevent the injury, were questions for the jury. It seems that Superintendent White stopped the conflagration by "firing against it." It might well be argued that had this method been employed in the beginning, or sooner than it was, the spread of the fire would have been prevented, and, at least, the loss to the plaintiff would have been diminished.

[5] We do not think Revisal, § 3346, applies to the facts. The defendant did not "set fire to any woods" within the meaning of that statute. The statute refers to woodland. Averitt v. Murrell, 49 N. C. 322. It was held in Achenbach v. Johnston, 84 N. C. 264, that "a field grown up in broom sedge and wire grass" was not "woods" within the intent of the statute, and it was said that the case of Hall v. Cranford, 50 N. C. 3, stretched the doctrine of liberal construction, in order to reach the mischief intended to be remedied, as far as it is safe to follow, and we concur in that view. Nor does the statute apply unless the firing is voluntary or intentional, and not merely accidental or necessary. Averitt v. Murrell, 49 N. C. 322; Tyson v. Rasberry, 8 N. C. 60; Lamb v. Sloan, 94 N. C. 534.

Defendant moved in this court for a new trial, alleging that the jurors were asked if any of them were related to the plaintiff, to which they answered, "No," and that since the trial it has been ascertained that one of the jurors was so related. We will not decide the question as to whether the motion should be made in this court or in the court below, for, assuming that we have jurisdiction, it is addressed to the discretion of the court, as we have so often held, and we would not be disposed, under the facts and circumstances of this case, to exercise our discretion in favor of the defendant and grant a new trial for the reason assigned. State v. Maultsby, 130 N. C. 664, 41 S. E. 97; State v. Lipscomb, 134 N. C. 689, 47 S. E. 44, and cases cited.

No error.

GATES COUNTY v. HILL

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 143*)—NONSUIT—WHEN AUTHORIZED.

Where the issue is one of fact, and the evidence supports both contentions, a nonsuit is properly denied.

2. TRIAL (§ 252*) — INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action by a county for land forming a part of a public square of the county, there was no evidence that the county had willfully abandoned a part of the square, and had established a different line, a charge that, if a part of the square had been willfully abandoned and a different line established, and there had been a continuous possession by defendant, under a deed, for the abandoned part for 20 years, the possession ripened into a title was properly refused.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 6*)—RETROACTIVE OPERATION—LIMITATIONS AS AGAINST COUNTY.

A person who first actually occupied land forming a part of a public square of a county two years before the adoption, in 1891 (Laws 1891, c. 224), of Revisal 1906, § 389, providing that no person shall acquire any exclusive right to any public square by reason of occupancy thereof, could not acquire title by possession.

5. NEW TRIAL (§ 42*)—GROUNDS—DISQUALIFICATION OF JURORS.

A verdict for a county suing for land forming a part of a public square of the county will not be disturbed because some of the jurors were related to the county commissioners, where one juror was the father-in-law of a present commissioner, another juror a stepson of the father of a former commissioner, and another juror the first cousin of the father-in-law of another present commissioner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Gates County; Cline, Judge.

Action by Gates County against A. O. Hill. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Smith, for appellant. A. P. Godwin, Ward & Grimes, and W. M. Bond, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The defendant relies on two exceptions in his brief; the first being to the refusal of his motion to nonsuit the plaintiff, and the second to the failure of his honor to instruct the jury, as requested, that the defendant could rely on adverse possession as a defense.

[1] The controversy between the parties is one of fact, the plaintiff contending that the deed under which it claims covers the locus in quo, and the defendant contending to the contrary, and, as evidence was introduced supporting both contentions, the motion to nonsuit was properly denied.

[2, 3] The prayer for instruction was as follows: "Although the law is that possession of any part of a public square or street which has been dedicated to the public cannot ripen into a title, yet, if the proper authorities of a public square or street shall purposely and willfully abandon the use of any part thereof and establish a different line, cutting off such abandoned part, and there is continuous possession under a deed for such abandoned part for 21 years or more, then such possession would ripen into a title and vest the title in the possessor under the deed; and if you find from the preponderance of the testimony that the defendant, and those under whom he claims, have been in possession of the land in controversy, under such circumstances, for more than 21 years, then the title vested in the possessor thereof, and cannot be divested, except by 20 years' possession adverse to him." This was properly refused, because there was no evidence that the plaintiff willfully abandoned a part of the public square and established a different line. Also, the first actual occupation by the defendant of the land in controversy was in 1889, two years before the act of 1891 (Laws 1891, c. 224), now section 389 of the Revisal, which reads as follows: "No person or corporation shall ever acquire any exclusive right to any part of any public road, street, lane, alley, square or public way of any kind by reason of the occupancy thereof or by encroaching upon or obstructing the same in any way, and in all actions, whether civil or criminal, against any person or corporation on account of any encroachment upon or obstruction of or occupancy of any public way it shall not be competent for any court to hold that such action is barred by any statute of limitations."

[4] The defendant also moves in this court for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, and because some of the jurors were related to members of the board of commissioners of Gates county. An examination of the affidavits on file and a comparison of them with the evidence introduced on the trial show that the new evidence is purely cumulative, and when this is true a new trial will not be granted.

[5] The relationship of the jurors, as stated by the defendant, is as follows: One of the jurors, to wit, Job Freeman, is the father-in-law of T. J. Carter, one of the present county commissioners; another, J. E. Harrell, is the stepson of the father of B. D. Lawrence, one of the commissioners in 1891; and another, J. A. Eason, is first cousin to the father of the wife of E. S. A. Ellenor, one of the present county commissioners. This is a motion addressed to our discretion, and, in our opinion, the interest and bias of the jurors, if any, is too remote to justify us in disturbing the verdict of the jury.

No error.

3. WILLS (§ 97*)—REQUISITES AND VALIDITY—CONTENTS—SEPARATE PAPERS.

A separate agreement cannot be considered a part of a will, though the words "is an addendum to the agreement made February 15, 1901," are prefixed to the will, where the date of the prefix does not appear, and the will is dated July 15, 1900, as it neither shows the existence of an agreement in writing, nor so describes and identifies it as to designate what paper was meant to be included.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 105*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—NONSUIT—FRAGMENTARY APPEAL.

Where, in an action to construe a will, there was a dismissal as to a portion of the lands involved, the plaintiff should have noted an exception as to the nonsuit, and have brought the whole case up on appeal from the final judgment of the issue reserved.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Justice, Judge.

Action by R. J. Shields and others against Leon H. Freeman and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Dismissed.

Pruden & Pruden, S. Brown Shepherd, and Gillam & Davenport, for appellants. Winston & Matthews, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. J. C. Freeman died, leaving a will, of which the following is the only part material to this controversy:

"It is my full purpose that Leon H. Freeman, my son, shall own the old—my father's homestead, or in case he refuses to respond, then my son Joseph W. Freeman may accept or refuse the same offer, with the positive injunction that it may and shall remain and belong in the family as long as any direct male descendant shall issue from our direct bowels for a claimant. I also have in view to purchase other pieces or parts of said homestead which are to be added thereto, and in case of failure to do so, I would have my boy, whichever may be the owner, use lawful endeavor to unite in as large a tract as circumstances will allow. I ask this as a part of the sale to this land, on account of the many old associations, recollections and tender recollections and bygone friends, relatives and friends.

"Now I invest either Lee or otherwise Joe with a full possession of the farm of a one-horse crop, to be selected by himself as an inducement to accept as superintendent the supervision of the farm and family from January 1, 1901, till further separation of the family or until my death, after which I leave them to his best care, and the farm is his in fee simple, to descend to his heirs. The family to remain together, unless torn asunder by natural circumstances. I want everything kept together, and I would have all work together for good, provided it can be so managed. The law is less partial than I can be, and I leave all except this old homestead, which is hereby sold and conveyed, to legal methods; and my prayer shall ever ascend for whole family, the good of my friends and the well-being of all mankind. This July 15, 1900."

To which he added this codicil: "Since writing the above, I have bought the lands herein intimated, containing 206 acres, to be paid for January, 1901, 1902, 1903—one-third amount each year; and if neither L. H. nor J. W. Freeman choose to accept the terms set forth, my wife and girls shall or may fill the wish, and after the death of my wife everything is to be equitably and legally divided. October 5, 1901."

Upon a caveat entered by these plaintiffs, this paper writing was established as the last will and testament of James C. Freeman. This action is brought by the daughters of James C. Freeman, alleging: (1) That they are tenants in common with Leon H. Freeman, and entitled to be let into possession with him and to immediate partition of the land. (2) That the said will confers no title to the premises upon Leon H. Freeman, and his claim is a cloud upon the title, which plaintiffs ask to have removed. (3) That under the will Leon H. Freeman was to hold said premises in trust for the use and benefit of the other children of said J. C. Freeman, and not for his sole use and benefit. (4) That that part of the home place, known as "lot No. 3 in the partition of the land of Sallie M. Freeman," the said J. C. Freeman had bought at a partition sale, but had not paid therefor, and no title had been made to him; and the plaintiffs contend that this part of the land did not pass under said will, but descended upon all the children as tenants in common.

Joseph W. Freeman and W. J. Freeman make no claim to the land, and did not unite with their sisters in this action, and are made parties defendant.

[1] The first exception is that the court refused to submit an issue, "Did Leon H. Freeman fail and refuse to take care of and support the widow and unmarried daughters of James C. Freeman after his death?" There was no allegation and no evidence that he had refused and failed, and the issue was properly refused. Sprinkle v. Insurance Co., 126 N. C. 678, 36 S. E. 112.

[2] The second exception is that the court refused to instruct the jury that Leon H. Freeman took no interest in the land described in the said will, but that James C. Freeman died intestate in regard thereto, upon the ground that the will is too indefinite, is vague and uncertain. But we think that the will, though inartificially drawn, clearly shows that, while the testator desired that his unmarried daughters should have a home with their mother and brother, and that the family should remain a unit, he devised the homestead to Leon H. Freeman. He put him in charge of the farm before his death, giving him a one-horse crop for his services each year, beginning January 1, 1901, and this was to continue until "my death, after which I leave them to his best care, and the farm is his in fee simple, to descend to his heirs." At this time, the testator did not own a part of his father's old homestead, and he urges his son to acquire as much of that as possible. Later the testator acquired that land, and by codicil added it to the devise. He further says: "It is my full purpose that Leon H. Freeman, my son, shall own the old—my father's homestead." He enjoins him against selling it, and hopes that it will be kept in the male line of inheritance. This last was a mere request, without legal effect. The language is not very formal or accurate, but it is sufficient to show a devise of the property in fee to Leon H. Freeman, who accepted it. Joseph W. Freeman is a party to the action, but sets up no claim to the land.

[3] Prefixed to the will are written these words, "This is written for Lee or Joe Freeman and is an addendum to the agreement made Feb. 15, 1901." This must evidently have been added after the main body of the will set out, which was dated July 15, 1900. The date of such prefix does not appear, and the agreement referred to can have no effect, unless it was in writing, and was "described and identified with such particularity as to designate and clearly show, and so that the court can certainly see, what paper was meant to be part of the will." Siler v. Dorsett, 108 N. C. 300, 12 S. E. 988.

[4] The court dismissed the action, except as to "the lands described in the complaint as lot No. 3, and continued the cause for trial upon the issues raised in the pleadings as to that tract of land." The plaintiffs should have noted an exception as to the nonsuit to the other part of the action, and have brought the whole case up on appeal from the final judgment after the determination of the issue reserved. The appeal at this stage must be dismissed as fragmentary. Rodman v. Calloway, 117 N. C. 13, 23 S. E. 37; Rogerson v. Lumber Co., 136 N. C. 266, 48 S. E. 647; Billings v. Observer, 150 N. C. 542, 64 S. E. 435.

[5] We have, notwithstanding, passed upon and approved the ruling as to the nonsuit, which we have sometimes done in such cases. State v. Wylde, 110 N. C. 503, 15 S. E. 5; Milling Co. v. Finlay, 110 N. C. 412, 15 S. E. 4, and cases there cited; Dowdy v. Dowdy, 154 N. C. 558, 70 S. E. 917.

Appeal dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Cline, Judge.

Action by J. B. Hodges against R. L. Smith. From a judgment on nonsuit for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

This action was brought to recover damages for deceit and false warranty in the sale of a horse. In his answer the defendant describes himself as "a regular horse and mule dealer; conducting a sales stable at Greenville, N. C." The following is the plaintiff's version of the facts, as given in his testimony: "I live in Beaufort county, and am a farmer and house carpenter. I know R. L. Smith, the defendant. I went to his stables in December, 1907. He has a large stable at Greenville. I saw Mr. Savage before I saw Mr. Smith. Savage was working with Smith. I told Mr. Savage that I wanted a horse, one that my father and mother could drive, and that is gentle and all right. I told him that I had never bought a horse before. He showed me the horse in question, and told me that he was all right. He priced the horse at $185 cash. I then saw Mr. Smith, and told him about the conversation with Savage. He said he had a horse to sell, that was what he was there for. He said the horse was all right. I told Mr. Smith that I did not know anything about horses, that I wanted a quiet, gentle horse. He said that this one was a quiet gentle horse; that any lady could drive him. I had Mr. Savage to look at my horse, and we traded. I gave $145 to boot by mortgage on the horse traded for. Mr. Smith had the horse hitched to a break cart and driven a short distance in the stable. He said he had no buggy, but would hitch him to a cart. My brother was with me at the time. I had no experience in buying horses. I told Mr. Smith that I wanted a quiet, gentle horse that my father and mother could drive. He said this was a gentle horse that any lady could drive. I relied on what he said and did not know, except from what he said, whether the horse was gentle or not. After the trade was made, Mr. Smith had the horse hooked up, and I drove him home a distance of about 25 miles. The next day after that I hitched the horse up again. Lum Whitaker was with me. We hitched him to a good buggy with a good harness, and drove him about two miles. The next day Whitaker and I hooked him up and drove him 125 yards, when he began to run and kick and threw me out of the buggy, breaking my leg. Whitaker stopped the horse by pulling him into a fence. I was laid up nearly all the year. I was in bed six weeks, flat on my back. I was then up and down until October or November. The doctor attended me nearly the whole time. My leg was dislocated and broken together. I was disabled the entire year, and it affects me yet. After I got hurt, John Hodges worked the horse for me beside an old team and broke him for me, and I drove him that fall. The horse was not worth anything to me. I reckon he was worth $150 or $175 on the market. I saw the horse after I got hurt. That fall I wrote Mr. Smith a letter, in November, 1908, and told him I could not pay for the horse and the interest on the mortgage, and to send for him, which he did. Before I was hurt, I could do a man's work. At the time of the injury the horse was in the main public road near my house, and threw me out of the buggy. My doctor's bill was $100. I had to hire a man to work at 50 cents per day and board at 25 cents per day. The horse I traded to Smith was worth $50. I lost him and lost my crop that year. My time was worth $1 per day. I have not been able to do a good day's work since. Was about 24 years old when I made this trade." At the close of the testimony for the plaintiff, the court, on motion of the defendant, entered a judgment as of nonsuit, and the plaintiff appealed.

Small, MacLean & McMullan, for appellant. F. G. James & Son, for appellee.

WALKER, J. The defendant, in his answer, denies the plaintiff's allegations, the substance of which have been set out, and avers that he had recently bought the horse when he sold him to the plaintiff, and, not knowing his qualities, he could not have warranted or represented that he was kind and gentle in harness, but told the plaintiff that the person who sold the horse to him represented him to be sound and safe, and he only expressed an opinion to the plaintiff, based upon such knowledge as he had thus acquired, that the horse would suit him, and that he made no warranty and practiced no deceit. The issue thus raised by the pleadings was not submitted to the jury, and the defendant offered no testimony, so that the case must be considered solely upon the evidence of the plaintiff.

[1, 2] We think the judge erred in ordering a nonsuit. The question involved in this case has frequently been decided by this court against the contention of the defendant. As early as 1805, in Thompson v. Tate, 5 N. C. 97, 3 Am. Dec. 678, it was held that a vendor of goods is liable on an express or implied warranty for affirming, at the time of the sale, that they possess a particular quality which would increase their value, if it turns out that the affirmation is not true, although he did not know such affirmation to be false; and with reference to this principle the court said: "Upon this question there can be no doubt. The vendor is clearly liable." This must be read in the light of subsequent decisions. In Inge v. Bond, 10 N. C. 101, Taylor, C. J., drew the distinction between an affirmation as to the title of goods where the law implies a warranty, and the affirmation binds the vendor, and an affirmation as to their soundness, which will not amount to a warranty, unless it appears on the evidence to have been so intended. This is but the statement of the general rule that, in order to make a contract, the minds of the parties must agree upon the same thing, the intention or belief of one only not being sufficient for the purpose. The intention of both must be the same. It is for the jury to find what the intention was from the language used and the circumstances of the case. The law was stated by Nash, C. J., in Foggart v. Blackweller, 26 N. C. 238, to be well settled, by numerous adjudications, "that there is no word or set form of words required to constitute a warranty in the sale of personal property, but wherever the words used, taken in connection with the attendant circumstances, show that it was a part of the contract with the parties that there should be a warranty, they will suffice. 4 Ad. & E. 473, 31st vol. Com. L. Rep., Pwon v. Barkham, 5 B. & A. 240, 7 vol. C. L. R., Shepherd v. Kain, 2 Nev. & Mann. 446, 28 vol. C. L. R., Freeman v. Baker. These authorities show that every affirmation made at the time of the sale of personals is a warranty, provided it appears to have been so intended by the parties. A bare affirmation, merely expressive of the judgment or opinion of the vendor, will not amount to a warranty; and the reason is a warranty subjects the vendor to all losses arising from its failure, however innocent he may be, and this responsibility the law will not throw upon him by implication, except as to the title of the property. As it respects the value or soundness of the article sold, the law implies no warranty. The leading case in this state upon the subject of the warranty of personals is that of Erwin v. Maxwell, 7 N. C. 241, 9 Am. Dec. 602. In that case the plaintiff asked the defendant if the horse he was about to let him have was sound, to which the latter answered that he was. His Honor Chief Justice Taylor in discussing the subject says: "To make an affirmation at the time of the sale a warranty, it must appear by evidence to be so intended, and not to have been a mere matter of judgment or opinion." In the case of Ayres v. Parks, 10 N. C. 59, the court says: "An affirmation at the time of the sale is a warranty, provided it appears in evidence to have been so intended. Whether it was so intended is a matter of fact to be left to the jury." The last case on this subject is that of Baum v. Stevens, 24 N. C. 411. In its leading features it strongly resembles this." It was stated in Baum v. Stevens that the true doctrine was established in Erwin v. Maxwell. The cases are collected in McKinnon v. McIntosh, 98 N. C. 89, 3 S. E. 840, and the rule is thus deduced from them and the other authorities: "The defendant had a right to have the question whether the force and effect of the affirmations of the plaintiff in regard to the quality of the fertilizer did not constitute a warranty of the quality. If the vendor represents an article as possessing a value which upon proof it does not possess, he is liable as on a warranty, express or implied, although he may not have known such an affirmation to be false, if such representation was intended, not as a mere expression of opinion, but the positive assertion of a fact upon which the purchaser acts; and this is a question for the jury. Thompson v. Tate, 5 N. C. 97 [3 Am. Dec. 678]; Inge v. Bond, 10 N. C. 101; Foggart v. Blackweller, 26 N. C. 238; Bell v. Jeffreys, 35 N. C. 356; Henson v. King, 48 N. C. 419; Lewis v. Rountree, 78 N. C. 323; Baum v. Stevens, 24 N. C. 411." See, also, Henson v. King, 48 N. C. 419; Lewis v. Rountree, 78 N. C. 323.

The question was presented in Horton v. Green, 66 N. C. 596, and the court said that: "A representation simply of soundness does not import absolutely a stipulation of the existence of that quality, but a representation may be made in such terms and under such circumstances as to denote that it was not intended merely as a representation, but that it entered into the bargain itself. In Ayres v. Parks, 10 N. C. 59, Hall, J., says: 'Whether an affirmation at the time of sale was intended as a warranty is a matter of fact to be left to the judge.' 'Of necessity, in verbal contracts,' says Chief Justice Ruffin, 'greater latitude must be allowed to evidence to establish the words and the meaning of parties. The evidence may consist of everything which tends to establish that the vendor meant to convey the impression that he was binding himself for the soundness of the article and that the vendee relied on what was passing as a stipulation.' Among these circumstances even the tones, looks, gestures, and the whole manner of the transaction, with all the surroundings, would be competent evidence for the jury to consider in making up their verdict. The doctrine upon special contracts of personalty, and whether the question of warranty is to be decided by the court or left to the jury with proper instructions, has been too long and too thoroughly settled in our state to be now overturned by decisions in other courts. We adhere to the decisions of our own court upon these questions." That case was approved in Beasley v. Surlea, 140 N. C. 605, 53 S. E. 360, and the following language of Chief Justice Ruffin in Baum v. Stevens, supra, was adopted: "It is certain that warrant is not an indispensable term in contracts respecting personalty, as it is in conveyances of freehold. It is also true that a representation simply of soundness does not impart absolutely a stipulation of the existence of that quality. But the representation may be made in such terms and under such circumstances as to denote that it was not intended merely as a representation, but that it entered into the bargain itself. * * *

The evidence may consist of everything which tends to establish that the vendor meant to convey the impression that he was binding himself for the soundness of the article, and that the vendee relied on what was passing as a stipulation. Among these circumstances would, of course, be the understanding at the time of the bystanders who witnessed the transaction and the facts on which the impression of these persons were founded." After further discussion he concludes: "These, we think, were all matters properly belonging to the jury, to whom they should have been submitted, with instructions that, if they collected therefrom that the defendant did not merely mean to express an opinion, but to assert positively that the negro was sound, and that bidders should, upon the faith of that assertion, bid for the negro as sound, then it would amount to a warranty, otherwise not." The same principle was stated and applied in Wrenn v. Morgan, 148 N. C. 101, 61 S. E. 641, and Harris v. Cannady, 149 N. C. 81, 62 S. E. 771, with a full citation of the cases in this court, and the rule was thus formulated by Justice Hoke: "It is accepted law that, to hold a bargainor in a sale responsible for a warranty, it is not necessary that this should be given in express terms, but that an affirmation of a material fact made by a seller at the time of the sale and as an inducement thereto and accepted and relied on by the buyer will amount to a warranty. Tiffany on Sales, 162." We find in Tiffany on Sales, at p. 162, a statement of the rule apparently corresponding with that adopted by this court: "No form of words is necessary to create a warranty. Whether the words amount to a warranty is a question of the intention of the parties. The affirmation of a fact made by the seller as an inducement to the sale, if the buyer relies upon it, will amount to a warranty. A statement of opinion or a mere commendatory expression will not. Whether a statement is an affirmation of fact, or whether it is simply a statement of opinion or a commendatory expression, often depends on the nature of the sale and the circumstances of the case."

[3] Applying the principle as thus gathered from the authorities, the court erred in not submitting the case to the jury to find the facts and to pass upon the question of warranty. The language of the parties, as used at the time of the transaction, is quite as strong to show a warranty as any to be found in the cases we have cited. The defendant was a dealer in horses, and by the testimony as we now have it he, at least, affirmed that the horse he sold to the plaintiff was of the description he wanted—kind and gentle in harness, and so well broken that even a lady could drive him with safety. The plaintiff says that he relied upon that representation and bought the horse believing it to be true, and being induced thereby to buy. The jury must decide whether it was intended and accepted as a warranty, and also, upon the evidence, whether there has been a breach thereof; there being evidence of a breach for them to consider.

We have so recently discussed the law in regard to the question as to the deceit that it will be sufficient merely to refer to the case. Whitmire v. Heath, 155 N. C. 304, 71 S. E. 313. We have also recently considered very fully all the questions now presented—deceit and warranty—in Halton v. Robertson, 156 N. C. 215, 72 S. E. 316. See, also, Unitype Co. v. Aschcraft, 155 N. C. 63, 71 S. E. 61. The case of Allen v. Truesdell, 135 Mass. 75, is much like this one. It was there held that if a person buys a horse in reliance upon a false representation by the seller that the horse is safe and not afraid of the cars, and is injured by reason of the horse being frightened by the cars and running, he may maintain an action against the seller for such injuries; and the facts that the accident did not occur until five weeks after the sale, during which time the horse had been driven safely on several occasions, and that the horse, after being frightened, ran three-fourths of a mile, and then turned from the highway towards a place where it had been accustomed to stand, and in doing so overturned the vehicle in which the buyer was riding, are not as matter of law conclusive that the vice of the horse did not cause the injury, but are for the jury, citing Langridge v. Levy, 2 Mees. & Wils. (Exch.) 519. More to the point, upon facts somewhat similar to those in this case, is Smith v. Green, L. R. (1875-6) 1 C. P. Div. 92.

The question of damages is also discussed in Robertson v. Halton, supra.

The nonsuit is set aside, and a new trial ordered.

New trial.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 306*) — ILLEGAL SALE OF LIQUOR TO MINORS—CIVIL ACTION—COMPLAINT—REQUISITES.

A complaint in an action under Revisal 1905, § 3525, for exemplary damages for the sale of liquor to a minor in violation of section 3524, which fails to allege that the minor was unmarried, as required by section 3524, is fatally defective, and, in the absence of a request for leave to amend the complaint, the trial court may dismiss the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; H. A. Foushee, Judge.

Action by Laura Spencer against John H. Fisher. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. McIver, for appellant. Gulon & Gulon, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This is an action by Laura Spencer, the mother of Carl Spencer, against a banking company and Fisher, its cashier. The complaint alleges: That Carl Spencer, the son of the plaintiff, who is a widow, is a minor 17 years of age, and that in April, 1911, a wholesale whisky dealer in Richmond, Va., shipped nine cases of whisky to New Bern, N. C., consigned to "order of the shipper," and that said shipper forwarded bills of lading, one for each case, to the defendant bank, with sight draft attached, with the request to "notify Carl Spencer." That the defendant, Fisher, was notified by the uncle of said Carl that he was a minor, and said uncle forbade the delivery to him of said bills of lading, but that notwithstanding, upon payment by said Carl of said drafts, Fisher delivered to him said bills of lading, "whereby the title to the whisky passed to the said Carl Spencer."

The complaint avers that this was a sale of the whisky to said Carl Spencer in violation of Revisal, § 3524, and this action is brought to recover exemplary damages under Rev. § 3525. The court sustained the demurrer that "the complaint did not state a cause of action," and dismissed the action.

The complaint fails to aver that Carl Spencer was "an unmarried person," as required by Rev. § 3524, and hence the judgment dismissing the action must be affirmed. The court, it is true, might have allowed an amendment in this respect in its discretion, but it seems that it was not asked for.

Action dismissed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; Justice, Judge.

Action by D. L. Minton against J. S. Hughes. Judgment refusing to set aside a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Winston & Matthews, for appellant. John E. Vann and Winborne & Winborne, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. The court is of opinion in this case that it is unnecessary to consider the question of excusable neglect for which his honor declined to set aside the judgment in the court below. Not only must the defendant show excusable neglect as defined by many decisions of this court, but he must also show that he has meritorious defense. Norton v. McLaurin, 125 N. C. 189, 34 S. E. 269; Turner v. Machine Company, 133 N. C. 384, 45 S. E. 781.

Upon consideration of this feature of the case, we are of the opinion that defendant's petition and affidavits show no defense to the action which could avail him in law. Pharr v. Russell, 42 N. C. 222.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

1. RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES (§ 20*) — SCHOOL PROPERTY—USES FOR WHICH HELD—DEED OF TRUST—"OTHER PURPOSE."

A religious association known as "Shiloh Association" purchased land and established a school called "Shiloh Institute," the deed for the property being executed to trustees appointed by the association, and reciting that it was upon trust to hold such property for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a school of general learning and for any other proper and legal purpose which the association might deem best, and giving the trustees power to sell or mortgage the property whenever requested by the association. Held, that the "other proper and legal purpose" should be construed as of the same general nature and kind as the main object of a school, and that the right to sell or mortgage meant a sale or mortgage in furtherance of the trust to maintain a school.

2. TRUSTS (§ 59*)—REVOCATION.

Where a religious association formed of several churches purchased land to be held by trustees for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a school, with power to sell or mortgage, was thereafter joined by other churches, and had the school incorporated by Priv. Laws 1891, c. 321, the property to be held by trustees for the same purpose, and the association having the right under Private Laws 1903, c. 49, to appoint the trustees, the association could not abolish the trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 78-81; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

3. PARTITION (§ 13*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO PARTITION—COTENANCY.

A religious association formed by a number of churches purchased land, the deed to which was executed to trustees appointed by the association upon trust to hold the property for the purpose of establishing a school and for any other legal purpose which it might deem suitable, with power to sell or mortgage on request of the association. Priv. Laws 1891, c. 321, incorporated the school, and made the trustees a body corporate to hold the property for the same purpose. Other churches joined the association after the land had been purchased. Held, in a suit by three of the unincorporated churches in the association for the sale of the school property for partition, that, as it did not appear what sum was raised by each of the respective churches and there was no basis for the allegation of a cotenancy in the property, they had no rights in the property which were the subject of partition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

4. PARTITION (§§ 19, 32*)—COTENANTS—POSSESSION—CESTUIS QUE TRUSTENT.

Tenants in common who are not in possession cannot procure an order for partition, nor can cestuis que trustent compel partition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 60, 63, 83-86; Dec. Dig. §§ 19, 32.*]

5. CHARITIES (§ 47*)—ADMINISTRATION BY COURT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

On disbandment of an unincorporated religious association, which controlled the property of an incorporated school by its power to elect the trustees of such school, the duty would devolve upon the court in case it was a charity to provide for filling vacancies among the trustees as they should occur so that the trust might not fail, as prescribed by Revisal 1905, § 3923; and, if not a charity, then it would have the same duty under its general equity jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Charities, Cent. Dig. § 85; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Warren County; Cline, Judge.

Action for partition by the Spring Green Church and others against Mansfield Thornton and others. Judgment overruling defendants' demurrer, and they appeal. Action dismissed.

Tasker Polk, Andrew J. Harris, and Thos. M. Pitman, for appellants. T. T. Hicks, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. In 1871 a voluntary association known as "Shiloh Association" was formed by several missionary Baptist churches for colored people. In 1883 the association purchased land for $2,500, and established a school called "Shiloh Institute." Considerable additional money from individuals and from the churches composing the association has since been raised by donations from time to time and put in improvements and repairs upon said property. The deed for the property when purchased was executed to certain trustees appointed by said association, and recited "upon the trust that they, the said parties of the second part, and their successors in the said office of trustee aforesaid duly qualified and appointed by the said association, shall hold the said property herein conveyed for said association to be used under the direction and management of the said parties of the second part as trustees aforesaid and their successors, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a school of general learning, and for any other proper and legal purpose which the association may deem best and the said parties of the second part and their successors to have the right and privilege of selling and mortgaging the property herein conveyed, whenever they are required and requested to do so by the association." Said "Shiloh Institute" was incorporated (Priv. Laws 1891, c. 321), which created said trustees a body politic and corporate, and specified that they are to "have and to hold the buildings, grounds and all appurtenances embraced in the deed." This act was amended (Private Laws 1903, c. 49) by increasing the number of trustees to nine, and by providing that three of these were to be elected by the "Shiloh Association" every year, and they have been so elected ever since. The number of churches belonging to the association has increased to 58, several of which were not members of the association in 1883. In Kerr v. Hicks, 154 N. C. 285, 70 S. E. 468, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529, the court held that such trustees elected by the churches present at a meeting held at the regular time and place duly designated by the last regular meeting were the duly elected trustees under the terms of the constitution of this association, and not those elected at a meeting held at a time and place not so authorized, though in the latter meeting a majority of the churches were represented, while at the regular meeting there was a minority of the whole number represented.

[1, 2] This is a proceeding by three of the churches in said association asking for a sale of the property for partition. The other alleged cotenants are not made parties. This misconceives the nature of the tenure of the property which as specifically recited in the terms of the deed above set out is that the property is to be held by said trustees and their successors "for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a school of general learning and for any other proper and legal purpose which the association may deem best." The "other proper and legal purpose" it would seem should be construed as "of the same general nature and kind" as the main trust recited. It is true that the trustees have the "right and privilege of selling and mortgaging the property herein conveyed whenever they are required and requested to do so by the association." This also means in pursuance and furtherance of the trust to maintain a school of general learning. If, however, the association can change the general nature of the trust, this could be done only by a majority vote at a regular meeting, and the complaint does not aver this. Kerr v. Hicks, supra. It could not abolish the trust, to which others have contributed funds.

[3] Under the acts of incorporation of the institute procured by the association, the powers of the latter are limited to the election of the trustees from time to time as therein specified. In effect, the association raised a fund with which it purchased property and appropriated it to be held by trustees to maintain and establish a school of general learning. The unincorporated association held no actual property interest therein, and can exercise no other control over it than through the medium of the election of the trustees, who are to manage said trust. If through such trustees the association should procure the sale of the property, how it could apply the proceeds might then come up for adjudication. But no individual church can ask the courts to order a sale for partition. The individual churches are not incorporated, and have no rights in the property which are the subject of partition among them. It does not appear what sum was raised by each of the respective churches, and there is no basis for the allegation of a cotenancy by the several churches in the property. Certainly one or more of the churches cannot at will defeat the action of the association by calling for a sale and division of the property. That would destroy the trust.

[4] If the individual churches were tenants in common, they could not procure an order for partition, for they are not in possession. Drew v. Clemmons, 55 N. C. 814; Wood v. Sugg, 91 N. C. 93, 49 Am. Rep. 639; Osborne v. Mull, 91 N. C. 207. Even if the individual churches should be held the cestuis que trustent, that would not entitle them to compel partition. Nichols v. Nichols, 28 Vt. 228, 67 Am. Dec. 712; 30 Cyc. 190, § 3, and notes. There is no analogy to the sale of a mill for partition because of the inherent difficulties of the cotenants operating it "turn about." Holmes v. Holmes, 55 N. C. 336. In that case there was no trust; and the property was run for the division of the profits among the cotenants. Nor is the case analogous to the division of church property upon a division of the church. Smith v. Swormstedt, 16 How. 288, 14 L. Ed. 942; Diocese v. Diocese, 102 N. C. 447, 9 S. E. 310, 3 L. R. A. 626. Here the property is held by incorporated trustees, and the association is not the beneficiary of the trust which is for the benefit of the colored youth, but occupies the position of supervising the trust through its power to elect the trustees, and there has been no division of the association calling for a division of the trustees to the respective fragments of a former association.

[5] If the association itself should disband, the duty would devolve upon the courts, under Rev. 3923, to provide, if this is charity (and if not, then under the general equity jurisdiction of the courts), for filling vacancies among the trustees as they shall occur from time to time so that the trust may not fail. Or the General Assembly might, in such case, amend the act of 1903, which provides for the method of electing trustees.

The demurrer that the complaint does not state a cause of action should have been sustained.

Action dismissed.

STATE v. WILSON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 158*)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence of a remark made to accused about three days before the homicide and of her threats against decedent made in reply thereto was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 293-296; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 274*)—EVIDENCE—CHARACTER OF ACCUSED—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF WITNESSES.

Witnesses testifying to the good character of female accused may be asked on cross-examination as to accused's reputation as to chastity, but questions as to specific acts of unchastity are not permissible, so that such witnesses were properly asked on the cross-examination whether it was not a fact that they had heard people say that accused was a prostitute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 965, 966; Dec. Dig. § 274.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

A witness testifying to the good character of accused was asked on cross-examination whether he had not heard people say that accused was a prostitute, and stated that he had heard talk of it, but that her character was about as good as the average negro, and another witness stated in reply to a question as to whether he had not frequently heard such talk that he had heard a few times that accused was a prostitute. Held, that the answers, if technically improper, could not have prejudiced accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3137-3143; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1163*)—APPEAL—BUREN OF SHOWING ERROR.

It must be shown on appeal that any error committed at trial could have reasonably affected the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3090-3099; Dec. Dig. § 1163.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 547*)—EVIDENCE AT FORMER TRIAL.

Revisal 1905, § 8205, provides that all examinations taken pursuant to the chapter shall be certified by the examining magistrate to the court at which the witness is bound to appear, and such examination may be used as evidence on accused's trial, if he were present at the taking thereof, and had opportunity to cross-examine the deposing witness, if such witness be dead, disabled, etc. Accused was first arrested for assault and tried before decedent's death, and the examining justice reduced decedent's testimony to writing and had it signed by him and delivered to the justice, who conducted accused's preliminary trial for murder, with directions to have it forwarded to the superior court for use in accused's trial for murder, and it was identified at trial by the justice who took it. Held, that there was a sufficient compliance with the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1237-1246; Dec. Dig. § 547.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 728*)—TRIAL—EXCEPTIONS—TIME OF TAKING.

An exception to improper argument must be taken when the argument is made, and is waived if not taken until the case is settled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1689; Dec. Dig. § 728.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 730*)—TRIAL—IMPROPER ARGUMENT—CURING IMPROPRIETY.

Improper remarks by the state's attorney in argument, to the effect that accused was a bad woman, and that people were afraid to testify against her, was cured by the trial court's statement, on objection being made, that the state's attorney could only argue the evidence, and that he recalled no evidence that the people were afraid to testify against accused, and that the jury should disregard the statement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1693; Dec. Dig. § 730.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1178*)—APPEAL—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—BRIEF.

Under Supreme Court rule 34 (140 N. C. 666, 66 S. E. ix), assignments of error not appearing in accused's brief are abandoned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, §§ 3011-3013; Dec. Dig. § 1178.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden County; Cline, Judge.

Mary Ann Wilson was convicted of second-degree murder, and she appeals. Affirmed.

W. M. Bond and E. F. Aydlott, for appellant. The Attorney General and T. H. Calvert, for the State.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The prisoner was convicted of murder in the second degree. It was in evidence that about three days before the homicide a remark was made to the prisoner, in response to which she made threats. The evidence of such threats was competent. State v. McKay, 150 N. C. 818, 63 S. E. 1059;

State v. Stratford, 149 N. C. 483, 62 S. E. 882. Evidence of the remark made to the prisoner which brought out the threat was admissible so far as it was connected with the threat. State v. Williams, 68 N. C. 60.

[2] Two witnesses for the prisoner testified that her reputation was good or very good. On cross-examination they were allowed to testify as to the general reputation of the prisoner as to a particular trait of character. In State v. Hairston, 121 N. C. 582, 28 S. E. 493, the court said: "A party introducing a witness as to character can only prove the general character of the person asked about. The witness of his own motion may say in what respect it is good or bad. He may have to do this in justice to himself—in other words, to tell the truth. As, for instance, if the party spoken of had a general bad character for other things, the witness could not truthfully say it was bad, nor that it was good, without qualification, or the opposite party may, on cross-examination, test the witness by asking him as to what it is bad for, what it is good for," etc. Bad repute as to chastity may be shown, but not specific acts of unchastity. State v. Effer, 85 N. C. 585. In the present case the witness Morris was asked on cross-examination, "Is it not a fact that you heard people say she was a prostitute?" to which he replied, "Have heard talk of it, but her character is about as good as the average negro." The other witness, having said her character was good, was asked on cross-examination, "Have you not heard it frequently said that she was a common woman and a prostitute?" to which he replied, "Have heard it, but not frequently; heard it some few times." We do not think these exceptions can be sustained. The answers were not prejudicial, and indeed were not excepted to. These questions come fairly within the rule in State v. Hairston, supra, which allows a cross-examination as to reputation of a particular trait, but not as to reputation of particular acts, which the state did not ask and which the replies do not give.

[3] If the reply could be held technically improper, we cannot see that it was prejudicial, or could have affected the verdict, and in such cases the tendency of all courts is against giving a new trial.

[4] It should reasonably appear that an error, if any, would have reasonably affected the result. Dr. Sawyer, a witness of the state, was asked the following: "If a person were suffering from heart trouble, would the chance of a fatal result by reason of such disease be increased or diminished from a shock such as you saw Jim Morrisette was suffering from when you visited him?" The question objected to was based upon conditions of heart trouble about which the prisoner and her witnesses had testified, and the shock which the witness himself had observed and testified to. It does not assume facts not in evidence, which is the ground of the appellant's exception.

[5] The prisoner was first arrested on the charge of an assault, and was tried before the death of the deceased. The justice of the peace reduced the testimony of the deceased at such trial to writing, and it was signed by the deceased. It was in evidence that this paper was delivered to the other justice of the peace on the preliminary trial before him of the prisoner for murder, with directions to deliver to the clerk of the superior court, and on the trial in the superior court the paper was identified by J. E. Cook, the justice of the peace who took down the evidence on the first trial. This was a sufficient compliance with Rev. § 3205. State v. Wilson, 24 Kan. 189, 36 Am. Rep. 257; Hart v. State, 15 Tex. App. 202, 49 Am. Rep. 188.

Assistant counsel for the state in his argument commented upon the character of the prisoner, saying that she was a bad woman, and that people were afraid to testify against her. Upon objection by the prisoner, the court told counsel he could only argue the testimony to the jury, and that he recalled no evidence about people being afraid to testify against her, and withdrew the remark from the jury, and directed them not to consider such statement.

[6] It appears that no exception was noted at the time, but the court permitted an exception to be made in stating the case. This was too late. An exception not taken at the time is waived, and the judge should not permit it to be made afterwards in settling the case. 2 Cyc. 714.

[7] Besides, the objectionable remark of counsel was cured by the ruling of the court and the instruction to the jury to disregard it. State v. Peterson, 149 N. C. 533, 63 S. E. 87; 4 A. & E. Enc. 450.

[8] The other assignments of error do not appear in the brief of counsel for the prisoner, and are held to be abandoned. Rule 34 (140 N. C. 666, 66 S. E. ix).

No error.

GREGORY v. PINNIX et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

1. PARTITION (§ 56*)—PLEADING—DENIAL OF COTENANCY—"NON TENENT INSIMUL."

A denial in the answer in partition of the allegations of the petition that petitioner is a tenant in common with defendant, and is seised in fee, raised an issue of fact, being equivalent to a plea of non tenent insimul by which defendant denies that he and plaintiff are tenants in common.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 160, 161; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 34*)—CONSTRUCTION.

Under the Code, pleadings should be liberally construed, with a view to substantial justice, and not strictly construed against the pleader as at common law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 68-75; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 747*)—EFFECT AS ESTOPPEL—PARTITION.

Since, under Revisal 1905, § 2487, only tenants in common may institute partition proceedings, a judgment in partition works an estoppel as to title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 747.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 960*)—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—TIME OF FILING PLEADINGS.

The action of the trial court in permitting answers to be filed which had been stricken by the clerk because not filed in time is not reviewable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3825-3833; Dec. Dig. § 960.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden County; Cline, Judge.

Partition proceedings by J. W. Gregory against Hannah C. Pinnix and others. From an order setting aside an order of sale made by the clerk and directing the issues of fact to be decided, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed:

This is a proceeding to sell lands for partition, heard in the superior court, on appeal from the clerk of Camden county.

The petitioner alleges, among other things:

"(1) That he is a tenant in common, is seised in fee, and is the owner of the following described lands, lying and being in the county and state aforesaid, situated in the jurisdiction of this court and bounded as follows: * * * (17) That the interest of your petitioner in said land is as follows: $\frac{201}{1200}$. (18) That the interests of the defendants are as follows: Mrs. Hannah C. Pinnix, $\frac{100}{1200}$ undivided interest; N. M. Ferebee, $\frac{333}{1200}$ undivided interest. That plaintiff is advised, believes, and alleges that John J. Old, John Hinton, Elizabeth Old, Lovey Grisham, Louisa Old, Hollowell Old, Jr., James Old, the persons named in count 2 as heirs at law of Hollowell Old, are dead, and that their heirs at law jointly own $\frac{422}{1200}$ of said property, viz.: That the heirs at law of John J. Old, who are unknown to your petitioner, jointly own $\frac{9}{1200}$. That the heirs at law or devisees of John Hinton, who are, as your petitioner is informed and believes, Mary F. Hinton, Sophia L. Sawyer, whose husband is Lee Sawyer, Charles L. Hinton, E. V. Hinton, W. E. Hinton, and R. L. Hinton, jointly own $\frac{81}{1200}$. That the heirs at law of Lovey Grisham, who are unknown to your petitioner, jointly own $\frac{9}{1200}$. That the heirs at law of Hollowell Old, who are unknown to your petitioner, jointly own $\frac{81}{1200}$. That the heirs at law of James Old, who, as your petitioner is informed and believes, are Livius L. Old, Lula J. Walker (whose husband is L. B. Walker), James H. Old, Eva L. Ferebee (whose husband is E. D. Ferebee), Dalsey E. Brooke (whose husband is T. L. Brooke), James E. Smith, James E. Old, Edward J. Smith, Mary M. Smith, Augustus C. Smith, Earl Smith, Roy Smith, Hulda F. Smith (whose husband is ——— Smith), and Samuel F. Old, jointly own ^{81/1296} thereof." These allegations are denied in the answers, and, in addition to a denial, the defendants allege that, if the petitioner had a deed for any part of the land described in the petition, he owned no beneficial interest therein, but held the title, if any he had, for the Richmond Cedar Works.

In this condition of the pleadings his honor held that issues of fact were raised, and directed that the same be tried before a jury, to which the petitioner excepted. His honor also permitted certain answers to be filed, which had been stricken out by the clerk, because not filed within the time prescribed by law, and the petitioner excepted. The appeal is by the petitioner from the order setting aside the order of sale made by the clerk, and directing that the issues of fact be passed on.

J. C. B. Ehringhaus and G. W. Ward, for appellant. J. K. Wilson, W. A. Worth, E. F. Aydllett, and J. C. Biggs, for appellees.

ALLEN, J. [1] The ruling of his honor that the denial in the answer of the allegation in the petition that the petitioner is a tenant in common with the defendants, and is seised in fee, raises an issue of fact would not be questioned, but for certain expressions in several of our decisions, which considered without reference to the facts in the cases and the history of proceedings in partition would render it doubtful. The first of these cases is Purvis v. Wilson, 50 N. C. 23, 69 Am. Dec. 773, in which Pearson, C. J., says that the plea by the defendant in partition of non tenant insimul is the plea of sole seisin, and that this raises the general issue, and this is followed by Wright v. McCormick, 69 N. C. 15, in which the same judge says: "The plea of 'sole seisin must be put in before the order for partition is made, otherwise it is waived, and the parties are for the purposes of the proceeding taken to be seised as tenants in common." In another case—Huneycutt v. Brooks, 118 N. C. 792, 21 S. E. 558—Furches, J., says: "Plaintiffs allege that they are tenants in common with defendants in said lands. The said defendants answer and deny that plaintiffs are the owners of the lands mentioned in their complaint, and plead 'non tenant insimul' (sole seisin in themselves), which is the 'general issue' in a proceeding for partition." And in Graves v. Barrett, 126 N. C. 269, 35 S. E. 539, the present Chief Justice makes substantially the same statement: "But in a petition for partition title is not in issue, unless the defendants put it in issue by pleading 'sole seisin.'" In Purvis v. Wilson and in Huneycutt v. Brooks sole seisin was pleaded, and the question of the effect of the denial of the allegation that the petitioner and the defendant were tenants in common was not raised. In Wright v. McCormick it does not appear that the defendant denied the tenancy in common, and in Graves v. Barrett there was no plea of sole seisin, and the court approved the proceeding in which issues were submitted to the jury upon a denial of the cotenancy. It appears, therefore, that the ruling of his honor is not in conflict with the decisions relied on by the petitioner, and the appearance of conflict doubtless arose by treating the plea of non tenant insimul as synonymous with the plea of sole seisin, because it is more comprehensive and includes it.

In 2 Sellon's Practice, p. 314, the author says, speaking of pleadings in partition: "To the declaration there can be no plea in abatement, since Stat. 8 & 9 W. 3, c. 31, f. 3. Nor shall the writ abate by the death of the defendant. And, if he pleads in bar, he can plead no other plea than non tenant insimul, for every other plea in bar is tantamount to non tenant insimul, upon which plea issue may be taken, and the parties proceed to trial as in other cases." The definition of plea non tenant insimul, as given by Bouvier, is: "A plea to an action in partition, by which the defendant denies that he holds the property which is the subject of the suit, together with the complainant or plaintiff." And by Black: "A plea to an action in partition, by which the defendant denies that he and the plaintiff are joint tenants of the estate in question." The plea is, in substance, a denial of the tenancy in common, as appears from the following form: "And the said C. D. by G. H., his attorney, comes, and says that he did not hold the premises in said petition of the said A. B. set forth, together with the said A. B. at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in this cause, as alleged in said petition of the said A. B.; and of this he, the said C. D., puts himself upon the country." Tillinghast Forms, 625. It would seem, therefore, that the denial of the cotenancy, while not technically the plea of "non tenant insimul," is substantially the same, and at this day, when substance is not sacrificed to form, would be held to permit the same defenses under it if the question was to be determined at common law.

[2] The construction of the pleadings is not, however, controlled by the rules of the common law, but by the code system, and as was said in Stokes v. Taylor, 104 N. C. 395, 10 S. E. 566, and approved in Brewer v. Wynne, 154 N. C. 471, 70 S. E. 948: "The rule of the common law was that every pleading should be construed strongly against the pleader. The code system is just the reverse. In the construction of a pleading for, the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations shall be liberally construed, with a view of substantial justice between the parties." The difference between the two is so well stated, with reference to the plea under consideration, in 30 Cyc. 225, in an article by Mr. Freeman, the editor of the American Decisions and the American State Reports and the author of a treatise on Cotenancy & Partition: "The plea of non tenant insimul constituted the general issue in actions of partition at common law. Every allowable plea which could be interposed amounted to non tenant insimul. This plea put in issue all the material allegations of the complaint, and seems to have been so adequate as to authorize defendant to place in evidence every conceivable fact which, if proved, would prevent plaintiff's recovery. Under the code rules of pleading, the general issue is made by a general denial. Therefore such a denial or any form, either of allegation or of denial, which necessarily negatives the idea that plaintiff and defendant were cotenants at the commencement of the action, must be sufficient where the only object of the pleader is to defeat plaintiff's claim to partition, and anything less than this must be insufficient." The rules of civil procedure are applicable to special proceedings (Rev. § 710), and one of these rules is that an issue arises on the pleadings when a material fact is maintained by one party and controverted by the other (Rev. § 544).

[3] The materiality of the allegation that the petitioner is a tenant in common with the defendant is apparent, as the right to institute the proceeding for partition is conferred only on tenants in common (Rev. § 2487), and it is upon this ground that judgments in partition are held to estop as to the title. Armfield v. Moore, 44 N. C. 164; Carter v. White, 134 N. C. 474, 46 S. E. 983, 101 Am. St. Rep. 853; Buchanan v. Harrington, 152 N. C. 334, 67 S. E. 747, 136 Am. St. Rep. 828. In the last case Justice Manning says: "We apprehend, however, that whenever plaintiff alleges himself to be the owner in fee, or of any specified estate, or avers any other ultimate fact under which he is entitled to relief, it becomes the duty of the defendant either to concede or take issue with the allegation or averment, and that the judgment in the action will be as conclusive as it would upon a like issue in any other action." We therefore conclude that his honor held correctly that the denial of the cotenancy raised an issue of fact for the determination of the jury.

[4] We are also of opinion that his honor had the power to permit the answers to be filed, and that the exercise of his discretion is not reviewable. Faison v. Williams, 121 N. C. 152, 28 S. E. 188. In this case the court says: "It is unnecessary to consider whether the judge could reverse the action of the clerk in refusing leave to amend, for the act of 1887, c. 276 (amending section 255 of the Code), provides that, whenever a cause is sent up to the judge for any ground whatever, the 'judge shall have jurisdiction,' and may either fully determine the cause himself or make orders therein and send it back to be proceeded in by the clerk."

Upon an examination of the record, we find no error.

McCULLERS v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF WAKE COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 21, 1912.)

1. HEALTH (§ 7*)—COUNTY SUPERINTENDENTS—APPOINTMENT—POWER—"FAIL TO ELECT."

Laws 1911, c. 62, § 9, which provides that, if a county board of health shall "fail to elect" a county superintendent within two months of the time fixed for such election, the secretary of the state board shall appoint, gives the power of appointment to the state secretary when the county board of health permits the office to remain vacant for the two months, and the state secretary properly made an appointment where the only appointee named within that time by the county board declined to qualify; the act requiring a choosing and induction into office of the superintendent within that period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Health, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. OFFICERS (§ 80*)—COUNTY BOARD OF HEALTH—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Laws 1911, c. 62, § 9, which provides that county boards of health shall be composed in part of the chairman of the county commissioners, the mayor, and superintendent of schools, does not violate Const. art. 14, § 7, which forbids the holding of two offices by one person at the same time as it only provides the duties of such boards shall be performed by such persons ex officio.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 37-43; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

3. HEALTH (§ 7*)—COUNTY SUPERINTENDENTS—APPOINTMENT—NECESSITY FOR FIXING FEES.

Title to the office of county superintendent of health under appointment by the secretary of the state board of health under Laws 1911, c. 62, § 9, is not affected by the secretary's failure to fix the appointee's fees as required by the act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Health, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. MANDAMUS (§ 3*)—WHEN REMEDY LIES—QUO WARRANTO AS REMEDY.

Mandamus, and not quo warranto, is the proper remedy to compel county commissioners to admit plaintiff to the office of county superintendent of health, where no other person has an equitable title to the office.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 10-34; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Peebles, Judge.

Mandamus by J. J. L. McCullers against the Board of Commissioners of Wake County. From a judgment dismissing the proceedings, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The judgment appealed from is as follows:

"This cause coming on to be heard by me in chambers at Raleigh Thursday and Friday, November 23 and 24, 1911. After hearing complaint, answer, affidavits, and argument of counsel on both sides, by consent of both sides I took the papers with me in order to give the matter further consideration. Having given the matter further consideration, I render the following judgment:

"(1) I find and hold that the pleadings raise no issue of fact requiring the intervention of a jury, and I therefore overrule the defendant's motion for a trial by jury. To this ruling defendants except.

"(2) I find that the facts contained in sections 1 to 8 of complaint, both included, are true.

"(3) It appearing from the complaint that the county board of health was organized as is required by section 9, c. 62, of the Public Laws of 1911, and elected J. J. L. McCullers county superintendent of health, that the contingency upon which W. S. Rankin as secretary of state board of health was authorized to act never happened, and the appointment of plaintiff by said Rankin was void. I also find and hold that said Rankin did not fix the fees as is directed in section 9 of said chapter 62.

"(3) Article 9, § 2, of state Constitution, forbids the holding of two offices by one man at the same time. If the act had provided that D. T. Johnson, James I. Johnson, and Z. V. Judd should constitute the board of health for Wake county, their acceptance of said office would have rendered vacant the office of chairman of the board of county commissioners, office of mayor of Raleigh, and office of superintendent of public schools for Wake county. The General Assembly seems to have linked the office of superintendent of the board of health for Wake county with the other three offices and made them inseparable, and for that reason I think and hold that section 9 of Public Laws of 1911, c. 62, is unconstitutional and void.

"(4) I find the facts stated in section 11 of the answer to be true. I hold that Dr. R. S. Stevens is not a usurper, but is in the office of superintendent of health for Wake under color of title, and is a de facto officer, and cannot be ousted without a day in court, and hence I hold that mandamus is not the proper remedy. And I therefore dismiss these proceedings at the costs of the plaintiff to be taxed by the clerk."

Aycock & Winston and Bart M. Gatling, for appellant. B. C. Beckwith and R. N. Simms, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The plaintiff derives his title to the office of superintendent of health of Wake county by appointment of the secretary of the state board of health, under chapter 62, § 9, Public Laws of 1911, which provides that, if the county board of health of any county shall fail to elect a county superintendent of health within two calendar months of the time fixed by the statute when such election shall take place, the said secretary of the state board shall appoint. The defendant board of commissioners passed a resolution undertaking to appoint a superintendent of health, and to fix his salary. In consequence of such conflict between the two boards and the failure to fix his compensation, the plaintiff appeared before the board of health at its next meeting, and declined to qualify as superintendent of health for Wake county. The board of health having failed to elect a superintendent for more than two calendar months, the secretary of the state board, W. S. Rankin, on July 17, 1911, appointed plaintiff the superintendent of health and quarantine officer for Wake county, and fixed his fees and compensation, claiming to have done so in accordance with sections 9 and 16 of said act. The plaintiff qualified as such, and the defendant board declined to recognize him and to pass on, audit, and approve his bill for fees as required by section 9. His honor found the facts as stated in sections 1 to 8, inclusive, of the complaint to be true, but it is unnecessary to state them more fully.

[1] 1. It is contended that the contingency had not arisen when the secretary could lawfully appoint. The statute requires the board of health to meet and elect on the second Monday in May, 1911, and thereafter on the second Monday of January in the odd years of the calendar. A majority of the board of health voted for plaintiff, but he refused to qualify. It was the duty of said board to at once elect another person. This it failed to do, so that the office remained vacant for more than two months up to the time the state secretary made the appointment. We think the true intent and meaning of the statute is to give such appointment to the state secretary when the board of health for any reason permits the office to remain vacant for two calendar months from the date fixed by the statute in this case the second Monday in May. The public interest requires that this particular office shall have an incumbent to discharge its duties and the evident intention of the General Assembly was to prevent the office being unfilled for a longer period than the time named. We think the learned counsel for the defendants place a too restricted construction upon the meaning and purport of the words "shall fail to elect," as used in the statute. We think the General Assembly meant the choosing and induction into office of a superintendent of health within the two calendar months. State v. Wilroy, 32 N. C. 329. If this were not so, then a hostile board of health could keep the office vacant by electing a person who would not qualify and the purpose of the General Assembly be entirely defeated.

[2] 2. But the real controversy in this case, which has been argued with much force by counsel on both sides, is the constitutionality of section 9 of the act. The power of the secretary of the state board to make the appointment is conferred by said section, and, if it is void in toto, then it is contended that plaintiff's title to the office fails. The learned judge of the superior court took this view, and in his judgment expressed it in these words: "Article 14, § 7, of state Constitution, forbids the holding of two offices by one man at the same time. If the act had provided that D. T. Johnson, James I. Johnson, and Z. V. Judd should constitute the board of health for Wake county, their acceptance of said office would have rendered vacant the office of chairman of the board of county commissioners, office of mayor of Raleigh, and office of superintendent of public schools for Wake county. The General Assembly seems to have linked the office of superintendent of the board of health for Wake county with the other three offices and made them inseparable and for that reason I think and hold that section 9 of Public Laws of 1911, chapter 62, is unconstitutional and void."

It appears that the persons named above are, respectively, chairman of the board of commissioners of Wake county, mayor of Raleigh, and county superintendent of schools for Wake county. Chapter 62, Laws of 1911, appears to be a comprehensive revisal of all preceding laws. It covers the entire subject of public health, both state and county. It first provides for the establishment of a North Carolina board of health, which is to be made up by the election by the Medical Society of North Carolina of four members, and by the appointment of the Governor of five. Section 9 constitutes the county board of health of the chairman of the board of commissioners, the mayor of the county town, and, when there is no mayor, the clerk of the superior court, the county superintendent of schools, together with two physicians to be elected by those three public officials.

We are unable to concur in the conclusion that the statute is violative of article 14, § 7, of our state Constitution. It is not a case where one person holds two offices at the same time, but rather the case where the duties of a member of the county board of health are to be performed ex officio by the chairman of the board of commissioners, the mayor, and the superintendent of schools. These duties cannot be discharged by the individuals named in his honor's judgment any longer than during the period they hold the offices of chairman, mayor, and superintendent. The right to discharge such duties is not conferred upon them as individuals, but is a part of the duties of the one office already held by each.

The case of Barnhill v. Thompson, 122 N. C. 493, 29 S. E. 720, does not sustain the contention of the defendants. The facts in that case show that the board of education of Bladen county was elected by the board of commissioners of said county, the clerk of the superior court, and the register of deeds, under the existing law, sitting with them. This body elected the defendant Thompson, who was a member of the board of county commissioners, a member of the board of education, and he undertook to exercise the duties of both offices. This court held that he was ineligible to discharge the duties of county commissioner; that, when he accepted the second office, he thereby vacated the one he already held. His right to act as a member of the board of education was not questioned. In the case at bar the persons named in the judgment have not been elected or appointed to any other office, but the added duties of the county board of health have been placed upon the offices they already held, and, as long as they retain such offices, they must discharge such duties, and, when they vacate such offices, their successors must continue to perform them. By discharging the duties of the board of health and acting as members of that board those gentlemen did not vacate the offices they already held, for the moment they resigned or vacated such offices they at once became ineligible to continue as members of the board of health. For this reason they could have no right to elect which office they would take, the offices they held, or membership on the board of health. This legislation is not novel in North Carolina, nor, indeed, in the other states of the Union. In 1901 the Legislature passed a similar act—section 4444 of the Revisal. That act provides that two physicians shall be selected—one by the chairman of the board of county commissioners, and one by the mayor of the county town, who, together with the board of commissioners, shall constitute the county sanitary committee, of which committee the chairman of the board of county commissioners shall be ex officio chairman. We also have the familiar case of the Governor who is made by law a trustee of the university of the state and chairman of the board, and is required to perform these duties and also act as chairman of the executive committee of the trustees. Similar legislation is to be found in other states having a constitutional provision similar to ours. In West Virginia the law requires the Governor, Auditor, Treasurer, superintendent of schools, and Attorney General to serve on the board of public works, and prescribes the duties of said board. The Court of Appeals in an elaborate opinion held the act valid, saying, in substance, it simply prescribes additional powers and duties to be performed by officers already elected by the people, and that it does not amount to an appointment to an office created by law, but that it only amounts to requiring the officers of the executive department by virtue of their respective offices to which they have been elected by the people to act as members of the board of public works; that it, in substance, simply annexes additional powers and duties to their respective offices. The court goes on to say "that it is a time-honored usage in Virginia, and continued in West Virginia, to cause certain duties which might have been assigned to officers specially appointed or elected for the purpose to be performed by officers already appointed for general service." Bridges v. Shallcross, 6 W. Va. 578, citing Wales v. Belcher, 3 Pick. (Mass.) 508. The question is considered by the Court of Appeals of Virginia in Sharpe v. Robertson, 46 Va. 518. In that case certain duties were assigned the circuit judges to be performed in the Court of Appeals and special compensation fixed by the General Assembly. Judge Baldwin, speaking for the court, says: "But the act in question creates no new judicial offices and appoints no additional judges, but merely attaches new duties for offices existing to be performed by the incumbents within the constitutional power of the Legislature." The subject is discussed by the Supreme Court of Texas in Powell v. Wilson, 16 Tex. 59, and the views we have expressed herein are fully supported. The court says: "It cannot be doubted that it is competent for the Legislature to create an office which shall be that of a substitute, or mere auxiliary to another, the duties of which shall commence and consist in performing the duties of the principal office." The subject is elaborately discussed by the Supreme Court of Florida in Wilkins v. Connors, 27 Fla. 329, 9 South. 7, and it is held that the statute making it the duty of the sheriff of Escambia county to act as city marshal of Pensacola is not obnoxious to the Constitution of that state, declaring that "no person shall hold or perform the functions of more than one office under the government of this state at the same time." In Louisiana the same view is taken in State v. Somnier, 33 La. Ann. 237, where it is held that the act providing that the clerk of the district court shall be ex officio member of the jury commission does not confer an additional office upon the incumbent of the clerk's office in violation of the constitutional restriction. We could multiply authorities in support of these views, but deem it unnecessary.

It is true, as contended, that section 9 uses this expression, "the term of office of members of the county board of health shall terminate on the first Monday in January in the odd years of the calendar, and while on duty they shall receive $4 per diem to be paid by the county." The former law declared their term of office to be coterminous with that of the commissioners with whom they serve, and, when on duty, they shall receive the same compensation as is received by county commissioners. Evidently the language of the new act in reference to term of office applies only to the two physicians who are chosen as members of the county board of health by the chairman of the board of county commissioners, by the mayor, and by the superintendent of schools. The change in the verbiage is due to the fact that there is a difference in the terms of the ex officio members of the county board of health. The county superintendent of schools goes out of office on the first Monday in July of each year; the mayor of the county town, as a rule, goes out in May or June; while the terms of the county commissioners expire in December. It evidently was not intended to either leave a vacancy in the health board or to shorten or lengthen the terms of the ex officio members. The person holding the office of county commissioner when his successor is elected as chairman of the board of county commissioners on the first Monday in December would go off the county board of health and the succeeding chairman of the board of county commissioners would eo instanti become a member of the county board of health. The same is true of the mayor and of the superintendent of public schools.

Our conclusion being that the entire section of the act is a valid exercise of legislative power, it is unnecessary to discuss the powers of the health board as a de facto organization with a colorable right to discharge the duties imposed upon it.

[3] 3. It is contended that the secretary of the state board did not fix the fees as required by the act. We fail to see how this affects the plaintiff's title to the office. It is plain that the secretary undertook to fix the fees to which plaintiff would be entitled, but whether he observed the standard laid down by the statute is not for us to determine in this proceeding. The statute (section 9) declares that the compensation of the superintendent of health for the county, when fixed by said secretary, shall be "in proportion to the salaries paid by other counties for the same service, having in view the amount of taxes collected by said county." And the same section declares that "all expenditures shall be approved by the board of county commissioners before being paid." It thus becomes the duty of the board of commissioners to pass on and audit the plaintiff's accounts for services, and to determine whether they are within the bounds fixed by the statute. The approval of the defendant board is necessary to the payment of plaintiff's account, and, while the courts will not undertake to compel the county commissioners to approve them, they will require them to consider the account and to pass on it in good faith in the exercise of a sound judgment as to whether or not the services as charged are warranted by the statute.

[4] 4. It is contended that mandamus is not the proper remedy, but that quo warranto is. This contention is based upon the theory that one Dr. Stevens is in possession of the office of "county superintendent of health" for Wake county, and exercising its functions. We find nothing in the record that gives Dr. Stevens even a colorable title to the office, or indicates that he is in possession of it. The resolution of the county commissioners does not purport to elect him superintendent of health or even to induct him into any office established by law. If he is in the service of the county commissioners under their resolution to employ a "county physician" (the term used in the resolution), then he is merely a contract physician performing services which should be performed by the plaintiff, and is not exercising the functions of a public office. He has not even a colorable title to the office of "county superintendent of health." He is not a party to this proceeding, and was very properly omitted.

That mandamus is a proper remedy to enforce plaintiff's demands is established by abundant authority. Moore v. Jones, 76 N. C. 185; Doyle v. Raleigh, 89 N. C. 133, 45 Am. Rep. 677; Lyon v. Commissioners, 120 N. C. 239, 26 S. E. 929; Koonce v. Commissioners, 106 N. C. 192, 10 S. E. 1038.

We assume that, when this opinion is handed down, it will be unnecessary for plaintiff to sue out the writ, but, in case it is, the plaintiff may apply for a peremptory writ of mandamus to the judge of the superior court residing in or holding the courts of the sixth judicial district.

The costs of this appeal will be paid by defendant board of commissioners.

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by William Spindler against A. M. Hamilton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Dismissed.

Hubbard & Hubbard, for plaintiff in error. James W. Ewing, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. The order, adjourning the term of court at which the judgment in this action was rendered, brought up by a writ of certiorari, at the instance of the defendant in error, proves the adjournment to have occurred more than 30 days before the bill of exceptions, containing the evidence and rulings complained of, was allowed and signed; and the assignments of error relate solely to matters not apparent upon the record otherwise than as shown by the alleged bill of exceptions. Hence, if this paper is no part of the record, the assignments of error fail for lack of foundation therein.

[1, 2] The application for the writ of certiorari to bring up the adjourning order was resisted on the ground of waiver by submission of the case, without a motion to dismiss; but the objection was overruled and the writ awarded. This ruling, and the dismissal now inevitable, the papers relied upon as a bill of exception having been obtained too late, are justified by numerous precedents of dismissal sua sponte on discovery, after submission, of lack of bills of exception necessary to bring into the record the subject-matter of the assignments of error, among which are Richardson v. McConanghey, 52 W. Va. 372, 43 S. E. 124; Craft v. Mann, 46 W. Va. 478, 33 S. E. 260; Griffith v. Corrothers, 42 W. Va. 59, 24 S. E. 569; Dudley v. Barrett, 58 W. Va. 235, 52 S. E. 100.

As to the form of the order of this court, under the circumstances here disclosed, our decisions are in conflict. In some instances the judgments have been affirmed (Lambert v. Gallipolis, 64 W. Va. 105, 60 S. E. 1099; Dudley v. Barrett, 58 W. Va. 235, 52 S. E. 100; McKendree v. Shelton, 51 W. Va. 516, 41 S. E. 909), and in others the writs have been dismissed as having been improvidently awarded (Richardson v. McConanghey, 52 W. Va. 372, 43 S. E. 124, and Craft v. Mann, 46 W. Va. 478, 33 S. E. 260). As this court finds, on its examination of the record, no question it can decide has been raised, we think the case is analogous to those in which there is no jurisdiction and those in which jurisdiction has failed, and so falls under the latter rule. In reality, the judgment has not been impeached and is not reviewed in disposing of the writ.

The order will be one of dismissal of the writ as having been improvidently awarded.

NOTE BY BRANNON, P. In my opinion the judgment of this court should be one of affirmance, with the usual damages and costs—not a dismissal without damages and costs. The writ of error is not without jurisdiction. It brought the case into this court to be disposed of on its record. It was submitted, not on any motion, but for decision. The defendant was compelled to defend, and now, because his adversary's bill of execution was made too late, he is denied damages and costs. The fixed rule is that a judgment is free of error, unless error is shown. Error not appearing, that presumption rules. Todd & Smith v. Gates, 20 W. Va. 464; Griffith v. Corrothers, 42 W. Va. 59, 24 S. E. 569; Dudley v. Barrett, 58 W. Va. 237, 52 S. E. 100; Furbee v. Shay, 46 W. Va. 736, 34 S. E. 746. Code of 1906, c. 135, § 26, expressly requires this court, if no error appears, to affirm. If our cases are not harmonious, we should follow the statute. The defendant in error has by another statute right to damages and costs. It is a property right under Code, c. 135, § 27.

Bill by Fannie J. Fuller and others against Bettie F. Edens. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. D. Littlepage and Linn & Byrne, for appellant. A. M. Belcher, for appellees.

ROBINSON, J. This appeal is one from a decree setting aside a tax deed and annulling subsequent conveyances of the real estate to parties having notice of the invalidity of the tax purchase and deed.

[1] The case involves this question: Does the husband acquire good title to the wife's land by becoming a purchaser thereof at tax sale and taking a tax deed therefor? The authorities are unanimous in answering the question in the negative. "It is a general rule that neither husband nor wife can purchase the other's land at a tax sale." 37 Cyc. 1350. The rule is approved by leading authors. Black on Tax Titles, § 286; Minor on Tax Titles, 66, 67. The adjudicated cases uphold the principle. Laton v. Balcom, 64 N. H. 92, 6 Atl. 37, 10 Am. St. Rep. 381; Burns v. Byrne, 45 Iowa, 285; Herrin v. Henry, 75 Ark. 273, 87 S. W. 430; Ward v. Nestell, 113 Mich. 185, 71 N. W. 593; Robinson v. Lewis, 68 Miss. 60, 8 South. 258, 10 L. R. A. 101, 24 Am. St. Rep. 254; Warner v. Broquet, 54 Kan. 649, 39 Pac. 228; Peck v. Ayres, 79 Kan. 457, 100 Pac. 283. Indeed we are not disposed to deal with the subject further than to quote approvingly the following: "It would be a startling doctrine that a husband may possess and enjoy the profits of his wife's real estate, neglect to pay the taxes, purchase the property at the sale for the delinquency, and acquire a valid title. Such a refusal or neglect to pay taxes would be a fraud upon his wife, and would vitiate the title acquired." Burns v. Byrne, supra.

[2] The husband conveyed to his second wife the tax title which he obtained to the land of his first wife before her death. This he accomplished by the use of the father of the second wife as an intermediary. He conveyed to her father, and the latter on the same day conveyed to her. It is submitted that the court could not annul these subsequent conveyances. Clearly, it could do so. The grantees of the invalid tax title had notice of its invalidity. They had notice by the record. Besides the whole transaction reflects an effort by fraud and collusion to put the property of the first wife beyond the reach of her children, so as to be beneficial to the second wife. Under all the circumstances we may reasonably infer that these subsequent grantees had actual notice. "One who takes a conveyance of a tax title can claim no benefit from it if he had actual knowledge of facts which render it invalid, or if the records show on their face fatal defects or irregularities." 87 Cyc. 1485.

[3] This case is not of the character of those in which it is necessary for the bill to tender the taxes. The husband's marital duty was to pay the taxes for the wife. His making the tax purchase was a payment of the taxes by her. After her death it was his legal duty to pay them as tenant by the curtesy. Why should a tender be made under such circumstances? No taxes are due from the plaintiff heirs of the first wife, who inherited the real estate. Then why is a tender essential? The rule requiring tender presupposes an obligation to pay.

The decree is manifestly a proper one in the premises. It will be affirmed.

(137 Ga. 586)

COWART et al. v. FENDER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENUE (§§ 18, 22*)—MONEY RECEIVED (§ 18*)—DOMICILE OF PARTIES—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where several persons conspire to defraud one of his money without consideration, but do not jointly receive the money so obtained, but in different amounts and on different dates, suit may be brought in tort jointly against the defendants in the county of the residence of either of the tort-feasors (the act of one being the act of all) to recover the amount of money so secured; or, waiving the tort in such case, the action may be brought in assumpsit for money had and received, in the county where each defendant may reside, and the plaintiff may recover of each defendant the amount received by him. In the latter case the recovery cannot be had against all the defendants jointly, but must be from each separately.

(a) In such case, evidence of conspiracy and fraud is admissible only to show that the person receiving the money is not entitled to keep it, but is bound in good conscience and equity to return it to the person from whom it was received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. §§ 18, 22*; Money Received, Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—TITLE TO MONEY PAID.

There was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the jury that the title to the money paid the firm of Powell & Kendall was in the plaintiff.

3. TRIAL (§ 165*)—NONSUIT—DETERMINATION OF MOTION—CODEFENDANTS.

Where a joint action was brought against two or more persons, in assumpsit for money had and received to the plaintiff's use, and at the close of the plaintiff's testimony the defendants moved for a nonsuit as to all the defendants, it was not error to refuse the nonsuit as to all of the defendants, if the case was made out as to some of the defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 165.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 970*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

It is within the sound discretion of the court to determine when the foundation has been laid for secondary evidence; and the exercise of such discretion will not be controlled, unless it is abused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3849-3851; Dec. Dig. § 970.*]

5. PARTNERSHIP (§ 44*)—EXISTENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in an action for money had and received, one alleges a partnership as an essential fact necessary to a recovery, the burden is on the party affirming it to prove the existence of the partnership, and it is error in such case for the court to charge the jury: "Where the partnership is denied, the opposite party is only required to present sufficient evidence to raise the presumption of the existence of the partnership."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; J. H. Merrill, Judge.

Action by J. F. Fender against J. S. Cowart and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Shipp & Kline, W. A. Covington, and J. R. Pottle, for plaintiffs in error. Denmark & Griffin, E. K. Wilcox, and T. H. Parker, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. The plaintiff contracted with the firm of Powell & Kendall, alleged to be composed of Charles J. Kendall, M. M. Kendall, and D. B. L. Powell, to purchase a certain "turpentine farm," and paid to that firm $12,000 as part of the purchase money. It was alleged that the plaintiff was induced to enter into the trade by false and fraudulent representations of M. M. Kendall and W. C. Cunningham, knowingly made, and that the firm of Cowart & Cunningham (composed of said Cunningham and J. S. Cowart) were simply confederating with Powell and Kendall to obtain money from the plaintiff upon the false and fraudulent pretense that the last-named firm had a valid title and lawful right to sell him the property, which neither firm had; the title to the property being in the Moye Naval Stores Company. The firm of Cowart & Cunningham had an option or contract of purchase with the owners. They contracted to sell to Powell & Kendall, who in turn made an agreement to sell to the plaintiff. The evidence showed that M. M. Kendall, at the request of Powell & Kendall, or one of its members, was requested by that firm to aid them in making the sale to the plaintiff, and was promised for his services one-third of the profits arising from such sale. Of the $12,000 paid by the plaintiff to Powell & Kendall, $8,000 was by them turned over to the firm of Cowart & Cunningham, and the remaining $4,000 Powell & Kendall divided, one-third to each of the members of that firm, and one-third to M. M. Kendall for his services in connection with the sale to the plaintiff. After the failure of the parties to finally consummate the sale, the plaintiff brought a joint suit against the two firms named, in assumpsit for money had and received, to recover the $12,000 paid out by him. M. M. Kendall, W. C. Cunningham, and J. S. Cowart each filed a special plea, averring that he did not belong to the respective firm of which he was alleged to be a member, and the issues as to partnership were submitted to the jury along with the entire case. The following verdict was returned and made the judgment of the court: "We, the jury, find in favor of the plaintiff, J. F. Fender, against each and all of the defendants, Powell & Kendall, a firm composed of M. M. Kendall, O. J. Kendall, and D. B. L. Powell, and Cunningham & Cowart, a firm composed of W. H. C. Cunningham and J. S. Cowart, the total sum of $12,000, with interest from November 26, 1905, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum therefrom." The defendants filed a motion for a new trial, and excepted to the order of the court overruling it, also assigning error in the bill of exceptions on certain pendente lite rulings made by the court. The motion for a new trial contained numerous grounds, and only those material to be considered under the direction we deem proper to give the case are hereinafter referred to.

[1] The main question in this case is: Was the action properly brought against all the defendants jointly, and in the county of the residence of one of the defendants? We think not. The plaintiffs are not suing in tort for damages against all the defendants as joint tort-feasors, where all would be jointly liable; but they waive the tort, and sue the defendants in assumpsit for money had and received, on the implied contract to refund the money, which in good conscience and equity they are supposed to return. Where an action is brought in tort, every one who participated in the tort is liable as a joint tort-feasor, and the act of one is the act of all. But the plaintiff in this case waives the tort and does not sue for damages, but sues in assumpsit against all the defendants jointly for the recovery of the money alleged to have been paid by him to them. In the latter case, the rule is different from the former, and the act of one is not the act of all; and a joint action can be maintained only against defendants who have jointly received the money. Limited Inv. Ass'n v. Glendale Inv. Ass'n, 99 Wis. 54, 74 N. W. 683; Manahan v. Gibbons, 19 Johns. (N. Y.) 427; Ward v. Hood, 124 Ala. 570, 27 South. 245, 82 Am. St. Rep. 205; Murphy v. Bidwell, 52 Mich. 487, 18 N. W. 230; Nat. Trust Co. v. Gleason, 77 N. Y. 400, 408, 33 Am. Rep. 632; Shepardson v. Rowland, 28 Wis. 108; Simmons v. Spencer (C. C.) 9 Fed. 581, 582. If Fender, the plaintiff, had paid over to the two firms and M. M. Kendall the entire sum sued for jointly, not knowing how they divided it, the status would be different. But where he paid it to one firm, Powell & Kendall, as disclosed by the record, the law will not imply a promise on the part of the second firm to refund the whole amount, when it did not receive the whole amount. By what rule does the firm of Cowart & Cunningham impliedly promise to pay back the $12,000, which they have not received? Bear in mind that we are not now discussing a case of damages growing out of tort, where the rule is different, but the proposition of an implied promise to repay on a quasi contract to return what has been actually received, and no more. The law of tort cannot be carried over into the law of contract (and especially where the tort is waived), and permit the plaintiff to recover against all of the defendants jointly, whether they received the money jointly or not. The action in assumpsit cannot be jointly maintained against all of the defendants, unless the payment was jointly made to the two firms and M. M. Kendall. Where the tort is waived, and the suit is in assumpsit for money had and received, evidence of conspiracy and fraud is admissible only to show that the party who received the money is not entitled to keep it, but is bound in good conscience to return whatever he did receive. If several persons conspire to defraud one out of his money, and succeed in receiving the money jointly, suit can be brought against all who take part in the conspiracy in one action, and in any county where either defendant resides. It is the community of wrong committed that gives the joint right of action. And the law will imply a promise to give back money to the owner wrongfully taken; and where the wrongful or fraudulent act is joint, they are joint tort-feasors, and jointly liable for their tort. But in a case of conspiracy to defraud one of his money, where the money is not received jointly, but in separate amounts, and the suit to recover is in assumpsit, then each must be sued for the amount received, and in the county of his residence.

Applying the principles above announced to the facts of this case, we do not think there was such a common receipt of the money paid by Fender to the two firms, Powell & Kendall and Cowart & Cunningham, and M. M. Kendall, as would imply a joint promise to return it. If Powell & Kendall received all the money paid by the plaintiff, Fender, they would be primarily liable. But the evidence discloses that neither Cowart & Cunningham nor M. M. Kendall received the $12,000 sued for jointly with the other firm; and therefore, while they are not liable under the ruling here made, under the evidence in this case, for the entire amount of $12,000, they might be liable severally for whatever portion of it they each did receive, if any. From what has been said above, it follows that Cowart & Cunningham could not be joined in a suit with Powell & Kendall, and therefore a court of a county not of their residence would have no jurisdiction over them. And the same would apply to M. M. Kendall, if he is not a member of the firm of Powell & Kendall. It appears from the record that he had no joint interest in the property sold to the plaintiff, and was not to share in the losses of the transaction, but only in the profits, and was not, therefore, a partner in the firm of Powell & Kendall. Civil Code 1910, § 3153, declares: "A joint interest in the partnership property, or a joint interest in the profits and losses of the business, constitutes a partnership as to third persons. A common interest in profits alone does not." See, also, Dawson Nat. Bank v. Ward, 120 Ga. 861, 862, 48 S. E. 313.

The verdict of the jury found, not only for the full amount of principal sued for by the plaintiff against all of the defendants, but interest as well. It is insisted that interest could not be recovered, because no demand was made against the defendants for the sum sued for. Whether interest can be collected without demand in this case need not be determined, as the judgment is to be reversed and the case goes back; but we may remark that, if a demand is necessary, the evidence shows that a demand was made on Powell & Kendall for the return of the money. It does not appear that a demand was made as to Cowart & Cunningham and M. M. Kendall.

[2] 2. The first assignment of error in the amended motion for a new trial is that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the evidence as to all of the defendants, "for that the evidence demanded a finding that the title to the money sued for was in the partnership of J. B. Fender & Co., and not in the plaintiff." This was a question of fact for the jury to determine; and, while the evidence was somewhat conflicting on this point, the jury found that the money paid to Powell & Kendall was that of the plaintiff, J. F. Fender, and we cannot say that they erred in so finding.

[3] 3. Error is assigned to the overruling by the court of the defendants' motion for a nonsuit, made at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence. If the motion for a nonsuit was made as to all of the defendants (and it seems to have been so made), it was not proper to grant the nonsuit as to all the defendants. Under the evidence in the case, we cannot say that no case was made out as to some of the defendants.

[4] 4. Objection is made to the ruling of the court admitting oral evidence as to the contents of an alleged lost schedule of the property of the Moye Naval Stores Company, being the schedule in writing which the plaintiff testified was furnished to him by Powell & Kendall; the plaintiff testifying, over objection, as to what the schedule contained, so as to show what property the defendants had contracted to sell him. It is within the sound discretion of the court to determine when the foundation has been laid for the introduction of secondary evidence. There appears no abuse of the exercise of the court's discretion in the ruling excepted to. Civil Code 1910, § 5829.

[5] 5. The following charge of the court is assigned as error: "Where the partnership is denied, the opposite party is only required to present sufficient evidence to raise the presumption of the existence of the partnership, when the burden will be shifted to the other side to disprove the existence of the partnership. This is so because the persons supposed to constitute the partnership are in possession of the definite information upon the subject, and therefore better able to present it to the court." This charge of the court is inaccurate. Where one alleges a partnership as an essential fact necessary to a recovery, the burden of proof is on the party affirming it. The court's charge that, "where the partnership is denied, the opposite party is only required to present sufficient evidence to raise the presumption of the existence of the partnership," is calculated to mislead the jury, and tends to lessen the duty of the plaintiff to prove his allegation of partnership. The jury might be led to conclude, from the charge as given, that all that is necessary in order to prove the existence of a partnership was to raise a presumption in favor of its existence. The language used is not an apt way of stating the rule. Civil Code 1910, §§ 5746, 5747; Hawkins v. Davie, 136 Ga. 551, 552, 71 S. E. 873; Mobley v. Lyon, 134 Ga. 125, 67 S. E.

668, 137 Am. St. Rep. 213. The only harm the charge could have in this case is as to the defendants other than Powell & Kendall, who denied that they were members of the respective partnerships to which they were alleged to belong.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

MADDEN v. LAMPLEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DEEDS (§ 47*)—EXECUTION—ATTESTATION—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

An attorney at law, who drafts and prepares a deed for the signature of the grantor, in which deed the client of such attorney is named as grantee, is not, because of the existence of the relation of attorney and client between him and the grantee, incompetent as an attesting witness to the execution of the instrument. Austin v. Southern Home Building & Loan Ass'n, 122 Ga. 440 (6), 50 S. E. 382.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 106; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 302*)—RECORD—SUFFICIENCY.

A ground of a motion for a new trial which complains that a named witness, "having in his hand a purported brief of the testimony," was permitted to state, "She [the plaintiff] testified according to the statement here," but which does not set forth, literally or in substance, the contents of the writing to which the witness made reference, is without merit, inasmuch as it fails to show the materiality of the testimony the admission of which is complained of; and, as has been frequently ruled, this court will not look to other parts of the record to ascertain the contents of the writing referred to, in order to ascertain its materiality.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 302.*]

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 41*)—GROUNDS—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

The admission of evidence which, though immaterial and irrelevant, could not injuriously affect the plaintiff's cause, is not a ground for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-71; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

4. REQUESTS TO CHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

The request to charge, in so far as it was legal and pertinent, was fully and appositely covered in the court's instructions to the jury.

5. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

There was sufficient evidence to support the verdict.

1. MANDAMUS (§ 74*)—COUNTY SITE—ELECTION.

When, under Civil Code 1910, § 486, a petition is presented to the ordinary of a county for removal of the county site, and it appears affirmatively that "two-fifths of the poll tax payers (as shown by the tax receiver's digest last made out)" signed the petition, it is the duty of the ordinary to call an election for the purpose of submitting the question of removing the county site to a vote of the people; but if, in order to find that the petition contains the requisite two-fifths, it is necessary for the ordinary to act upon extraneous evidence, explaining that certain names upon the digest, though different from names signed to the petition, refer to the same persons, and that certain names on the digest last made are persons deceased or removed from the county since the digest was made, there would be no absolute duty to call the election, and, after refusal of the ordinary in such case to call the election, as prayed, the writ of mandamus will not issue to compel him to do so.

2. SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION—GENERAL DEMURRER.

Under the ruling announced in the preceding headnote, the petition, as amended, was subject to general demurrer, and the proposed amendment was not sufficient to render it otherwise.

DEPOSITARIES (§ 10*)—PUBLIC FUNDS—PRIORITIES OF CLAIMS.

The principle ruled in County of Glynn v. Brunswick Terminal Co., 101 Ga. 244, 28 S. E. 604, is controlling in this case. Accordingly, where funds, arising partly from oil inspection fees and partly from private donations, had been turned over to and were in the hands of trustees of a school of agriculture and mechanic arts, established in a particular congressional district, under Civil Code 1910, § 1552 et seq., and were deposited by the treasurer of the board of trustees in his own name, as such, in a bank which was a state depository, and which failed, this did not constitute such a debt due to the state as created a lien in its favor by virtue of its general sovereignty, or under the law in reference to state depositories, embodied in Civil Code, § 1249 et seq.

STONE v. MARSHALL & CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 534*)—VALIDITY—PROVISION FOR ATTORNEY'S FEES.

The maker of two promissory notes, calling for 8 per cent. interest after maturity, stipulated therein that, if they should be placed in the hands of an attorney for collection or adjustment, 10 per cent. upon the amount due should be paid as attorney's fees, to be included in judgment thereon as part of the principal. To secure the payment of the notes the maker conveyed to the payee land, and in the conveyances gave to the payee the right, in default of payment, to sell the land "at public outcry before the courthouse door of the county where the property is located, after an advertisement of once a week for two or more weeks in the public gazette where the sheriff advertises, and so deduct from the proceeds of such sale the amount due, including interest and attorney's fees, and all expenses incident to such sale, returning the overplus, if any there be, to me [the maker of the notes and deeds] or my legal representatives." The payee, claiming that there had been default in the payment of the notes, advertised the land for sale under the power given in the deeds. The maker of the notes and deeds filed a petition to enjoin such sale, upon the ground that he was not indebted in the amounts claimed. The defendant, in answer to the petition, set up that the amounts due on the notes were due and unpaid, and prayed for judgment against the plaintiff for the amount of the notes and interest thereon, and also for attorney's fees. The answer containing such prayer was filed during the trial term. A verdict was rendered in behalf of the defendant, in the action for injunction against the plaintiff therein, for given amounts as principal and interest on the notes, and 10 per cent. on principal and interest as attorney's fees. Held that, under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 4252, an obligation in a note to pay attorney's fees, in addition to the rate of interest specified therein, is void, and not enforceable, except in a suit upon the note where the defendant has been given 10 days' written notice by the holder of the note, his agent or attorney, before the institution of the suit, of his intention to bring suit, and also the term of the court to which it will be brought, and where the defendant fails to pay the note on or before the return day of the court to which the action is returnable. As these statutory provisions were not complied with, it was error, over proper and timely objection of the plaintiff, to admit evidence as to what would be reasonable attorney's fees for the services rendered in the case by defendant's counsel; and the verdict rendered was not authorized, in so far as attorney's fees were found for the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 1946, 1947; Dec. Dig. § 534.*]

2. GROUNDS FOR NEW TRIAL.

There is nothing in the other grounds of the motion for a new trial requiring a reversal.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1140*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—AFFIRMANCE ON CONDITION.

The evidence authorized the verdict, except as to attorney's fees; and a new trial is granted unless the defendant in error, within 20 days after the filing of the remittitur in the trial court, shall write off from the verdict the amount found therein for attorney's fees. If this shall be done, then a new trial is refused; otherwise, the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

DICKENS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. GRAND JURY (§ 20*)—JURY (§ 62*)—IMPANELING JURORS—DUTIES OF JURY COMMISSIONERS.

It is not error to overrule a plea in abatement to the indictment returned against one charged with murder, where the indictment is not only regular on its face, but where it appears that the foreman of the grand jury, and each member thereof who participated in the finding of the indictment, were regularly summoned and impaneled according to law, under the direction and approval of the presiding judge.

(a) The jury commissioners of each county are the proper judges of the qualifications of the citizens to be placed on the jury lists of the county.

(b) And where "all lawyers, ministers of the gospel, doctors, dentists, railroad engineers, and firemen" are left off the jury lists of the county by the jury commissioners, it is no ground for a plea in abatement and challenge to the array in a criminal case.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 594*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF WITNESSES.

On the call of the case against one charged with murder, a motion was made to continue it for the purpose of getting the evidence of an absent witness, and it appeared that the witness on account of whose absence the motion was made had died the night previous to the day the case was finally called for trial. Held, that it was not error to refuse a continuance.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 822*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

An excerpt from the charge of the court on the subject of reasonable doubt, which does not contain an essential feature of the law on the subject will not be held to require a new trial, where the general charge on the same subject, immediately preceding and following the excerpt, states the rule correctly, and the whole charge omitted from this ground of the motion for a new trial meets squarely the objection urged against the excerpt complained of.

Voluntary drunkenness is no excuse for crime.

6, 7. CHARGE OF COURT—NO ERROR.

There was no error in the charges of the court, as set out in the sixth and seventh divisions of the opinion, of which the defendant can rightly complain.

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 825*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

Where the charge of the court to the jury on a given subject is substantially correct, and a fuller charge is desired, a request therefor should be made.

9. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The verdict is supported by the evidence.

10. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—INSTRUCTIONS—VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER.

In a prosecution for murder, it is not error as against the defendant to instruct that malice is excluded if the intention to kill grows out of hot blood produced by provocation other than that produced by mere words, menaces, or contemptuous gestures, and if the provocation be induced by an actual assault, by an attempt to commit a serious injury upon the person, or by other equivalent circumstances calculated to excite sudden passion, the fact that defendant shot with the intention to kill would not render the offense murder, but he would be guilty of voluntary manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-656; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

11. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE—REASONABLE FEAR.

In a prosecution for murder, it is not error to charge that the doctrine of reasonable fears only applies when the danger is urgent and pressing, or apparently so, at the time of the killing, especially where the court had charged that the defendant is not required to demonstrate that a felony was about to be committed upon him, or that his life was in danger, but only that the circumstances as they appear to him were sufficient to make him so believe.

Error from Superior Court, Walton County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

At Dickens was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Jno. R. Cooper and E. W. Roberts, for plaintiff in error. Clifford Walker, Sol. Gen., and T. S. Felder, Atty. Gen., for the State.

HILL, J. [1] 1. At Dickens was tried and convicted of murder and sentenced to life imprisonment in the penitentiary. A motion for a new trial being overruled, he excepted. Before arraignment the defendant filed a plea in abatement to the indictment returned against him and challenged the array, on the ground that the grand jury as first called consisted of 23 men, who were instructed by the court to retire from the courtroom and elect a foreman. They did retire and elected W. H. Nunnally foreman and returned to the courtroom. The court then stated that since the jury had retired one of the absent jurors, Pleas Stanton, had come in. "Wherefore W. H. Nunnally was stricken from the grand jury as foreman, and this juror was added to the list, and the grand jury was again, for the second time, ordered to return to their room and elect another foreman, and therefore they returned to their room and elected John T. Robertson foreman of the grand jury, and when they returned to the courtroom, the jury was sworn by the Solicitor General, according to law." In a note appended to this ground of the motion for a new trial, the presiding judge says: "W. H. Nunnally was never sworn in as a grand juror at said term of the court. He was not sworn in as foreman of said grand jury. He was not selected by the judge or court as such foreman. He did not take the oath of office in either capacity. When the 23 jurors being present answered, the judge instructed them to go to the jury room and select a foreman. As they returned from the jury room, being in there only a minute or two, and before the jury had taken their seats, and before any announcement was made that any one had been selected foreman, the sheriff publicly called the court's attention to the fact that Mr. Stanton, who did not at first respond to his name, and who was on the venire of the grand jury, had just come into court. The court thereupon asked

Mr. Stanton if he had any excuse to render why he should not serve on the grand jury at that term of the court. He said he had none. His name having been drawn, and it appearing on the said list before said Nunnally's name, and the regular time of opening the court, according to custom on Monday morning, not having arrived by a few minutes, Mr. Stanton was instructed to take his place on the grand jury, he making 23, thus excluding Nunnally, who made the twenty-third juror present before said Stanton came into court. The court then told the grand jury, with Nunnally off and Stanton on, to retire to the room and select a foreman, which they did, selecting said Robertson, as aforesaid, which selection was approved by the court. All this occurred without any information on the judge's part from any grand juror or any source whatever that said Nunnally had been selected to act as foreman. Said Stanton's name was No. 6 on said list. Said Nunnally's name was No. 28 on said list. If said Stanton had been present and responded to his name when it was first called, the grand jury would have been impaneled and qualified exactly as it was subsequently impaneled and qualified, because it would have been thus completed before Nunnally's name was ever reached. Anything in said evidence above referred to, in conflict with this statement, is not true. Under these facts and circumstances the said plea in abatement was decided against the defendant."

It is insisted that the indictment is illegal for the following reasons: (1) Because it was found by an illegal grand jury not chosen according to law. (2) Because John T. Robertson was not the legal foreman of the grand jury, but W. H. Nunnally was the legal foreman duly elected by that body. (3) Because the court did not have authority to withdraw from the jury a duly elected foreman, W. H. Nunnally, without cause, and substitute another grand juror who had come in late, and trouble the body to elect another name. (4) Because the court should have put a fine upon the absent juror, if he had no legal excuse. (5) Because the jury commissioners arbitrarily excluded from the grand jury and the petit jury all lawyers, ministers of the gospel, doctors, dentists, railroad engineers, and firemen, there being ten or other large number of each class in the county, who were citizens and residents and possessed the qualifications required by law for grand jurors and petit jurors. "Defendant contends that the arbitrary exclusion of this class without reference to their qualifications was in violation of the statute and Constitution of the state of Georgia, and especially that provision of the Constitution which guarantees due process of law, and that it was in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, as well as other provisions of that instrument, and had the effect of denying to the prisoner due process of law and the equal protection of the law and alledged [abridged?] his privileges and immunities as citizens of the United States. The arbitrary exclusion of the class of citizens from the grand and petit jury is contrary to the Constitution and laws of the land."

There was no error in deciding the plea in abatement against the defendant's contention on all the grounds stated therein. So far as the record discloses, the grand jury was legally organized. The jury had not been organized when Nunnally was withdrawn, and Stanton, who was regularly drawn as a grand juror, was substituted in his stead. The presiding judge did not know who had been selected as foreman when the juror Stanton was substituted for Nunnally. The oath had not been administered when the substitution was made. Ridling v. State, 56 Ga. 601 (1). This case is different from that of Williams v. State, 60 Ga. 88, cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error. There some of the jurors who found an indictment, regular on its face, were not regularly summoned and impaneled, and it was held a matter for plea and not for demurrer. But here the juror was regularly drawn, appeared in court in answer to the summons served upon him before the grand jury was organized, and took the oath as prescribed by law with the rest of the jurors. The presiding judge approved the selection of the new foreman, and we think that the jury was a legally organized grand jury, and that the indictment found by the grand jury, so organized, was a legal and valid indictment, so far as this ground of exception is concerned.

The only other ground of the plea in abatement which needs to be considered is the fifth and last; the other grounds being without merit. The fifth ground of the plea in abatement alleges that the indictment is illegal, because the jury commissioners arbitrarily excluded from the grand jury and the petit jury "all lawyers, ministers of the gospel, doctors, dentists, railroad engineers, and firemen." It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that the exclusion of these classes of citizens from the jury box, without reference to their qualifications, was in violation of the statute and the Constitution of the state, "which guarantees due process of law, and that it was also in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, as well as other provisions of that instrument, and had the effect of denying to the prisoner due process of law and the loyal [equal?] protection of the law," etc. We think this assignment is without merit. In the case of Thomas v. State, 67 Ga. 460, it was held: "The jury commissioners are the proper judges of the qualifications of citizens to be placed on the jury lists of the county. That witnesses sworn on the trial think that certain names should have been on the list, and that few colored men were selected (the defendant being colored), is no ground for a challenge to the array in a criminal case." See, also, Wilson v. State, 69 Ga. 224 (3 a, b.)

[2] 2. The fourth ground of the motion assigns error on the part of the court in not granting a continuance of the case for the term. In a note to this ground of the motion the trial judge certifies that: "It was shown to the court beyond doubt and without denial that the witness on account of whose absence the matter [motion?] to continue was based died the night previous to the day this case was finally called for trial." We do not see how it would be to the advantage of the defendant to continue his case on account of the absence of a witness who was shown to be dead, and hold, therefore, that it was not error for the court to overrule the motion to continue on that ground. It is insisted, in argument by the counsel for the plaintiff in error, that the continuance should have been granted, for the reason that counsel had been recently employed, and on account of the sudden death of the witness he was not prepared to go on with the trial. If such was the case, a motion on this ground should have been made, directed to the discretion of the court. In the absence of such motion the refusal of the continuance is no cause for a new trial. The motion, which was in writing, was based solely on the ground of the absence of the witness named, and "for the purpose of getting the evidence of this witness." Civil Code 1910, § 5724.

[3] 3. The fifth ground of the motion for a new trial is not approved by the court, and will not be considered.

[4] 4. Complaint is made of the judge's charge on the subject of reasonable doubt. The excerpt from the charge complained of is as follows: "A reasonable doubt is one that grows out of the testimony or from the absence of testimony, or a conflict in the testimony and the defendant's statement, and leaves the reasonable mind wavering and uncertain not satisfied from the evidence. You cannot create for yourself a doubt and act upon it; you cannot raise an artificial or captious doubt in order to acquit." It is insisted that the presiding judge committed error in charging the jury that, if they had a reasonable doubt from a conflict of the evidence and the defendant's statement, they should acquit; as the jury would have a right to acquit if they had a doubt of his guilt from the defendant's statement alone, or from the state's evidence alone. The judge did charge the jury that "if after a fair and impartial consideration of the entire case, including defendant's statement, a reasonable doubt exists, it is the duty of the jury to give the defendant the benefit of it and acquit him." Fairly construed, the charge as a whole was free from the criticism of it. The excerpt complained of gives only a portion of the charge on this subject. The record shows that the court gave the jury the following instructions: "A reasonable doubt is an actual doubt that you are conscious of after going over in your own minds the entire case, giving consideration to all the testimony and every part of it. If you then feel uncertain and not fully convinced that the defendant is guilty, and believe that you are acting in a reasonable manner, and if you believe that a reasonable man in any matter of like importance would hesitate to act because of such a doubt as you are conscious of having, that is a reasonable doubt, of which the defendant is entitled to have the benefit. It is essential to a verdict of condemnation that the guilt of the accused shall be fully proved. Neither a mere preponderance of evidence nor any weight of preponderant evidence is sufficient unless it generates full belief of the fact to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt. A reasonable doubt is one that grows out of the testimony, or from the absence of testimony, or a conflict in the testimony and the defendant's statement, and leaves the reasonable mind wavering and uncertain—not satisfied from the evidence. You cannot create for yourself a doubt and act upon it; you cannot raise an artificial or captious doubt in order to acquit. The doubt should be real and honestly and fairly entertained after all reasonable efforts to find out the facts. And if after a fair and impartial consideration of the entire case, including defendant's statement, a reasonable doubt exists, it is the duty of the jury to give the defendant the benefit of it and acquit him. If, however, you are satisfied of his guilt to the exclusion of such a doubt as this, it would be your duty to convict."

[5] 5. Another ground of alleged error is because of the judge's charge on the subject of drunkenness, which was as follows: "On the subject of drunkenness, I charge you that drunkenness is no excuse for crime. One who voluntarily and in testimony [intentionally] kills must meet the demands of the law with some other excuse than that of drunkenness. To be too drunk to form the intent to kill, the slayer must be too drunk to form the intent to shoot. Still, I charge you that, if the defendant was drunk when he fired the fatal shot which took the life of Roseberry, you may consider this, like any other fact, to illustrate his intent and motive and otherwise to shed light upon the transaction." In a note appended to this ground of the motion, the judge trying the case says: "The sole defense was self-defense, and justifiable homicide under the distress of the fears of a reasonable man, and accident. The statement shows these defenses were set up, and in addition in this statement the defendant denied that he was drunk, and the evidence on the part of the state fails to show that he was drunk—that he had taken a couple of drinks before the killing." The brief of evidence sustains the judge in the note just quoted, with reference to the testimony and the statement of the accused. Nor do we think the charge complained of was erroneous as against the defendant, especially in view of the statement of the defendant himself, who claimed that he was not drunk. If the charge complained of was not full enough, a request should have been made for a fuller charge on the subject, if the facts authorized it. But conceding for the sake of the argument that the defendant was drunk at the time of the homicide (which is not borne out by the evidence), this court has often held that voluntary drunkenness is no excuse for crime. Estes v. State, 55 Ga. 30 (1-3); Penal Code 1910, § 39; Marshall v. State, 59 Ga. 154; Moon v. State, 68 Ga. 687 (6); Hanvey v. State, 68 Ga. 612 (2); Beck v. State, 76 Ga. 452 (1); McCook v. State, 91 Ga. 740, 17 S. E. 1019; Cribb v. State, 118 Ga. 316 (8), 45 S. E. 396.

[8, 10] 6. The following charge of the court, under the circumstances of this case, was not error as against the defendant: "Malice is excluded if the intention to kill grows out of hot blood produced by provocation other than that induced by mere words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures. If the provocation be produced by an actual assault, by an attempt to commit a serious personal injury upon the person killing, or by other equivalent circumstances, calculated to excite sudden passion, the fact that the defendant shot with the intention to kill would not render the offense that of murder. But if the killing occurred under such circumstances and was unlawful, the slayer is guilty of voluntary manslaughter." Pryer v. State, 128 Ga. 29 (5), 57 S. E. 93; Bird v. State, 128 Ga. 253, 57 S. E. 320. See, also, Adkins v. State, 137 Ga. 81, 72 S. E. 898, where it was said that "the doctrine of reasonable fear has no connection with the offense of voluntary manslaughter." That portion of the charge excepted to in this case was on the subject of voluntary manslaughter, and, under the ruling just cited, the contention of counsel for the plaintiff in error is not sound.

[7, 11] 7. It was not error for the court to charge the jury: "The doctrine of reasonable fears only applies when the danger is urgent and pressing or apparently so at the time of the killing." And especially where it appears that just before the charge excepted to the court had charged the jury that: "The defendant is not required to demonstrate that a felony was about to be committed upon him or that his life was in danger. He is only required to show that the circumstances as they appeared to him at the time were sufficient to make him so believe."

[8] 8. If the defendant desired a fuller charge than that complained of in the tenth ground of the motion, on the subject of a mutual intent to fight, it was his duty to request further instructions. We may remark, however, that a mutual intent to fight does not necessarily reduce the crime from murder to manslaughter. In order to do so, "the killing must be the result of that sudden, violent impulse of passion supposed to be irresistible; for if there should have been an interval between the assault or provocation given and the homicide, of which the jury in all cases shall be the judges, sufficient for the voice of reason and humanity to be heard, the killing shall be attributed to deliberate revenge, and be punished as murder." Penal Code 1910, § 65.

[8] 9. There was abundant evidence upon which the jury could have found the defendant guilty of murder. We think, from a careful reading of it, that the evidence supported a verdict of guilty as alleged in the indictment; and as the presiding judge is satisfied with it, we will not disturb the finding of the jury.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

GEORGIA R. & BANKING CO. v. TOWN OF DECATUR.

TOWN OF DECATUR v. GEORGIA R. & BANKING CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 14, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 425*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENT—ASSESSMENTS—PROPERTY LIABLE.

A railroad company owns a strip of land in a municipality, 116 feet wide, through the center of which runs its main line of railroad. The land is located between two streets of the town, along which the town, under legislative authority, laid, respectively, 4,456 and 938 feet of sanitary sewer pipe. The land is held for present use to support the roadbed and to provide for an increase of tracks, which the future needs of the railroad probably may require. Under such circumstances the land abutting on the sewers, of such depth as will not interfere with the present roadbed, is liable for the cost of assessment of the local improvement, and such assessment is not illegal because the abutting property in its present condition, and as devoted to its present use, may not be specifically benefited by the improvement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1031-1034; Dec. Dig. § 425.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 465*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under its amended charter (Acts 1903, p. 504) the town of Decatur was authorized to construct a system of sewerage and to assess against abutting property on each side of a street improved fifty cents per lineal foot. The legislative determination of the cost of the local public improvement and its apportionment to the abutting land is conclusive as to these matters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1108; Dec. Dig. § 465.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 425*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENT—PROPERTY LIABLE.

In the absence of express legislative authority, the main track of a railroad company is not subject to levy and sale to satisfy a lien for assessment for local improvements. It follows that an execution for assessments issued against a lot of land bisected by the main track of a railroad is not liable in solido for improvements on two streets which bound the lot of land and between which the main track is located, and therefore a portion of the land on one side of the railroad track cannot be levied on to satisfy assessments made against the entire strip of land through which the railway runs, on account of sewers constructed in streets lying on each side of the track.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1031-1034; Dec. Dig. § 425.*]

Error from Superior Court, De Kalb County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Proceedings under execution on an assessment by the Town of Decatur against the Georgia Railroad & Banking Company. To the judgment, both parties bring error. Judgment reversed on both bills of exceptions.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming and Jno. S. Candler, for plaintiff in error. Mayson & Johnson and Leslie Steele, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. By an act approved July 30, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 504), the charter of the town of Decatur was so amended as to authorize the construction of a system of sewerage for that town. The caption and first section of the act are as follows:

"An act to amend the charter of the town of Decatur, in the county of De Kalb, so as to authorize the mayor and council of said town to construct a system of sewerage for said town, and to assess the cost of constructing said sewerage system against the abutting property, or the property through which said sewer may be constructed, and against the owners thereof, and for other purposes.

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of Georgia, and it is hereby enacted by the authority aforesaid, that from and after the passage of this act the mayor and council of the town of Decatur, in the county of De Kalb, shall have full power and authority to lay down and construct sewers in said town, and to assess the sum of fifty cents per lineal foot upon the property and estates respectively abutting on said sewer on each side of the street along which said sewer is laid or constructed; and in consideration of the payment of said assessment, the owners of said estates shall have the right to connect their drains from said abutting property for the discharge of sewerage into said sewer; and in case any such sewer is laid down or constructed through or on any private property, along the course of any natural drain or otherwise, a like sum of fifty cents shall be assessed upon such property abutting on each side of said sewer for every lineal foot, making in all one dollar for every lineal foot to be assessed upon such property through which sewers are constructed as aforesaid: Provided, that when the same party owns the land on both sides of a sewer running through his land, he shall be assessed only for one side thereof; and in consideration of the payment of said assessment, the owners of real estate, respectively, on each side of said sewer, through or over which such sewer may be constructed, shall have the right to connect their drains from said abutting property for the discharge of sewerage into said sewer. The extent and character, material used, and expense of sewers constructed, as well as the time and manner of constructing the same, shall be in the discretion of the mayor and council of said town, to be prescribed from time to time by ordinance. The remaining cost of all sewers not thus assessed shall be paid by said mayor and council from the treasury of said town."

The Georgia Railroad & Banking Company owns a lot of land in the town, lying between College street and Railroad avenue, 116 feet in width, along the center of which is constructed its main line of railroad track. The town constructed a line of sewerage pipes in front of this property on College street, 4,456 feet, and a line of sewerage pipes, 938 feet, on Railroad avenue. For the construction of this sewer the railroad's property was assessed 40 cents for each lineal foot the sewer pipe was laid. An execution was issued against the property in solido for the aggregate sum. This execution was levied upon a rectangular strip of the land 30 by 912 feet, lying on one side of the railroad track. The railroad company interposed its affidavit of illegality; and on demurrer all grounds of the affidavit, except such as set up that the cost of the work as constructed was less than the amount assessed, were stricken. The case was tried by the judge without the intervention of a jury. He adjudged the railroad company subject to one-half of the amount assessed against its property. The company and the town sued out bills of exceptions.

Though assessments for local improvements are not taxes, within the meaning of the requirement of the Constitution that taxes must be ad valorem and uniform, nevertheless assessments for local improvements, such as street paving and sewerage, are an exercise of the taxing power. While assessments for sewerage are primarily referable to the taxing power, they also have in many instances the aspects of police regulations. It is competent for the Legislature to authorize the construction of a sewerage system in a municipality and to determine how the cost shall be borne as between the public and the property to be benefited. The Legislature may fix some definite standard of apportionment of costs to be applied to the property abutting the improvement by a measurement of length, quantity, or value. "Benefit to the owner of the real estate assessed, so far as necessary to be passed upon, as well as the necessity or reasonableness of the improvement, being for the determination of the Legislature, is concluded by the act authorizing the assessment, and will not be inquired into by the courts unless in extraordinary cases, presenting a manifest abuse of legislative authority." Speer v. Athens, 85 Ga. 49, 11 S. E. 802, 9 L. R. A. 402; Bacon v. Savannah, 86 Ga. 301, 12 S. E. 580. The foregoing principles were elaborately considered in the cited cases, and we need only apply them to the questions presented by the affidavit of illegality.

[1] 1. The first of these raises the point that a local assessment for a sanitary sewer cannot be levied against a railroad right of way. The argument is advanced in support of this contention that a sanitary sewer alongside a right of way of a railroad from the nature of things cannot be of benefit to the railroad, and comes within the exception to the rule referred to in the Speer Case, and applied in the case of City of Atlanta v. Hamlein, 96 Ga. 381, 23 S. E. 408, and 101 Ga. 697, 29 S. E. 14. In the latter case the property against which a paving assessment was made was, in consequence of its peculiar shape and situation, not worth more after than before the improvement, and the cost of the improvement largely exceeded the value of the lot; and under such circumstances the process to enforce the collection of the assessment was enjoined, because it virtually amounted to a confiscation of the property. The case in hand does not come within the exception to the rule referred to in the Speer Case and illustrated by the Hamlein Case. The railroad's land which abutted the improvement is 116 feet wide and located between two streets, and although it is stated in the affidavit of illegality that its present use is for the maintenance of the roadbed and that future needs of the company shall probably require all of it for additional tracks, it does not appear that the railroad company may not now put it to some accessorial use, such as leasing it for warehouse and business purposes. The railroad company does not present a case of confiscation. Its contention is but an inference drawn that it will derive no benefit from the improvement. It may be that from the present use to which the property is put no special benefit may result; but as all of the abutting property is not actually required for the support of the roadbed, and may be used for warehouse or other business purposes, we cannot say that no special benefit will ensue. As was said by Mr. Justice Holmes: "There is a look of logic when it is said that special assessments are founded on special benefits, and that a law which makes it possible to assess beyond the amount of the special benefit attempts to rise above its source. But that mode of argument assumes an exactness in the premises which does not exist. The foundation of this familiar form of taxation is a question of theory. The amount of benefit which an improvement will confer upon particular land—indeed, whether it is a benefit at all—is a matter of forecast and estimate. In its general aspect, at least, it is peculiarly a thing to be decided by those who make the law." L. & N. R. Co. v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co., 197 U. S. 433, 25 Sup. Ct. 466, 49 L. Ed. 819. See, in this connection, Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. City of Janesville, 137 Wis. 7, 118 N. W. 182, and valuable note to this case in 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1124.

[2] 2. The railroad company contends that under the act providing for the construction of the sewerage system the cost of the improvement must be limited to costs actually incurred in front of the property. Learned counsel for the railroad company conceded on the argument that the Legislature could embrace, as a part of the cost to be assessed on the abutting property owner, not only the cost of providing and laying the sewer, but also the cost of all other things that went to make up a complete sewerage system; but it was contended that under the special act the Legislature did not make such provision. The caption and the first section of the act are set out in the statement of facts; and we think the legislative intent, as expressed from the language of the act, is to authorize the construction of a sewerage system in the town of Decatur at a cost of 50 cents per lineal foot of the land abutting on each side of the improvement, and that the additional cost shall be paid by the town. It was competent for the Legislature to estimate the cost of the improvement, and to fix the frontage assessment. As was said by the Supreme Court of the United States: "The Legislature determines expenditures and amounts to be raised for their payment; the whole discussion and all questions of prudence and propriety and justice being confined to its discretion. It may err; but the courts cannot review its discretion." French v. Barber Asphalt Co., 181 U. S. 324, 21 Sup. Ct. 625, 45 L. Ed. 879. The Legislature having determined that the cost be apportioned to the abutting land on each side of the improvement, the abutting landowners have no cause for complaint that the town, upon discovering that it could construct the improvement for a smaller sum, assessed the cost of the improvement at a less sum than fixed by the statute. It would have been competent for the town to assess the improvement at $1 per lineal foot, 50 cents of it to be paid by the landowners on each side; and the landowner cannot complain that the town voluntarily reduced the assessment to 40 cents per foot against each abutting tract of land.

[3] 3. The fl. fa. ran against the entire property abutting on the improvement, but was levied on a part of it. It was urged, as a ground of illegality, that the fl. fa., being a special lien against the property along which the sewer was laid, could not be levied for the whole amount upon a selected part. The affidavit of illegality alleged that the defendant owns a strip of land between College street and Railroad avenue, 116 feet in width, along the center of which is constructed its main line of railroad track, and that its present use is to give a sufficient right of way for the proper maintenance of the present roadbed and to provide for increase in the number of tracks as the business of the defendant may require in the future. A majority of the authorities are to the effect that the track, rails, and ties of a railroad company cannot be sold by piecemeal, in the absence of express legislative permission. The reason of the rule is that a railroad company is a quasi public institution, and owes a duty to the public to discharge the objects of its franchise, and a compulsory sale of a fragment of its track will prevent its discharge of this duty. Gray on Limitations of Taxing Power, § 1190; City of Atlanta v. Grant, 57 Ga. 340. Only so much of the right of way as is essential to the discharge of its present obligations comes within the operation of the principle. A railroad company, by extensive purchase of real estate for future needs, cannot defeat the sale of such real estate under a valid assessment against so much of the right of way as is not necessary for the present maintenance of its roadbed. We think, therefore, that the assessment should have been against the abutting land of such depth as not to interfere with the roadbed, and the land on each side of the track should have been assessed for the abutting improvement; that is to say, the abutting land on College street alongside of which is laid 4,456 feet of sewerage should be assessed 40 cents per foot, and the abutting land on Railroad avenue, alongside of which 938 feet of sewerage is laid, should be assessed 40 cents per lineal foot. Separate fl. fas. should be issued for each assessment, running against the property abutting the improvement.

We are not informed by the affidavit of illegality whether the property assessed contains warehouses or depots. If the right of way contains such structures, and is put to such uses, it is assessable and liable for the local improvement abutting the same. Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Ottumwa, 112 Iowa, 300, 83 N. W. 1074, 51 L. R. A. 763. As the assessment was made against and levied upon the whole lot, which was bisected by the railroad track, it follows that the illegality should have been sustained on the ground stated in this division of the opinion.

Judgment reversed on both bills of exceptions. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*) — BRIEF — WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

It is settled by many adjudications that grounds of a motion for new trial, which are not referred to or argued in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, will be treated as waived, and will not be decided by this court.

DODSON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 654*) — BAR OF SUBSEQUENT ACTION—DISMISSAL.

Where a case was dismissed upon general demurrer, and it appears that the declaration, while so defective as to be open to attack by general demurrer, could have been amended by averments of negligence showing a complete cause of action, the judgment of dismissal may be pleaded in bar of a subsequent suit brought for the same cause of action, although the latter states the cause more completely, by adding averments of negligence which were wanting in the first suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1165; Dec. Dig. § 654.*]

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 79*)—INVOLUNTARY DISMISSAL — INTERPRETATION OF ORDER.

The court did not err in construing an order dismissing the first suit, which recited that such former suit was dismissed "on general motion," as being a judgment sustaining a general demurrer to the declaration in the case dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 174, 175; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by J. P. Dodson against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

W. A. James, for plaintiff in error. Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. The plaintiff brought suit against the Southern Railway Company to the May term, 1905, of the superior court of Douglas county, complaining that through the negligence of its agents and employes in the running of a train the defendant had inflicted certain injuries upon a mule described in the petition, to the injury and damage of petitioner, the owner of the mule. The defendant pleaded, among other matters, the defense of former adjudication of the cause, alleging that a former suit, based upon the same cause of action, had been dismissed upon general demurrer. In support of the plea setting forth a former adjudication, counsel for the defendant introduced in evidence the record in the first suit, to the introduction of which counsel for the plaintiff objected, on the ground that "in the plea it is set up that they filed a demurrer to this bill, and here they are offering a bill—a declaration—wherein the cause was dismissed on motion, simply a motion." After the introduction of the evidence, the court directed a verdict for the defendant.

[1] 1. While the plea of res adjudicata in this case is inartificially drawn, and in some respects is open to attack by special demurrer, it is sufficient, in the absence of such special demurrer, to withstand the general oral objection made to the plea at the trial term. It appears from the plea, and from the records of the first case introduced to support the plea, that the plaintiff, at the May term, 1903, brought suit against the defendant in the present case, alleging that the defendant had injured and damaged him in the sum of $250, in that the employes of the defendant, by the running of a locomotive of the defendant and the train which it was pulling, had struck and seriously and permanently injured a certain mule, and disabled the animal to such an extent as to render it practically worthless. In the second suit, to which the plea of res adjudicata was interposed, the damage complained of is for the same injury to the same animal referred to in the first suit. In the first suit the pleader failed to allege negligence upon the part of the defendant's employes who were running the locomotive and train. In the second suit negligence of the company was specifically alleged. It is insisted by counsel for plaintiff in error that no cause of action was set forth in the first suit, and that its dismissal upon general demurrer cannot be pleaded in bar of the second suit. While the cause of action was so defectively set forth in the first suit as to be open to attack by general demurrer, it could have been amended by averring negligence upon the part of the defendant, and showing wherein the negligence consisted, as was done in the petition in the last case. Ellison v. Georgia Railroad Co., 87 Ga. 691, 13 S. E. 809. And, that being true, a dismissal of the former suit upon general demurrer will bar a second suit based upon the same cause of action. In the case of Greene v. Central of Georgia Ry. Co., 112 Ga. 859, 38 S. E. 860, in discussing the ruling in the case of Kimbrow v. Railway Co., 56 Ga. 185, the court said: "The effect of the decision, therefore, is that a dismissal of a declaration on a general demurrer thereto will bar a second declaration for the same cause of action, though it contains additional allegations, if they could have, by way of amendment, been incorporated in the first." And the court, after quoting from the decision supporting that ruling, continued: "In the present case the second petition is between the same parties and based on the same alleged cause of action. It is true that the grounds of negligence relied on in the two petitions are different, but all the grounds of the second could have been incorporated in the first by way of amendment; and, according to the decisions above cited, the judgment on demurrer was conclusive as to all such matters. On these decisions we rest our conclusion, though many authorities could be cited for as well as against it. See 1 Freeman, Judg. (4th Ed.) § 267; 2 Black, Judg. § 708; Gould v. Railroad Co., 91 U. S. 534, 23 L. Ed. 416."

[2] 2. It is further contended by counsel for the plaintiff that it does not appear that the record of the former suit, offered to support the plea of res adjudicata, shows that it was dismissed upon general demurrer. The order passed dismissing the former suit is in the following language: "On general motion to dismiss made, the case is hereby dismissed, with judgment for $11 as costs against Dodson, the plaintiff. March 24, 1904." We are of the opinion that the court properly construed this as an order sustaining a general demurrer. A general motion to dismiss a cause may be made orally at the trial term, and is effective as a general demurrer, where a case is open to attack by general demurrer. On the trial of the present case, the court stated to counsel for plaintiff that the terms of the order implied "that the cause was dismissed because there was no cause of action," and offered to allow plaintiff's counsel to show that the truth was otherwise; but this counsel did not attempt to do. The construction placed by the court below on the order was the proper one; and under the ruling made in the first division of this opinion the court properly directed a verdict for the defendant.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

JONES v. LAURENS BANKING CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 715*)—RES JUDICATA—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—RECORD OF FORMER SUIT.

Where the record of a former suit between the same parties, embracing the petition and the plea filed therein, shows that the same matters of defense were then pleaded by the defendant as were pleaded in the present case, and that, while the two notes sued upon in the present case were not included in the petition in the former suit, the right of the plaintiff to recover upon them was put in issue by plea of settlement between the defendant and the plaintiff, in which settlement were embraced both the two notes sued upon in the first suit, as well as the two sued upon in the present case, such record was properly admitted in evidence.

(a) It was competent for the plaintiff to introduce the record of the former suit, to meet a defense based upon the alleged settlement, which had been set up to prevent a recovery in the first suit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1244-1247; Dec. Dig. § 715.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 843*) — REVIEW—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED.

The ruling that the transcript of the record of the former suit was properly admitted controls the case in favor of the plaintiff, irrespective of other questions raised in the record.

Error from Superior Court, Toombs County; B. S. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by the Laurens Banking Company, for use, etc., against W. B. Jones. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Lankford & Dickerson and G. W. Lankford, for plaintiff in error. Thos. J. Parrish and Hines & Jordan, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. C. S. Pope brought suit, as holder and transferee of four promissory notes, against W. B. Jones, to the February term, 1907, of the superior court of Toombs county. The notes were for the principal sum of $203.82, $179.65, $168.50, and $279.42, respectively. They fell due, in the order above named, on May 8, 1900, June 8, 1900, June 20, 1900, and June 16, 1900. By amendment the plaintiff struck all reference to the first two notes, and declared that no judgment upon the same was prayed for. Subsequently to the filing of that suit, the plaintiff brought suit in the city court of Dublin on the note falling due on May 8, 1900, for $203.82, and on the note falling due on June 8, 1900, for $179.65; these two being the notes which by amendment were stricken from the first suit. These two notes were signed by W. B. Jones and A. B. Jones, as principals. W. B. Jones filed a plea in both cases. The case in the city court was tried in March, 1909, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount of the two notes sued on. The case in the superior court was tried at the February term, 1910, and resulted in a verdict for the full amount of the notes sued on. W. B. Jones moved for a new trial in the latter case. The motion was overruled, and he excepted.

[1] 1. One of the grounds of the motion for a new trial complains that a certified transcript of the record of the case in the city court of Dublin was admitted in evidence upon the trial of the present case. It was offered for the purpose of establishing the plaintiff's contention that the matters in issue between the parties to the case in the superior court had been adjudicated by the trial of the case in the city court. It appears from this transcript that the defendant, after admitting the execution of the notes sued on, set up as a defense that the notes had been fully discharged as the result of a settlement between himself and the plaintiff. It was alleged in the plea in the case in the city court that on April 24, 1901, W. B. Jones was indebted to the plaintiff on the notes sued on, and on two other notes signed by W. B. Jones individually and indorsed by A. W. Garrett, cashier, in the principal sum of $831.19, and that on the date last mentioned W. B. Jones and the plaintiff "had a settlement of all matters between them, and the defendant, at Conders, Ga., paid to the plaintiff the sum of $——, leaving a balance due by the defendant Jones to the plaintiff on said date on the notes hereinbefore set out [that is, the four notes originally sued on in the superior court] of the sum of $597.42"; that at the time of the settlement there was certain timber, which was delivered partly to Grier Bros. and partly to Bales, for and at the instance of the plaintiff; that no account was taken of this timber, "because the said Pope had not received measurements and bill of sale of said timber; that said timber so delivered to Pope had at least 60,000 feet in same, for which defendant was entitled to $10.50 per 1,000 feet, making a total of $639.60 due by plaintiff to defendant, Walter B. Jones; that it was distinctly agreed to and thoroughly understood by both plaintiff and defendant Walter B. Jones that said timber should be credited on balance due at that time on said notes sued on; and that said timber aforesaid was more than sufficient to pay the balance due by defendant Walter B. Jones on said notes." In the plea there was a further averment of the delivery by the defendant to the plaintiff of 25,000 feet of timber, of the value of $250. Certain other items relating to lumber delivered and services performed by the defendant to the plaintiff were set forth, amounting to the sum of $1,410, "which amount was paid by defendant to plaintiff on balance due on aforesaid notes, and $500 for borrowed money and poplar bought from plaintiff by defendant; that said amount of $1,410 was more than enough to pay off the said notes sued on and all other indebtedness due by the defendant Walter B. Jones to plaintiff C. S. Pope, and was paid on said indebtedness] aforesaid; that said plaintiff C. S. Pope, notwithstanding the fact that said money aforesaid and said timber was paid by defendant Walter B. Jones and accepted by said plaintiff as payment of said notes, the said plaintiff failed and refused to apply same to said notes and indebtedness as aforesaid, or to give the defendant Walter B. Jones credit for the said sum of $1,410, aforesaid.

From this plea it distinctly appears that, while in the suit brought in the city court of Dublin only two of the notes included in the suit previously brought in the superior court of Toombs county were sued upon, the defendant by his answer distinctly put in issue the question as to whether or not he was indebted to the plaintiff upon all or any one of the four notes. It was averred by the defendant that on April 24, 1901, he and the plaintiff had a settlement of all matters between them, that averment relating specifically to the indebtedness represented by all of the four notes, and that that settlement left a balance due to the plaintiff of $597.42, and that he then pleaded matter showing a complete discharge and payment of that balance and the other indebtedness brought about by subsequent dealings between the parties. By an amendment to his original plea to the suit in the superior court the defendant set up the same settlement of April 24, 1901, between himself and the plaintiff. He again, after having alleged the settlement of all matters between them, stated the balance to be $597.42, and alleged the delivery to Pope, or to other parties for and at the instance of Pope, of the rafts of timber containing 60,000 feet, of the value of $639.60, and the subsequent delivery of timber to Pope, 25,000 feet in amount, of the value of $250, and set forth the other dealings between himself and the plaintiff subsequently, as set up in the answer he filed in the city court. We are of the opinion that the court properly admitted the record of the suit brought by the plaintiff in the present case against the defendant in the city court of Dublin. It shows that, while only two notes were sued upon there, the defendant himself brought into the controversy the two notes that were being sued upon in the superior court of Toombs county. Under the plea filed in the city court the obligation of the defendant on all four of the notes herein referred to was put in issue. The defendant, in the suit in the city court of Dublin, pleaded a settlement which related, not to any one or two of the four notes, but to all of them. In his plea he showed a settlement which left a balance of $597.42, and then in the next paragraph of his plea he alleged a delivery of 60,000 feet of timber, of the value of $639.60, which was more than enough to cancel the unpaid balance, and then in immediate connection he alleged the delivery of still other timber, of the value of $250. The jury found against him upon the issue made by these averments, giving to the plaintiff a verdict for the full amount of his demand.

Upon what theory could the defendant again be heard to set up the delivery of these various lots of timber, which were more than sufficient in value to discharge the entire balance of his indebtedness to the plaintiff after the settlement referred to? We can conceive of none. In the city court the defendant rested his case upon a settlement of a certain date of all matters, which included the four notes, which settlement left a balance due by him to the plaintiff, which balance he asserted had been entirely discharged by delivery of goods of a value greater than the amount of the balance. The jury found against him on the issues made by his defense. Can he now set up, as a defense to the two notes which were being sued to judgment in the superior court, the same settlement, the same balance due after the settlement, and the same payments made to cancel that balance? Certainly he cannot, unless he make it appear, from the evidence introduced on the trial of the present case, that some of the matters put in issue by his plea in the city court of Dublin were not actually litigated. That that was done is not suggested in the ground of the motion which we are now considering, and which is based solely upon an alleged error in the admission of the record in the case in the city court. It was not necessary that the plaintiff should have pleaded former adjudication, in order to make the introduction of a transcript of the record proper. The petition of the plaintiff and the answer of the defendant were the only pleadings necessary in the case. And when the defendant attempted to defeat the plaintiff's action by setting up matters that had been adjudicated in a former suit, the plaintiff could show the former adjudication by evidence competent for that purpose, without having given any notice of the evidence in his pleadings.

[2] 2. There are two other grounds in the amended motion for a new trial—one complaining of the admission of certain evidence over the objection that it was immaterial and irrelevant, and the other assigning error upon a certain excerpt from the court's charge. It is unnecessary to consider these, however, as it appears from a consideration of the entire record that, if the transcript of the record of the suit between these parties in the city court of Dublin was properly admitted, a verdict for the plaintiff necessarily followed, and the court might properly have so directed. Counsel for plaintiff in error concede this in their brief.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

BARRETT v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 258*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

The petition sufficiently charged actionable negligence upon the part of the defendant. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 816-836; Dec. Dig. § 258.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—PLEADING.

The circumstances attending the homicide, as set forth in the petition, do not make such a case as that the court can, as a matter of law, decide that the plaintiff's husband could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the consequences to himself of the defendants' negligence. In this connection, see Richmond & Danville R. Co. v. Howard, 79 Ga. 44 (2), 3 S. E. 426; Georgia R. Co. v. Pittman, 78 Ga. 325 (5).

(a) It was error to dismiss the petition on general demurrer.

(b) This case differs from that of Thompson v. Southern R. Co., 134 Ga. 371, 87 S. E. 939, in that in the present case plaintiff's husband was on the public crossing when struck, and was in the discharge of his duty at the time he was struck, whereas in the case cited the injured person was not on a crossing, and was not in the discharge of his duty at the time he was struck, and, further, in the case cited only one train was passing, whereas in the case at bar there were two trains coming from different directions, and the plaintiff's husband, while in the performance of his duty, was confronted with an emergency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1069-1132; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

3. SPECIAL DEMURRER—NO RULINGS.

The court did not rule upon any of the grounds of special demurrer, and none of them are involved in this decision.

Error from Superior Court, Cobb County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by M. L. Barrett against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Mrs. M. L. Barrett instituted suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and Walter Sparrow, an engineer in charge of one of defendant's trains, for damages on account of the homicide of her husband. Among other things the petition, as amended, alleged the following in substance: Kennesaw avenue, a public street in Marietta, a city of 8,000 inhabitants, was crossed by the railroad of the defendant railroad company, and also by that of the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company; there being three lines of railroad tracks. A great many persons and vehicles constantly passed over the crossing by means of the street, while a great many trains constantly and continuously passed over the crossing by means of the railroad tracks. As a consequence it was a place of danger, and the plaintiff's husband was employed by the Western & Atlantic Railroad Company as a watchman at that place. While in the discharge of duty, at about 7:30 o'clock a. m. on the 24th day of October, 1908, he saw two persons approaching the crossing rapidly and about to be caught by a freight train of the defendant railroad company, which was approaching the crossing from the south at a rapid rate of speed. He immediately turned, waving his flag violently as a warning to the persons to stop, and just succeeded in stopping them from passing over the crossing and coming in collision with the approaching freight train. While thus engaged, and looking in the direction of the persons he was endeavoring to stop, the passenger train of the defendant approaching from the north (being the opposite direction), at a rate of 40 miles per hour, without any warning by ringing bells or otherwise, struck and killed him instantly. The passenger train was about five minutes ahead of its schedule time. Plaintiff's husband did not know of its approach, and could have been seen by those in charge of the train for a distance of 300 yards before reaching the crossing. Sparrow, the engineer, was not on the lookout. The court dismissed the petition on general demurrer, and plaintiff excepted.

ROBERT v. WILKINSON COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MANDAMUS (§ 102*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—ACTS OF OFFICERS—ISSUANCE OF WARRANT.

Before the writ of mandamus will issue to compel the county commissioners to issue their warrant upon the treasurer to pay a debt, it must appear that the debt comes within the classes provided in the Constitution for which a tax may be levied. Brunson v. Caskie, 127 Ga. 501, 56 S. E. 621, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1002; Barksdale v. Hayes, 134 Ga. 348, 67 S. E. 852.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 217-219; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 28*)—POWER TO TAX—DELEGATION TO COUNTY.

Const. art. 7, § 6, par. 2 (Civil Code, § 6562), declares: "The General Assembly shall not have power to delegate to any county the right to levy a tax for any purpose, except for educational purposes in instructing children in the elementary branches of an English education only, to build and repair the public buildings and bridges, to maintain and support prisoners, to pay jurors and coroners, and for litigation, quarantine, roads, and expenses of courts, to support paupers and pay debts heretofore existing, to pay the county police, and to provide for necessary sanitation."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

3. MANDAMUS (§ 102*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—ACTS OF OFFICERS—ISSUANCE OF WARRANT.

It is manifest that the compensation provided for surveyors, their chain bearers, flag bearers, and other laborers in the act approved August 17, 1908 (Acts 1908, p. 96), for services rendered in connection with the settlement of disputed county lines, is not included among those things for which a county is authorized to levy a tax.

(a) Accordingly it was not error to sustain the demurrer to the petition for mandamus which sought to compel the county commissioners to issue a warrant on the treasurer for the payment of a debt of the character last mentioned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 248*)—AMENDMENT—CHANGE OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

The petition for mandamus to compel the county commissioners to issue a warrant was not amendable into a suit against the county for the value of the services.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 124*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—SUFFICIENCY OF MOTION.

A ground of a motion for a new trial, complaining of the exclusion of evidence referred to therein in general terms, is sufficient, where the evidence offered is fully set out in a marked exhibit attached to the motion, and the ground of the motion, including the exhibit, which is expressly referred to in his order, is approved by the judge, although the exhibit be not referred to in the ground of the motion.

2. RAILROADS (§ 265*)—OPERATION—TORTS—COMPANIES OR PERSONS LIABLE.

Where a railroad has been duly placed by a court of competent jurisdiction in the hands of a receiver, who is in full and exclusive possession and control of the railroad and all the property of the railroad company, such company is not liable for a tort committed by the receiver or his servants in the operation of the railroad. 33 Cyc. 722, and cases cited in notes 20 to 24, inclusive; Ocean Steamship Co. v. Wilder, 107 Ga. 222, 33 S. E. 179.

3. RAILROADS (§ 271*)—TORTS—COMPANIES OR PERSONS LIABLE—EVIDENCE.

In view of the answer filed, it was error for the court to refuse to permit the defendant company to introduce in evidence a properly certified copy of the proceedings in the federal court, showing the appointment of a receiver for the defendant railroad company, and his discharge and the pendency of the receivership at the time of the commission of the tort complained of by the operation of the road.

PARKS v. WILLIAMS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 119*)—PROCEDURE—ATTACHMENT—VALIDITY OF SALE.

Where an attachment has been sued out in a justice's court against a nonresident, and no notice has been served as provided by Civil Code 1910, § 5103, and there has been no bond made, or appearance and defense, a general judgment cannot lawfully be rendered against the defendant; and if such a judgment be rendered, and an execution be issued accordingly and levied, the sale is void. Carithers v. Venable, 52 Ga. 389; Kimball v. Nicol & Davidson, 58 Ga. 175.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

2. EXECUTION (§ 245*)—SALE—ESTOPPEL TO DENY VALIDITY.

A defendant in such an execution may estop himself from denying the validity of the sale by knowingly accepting a balance of the purchase money left in the hands of the officer after discharging the executions of the plaintiff in attachment, or directing its payment to another creditor, under a settlement with him. Tribble v. Anderson, 63 Ga. 31 (6); Reichert v. Voss, 78 Ga. 54, 2 S. E. 558; Ray v. Pitman, 119 Ga. 680, 48 S. E. 849; Civil Code 1910, § 6077.

(a) If one takes a deed from a defendant so estopped with knowledge of the facts, he will likewise be estopped; or he may so participate in the transaction as to estop himself, though the deed to him may have been delivered before the actual disposition, by the agreement or direction of the defendant in fl. fa., of the fund left in the hands of the officer making the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. §§ 681-686; Dec. Dig. § 245.*]

3. EJECTMENT (§ 90*)—PROCEEDINGS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in a statutory action to recover land held under a sheriff's sale and conveyance, it appeared that the sale was void, because based on executions issued upon general judgments, where only special judgments could lawfully have been rendered, but the purchaser set up that the plaintiff was estopped from denying the validity of the sale and the purchaser's title thereunder, and introduced evidence to support such contention, there was no error in admitting in evidence, in connection therewith, the sheriff's deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

There was sufficient evidence to authorize the submission to the jury of the issue of estoppel and fraud.

(a) The charge was not altogether accurate or exact. It was especially erroneous to charge that, if the plaintiff should recover, the land sued for would be "subject to the purchase money and the amount paid by the defendant for repairs, taxes, insurance, interest on the purchase money at 7 per cent., less reasonable rents for the property." But, in view of the fact that the jury did not find for the plaintiff, and thus subject the property recovered to the charges mentioned, and in the light of the entire charge and the evidence, the verdict should not be disturbed or a reversal granted for any of the reasons set up by the plaintiff in error.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 384*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

In an action for damages against a railroad company for the wrongful ejection of a passenger, the petition contained three separate counts. The first and third were similar, except that the latter contained additional allegations as to why the ejection was wrongful. The second was similar to the first, except that it contained additional allegations as to aggravating circumstances, thus laying the foundation for the recovery of exemplary damages. On the trial it was error to instruct the jury in such manner as to authorize them to consider the case as one for three separate causes of action for an amount equal to the sum of the damages laid in the three counts, and otherwise confuse and lead the jury to conclude that they would be authorized to find damages of the same character under each of the separate counts, thereby rendering it possible that a verdict might be rendered for double damages for one and the same tort.

(a) It does not appear that such error was harmless, because the jury, in rendering the verdict for a lump sum, recited that it was based only on counts 1 and 2.

NACOOCHEE INSTITUTE v. DAVIDSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CORPORATIONS (§ 448*)—POWERS AND LIABILITIES—REPRESENTATION BY AGENTS.

A school was organized by private persons under the name of Nacoochee Institute, and a certain teacher, known as its president, having authority to teach, get out catalogues, advertise the school, and do anything he saw proper in order to build up the school, made a contract with a printer to publish a monthly magazine called the "Institute News." Its publication commenced under the contract in December, 1905, and was continued until December, 1907. A charter was obtained for the school in June, 1907, and organization as a corporation was perfected soon after the charter was granted. None of the trustees of the school, either before or after it was chartered, ever recognized the contract with the printer as a contract of the institution. Services were rendered by the printer under the contract to the amount of $532.02, of which the sum of $324.40 was paid at different times by the teacher who made the contract and other individuals connected with the school, either in the capacity of teacher or student, leaving a balance due of $207.62. The nature of the magazine is not disclosed, further than that it was a paper "gotten up by the pupils." After the publication was discontinued, the printer, as well as some of the pupils, endeavored to get the trustees of the corporation to assume the debt, which was declined. Afterwards the printer instituted suit against the corporation for the balance due on the account for his services rendered under the contract, and obtained a verdict. A motion for a new trial, on the grounds that the verdict was contrary to evidence, etc., was overruled, and the defendant excepted. Held, that the evidence fails to show authority upon the part of the teacher to bind the corporation to the contract, or ratification of the contract by it. In this connection, see the remarks of Evans, J., in Medical College of Georgia v. Rushing, 124 Ga. 239, 52 S. E. 333. Accordingly, the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict.

2. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE TO SUPPORT.

Where actions by a minor and his grandmother against a railroad company for acts of a conductor while plaintiffs were passengers were consolidated for trial, and in the case brought by the grandmother the court charged that she could recover if the conductor used the language which she attributed to him, if it tended to subject her to mortification, an instruction in the case of the minor that the same rule as to damages applies in his case was erroneous, where there was no evidence that the conductor used any improper language to the minor, who was only seven years of age, but that all he said was addressed to the grandmother, and the minor testified that he did not hear any abusive language to the grandmother.

Error from Superior Court, Cherokee County; N. A. Morris, Judge.

Action by R. L. Callahan against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

D. W. Blair and E. W. Coleman, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. Grady Callahan, a minor, by his next friend, brought an action for damages against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. His grandmother, Mrs. Spence, also brought a similar suit against the same company. The acts of negligence on the part of the defendant's conductor and his abusive language to the plaintiffs while passengers on the defendant's train, as set forth in the respective petitions, were substantially the same, except that in the petition of young Callahan he alleged that upon the same occasion he received certain physical injuries by reason of a tort committed upon him by the conductor. As the two cases involved the same transaction, they were by consent tried together under the same evidence, and a separate verdict was rendered in each in favor of the respective plaintiffs. The defendant moved for a new trial in each case, which being refused, it excepted.

[2] We are now dealing only with Callahan's case. In one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial in his case, complaint is made that the court instructed the jury that "the same rule as to damages applies in this case as in the other," referring to the Spence case, and that in her case the court charged the jury, in effect, that she would be entitled to recover damages if the conductor of the defendant company used the language which she attributed to him, if it tended to subject her to humiliation and mortification. There was no evidence in the case we are now considering tending to show that the conductor used any improper or abusive language whatever to young Callahan, who was then only seven years of age, but that all the conductor said upon that occasion was addressed to Mrs. Spence. Indeed, young Callahan testified that he did not hear any abusive language used by the conductor to Mrs. Spence. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff in this case was not entitled to recover any damages for humiliation and mortification caused by any language addressed to him by the conductor; for, as we have stated, none such was used. The instruction complained of was manifestly erroneous, for the reason just stated, and was evidently calculated to increase the amount which the jury might find in favor of the plaintiff. The amount of the verdict in this case was $300, and the only injuries young Callahan received, according to the evidence, were that the defendant's conductor somewhat roughly took him by the arm, or hand, or both, and led him to the ground from the platform of the car where he was standing, or placed him upon the ground, and in being so taken from the platform down the steps from the car the plaintiff's foot or ankle struck the hand railing or steps, or some other portion of the car, and caused him pain, which according to the plaintiff's own testimony he suffered for only a few minutes, and that he was forced to remain in the cold from five to seven minutes, while his grandmother, Mrs. Spence, was procuring a ticket for him, which the agent of the company had at first refused to sell her, and, further, that the plaintiff was required to enter the train from the platform of the negro coach, or, as this plaintiff testified, the smoker, and to pass through that coach in order to reach the first-class coach, or the one for white passengers.

[1] In view of the amount of the verdict, we think it apparent that the instruction complained of was harmful to the defendant. Accordingly, the judgment of the trial court is reversed on account of such erroneous instruction.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

A. G. GARBUTT LUMBER CO. v. CAMP
et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 113*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

A suit for land was based upon prescription under color of title and seven years' possession. Certain deeds purporting to convey the land in controversy, and memoranda relating to the same, which were not admissible in evidence as muniments of title, were delivered to the plaintiffs at the time of the purchase of the land; and there was evidence tending to show that they took them, believing they were getting a genuine title to the land in controversy. Held, that the deeds and memoranda were admissible to show the good faith of the prescribers, and not as muniments of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 669-681; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

2. CHARGE OF COURT—NO ERROR.

There was no error in the charges given, or failures to charge, dealt with in the second division of the opinion.

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence was sufficient to authorize the verdict.

5. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—FURTHER REQUESTS.

In an action for land, based on prescriptive title, instructions that the working and operating of timber for turpentine purposes may amount to possession which will ripen into prescription, being dependent upon the character of the work and the continuity thereof, and that whether the cultivation of a turpentine farm upon a tract of land is such an occupancy as may be the basis of a prescriptive title is a question of fact, dependent upon the character of the possession, the extent of the visible signs of occupancy, and its continuance, were not erroneous, in the absence of a request to charge more fully.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 628-641; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—FURTHER OR MORE SPECIFIC INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court charged correctly the law bearing on the issues involved, if a fuller charge was desired by defendants, a request should have been made therefor.

7. TRIAL (§ 255*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—NECESSITY.

Error from Superior Court, Loundes County; W. E. Thomas, Judge.

Action by R. J. Camp and another against the A. G. Garbutt Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

R. J. and B. F. Camp brought their suit in Echols superior court against the A. G. Garbutt Lumber Company, to restrain them from cutting and removing the timber from land lot No. 90 in the Sixteenth district of Echols county, Ga., and for the recovery of damages. The plaintiffs claimed the title to the lot of land in controversy, and that the defendant was a willful trespasser upon said lot, and was engaged in cutting the timber therefrom for its own benefit, to the irreparable injury of the plaintiffs. They claimed title, also, to the timber suitable for sawmill and cross-tie purposes on the lot in controversy, and on lots Nos. 94, 95, and 136 in said county and adjacent thereto, and that they and their predecessors in title acquired a complete prescriptive title to the land, by reason of more than seven years' continuous and adverse possession under color of title, while engaged in working the timber for turpentine and cross-tie purposes. They relied upon a certain chain of deeds for color of title, and as showing good faith in those taking and holding under them, beginning with the plats and grants from the state of Georgia to Benjamin S. Jordan to the lots of land in controversy, dated January 2, 1842, and, the death of Jordan being shown, certified copies of deed conveying title out of the estate of Benjamin S. Jordan, deceased, into the estate of Skelton Napier, deceased, or to John T. Napier, as executor of the will of Skelton Napier; a certified copy of the will of Skelton Napier, deceased, dated April 7, 1832, with a codicil, dated March 10, 1856, under which Jane E. Napier, William P. Napier, and John T. Napier were named executors, said will being probated in common form; a certified copy, from the ordinary's office of Bibb county, of what purported to be an agreement or deed of division between the heirs at law of Skelton Napier, deceased, dated November 10, 1866; a certified copy of a deed from Emily E. Jordan and Leonidas A. Jordan sole heirs at law of B. S. Jordan, deceased, to John T. Napier, executor of Skelton Napier, deceased, dated February 28, 1871; letters of administration issued by the court of ordinary of Houston county, Ga., to Frances C. Napier, as administratrix of the estate of John T. Napier, deceased, dated February 5, 1872; a certified copy of an order from the court of ordinary of Houston county, granted at the August term, 1872, authorizing Fannie C. Napier, administratrix of the estate of John T. Napier, deceased, to sell the lot of land in controversy and other wild lands, at private sale; a deed from Mrs. Frances C. Napier, administratrix of John T. Napier, deceased, to John T. Willey, dated September 8, 1882; a deed from John T. Willey to J. B. Withers, dated June 22, 1885; a deed from J. B. Withers to S. J. Barnes, dated January 1, 1897; and a lease from S. J. Barnes and others to the plaintiffs, dated January 20, 1902, conveying the timber suitable for sawmill and cross-tie purposes on said land.

The defendant, in answer to the petition, denied that the plaintiffs purchased the timber in controversy for the purpose or with the view to using the same for sawmill or cross-tie purposes, that the plaintiffs acquired any title thereto by reason of any purchase they may have made, that the timber was worth the sum alleged ($1,000), or anything like said sum, that the profits from cutting and converting the timber into lumber and cross-ties could not be calculated and estimated, and that the plaintiffs would be entitled to the benefit of such profits, if made. Defendant admitted that it entered upon the lot of land described in the petition during the month of January, 1907, and commenced to cut and remove the timber therefrom suitable for sawmill purposes, and denied that it did so as a willful trespasser, without lawful claim, right, and authority, and denied, further, that the plaintiffs had sustained or would sustain any damages whatever by reason thereof, or that damages, if sustained, would be in their nature irreparable. The defendant further averred that it was the true and lawful owner of all the timber suitable for sawmill purposes situated, growing, and being on the lot of land described in the petition. A. G. Garbutt, secretary and treasurer of the defendant company, made an affidavit that the original deed, purporting to be from Emily E. Jordan and Leonidas Jordan, as sole heirs at law of Benjamin S. Jordan, deceased, to John T. Napier, as executor of the last will and testament of Skelton Napier, deceased, reciting a consideration of $5, etc., and conveying, among others, lot of land No. 90 in the Sixteenth district of originally Irwin (now Echols) county, Ga., was a forgery; and the issue of forgery was submitted, with the rest of the case, to the jury.

Under the charge of the court, the jury found the deed from Emily E. Jordan and Leonidas Jordan to John T. Napier, executor, to be a forgery, and also found in favor of the plaintiff the premises in dispute. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendant, which was overruled, and it accepted.

J. G. Cranford, E. K. Wilcox, and Wilson, Bennett & Lambdin, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Sweat, R. G. Tison, and G. A. Whitaker, for defendants in error.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. This is the second appearance of this case here. It will be found reported in 129 Ga. 411, 58 S. E. 870. The case turns largely on prescriptive title. The possession began in J. B. Withers, who held possession less than the time necessary to ripen the prescription. Then Withers made a deed to the property in controversy to S. J. Barnes, dated January 1, 1897. Barnes and others made a "timber lease" to R. J. and B. F. Camp, the plaintiffs in the court below, on January 20, 1902, conveying the timber on the land in controversy for sawmill and cross-tie purposes. Possession, under which prescription ripened, was in Barnes and the Camps. Several deeds and papers which purported to convey the title to the land, as well as an abstract of title and certain memoranda, were offered in evidence and admitted by the court over objection of defendant's counsel. Most, if not all, of these documents were not admissible as muniments of title, but as bearing on the subject of good faith on the part of the plaintiffs in purchasing the timber, which is one of the elements of prescription. Withers testified that the memoranda and chain of title came to him together, and that he thought he was getting a genuine title, or he would not have paid for it. Barnes testified that certain of the deeds and grants were delivered to him when he bought as agent for his wife, that they were not all the deeds that he received, and that he did not know anything about the originals of two other deeds mentioned, but he knew that he had bought them and they were all there when he bought. "They were with the full chain." Also, that he delivered the papers to the agent of one of the Camps. From this and other evidence it will be seen that a number of the papers introduced were before the prescribing parties at the time they purchased, and relied on by them in connection therewith; and while they may have been inadmissible as tending to prove title, they were admissible as bearing on the good faith of the prescribers. If any of these papers were inadmissible, their admission was not of sufficient materiality to require a reversal. The presiding judge did not submit to the jury at all the question of title by chain, or otherwise than by prescription; and certainly most, if not all, of the papers offered were admissible in that connection as bearing on the question of good faith, and, if any of them should have been rejected, their reception was not sufficiently material error to require a new trial, in the light of the charge, which directed the jury to find that a certain deed attacked for forgery should be declared to be such, and confined them to the contention as to whether the plaintiffs had acquired prescriptive title.

[2, 4] 2. It was not error for the court to charge the jury as follows: "An inchoate prescriptive title may be transferred by a possessor to a successor, so that the successive possessions may be tacked to make out the prescription." This charge of the court embodies a correct principle of law on this subject; and if a fuller charge, or an amplification of the principle to suit the facts of the case, was desired, a request therefor should have been made.

There was no error in the failure to charge the jury as contended in the thirteenth and fourteenth grounds of the amended motion for a new trial, in the absence of a request to so charge. The court had charged the jury that it took seven years' continuous adverse possession to ripen into prescription, and that the possession must be "public, continuous, exclusive, uninterrupted, and peaceable, and accompanied by a claim of right, and such continued for and during the term of seven years."

[5] There was no error in the following excerpts of the court's charge, in the absence of a request to charge more fully on the subjects excepted to: "The court instructs you, further, that the working and operating of timber for turpentine purposes may amount to possession which will ripen into prescription, being dependent upon the character of the work and the continuity thereof." And: "Whether or not the cultivation of a turpentine farm upon a tract of land is such an occupancy as may be the basis of a prescriptive title to the land itself is a question of fact, dependent upon the character of the possession, the extent of the visible signs of occupancy, and its continuance."

[6] The court concisely, but correctly, charged the jury the law bearing on the issues involved in the case; and, if a fuller charge was desired by the defendant, a request should have been made therefor. While the charge was meager in some respects, we cannot say that it was error.

[3,7] 3. It is insisted that the deeds and other papers admitted by the court in evidence on the question of the good faith of the plaintiffs were calculated to influence the jury in favor of the plaintiff's case. No request to charge the jury on the subject of limiting the deeds to the question of good faith was made, nor complaint that the court refused to so charge the jury. If the deeds and papers were admissible, and the defendant desired a charge to the effect that the deeds and other papers admitted were solely for the purpose of showing the good faith of the plaintiffs when they bought the timber in controversy, and the jury should consider them for that purpose alone, a request to so charge should have been made. McGruder v. State, 71 Ga. 864, 2 (a). While the evidence was somewhat meager on the question of possession, it was sufficient to authorize the verdict.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurred.

MORGAN v. COBB.

BILLS AND NOTES (§ 477*)—DEFENSES—PLEADING.

The court erred in refusing, on the plaintiff's motion, to strike the only plea which sought to set up a defense to the action.

Error from Superior Court, Hart County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by W. S. Morgan against M. C. Cobb. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. S. Morgan brought an action against Mattie C. Cobb on four promissory notes, aggregating $346 principal. The defendant, in her answer, admitted that she had executed and delivered the notes to the plaintiff, and that he was the owner of the same and had the right to sue thereon. By way of special plea she set up the following:

"For further plea and answer this defendant says that she was induced to sign said notes by the false statements and representations and fraudulent acts of the plaintiff, as will appear from the following statement of facts: Some years ago, previous to the time said notes were signed, defendant bought a small tract of land in said county, containing 20 acres, from J. A. Cook, and paid for the same; said land being a portion of a tract containing 100 acres, more or less, which the said J. A. Cook had purchased from J. N. Edwards, and on which entire tract of land the said J. A. Cook owed said Edwards a balance of the purchase money, amounting to $346, including interest up to January 15, 1904, which said sum this said defendant desired to borrow with which to pay said indebtedness as an accommodation to the said J. A. Cook, she, the said defendant, to have titles to said entire tract of land made to her to secure her for said money which she desired to advance on said land. On January 14, 1904, plaintiff came to the home of this defendant, and, voluntarily and unsolicited, proposed to loan her the said sum of money at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, which he claimed to be doing only as an accommodation to this defendant. Defendant at first declined his offer of a loan; but plaintiff insisted, and told defendant that he would give her papers, or bond for title, to the entire tract of land, containing 100 acres, more or less, to make her safe, and secure her against loss on account of advancing said money, and promised defendant that he would have H. H. Chandler, defendant's attorney, to prepare all papers pertaining to said transaction. Defendant then believed all of said statements and representations made by said plaintiff to be true, and acted upon the same, and finally agreed to borrow said sum of money from plaintiff, believing that he, the said W. S. Morgan, would comply with all of his said promises. The said Morgan then informed this defendant that it would be necessary for her to sign a paper to get said money, and pretended to be in a great hurry, and insisted that defendant sign said paper as quickly as possible, which she did, not knowing at the time the contents of same, she being unable at that time to read said paper, since which time this defendant has been advised, and now believes, that the paper to which her signature was thus obtained was a transfer to the said W. S. Morgan of all of her rights, title, and interest in and to her own land, on which she then lived and for which she had paid in full. Afterwards, on January 15, 1904, R. W. Eaves, acting as agent for said W. S. Morgan, came to the house of the defendant and informed her that the said Morgan wanted her to sign notes for said sum of money, which she at first refused to do until she had received a bond for title, as per her agreement with said Morgan, to which the said Eaves replied that if she would sign said note she could then get the bond for title as promised her by said Morgan. Defendant, still believing that said Morgan would comply with his said promises and that he was acting in good faith, signed said notes, same being the notes sued on in this case. The said Morgan failed and refused to comply with his said promise to give defendant bond for title as agreed, but gave her a bond for title to her own land, containing 20 acres, on which he, the said Morgan, had no claim whatever, except such as were obtained in the fraudulent manner aforesaid. The said Morgan willfully deceived this defendant, in that he promised to have H. H. Chandler, the attorney at law of this defendant, and in whom she had confidence, to prepare all the papers pertaining to said transaction, which he failed to do, but, on the contrary, took especial pains to prevent the said H. H. Chandler from knowing anything whatever about the transaction, and did, on the day following that on which said notes were signed, leave this state, and remove to New Mexico, or to some other Western territory or state. This defendant procured no funds whatever from said plaintiff, but the said Morgan did pay to W. N. Edwards, one of the executors of the estate of J. N. Edwards, deceased, the sum of $346, and claimed to have received from said Edwards titles to said entire tract of land, including the land of this defendant. As soon as defendant learned and ascertained the contents of the bond for title which the said Morgan had given her, she immediately demanded a rescission of the entire contract, tendered him all the money which he had paid out on said land, and demanded of him titles to same, as he agreed to do, all of which he refused and still refuses to do. Defendant says that all of said notes were procured by the fraudulent acts and false statements and representations made as aforesaid by the said Morgan; that all of said statements upon which this defendant acted in signing said notes, which she then believed to be true, were false, and known to said Morgan to be false, at the time the same were made, and were fraudulently made for the purpose of cheating, swindling, and defrauding this defendant out of the sum of $346; that the acts and statements made as aforesaid by the said Morgan amount to legal fraud, and that said notes are therefore void, all of said notes having been executed by this defendant without any consideration whatever. Defendant therefore asks that she be discharged, with costs of suit."

On the trial the plaintiff moved to strike this plea, on the ground that it did not set forth any legal defense to the action, which motion the court overruled. The plaintiff excepted to this ruling, and, after verdict in favor of the defendant, to the overruling of a motion for a new trial.

A. G. & Julian McCurry, for plaintiff in error. Jas. H. Skelton, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). In our opinion the court erred in refusing to strike the plea, which should be construed more strongly against the defendant. The averment in the plea that the plaintiff fraudulently induced the defendant to give him a bond for title to the 20 acres of land which she had purchased from Cook was not a sufficient allegation to constitute fraud practiced by the plaintiff upon the defendant. The averment in the plea was that the plaintiff "informed this defendant that it would be necessary for her to sign a paper to get said money, and pretended to be in a great hurry, and insisted that defendant sign this paper as quickly as possible, which she did, not knowing at the time the contents of same, she being unable at that time to read said paper, since which time this defendant has been advised, and now believes, that the paper to which her signature was thus obtained was a transfer to the said W. S. Morgan of all her rights, title, and interest in and to her own land, on which she then lived and for which she had paid in full." There is no averment that the plaintiff misrepresented to the defendant the character or the contents of the paper which she was then requested to sign, or that the plaintiff knew that the defendant believed the paper to be one other than it really was. Even if for any reason the defendant could not then read the paper, it does not appear that she inquired of the plaintiff what the contents of the paper were.

It does not appear from the plea that, before the transaction about which the notes were given, the plaintiff had any interest whatever in the balance of the land purchased by Cook from Edwards. Under the allegations of the plea, the title to such balance was either in Edwards, or, if he were dead, in his estate, or in Cook, if a conveyance had been made to him by Edwards or his executor. The plea, therefore, fails to show that the plaintiff, Morgan, could execute a valid bond for title or conveyance covering the balance of the land to the defendant; and it not appearing that the plaintiff had any authority so to do, his failure to give the defendant a bond for title to the balance of the land, or to convey the same to her, would not be a valid defense to the action on the notes. It appears from the plea that the plaintiff loaned the defendant the sum of $346, for which she gave him the notes sued on, which loan, as the plea shows, went to the payment of the balance of the purchase money for the whole 100 acres of land which Cook had purchased from Edwards, and there is no reason set up in the plea why the plaintiff, who was the lender of the money to the defendant, should have given her security, or an obligation to repay the same to her. Indeed, there is nothing in the plea indicating that the $346 was to be repaid to the defendant by the plaintiff, or by Cook, or any one else; but it does appear that she was paying it for Cook's accommodation, though he was no party to the contract between the plaintiff and defendant.

As the plea should have been stricken, the subsequent trial on the issue sought to be made by the plea was nugatory, and it is therefore unnecessary to pass upon the grounds of the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078)—REVIEW—ERROR WAIVED IN APPELLATE COURT.

The assignment of error upon the overruling of the demurrer to the petition is not referred to in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, and therefore it must be considered as abandoned.

Though conflicting, the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, and the discretion of the trial judge in refusing a new trial will not be disturbed.

A. B. SMALL CO. v. LIBERTY MILLS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. SALES (§§ 369, 377)—FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 158*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—DAMAGES—MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT.

A contract for the sale of a given number of barrels of flour, to be shipped in the future on orders furnished by the buyer, stated that it was "subject to the terms and conditions printed on the back hereof, which are hereby agreed to," and among such terms and conditions were that "failure to order flour out on demand of shipping instructions at expiration of the maximum 90-day period, or to pay accrued carrying charges on demand, gives seller the right to cancel contract, or resell the goods for buyer's account," and failure of seller "to ship within the maximum 90-day limit entitles the buyer to cancel the contract or buy a similar quantity and grade of goods for seller's account." Held that, upon failure of the buyer to comply with the contract in respect to the matter above indicated, the seller, without a resale, had the right at his option to sue for the difference between the contract price and the market value at the time and place of delivery (Civil Code 1910, § 4131); the contract not expressly stipulating or necessarily implying that the remedies given therein to the seller were to be exclusive. In this connection, see Leonard v. House, 15 Ga. 473; Seymour v. Cobb, 43 Ga. 525; Adams v. Haigler, 123 Ga. 659; 51 S. E. 638.

(a) In a suit by the seller against the purchaser for a breach of contract of the character indicated by the preceding note, where the damages for his failure and refusal to order shipment of a given number of barrels of flour were laid as the difference between the agreed price and the market value at the time and place for delivery, the petition was not demurrable because it also alleged that the seller shipped to the buyer at the place of delivery, on a given date within the time which the buyer was to order shipment of the same, a stated number of barrels of flour, which he had refused to order shipped, which specified number of barrels the buyer declined to accept, and thereupon the seller sold the same in that market at the highest and best price obtainable, and that the difference in the price so obtained and the contract price was the same as what was alleged to be the difference between the contract price and the market value at the time and place of delivery of the flour which buyer had failed and refused to order shipped.

(b) Where the contract stipulated that the buyer was to order shipment of the flour within a specified time, and in an action by the seller against him for its breach the petition alleged that additional time was granted the buyer upon his requests, it will not be assumed that such requests were oral, and therefore ineffective to change or modify the written contract, which under the statute of frauds was required to be in writing. We do not mean to hold, however, that, if the buyer procured delay in the performance of the contract by parol requests he could take advantage of that fact, whether the agreement for delay amounted to a binding contract or not. See, in this connection, Mendel v. Miller, 126 Ga. 834 (2), 58 S. E. 88, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1184; Hardwood Lumber Co. v. Adams, 134 Ga. 821 (6), 68 S. E. 725, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 192.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. §§ 369, 377; Frauds, Statute of, Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

The allegations of the petition as amended sufficiently explained the meaning of all the material portions of the contracts, in order to allow such meaning to be proved by competent aliunde evidence, and the petition was not demurrable on the ground that the contracts were obnoxious to the statute of frauds. Happ v. Hunter Co., 136 Ga. 671, 71 S. E. 1099.

3. DEMURRER TO PETITION OVERRULED.

The rulings above announced dispose of the controlling questions raised by demurrer to the petition. Other points presented by various grounds of demurrer were without merit, and it is not necessary to specifically deal with them.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. RAMSEY et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)(Syllabus by the Court.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1194)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—CONSTRUCTION OF JUDGMENT.

Where error was assigned on the overruling of a demurrer, the refusal to grant a nonsuit, and the overruling of a motion for a new trial, and this court passed upon the various questions raised, and entered a judgment that "the judgment of the court below be reversed because the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial," the effect of making such judgment of the Supreme Court the judgment of the lower court would not be to put the case out of court as on a nonsuit, but to leave it to stand for a new trial.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1201*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—REMITTITUR OF CAUSE—AMENDMENT OF PROCEEDINGS.

Under the ruling in Holcombe v. Richmond & Danville R. Co., 78 Ga. 778, 3 S. E. 755 (which has not since been modified or reversed), where certain persons, claiming to own land, brought suit against a railroad company for the purpose of recovering on account of damage alleged to have resulted to the land from the erection by the defendant of a bridge across a stream, and where it appeared that the legal title was in another at the time when the action was commenced, though he had made a conveyance to the plaintiffs pending the case, and this court held that the plaintiffs therefore could not recover, and granted a new trial, it was not error to allow an amendment to the petition, adding the name of the person who appeared to hold the legal title when the action was begun, suing for the use of the original plaintiffs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1201.*]

Error from Superior Court, Murray County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by Earl Ramsey and others against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed, with directions.

Ramsey and others brought suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to recover damages alleged to have resulted by reason of the construction of a bridge across a stream, causing water to be backed on a part of the land, and also causing soil to be washed away from a part of it. A demurrer was overruled. On the trial a motion for nonsuit was overruled, and the defendant filed exceptions pendente lite. A verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant moved for a new trial. This court affirmed the ruling on the demurrer, but for other reasons reversed the judgment of the trial court. The remittitur transmitted to the court below recited that: "It is considered and adjudged that the judgment of the court below be reversed because the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial." At the succeeding term of the superior court a judgment was entered, making the judgment of the Supreme Court the judgment of the superior court. Immediately thereafter counsel for the plaintiffs announced to the court that they wished to amend the declaration by adding a named person, claiming to hold the legal title when the suit was brought, as plaintiff, suing for the use of the originally named plaintiffs. Objection was made to this, on the ground that there was no case in court, as the entry of the judgment on the remittitur operated as a grant of a nonsuit, and also on the ground that the amendment added a new party and a new and distinct cause of action. Thereupon the plaintiffs' counsel made an oral motion to vacate the order, which had been signed, but not entered on the minutes, making the judgment of the Supreme Court the judgment of the superior court. The court granted the motion, and passed an order making the person named as holding the legal title to the land a party plaintiff, suing for the use of the plaintiffs already named. Counsel for the defendant moved the court to enter a judgment upon the remittitur from the Supreme Court, making its judgment that of the superior court, and that a nonsuit be entered. The presiding judge refused to enter a nonsuit, holding that the case had not been finally disposed of, and assigned it for trial at the succeeding term of court. The defendant excepted.

C. N. King and D. W. Blair, for plaintiff in error. Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, W. W. Sampler, and W. E. Mann, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. Ramsey and others brought suit against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to recover damages to land arising from the construction of a bridge across a stream. On the trial plaintiffs obtained a verdict. The defendant excepted to the overruling of a demurrer, to the refusal to grant a nonsuit, and to the overruling of a motion for a new trial. In this court the judgment of the court below was reversed. 134 Ga. 107, 67 S. E. 652. The decision dealt with the different rulings. While doubtless this court might have given direction that the case be entered nonsuited, had it seen proper to do so, such was not the judgment rendered. The admission of evidence and charges complained of in the motion for a new trial were dealt with in connection with the question whether the plaintiffs made out a prima facie case; and, upon the whole case, the judgment entered, as shown by the remittitur, was that the judgment of the court below be reversed, because the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial. The making of such judgment the judgment of the court below did not operate to nonsuit the case, or finally dispose of it, but to grant a new trial. It was accordingly not error for the presiding judge to refuse to enter a judgment of nonsuit or dismissal, upon motion. The remittitur from this court should have been made the judgment of the trial court, and the order for that purpose should not have been revoked. But so doing did not have the effect claimed for it by counsel for the plaintiff in error.

[2] 2. The action was originally brought in the name of Ramsey and others. It appeared that they relied on a parol gift, and also on a deed from one Harlan, but that such deed was made after the suit was brought. This court held that it was improperly admitted in evidence, as was also certain evidence tending to attach to a deed absolute on its face an express trust in land. When the case was returned to the superior court, a motion was made to amend the petition by inserting the name of Harlan as plaintiff, suing for the use of the original plaintiffs. To this objection was made, on the ground that it added a new party and a new and distinct cause of action. The objection was overruled, and the amendment allowed. It was urged in this court that section 5689 of the Civil Code of 1910, which declares: "When it becomes necessary for the purpose of enforcing the rights of such plaintiff, he may amend by substituting the name of another person in his stead, suing for his use"—applied to cases in which persons having equitable rights might enforce them in the name of the holder of the legal title; that, in general, there is no equity in damages arising from a tort; and that this section is not applicable to the case in hand. As an original proposition, there might appear to be some force in the argument. "An action for a tort must, in general, be brought in the name of the person whose legal right has been affected, and who was legally interested in the property at the time the injury thereto was committed." Civil Code 1910, § 5517. "A right of action is not assignable if it does not involve, directly or indirectly, a right of property; hence a right of action for personal torts, or for injuries arising from fraud to the assignor, cannot be assigned." This section was codified from a statement in the opinion in Central Railroad & Banking Co. v. Brunswick & Western Railroad Co., 87 Ga. 388, 18 S. E. 520, where one railroad company sued another for damages arising from a collision, and not only sought to recover damages done to it, but also to sue for the use of its engineer, who had been hurt. It is unnecessary to discuss the exact meaning of the words, "if it does not involve, directly or indirectly, a right of property." But the Code section first above quoted, allowing the petition to be amended by substituting the name of another person, instead of the original plaintiff, suing for his use, when it becomes necessary for the purpose of enforcing his rights, has been directly considered in Holcombe v. Rich- mond & Danville R. Co., 78 Ga. 776, 3 S. E. 755. In that case an insurance company brought suit against a railroad company, alleging that certain wood belonging to Holcombe had been destroyed through the negligence of the defendant; that the plaintiff had insured Holcombe against loss, and had paid the insurance; and it thereupon sought to recover from the railroad company the amount so paid. It was held that the petition, as originally brought, was demurrable, but that the presiding judge properly allowed an amendment adding the name of Holcombe as plaintiff, suing for the use of the insurance company.

We are not now discussing the question of the right of an insurer who is liable for the loss of property under certain circumstances, to recover in the name of the insured, for his use, against one negligently destroying the property. The point under consideration is as to amending a petition by adding the name of the person having the legal title to the property, suing for the use of the original plaintiffs. As to this point we think the ruling as to the case cited is controlling on that now before us. It has not been reviewed and reversed or modified. In connection with the general subject, see Mitchell v. Georgia & Ala. Ry., 111 Ga. 760, 771, 36 S. E. 971, 51 L. R. A. 622; Willis v. Burch, 116 Ga. 374, 42 S. E. 718; McElmurray v. Harris, 117 Ga. 919, 43 S. E. 987; McEachern & Co. v. Edmundson, 122 Ga. 80, 49 S. E. 798; 38 Cyc. 463; 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 487 et seq.

Direction is given that the remittitur be entered.

ROGERS et al. v. GREAT SOUTHERN ACCIDENT & FIDELITY CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

CORPORATIONS (§ 80*)—LIABILITIES—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

Under the allegations of the petition, the plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief prayed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by R. L. Rogers and another against the Great Southern Accident & Fidelity Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

R. L. Rogers, T. A. Maynard, and A. A. Camp, suing for themselves and others similarly situated, brought their petition against the Great Southern Accident & Fidelity Company, R. H. Cantrell, W. G. Chipley, J. R.

Duval, Ed. S. Moore, and H. H. Bass, alleging as follows:

In the early part of 1909 Cantrell and Chipley conceived the scheme of promoting and subsequently organizing the Great Southern Accident & Fidelity Company, ostensibly to engage in the business of casualty and fidelity insurance, but really for the purpose of defrauding such of the public as could be induced to subscribe for the stock of the proposed corporation. About March 1, 1909, Cantrell, Chipley, and their associates, including Duval, procured from the Secretary of State of Georgia a certificate of incorporation for the insurance company, authorizing it to do an insurance business, and providing that the capital stock of the company should be $500,000, divided into shares of $100 each. Petitioners are informed and believe that Cantrell and Chipley, through a fraudulent arrangement with the other incorporators of the company, took entire charge of promoting the organization of the company, by inducing subscriptions to the capital stock, collecting the subscriptions, and appropriating to themselves an enormous part of the collections; and after their efforts in this direction were exhausted, and they had looted the fund collected as far as possible, having a fictitious organization of the company, they abandoned the company. It was never the intention of Cantrell and Chipley to raise the entire capital of the company, nor to legitimately organize the company and prosecute the business for the conduct of which the company was incorporated; but their purpose was to realize for themselves an enormous sum of money by persuading people to invest in the stock of the proposed corporation, by falsely representing that men of large experience and national reputation as insurance men were to be identified with the company and have control of its affairs, that the company would begin business with a capital stock of $500,000 and a surplus of equal amount, that the stock would ultimately have an actual value of 2 for 1, that the field of operation was broad and ample, and that the profits of the company would be enormous from the beginning and the value of the stock would rapidly enhance. By false representations of this character, Cantrell and Chipley contemplated collecting a very large sum of money, deducting therefrom 45 per cent., or other large percentage, for themselves, paying such moneys as might be left to the provisional officers of the company, and leaving the company to its fate in the hands of incompetent and irresponsible men. Upon procuring a certificate of incorporation from the Secretary of State, Cantrell and Chipley proceeded to canvass, by themselves and other men employed by them, for the sale of the stock of the proposed company. In every instance they made false statements to induce subscriptions to the stock, painting the situation in such glowing terms that within the space of a few months they procured many subscriptions, selling each share for $200; although their par value was only $100, and representing that $100 for each share was to go to the capital account of the company and $100 to the surplus account. In this way they collected $325,000, representing $162,500 capital stock of the company. In nearly every instance a note was taken for the amount of the subscription, payable 12 months after date, to the subscriber's order, which note was placed at the subscriber's home bank, who was given a bonus of from 10 to 12 per cent. It was represented that the fund realized in any particular town would be left at the home bank, according to the plan adopted. In each case the bank, upon taking the note, issued its deposit slip in favor of the Great Southern Accident & Fidelity Company, showing the amount of credit in the bank. The deposit slip was then sold at a considerable discount. Out of the cash realized in this way Cantrell and Chipley appropriated to themselves 45 per cent., or other large percentage.

Petitioners were officers of the Winder Cotton Mills, and they subscribed to the stock of the proposed corporation under the persuasion of one Jackson, agent and representative of Cantrell and Chipley. Among the other false and fraudulent representations made to them in order to induce their subscription, it was promised to them by Jackson that the insurance company would immediately lend to the Winder Cotton Mills the sum of $35,000 at 6 per cent. interest, taking bonds of the mills as security. The mill was in need of a considerable sum, and had it not been for the representation of Cantrell and Chipley, through their agent, Jackson, that the insurance company would make the loan, petitioners never would have subscribed for the stock. This promise was a large inducement, and was falsely made, and it was never intended that the same should be carried out or performed, and in fact the insurance company refused to make such loan. Each of petitioners subscribed for five shares of the capital stock, executing a 12 months note for $1,000, payable to his own order, indorsing the same, and the notes were deposited in the Winder Banking Company; the bank receiving a bonus and issuing its time deposit slips upon the plan above referred to. Each of the petitioners was issued his certificate of stock for five shares, par value $100. The additional $500 was to go to surplus account of the company.

Afterwards, in the fall of 1909, as petitioners are advised and believe, a fictitious organization of the company was had in the office of the company in Atlanta, Ga. The required capital stock of the company had not been subscribed, and those who had subscribed were not notified of the proposed meeting. The entire capital stock of the company was voted by Cantrell and Chipley and by J. H. Dean, who was previously represented to be president of the company, although the company had never been duly organized so far as petitioners are informed, and who was in fact a mere figurehead, without real interest in the company. At this meeting Dean was deposed as president and Cantrell elected in his stead. Thereafter there was an attempt to organize the company, although the required capital stock had never been subscribed. At the stockholders' meeting at which this organization was attempted, H. H. Bass was elected president and J. R. Duvall secretary, as petitioners are informed. The company obtained a license to do business in February, 1910. It has practically done no business. It was really never contemplated by Cantrell and Chipley and their associates that the company would ever be organized in good faith, or in good faith engage in business. Since obtaining the license to do business above referred to, the company has been paying out large salaries to its various officers, as to the amounts of which the plaintiffs are not advised. They are informed that Ed. S. Moore, as manager of the company, is drawing an annual salary of $10,000, and that Renfro Jackson, as special agent, is paid $250 per month and all expenses. There are a number of other salaries paid, as petitioners are informed, all of which are out of proportion to the amount of business done by the company. The company is doing very little business, the expenses are heavy, and such assets as the company has are being rapidly impaired and wasted, and they will soon be exhausted and the company entirely wrecked, unless the assets of the company are seized by the court, conserved, and administered for the benefit of those entitled. Neither Cantrell nor Chipley is now interested in the company. None of the officers of the company are experienced and competent men to conduct the business of such a company. Not only are its assets being wasted, as before indicated, but the company is carrying on business without being properly and legally organized; and Bass, Moore, and Duvall are unauthorized to conduct the affairs of the company or receive or pay out the funds thereof.

As an instance of the reckless manner in which the company is being managed, it is alleged that the defendants settled with a subscriber, who claimed that he had been defrauded, by refunding his money and paying a large sum, amounting to about $1,000, as fees to the attorneys in the case brought by him. They also refunded to another subscriber his money paid on stock subscription. Petitioners are informed that a large percentage of those induced to subscribe are claiming that their subscriptions were given under false and fraudulent representations, and a number of the subscribers have brought ordinary suits against the company for the money paid by them to Cantrell and Chipley for the company. "Under the circumstances aforesaid, petitioners are not indeed stockholders of said company, and they here and now repudiate as void their subscriptions to the stock of said company, being induced as aforesaid by false and fraudulent representations and promises. Most of the other persons who were induced to subscribe to the stock of said company are claiming that their stock subscriptions are likewise void, and that they are creditors of the company, and not stockholders; and upon information and belief petitioners aver that such is the fact, and that said company is therefore insolvent, its assets having been so largely looted, wasted, and dissipated as to leave the company without sufficient money to redeem such fraudulently induced subscriptions." Petitioners are informed that a large number of the notes given by subscribers to the stock for payment of their subscriptions have been and will be repudiated, and that the subscribers will not pay the same, claiming them to be void, because procured by fraud, all of which notes must be paid to the banks holding them by the company. Petitioners are informed that Cantrell and Chipley have now considerable property, purchased with the money illegally and fraudulently taken by them from subscribers to the stock of the company; but petitioners are not able to locate and describe these properties.

They pray that the defendants be enjoined from disposing of any of the assets or funds in their hands, belonging to the company or purchased with money put into the company by petitioners or others in like position, or in any way disturbing or changing the present status of the assets or the affairs of the corporation, or attempting to prosecute the business in the corporation's name; that Cantrell and Chipley be especially restrained from disposing of any of their properties in which they have invested the money illegally procured by them of petitioners and others in like situation, on subscriptions to the stock of the company; that a receiver be appointed to take charge of all the property of the various defendants; that Cantrell and Chipley be required to account to the receiver for all moneys illegally received by them from subscriptions of petitioners and others in like position; and that judgment be rendered in favor of the receiver against Cantrell and Chipley for the sum of money found to be due by them by such accounting.

The defendants filed their several demurrers, both general and special, upon numerous grounds, asserting, inter alia, that no cause of action is set out against any of the defendants; that the allegations with reference to the fraud of Cantrell and Chipley in no wise affected the corporation; that no specific acts of fraud were charged; that the plaintiffs, having paid no money for the stock, and having repudiated the notes given therefor, were neither creditors nor stockholders, and had no interest whatever in the company; that there was a misjoinder of parties; and that the plaintiffs, if they were stockholders, were estopped from attacking the validity of the organization of the company, as it had complied with the laws with reference to the organization of insurance companies, and had been recognized by the state and given a license to do business as an insurance company.

The petition was dismissed on general demurrer, and the plaintiffs excepted.

PURYEAR v. FARMERS' MUT. INS. ASS'N.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 651*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—BY-LAWS.

In September, 1906, a fire insurance company, which assessed its members to pay losses, issued a policy which contained a clause providing that the liability of the company should cease if the insured should neglect to pay any assessment within 30 days after the agent's notices had been issued. The policy declared that the company and the insured should be bound by the by-laws; but no by-laws were set out or attached, as provided by the act of August 17, 1906 (Civil Code 1910, § 2471). Held that, on the trial of a suit on the policy, it was error to admit in evidence a clause of the by-laws for the purpose of showing the provision as to the manner of issuing notices of assessments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1673-1675; Dec. Dig. § 651.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 310*)—FORFEITURE—NON-PAYMENT OF ASSESSMENT—NOTICE.

Where a policy of insurance contains a clause which works a forfeiture on failure to pay assessments made to meet losses within 30 days after notice, unless there is something to show a contrary intent, it will be construed to require actual notice; and the mailing of a notice which is never received will not work that result.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 703, 761, 780, 826, 840, 904; Dec. Dig. § 310.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 310*)—FORFEITURE—NON-PAYMENT OF ASSESSMENT.

A provision that such forfeiture shall result from a failure to pay any assessment within 30 days "after the agent's notices have been issued," in the absence of anything further, will not be construed to work a forfeiture for failure to pay an assessment of which notice was mailed, but never received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 703, 761, 780, 826, 840, 904; Dec. Dig. § 310.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 668*)—ACTIONS ON POLICIES—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

There was evidence tending to show these facts: A policy was issued to D. Puryear, and the insured later received by mail a postal card addressed to "C. Y. Per," containing a notice of an assessment of a stated amount; but, not believing it to be intended for him, and at the instance of the company's agent, he returned it to the company by mail, with the request that, if it was for him, they should correct it, and the statement that he was ready to pay his assessment. He heard nothing from the company, though its agent promised to call and correct the matter. Held, that in a suit on the policy it was error to direct a verdict for the defendant, although the company's secretary testified that he mailed a correct notice after receipt of the plaintiff's letter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1732-1770; Dec. Dig. § 668.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. INSURANCE (§ 687*)—"FRATERNAL BENEFICIARY ORDER."

A fire insurance company operating on the assessment plan is not a "fraternal beneficiary order," within Civ. Code 1910, §§ 2866-2877, relating to such orders.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1824; Dec. Dig. § 687.*]

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by D. Puryear against the Farmers' Mutual Insurance Association. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, for plaintiff in error. J. G. B. Erwin, Jr., and J. M. Neel, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. A policy of insurance on a house was issued to D. Puryear by the Farmers' Mutual Insurance Association; the insurer being a company operating on the assessment plan. In addition to making certain provisions as to assessments, the policy declared that both the association and the insured should be governed by the by-laws. After a loss by fire, a suit was filed by the insured. On the trial the court directed a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was refused, and he excepted.

[1] 1. The policy of insurance was dated September 18, 1906. It had no copy of by-laws attached to it. Objection was made to the introduction in evidence of the by-laws in regard to mailing notices of assessments, but this was overruled. The objection was well taken, and should have been sustained. The act of August 17, 1906 (Civil Code 1910, § 2471), was in force when this policy was issued. It declares that where an insurance policy contains a reference to the application for insurance, or to the constitution, by-laws, or other rules of the company, as forming part of the policy or contract, or having any bearing on the contract, a copy thereof shall be contained in or attached to the policy, and that, if not so attached, such constitution and by-laws shall not be received in evidence as a part of the policy, or as an independent contract, or be so considered. Johnson v. American National Life Ins. Co., 134 Ga. 800, 68 S. E. 731. This applies in terms to "all life and fire insurance policies issued upon the life or property of persons within this state," whether issued by a domestic or foreign company. There is no exception as to insurance companies operating on the assessment plan. It is true that prior to 1906 there was in the Code a section which declared that the rules and regulations of a mutual insurance company became a part of the policy; and this still remains in the Code of 1910 as section 2530. But it must be construed in harmony with the act of 1906, now embodied in section 2471. Similarly section 2479, which was in existence prior to 1906, declares that representations in an application are considered as covenanted to be true. But, if not harmonized with section 2471, it practically nullifies that section, codified from a latter act.

[5] In Pennsylvania it has been held that a somewhat similar statute does not apply to benefit societies; but a different rule has been declared in Kentucky. Whichever of these decisions may be the sounder, it does not affect this defendant, which is not a fraternal beneficiary order, within the meaning of the laws of this state. Civil Code 1910, § 2866 et seq. See, in this connection, Heralds of Liberty v. Bowen, 8 Ga. App. 325, 68 S. E. 1008. It was accordingly error to admit in evidence the by-laws of the company, which were referred to in the policy, but of which no copy was attached.

[2] Omitting from consideration the by-laws, how stands the case? The policy declares that "the insured shall bear his pro rata portion of all expenses and loss sustained by the members of this association." It also contains this clause: "Should this insured neglect to pay any assessment to meet the loss of property of any member of the association, that at noon of the thirtieth day after the agent's notices have been issued the liability of this association shall cease until such time as the insured be again restored to membership in the association; but the treasurer shall collect the last assessment, it being a premium for past protection." What was the effect, standing alone, of the provision that the liability of the association should cease on the thirtieth day after the agent's notices "have been issued"? The ceasing of liability was provided to occur without further action. Where forfeitures are to result from non-payment of contingent and irregular assessments, in the absence of any agreement as to notice, it has been declared that the law will hold that no liability to pay the assessment has become fixed until notice has been given. Wright v. Supreme Commandery of the Golden Rule, 87 Ga. 426, 13 S. E. 564, 14 L. R. A. 283. Where notice is required to be given, it is generally held, in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, that the notice is not complete until it is received, and that, while mailing a notice duly directed and stamped may furnish presumptive evidence of its receipt, it does not alone constitute notice. Courtney v. U. S. Masonic Benefit Association (Iowa) 53 N. W. 238; McCorkle v. Texas Benevolent Ass'n, 71 Tex. 149, 8 S. W. 516; Castner v. Insurance Co., 50 Mich. 277, 15 N. W. 452; Supreme Council American Legion of Honor v. Hass, 116 Ill. App. 587; Preferred Accident Ins. Co. v. Fielding, 35 Colo. 19, 83 Pac. 1013, 9 Ann. Cas. 916; 3 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. 2356 (h) et seq., and citations.

[3] In Wyone Shoe Co. v. Daniels & Co., 136 Ga. 192, 71 S. E. 1, a statute requiring a purchaser of a stock of goods in bulk to notify, "personally or by registered mail," the creditors of the vendor, 5 days before completing the purchase or paying therefor, was construed, with reference to its language and context, to be satisfied by sending the proper notice by registered mail. This is different from the present case. Here the liability of the company was to cease if the insured should neglect to pay any assessment to meet the loss of property of any member within 30 days "after the agent's notices have been issued." Unaided by any by-laws as to issuance of notice, what does this require? The transitive verb "issue" sometimes means to send out or let out, and sometimes to deliver or give out, as for use, to send out officially, or to deliver by authority. Webster's Dictionary; Century Dictionary. A county warrant has been held not to be issued until it is actually delivered to the person authorized to receive it. American Bridge Co. v. Wheeler, 35 Wash. 40, 76 Pac. 534. Where a provision in the constitution of a society declared that a member should be liable for dues, etc., for the month in which his certificate was "issued or dated by the supreme secretary," it was held that the certificate was not "issued" until it had been delivered to and accepted by the subscriber. Logsdon v. Supreme Lodge of Fraternal Union of America, 34 Wash. 666, 76 Pac. 292. In Mass. Benefit Life Ass'n v. Robinson, 104 Ga. 256, 30 S. E. 918, 42 L. R. A. 261, it was held that, "If a policy of insurance is capable of being construed in two ways, that interpretation must be placed upon it which is most favorable to the insured." Thornton v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 116 Ga. 121, 126, 42 S. E. 287, 289, 94 Am. St. Rep. 99. No mode of issue is here prescribed. If the company could say that sending out a notice by mail would suffice, whether received or not, why might it not urge the same argument if the notices were sent out by a messenger?

[4] The plaintiff testified, among other things, as follows: His name was D. Puryear. He found in his mail box a card addressed to "C. Y. Per," calling for payment of an assessment of $2, and having attached a notice that unless it was paid in 30 days the policy would be void. He asked the postmaster if it was intended for him, to which the latter replied that he thought so, and, if not, he did not know for whom it was. Plaintiff met the agent of the company at the post office, and asked him if the card was intended for plaintiff, to which the agent replied that he thought not, and told him to send it back to the company, or a named officer, and tell them, if it were intended for him, to send another notice of assessment, and that he was ready to pay the money. He did so, but received no reply. The agent promised several times to come down and have it corrected, but the plaintiff never knew of his having come. He did not know the authority of the agent. It is unnecessary to set out the evidence for the defendant, further than to say that the treasurer of the company testified that, after receiving the letter of the assured, he mailed another notice. The judge directed a verdict, which he could not lawfully do, unless the uncontradicted evidence, with all reasonable deductions therefrom, demanded it. Civil Code 1910, § 5926. It did not do so in this case.

It was argued that, if the first card or notice was insufficient, the policy holder made the United States post office his agent by asking for a reply to his letter, and thus ran the risk of receiving the reply. This is not sound. He did not ask a reply by mail, if that would have had the effect claimed. The evidence stated above makes a very different case from making a proposition or offer by mail.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

PROCESS (§ 31*)—PARTIES (§ 59*)—AUTHORITY OF COURT—DIRECTION TO DIFFERENT DEFENDANT—VALIDITY.

Where process is prayed against a named person, and there is nothing in the petition to indicate an intention on the part of the plaintiff to name any other person as defendant, the suit must be construed as having been brought only against the party named in the prayer. In such a case the clerk has no authority to annex a process directed to a different person, nor can the petition be amended by striking the name of the defendant from the prayer and substituting in his stead that of the person named in the process.

Error from City Court of Blakely; L. M. Rambo, Judge.

Action by J. M. Brown, Governor, against M. W. White and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants petition to set aside the judgment, and ask process against the solicitor of the city court. The clerk issued process against Hoke Smith, Governor, and a special appearance was entered in behalf of J. M. Brown, his successor. From an order dismissing the petition, petitioners bring error. Affirmed.

B. R. Collins, for plaintiffs in error. W. G. Park and Glessner & Park, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. A judgment absolute upon the forfeiture of a criminal recognizance was entered in the city court of Blakely against White as principal and Harris as surety. At a subsequent term they filed a petition seeking to set aside the judgment absolute, upon several grounds mentioned in the petition. The petition did not in its body name any person as a party defendant, but did allege that the judgment sought to be vacated was against the plaintiffs and in favor of J. M. Brown, Governor. The plaintiffs prayed that process issue against the solicitor of the city court. The clerk annexed a process naming Hoke Smith, Governor, as defendant, and requiring him to appear and plead, and service was acknowledged by the solicitor, but no waiver of process was made. At the trial term, the city court solicitor entered a special appearance in behalf of "J. M. Brown and his successor, Hoke Smith, Governor," and moved the court to quash the process which had been issued by the clerk, requiring the Governor to appear and answer the petition. Thereupon the plaintiffs offered an amendment, praying that process issue directed to Hoke Smith, Governor, and striking the prayer for process against the city court solicitor. The court refused the amendment and dismissed the petition, to all of which the plaintiffs excepted.

1. This was not an effort to amend a defective process. The process was in proper form. It is clear, however, that the city court solicitor was the party defendant, since this must be determined by the prayer for process. No other person was named as defendant in the body of the petition, nor was anything therein disclosed to indicate an intention to proceed against any other person as defendant. Orr Shoe Co. v. Kimbrough, 99 Ga. 143, 25 S. E. 204. The clerk was without authority to annex a process calling upon Governor Smith to appear and answer, and such a process was properly treated as a nullity. Selsel v. Wells, 99 Ga. 159, 25 S. E. 266. The amendment offered sought to add a new and distinct party, and was properly disallowed. The mere acknowledgment of service by the solicitor did not cure the defect. Selsel v. Wells, 99 Ga. 159, 25 S. E. 266. The decision in Lyons v. Planters' Bank, 86 Ga. 485, 12 S. E. 882, 12 L. R. A. 155, does not, upon its facts, conflict with what is now ruled. In that case there was no prayer for process at all and the persons named as defendants appeared and pleaded. This was a waiver of process and of a prayer therefor. It has never been held that a plaintiff can proceed directly against one person as defendant, and then by amendment, convert the action into one against an entirely different person.

Judgment affirmed.

1. APPEARANCE (§ 24*)—EFFECT—WAIVER OF IRREGULARITY.

Where the process attached to the petition was dated January 7, 1907, and required the defendant to be and appear at the city court of Atlanta to be held on the first Monday in January, 1908, and the defendant was duly served with the process and petition and appeared in that court at the January term, 1908, and filed a plea to the merits of the suit, this was a waiver of irregularities of the proceedings; and it was not error to overrule a motion to dismiss the petition, made one year after the plea was filed, because of the mistake in the date of the process. Civil Code 1910, § 5551. The date of the process was immaterial, when the defendant was duly served with the petition and process, and made an appearance and filed a plea at the term of the court at which the process required him "to be and appear."

The copy of the note sued on, attached to the petition, contained the clause that it was payable "at the Fourth National Bank of Atlanta, Ga., for value received, with interest after date until paid at 8 per cent. per annum." By an amendment to the petition this clause was stricken, and in lieu thereof the following inserted: "At the Third National Bank of Atlanta, Ga., for value received, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum," etc. Held: (1) The amendment was properly allowed. Chapman v. Skellie, 65 Ga. 125 (1). (2) Overruling a motion to continue on the ground of surprise because of the allowance of the amendment was not an abuse of discretion, in the absence of a showing that the movant was less prepared to go to trial. Railway Co. v. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 642)—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE—REVIEW—CERTIORARI—BOND.

The filing of a bond conditioned for the personal appearance of the defendant to abide the final order, judgment, or sentence of the municipal court or of the superior court (or the filing of a proper affidavit in forma pauperis in lieu of a bond) is a condition precedent to obtaining the writ of certiorari in a case where one seeks to review the judgment of a municipal court. The bond must be approved by the clerk of the municipality under which the court exists, if there be one, and it must be conditioned for the appearance of the defendant to abide the final judgment of the superior court, as well as of the mayor's court, and a defect in either respect is fatal. Consequently it is not error for a judge of the superior court to refuse to sanction a petition for certiorari when it appears from an inspection of the bond tendered and attached to the petition that it is neither conditioned as required by law nor approved by the municipal officer charged by law with the duty of approving it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 642.*]

Error from Superior Court, Jackson County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Ause Moon, Dock Appleby, Grace Duke, and Buster Phillips were severally convicted of violating an ordinance of the City of Jefferson. From an order of the superior court refusing to sanction petitions for certiorari, each defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Ray & Ray and Mahaffey & Mahaffey, for plaintiffs in error. C. L. Bryson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. We are precluded from a consideration of the merit of the attacks upon the constitutionality of the ordinance of the city of Jefferson, sought to be made in the petitions for certiorari in these cases. The trial judge, for the same reason, could not consider them. It appears, from an inspection of the petition for certiorari and the exhibits referred to thereby, including the bond itself, that the bond was approved in one case by the mayor and in the others by the acting mayor of the city of Jefferson, when they should have been approved by the clerk of the city council. It also appears in the case of Ause Moon that the petitioner only binds himself to appear before the mayor, if the certiorari is decided finally in favor of the city of Jefferson, and pay the fine or serve the sentence. In the other three cases the condition of the bond is that it shall be void if the principal in the obligation abides and answers the final judgment in said case, whatever it may be. It is therefore plain, that the judge of the superior court did not err in refusing to sanction all of these petitions. As held by the Supreme Court in Johns v. City of Tifton, 122 Ga. 734, 50 S. E. 941: "The filing of the bond or making of the pauper affidavit is a condition precedent to the application for certiorari." Both the Supreme Court and this court have frequently defined the requisites of the bond in cases of certiorari from judgments of municipal courts. In the Johns Case, supra, it was held that "a bond conditioned to pay the eventual condemnation money is not such a bond as the statute prescribes, and the trial judge did not err in refusing to sanction the application." In McDonald v. Ludowici, 3 Ga. App. 654, 60 S. E. 337, this court held that a certiorari could properly be dismissed, either where the bond was not approved by the proper officer of the municipality, or where it was not conditioned to abide by the judgment of the superior court, or the mayor's court.

This ruling has been followed without exception, because we have deemed the act of 1902 (Acts 1902, p. 105) mandatory, and have considered the matter of perhaps even more importance since the passage of the act of 1909 (Civil Code 1910, §§ 5192-5194), which provides for the supersedeas of the judgment upon the filing of the bond. Upon the proposition that the certiorari should not be sanctioned, or, if sanctioned, should be dismissed, where it appears that the bond was not approved by the proper municipal officer, see Condon v. Town of Jesup, 5 Ga. App. 100, 62 S. E. 677. Upon the proposition that the certiorari bond must be conditioned strictly as provided by law, we pointed out, in McDonald v. Ludowici, supra, the apparent reason for the legislative requirements for the appearance of the defendant to abide the final order or judgment of the superior court, as well as of the police or mayor's court, and this ruling was followed in Simon v. Savannah, 4 Ga. App. 172, 60 S. E. 1036, Poulos v. Atlanta, 4 Ga. App. 567, 61 S. E. 1128, Tooke v. City of Oglethorpe, 4 Ga. App. 851, 62 S. E. 544, and Roach v. Atlanta, 7 Ga. HUBBARD v. SHAW. (No. 3,218.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COMPENSATION OF BROKER—SUFFICIENCY.

There was a direct conflict between the evidence for the plaintiff and the testimony of the defendant; but the credibility of the witnesses is a question to be determined by the jury, and the evidence fully authorized the conclusion that the defendant empowered his partner in the land to employ the plaintiff as a real estate agent to sell the farm in question, giving his partner unlimited discretion as to the terms and conditions of the sale, and that the real estate agent fulfilled his contract by finding a purchaser who was able, willing, and ready to comply with the terms of sale fixed by the partner and ratified by him.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 207, 1051*)—RELEASE (§ 28*)—HARMLESS ERROR—PRESENTATION OF QUESTIONS IN LOWER COURT—RELEASE OF JOINT OBLIGOR.

The remaining assignments of error are not sufficiently meritorious to warrant a reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial.

(a) The hearsay testimony was not injurious to the defendant, in view of the testimony of the defendant's partner that he was satisfied as to the willingness of the proposed purchaser to buy and his ability to pay for the partnership farm.

(b) The statement of counsel for the plaintiff in the court below to the effect that Kelly, one of the codefendants, had tendered one-half of the commissions sued for, and that none of the costs should be taxed against him, did not amount to a release of the other defendant; and, even if the statement was prejudicial to the plaintiff in error, no ruling of the lower court was invoked thereon, and consequently that phase of the exception presents nothing for the consideration of this court.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1031*)—PRESUMPTION OF PREJUDICE—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

The argument of counsel, being based upon an inference unsupported by evidence and irrelevant to the merits of the cause, was presumably prejudicial to a fair consideration by the jury of the rights of the opposite party; and, the latter's counsel having properly objected thereto and moved for a mistrial, it was error not to grant a mistrial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4038-4046; Dec. Dig. § 1031.*]

Chapman & Howard, for plaintiff in error. O. E. Battle and Howell Hollis, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Upon an examination of the record in this case we were first inclined to affirm the judgment in refusing a new trial, but upon more mature reflection we are satisfied that the argument of the distinguished counsel for the plaintiff in the court below must necessarily have prejudiced the rights of the defendant, and probably deprived him of his right of an absolutely fair and impartial trial, had, as all trials should be had, upon the law and the evidence, and nothing else. The right to an absolutely fair and impartial trial is guaranteed every party in every cause, and the highest duty of a court is to see that this right is preserved absolutely unimpaired. The importance of the principle is likely to be overlooked, when the cause is a civil case and only a small amount is involved; but the paramount importance of this right should never be overlooked, and, when the power of the court is properly invoked for its protection and preservation, the appeal should in no case be disregarded. Retribution upon any party offending should be speedy and unsparing. As was said in Parker v. State, 3 Ga. App. 23, 59 S. E. 205: "It is with the greatest reluctance and with the gravest sense of responsibility that a court of review will control the conduct of a trial judge in the administration and exercise of the high duties which devolve upon him." Counsel, too, in the discharge of his duties to his client, standing, as he does, in his client's shoes to plead his cause, should be allowed the utmost freedom of speech and action consistent with the rules of orderly judicial procedure; yet in any case in which the attorney for one party does any unwarranted act which prejudices the right of the opposite party to have the jury accord exactly impartial consideration of his contentions as deducible from the evidence in the case, or when the attorney for either party argues before the jury matters foreign to the issue and unsupported by the evidence which are prejudicial to the opposite party, the duty devolves upon the court of dealing summarily with the matter, if it is properly called to his attention. This rule is essential, to the end that exact justice shall be administered. [1] In the present case, which only involves a small amount, the judge certifies that the plaintiff's attorney argued in conclusion that the defendants had collected insurance money from insurance companies on all the stock of merchandise of the defendant, including the rice in controversy. The defendant's attorney objected in open court to this argument, and the judge stated to the jury that such argument was improper, and that the jury should not consider it. After this ruling and instruction, the plaintiff's counsel stated to the court that he was arguing this fact only as an inference to be drawn from the testimony in the case, to which the court replied, in substance, that it would not be proper to argue any fact not brought out by the testimony, but any fair inference counsel drew from the testimony might be stated as an inference only. Thereupon counsel for the plaintiff continued to argue that it was a fair inference to be drawn from the testimony in the case that the defendant had collected on all his stock of merchandise, and on all this rice, which had been destroyed in the store. Counsel for the defendant again objected to the argument, and urged that it was unfair and prejudicial to the defendant, and without any evidence to support it, and thereupon moved the court to declare a mistrial. The court overruled the motion to grant a mistrial, and error is assigned upon this ruling. We think a review of the record sustains the contention that the failure of the court to declare a mistrial, under the circumstances, had the effect of denying the defendant a fair and impartial trial upon the issues involved in the case; that the argument was calculated to prejudice the jurors' minds against the defendant, because it was unfair argument and had no connection with the true issues in the case. The only issues under the evidence were whether the rice ordered by the defendant was shipped to him by the plaintiff, and, if so, whether the fact that the rice was received by the defendant from the carrier sufficed to constitute such an acceptance of the shipment as would remove the sale from the operation of the statute of frauds, the value of the rice being more than $50. "Mere receipt of goods, without acceptance, will not meet the requirements of the statute of frauds." Wholesale Mercantile Co. v. Jackson, 2 Ga. App. 782 (3), 59 S. E. 109; Loyd v. Wight, 20 Ga. 578, 65 Am. Dec. 636; s. c. 25 Ga. 215; Tiedeman on Sales, § 66. If there had been any evidence to the effect that the defendant collected insurance upon the rice, or any evidence that the rice was specifically considered by either party when the loss by fire was adjusted, the inference that the defendant had accepted the rice and treated it as his own would have been authorized. We do not find anything in the defendant's letter to the plaintiff, however, which authorized any such inference. Nothing to that effect was elicited from Knowles on cross-examination, and no direct or circumstantial evidence to that effect appeared in the record from any source.

For this reason we think there was nothing to suggest the inference which counsel for the plaintiff sought to argue, except mere conjecture. There could, at most, be but a suspicion that Knowles might have been paid for the rice, due to the fact that it was in his store at the time of the fire; but this would not authorize the inference that he had received pay for it, in the absence of any evidence as to the time when his insurance was taken out, the amount of insurance upon the stock, and the value of his stock of goods at the time the contract of insurance was entered into and at the time of the fire. If, as we think, the inference was unauthorized, it was naturally very prejudicial to the defendant, because it would place him in the attitude of refusing to pay for goods for which he himself had been paid. Nothing more strongly prejudices an honest jury against the litigant than evidence of his dishonesty. Nothing in our experience can more strongly tend to influence a fair jury (perhaps unconsciously to themselves) against a contention otherwise unanswerable than circumstances which strongly suggest the fact that the contention is not fairly presented. The amount involved in this case was small. As suggested by the remarks of Judge Lamar in discussing a similar situation (Patton v. State, 117 Ga. 238-239, 43 S. E. 533), the defendant's counsel in the instant case took a great risk in objecting to the argument at all, because juries are so much in favor of the right of free speech that the objection might suggest to the jury that the counsel was of the opinion that the plaintiff was protecting an unusually vulnerable point in the defendant's defense, and that if the plaintiff's counsel had been permitted to develop the whole truth, unobstructed by a legal technicality, more of the true merits of the transaction might have been disclosed to their view. The court properly sustained the objection of the defendant's counsel, but practically withdrew the ruling and magnified the injurious effect of the argument when he later permitted plaintiff's counsel to argue, as a legitimate inference from circumstances proved in the case, the same thing to which objection had been offered as not being a matter of direct proof. We think the court erred in the latter ruling; for, unless the inference indulged can be reasonably drawn from facts and circumstances in a given case, it cannot arise at all and does not exist. There must be a plain connection between the facts in proof and the inference drawn therefrom. If the inference in question is not manifestly supported by, and reasonably deductible from, the facts in proof, the argument is irrelevant, and ordinarily prejudicial.

[2] Otherwise than as above stated, the trial was free from error.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 71*)—PRESUMPTIONS—DUE COURSE OF MAIL.

Where the plaintiff's evidence shows that letters were written and duly mailed, properly addressed to the defendant, a presumption arises that they were received. This presumption is rebuttable, and is entirely overcome by the uncontradicted evidence of the defendant that the letters were never received. Hamilton & Co. v. Stewart, 108 Ga. 476, 34 S. E. 123, and citations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 92; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 150*)—REPAIRS—DUTY OF LANDLORD.

The duty of the landlord to make repairs does not arise until he has knowledge of defects. The tenant, being in possession, must notify the landlord of needed repairs. Dougherty v. Taylor & Norton Co., 5 Ga. App. 776, 63 S. E. 928; Ocean Steamship Co. v. Hamilton, 112 Ga. 901, 38 S. E. 204; White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 150*)—REPAIRS—DUTY OF LANDLORD.

Where the tenant and the landlord live in different cities, and the custom during the tenancy for several years has been for the tenant to make needed repairs and charge the costs of the repairs in the settlement of rent, the landlord would have the right to assume that this custom would continue during the tenancy, unless expressly notified by the tenant to the contrary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 536-557; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 154*)—CONDITION OF PREMISES—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES.

The uncontradicted evidence in this case showing that the landlord did not know of the necessity for making the repairs, and that the tenant had been in the habit for several years of making all needed repairs on the premises and deducting the costs therefor from the rent, which practice had been acquiesced in by the landlord, and the landlord had not been informed by the tenant of any discontinuance of such practice, the landlord was not liable for any damage to the property of the tenant caused by want of repairs, and a nonsuit was properly awarded.

RANSOM. (No. 3,244.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1004*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

The plaintiff in her petition asks for no damages other than vindictive damages. "The entire injury," as alleged, "is to the peace, happiness, and feelings of the plaintiff. The verdict of a jury in such a case should not be disturbed, unless the court should suspect bias or prejudice from its excess or its inadequacy."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3944-3947; Dec. Dig. § 1004.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1006*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

This is the third consecutive verdict for the plaintiff, upon testimony at each trial substantially identical (Ga. So. & Fla. Ry. Co. v. Ransom, 5 Ga. App. 740, 63 S. E. 525; Id., 8 Ga. App. 277, 63 S. E. 943), the instructions of the court to the jury in the instant case do not vary in any material particular from the charge heretofore approved by this court (5 Ga. App. 740, 63 S. E. 525), and this court having then ruled that a verdict for the same amount as that now under review ($700) could not, as a matter of law, be held to be excessive, the assignment of error that the verdict was contrary to evidence is not sustained.

3. TRIAL (§ 116*)—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—READING FROM NEWSPAPER.

It is within the privilege of counsel, in reply to the contention of his adversary that the word "woman" could never be used as a term of reproach or contempt, to read a supposed newspaper item, illustrative of an opposite contention upon his part, or even to read, from notes used by him in the argument, the language of a news item sustaining his contention, where it does not appear that the newspaper item was exhibited to the jury, or that they were told that the illustration employed had ever existed in fact, and where it is perfectly plain that the instance related was used, and intended to be treated, merely as matter of illustration in argument.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. CRABB. (No. 3,259.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—ACTIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

"The allowance rightfully to be made for indiscreet conduct under excitement and alarm can better be determined by the jury than by the court." Smith v. Wrightsville & Tennille R. Co., 83 Ga. 671, 10 S. E. 361.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 286, 291, 299, 340; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1001*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

Whether the agents of the defendant are negligent or exercise extraordinary diligence in the case of a passenger seeking to enter a train, as well as the comparative negligence of the passenger and the agents of the carrier in contributing to or preventing injury, is a question for determination by a jury; and the finding of the jury is not to be disturbed, if there is any reasonable inference from the facts and circumstances in proof which supports the verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3922, 3928-3934; Dec. Dig. § 1001.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 287*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS—CARE REQUIRED.

The duty of extraordinary diligence for the safety of passengers, which rests upon a carrier in behalf of a passenger who has purchased a ticket and is seeking to enter the train for the purpose of being transported to his destination, and whether extraordinary diligence requires that a passenger be assisted in entering a train, may be dependent upon the circumstances and conditions surrounding the passenger, the location of the tracks, the height of the steps or platform, and other facts of the particular case. If, in the exercise of extraordinary care, it should be necessary for the safety of a particular passenger, in an emergency, that the passenger be assisted in mounting the steps, or otherwise aided in entering the train, then it will become the duty of the carrier to assist the passenger.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1157, 1158; Dec. Dig. § 287.*]

4. INSTRUCTIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CONSTRUCTION OF CHARGE AS A WHOLE.

The instruction of the court upon the subject of contributory negligence, when taken in connection with the entire charge, was a brief, but clear, presentation of the correct rules upon that subject as applied to the evidence in the case, being substantially similar to an instruction approved by the Supreme Court in Southern Railway Co. v. Wallis, 133 Ga. 553 (3), 66 S. E. 370, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 401.

5. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

The assignments of error based upon the failure to charge upon contributory negligence in the language of the Code do not authorize a reversal. The principles referred to in these assignments of error were presented to the jury, and, if fuller instructions were desired, they should have been requested.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 644*)—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—COMPELLING FURTHER CERTIFICATION—WAIVER.

The application for mandamus nisi must be denied. The exact point is ruled in Moore v. Reid, Judge, 110 Ga. 248, 34 S. E. 211. The acceptance of the writ of error and its filing by the agent of the plaintiff in error cannot be treated otherwise than if they had been his own act. "After a judge has certified a bill of exceptions, and the plaintiff in error has, by serving and filing the same and by causing it and the specified portions of the record in the case to which it relates to be transmitted to the Supreme Court, accepted the certificate of the judge as sufficient, it is too late to apply to this court for a mandamus to compel the judge to certify further respecting such bill of exceptions. Rogers v. Roberts, 88 Ga. 150, 13 S. E. 962. The above is true, although counsel for the plaintiff in error may, before receiving from the judge the certified bill of exceptions, have orally expressed some dissatisfaction with the certificate and requested an addition thereto. The proper course in such case, if counsel regarded the certificate as incomplete, would have been to decline to receive and act upon it, and then apply to this court for a mandamus."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2795-2798; Dec. Dig. § 644.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 641*)—RECORD—DEFECTS—DISMISSAL.

The recitals of fact as to the only assignment of error contained in the bill of exceptions not being certified to be true, and it appearing, on the contrary, that the material statement of material facts in the bill of exceptions are denied by the trial judge, the writ of error must be dismissed.

Error from City Court of Covington; W. H. Whaley, Judge.

Action by Thomas E. Scott, trustee in bankruptcy of E. C. Taylor, against Arch Camp, defendant, and N. S. Turner, garnishee. To a ruling permitting the garnishee to file his answer, plaintiff excepts. Writ of error dismissed.

Phil W. Davis, Jr., for plaintiff in error.
R. W. Milner, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error presented to the judge of the lower court a bill of exceptions in which it was stated that in the suit of Thomas E. Scott, trustee in bankruptcy of E. C. Taylor, against Arch Camp, in which a judgment was rendered against the defendant, Arch Camp, at the March term, 1910, of the city court of Covington, a summons of garnishment returnable to said November term of court had been served upon one N. S. Turner; that no answer to the garnishment had been made at the November term, 1910, or the January term, 1911, and that the plaintiff in fi. fa., after having introduced in evidence his judgment and the affidavit and bond for garnishment, the return of service showing that the garnishee had been duly served, the docket of the court, and all other papers in the case on file, and thereby having shown that the garnishee had filed no answer, asked for a judgment against the garnishee, which was refused, the court, on the contrary, having allowed the garnishee to file an answer. Exceptions pendente lite were filed to the ruling of the court in permitting the garnishee to file his answer, and exception was taken in the bill of exceptions to the refusal to grant a judgment against the garnishee as in default. There was prepared and attached to the bill of exceptions, which was sent to the judge, the certificate prescribed by section 6145, Code 1910. However, the judge did not sign this certificate, but in lieu thereof prepared and signed the certificate following, which incorporated a contradiction of the facts related in the bill of exceptions concerning the only material assignment of error:

"I do certify that the foregoing bill of exceptions is true, subject to the following explanation: In the second exception upon the ruling of the court, found on page 2 of the bill of exceptions, I do not certify that the garnishment was returnable to the November term, 1910, of the city court of Covington. No evidence whatever was offered by the plaintiff showing to what term the summons of garnishment was returnable. The affidavit and bond for garnishment was dated October 22d. The entry of service thereon was dated October 24th. The case was docketed to the January term, 1911, and I ruled that, inasmuch as there was nothing to show when the summons of garnishment was issued and the service on Turner was dated October 24th, and the November term of the city court began November 2d, giving only eight days between the service of the summons of garnishment on Turner and the beginning of the November term, that the clerk had properly docketed the same to the January term, and that therefore the March term was the second term, and that he had a right to file his answer under the statute at the second term. This also upon the statement made by the plaintiff's counsel in open court to me, and to the opposing counsel, to the effect that, if Turner did not owe the defendant anything, he did not want a judgment upon a technicality. I then allowed the answer and overruled the motion for a judgment. I further certify that this bill of exceptions specifies and contains all of the evidence, and specifies all of the record material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of; and the clerk of the city court of Covington is hereby ordered to make out a complete copy of such parts of the record in said case as are in this bill of exceptions specified, and certify the same as such, and cause the same to be transmitted to the present term of the Court of Appeals of Georgia, that the errors alleged to have been committed may be reviewed and corrected."

With the certificate in this form the bill of exceptions was filed and served. More than 30 days had elapsed since the date of the judgment, and the bill of exceptions had been filed in this court before counsel for plaintiff in error discovered that the bill of exceptions had not been certified. Thereupon counsel for plaintiff in error presented a petition for a mandamus nisi, requiring the judge of the city court of Covington to show cause why he should not be required to certify the bill of exceptions.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] 1. The first question which arises is upon the petition for the mandamus. It appears from the petition and the exhibit that counsel for the plaintiff in error sent his bill of exceptions by mail to the judge, and that as it was not returned to him until several days elapsed, and the time within which the bill of exceptions could be certified was about to expire, plaintiff's counsel wrote to the judge in regard to the matter. The judge replied the next day, stating that he had "certified the bill of exceptions and turned it over to the clerk immediately after he had received it." The same day counsel for plaintiff in error addressed a letter to the clerk of the superior court, with a request that the clerk have the bill of exceptions served the next day without fail, and asking the clerk to see to it that the entry of service was entered and signed by the sheriff. He inclosed copy of the bill of exceptions to be served upon Turner, and requested the clerk to fill in the date of the certificate in the copy before having it served. The bill of exceptions, as appears from the entries thereon, was filed March 23, 1911, and service was acknowledged by the attorney for the garnishee (the defendant in error here) on March 25, 1911. We think that the act of the clerk in having the bill of exceptions filed and served must be treated as the act of the plaintiff in error himself. The bill of exceptions was not certified by the judge, and an examination of the joint statement of facts and certificate prepared by the judge would have disclosed that fact. It is very apparent that counsel for plaintiff in error believed that the bill of exceptions, as prepared by him, had been certified. He had the right to believe this from the statement of the judge's letter to that effect; but it transpired that from the judge's statement he understood one thing, while the judge meant another. Acting upon his belief that the writ of error had been certified, he wrote to Mr. Davis, clerk of the superior court, to have it served by the sheriff. He thus constituted Mr. Davis his agent, and is bound by his acts. "After a judge has certified a bill of exceptions, and the plaintiff in error has, by serving and filing the same, and by causing it and the specified portions of the record in the case to which it relates to be transmitted to the Supreme Court, accepted the certificate of the judge as sufficient, it is too late to apply to this court for a mandamus to compel the judge to certify further respecting such bill of exceptions. Rogers v. Roberts, 88 Ga. 150, 13 S. E. 962. The above is true, although counsel for the plaintiff in error may, before receiving from the judge the certified bill of exceptions, have orally expressed some dissatisfaction with the certificate and requested an addition thereto. The proper course in such case, if counsel regarded the certificate as incomplete, would have been to decline to receive and act upon it, and then apply to this court for a mandamus." If what purports to be the certificate of the judge to the bill of exceptions be treated as a nullity, or the equivalent of a refusal to certify the bill of exceptions, as it must be, then the application for mandamus under the ruling above cited comes too late.

[2] 2. On the other hand, if the judge's note could be considered as a certificate—informal, it is true, but substantially sufficient to give this court jurisdiction—then no proceeding would be of any avail, because the judge could not be required to certify to facts and conditions related to have existed, when as a matter of fact such was not the case. It is plain that the only material assignment of error set forth in the bill of exceptions depends upon whether the summons of garnishment served upon Turner was returnable to the November term, 1910, of the city court of Covington. Under the facts stated by the judge, the averments of the bill of exceptions in this essential particular are fully contradicted. The recitals of fact as to the only assignment of error contained in the bill of exceptions not being certified to be true, it appearing, on the contrary, that the material statement of facts in the bill of exceptions is denied by the trial judge, the attempted writ of error must be dismissed.

Writ of error dismissed.

COOK v. STATE. (No. 3,470.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 101*)—CONFLICTING JURISDICTION—TRANSFER OF CAUSES—EFFECT.

An indictment having been duly transferred by the superior court of the county having jurisdiction of it to the city court for trial, jurisdiction of the case was immediately vested in the city court, and the superior court had no further jurisdiction over the indictment. Coleman v. State, 94 Ga. 87, 21 S. E. 124.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 101*)—CONFLICTING JURISDICTION—TRANSFER OF CAUSES—EFFECT.

The act of the General Assembly approved August 15, 1910 (Acts 1910, p. 201), entitled "An act to abolish the city court of Newton, to provide for the disposition of business pending in said court, and for other purposes," having been held by the Supreme Court to be "nugatory and ineffectual" (Cook v. State, 137 Ga. —, 73 S. E. 672), it follows that the city court of Newton retained jurisdiction of all criminal cases which the superior court of Baker county had duly transferred to it for trial, irrespective of the provisions of that act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 101*)—CONFLICTING JURISDICTION—TRANSFER OF CAUSES—EFFECT.

The indictment against the plaintiff in error having been duly transferred by the superior court of Baker county to the city court of Newton for trial, the former court lost jurisdiction of the case, and the latter court was vested with exclusive jurisdiction thereof. Under the provisions of the act of 1910, supra, which attempted to abolish the city court of Newton and to provide for the disposition of business pending in that court, the indictment was transferred back to the superior court of Baker county for trial. Since the act abolishing the city court of Newton was ineffectual for that purpose, as declared by the Supreme Court in the present case, the transfer of the indictment back to the superior court under the provisions of that act was unauthorized, and did not confer upon the superior court jurisdiction of the case which it had previously fully relinquished to the city court, and therefore the superior court was without jurisdiction to try the case, and a plea in abatement, filed in the superior court, challenging the jurisdiction of this court, should have been sustained, and the case sent back by the superior court to the city court for trial.

There was no motion to dismiss the levy of the mortgage fi. fa. upon the ground that the justice of the peace had not notified the mortgagor at the time of issuing the execution upon the affidavit of foreclosure; and, in the absence of an appropriate request, the judge did not err in failing to charge the jury that it was the duty of the magistrate, with whom the mortgage and affidavit to foreclose it were filed, to give notice to the mortgagor of the proceedings to foreclose at the time of issuing the execution, and that if the proof showed that he failed to do this the jury should find for the plaintiff. Nor did the court err in overruling the objection to the mortgage fi. fa., based upon the ground that it did not show that the justice of the peace had given notice to the defendant in fi. fa. as required by law.

1. JUDGMENT (§ 138*) — DEFAULT — SETTING ASIDE.

Under the facts stated in the defendant's motion, it was error to refuse, at the trial term, to allow the default to be opened. The defendant had paid the costs, the showing under oath set up a meritorious defense, and the movant offered to plead instanter and announced ready to proceed with the trial.

2. PLEDGES (§ 58*)—ENFORCEMENT OF RIGHT OF ACTION PLEDGED—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

Generally the holder of a promissory note, pledged to him as collateral, may enforce it for the entire amount against the maker as obligor, holding as trustee for the pledgor, any surplus after the payment of his debt; but if the maker has a valid defense against the original payee, the holder cannot recover more than the amount of the debt due him by the payee as his pledgor. If the maker of a promissory note which has been pledged to a third person as collateral security proves a defense not available as a bar to recovery by the pledgee, but good as against the pledgor, the pledgee will be allowed to recover only to the amount of the debt for which he holds the collateral security.

In a case in which A. gives his promissory note to B. and deposits with B. a promissory note of C. to himself as collateral security, and B. sues C. upon the collateral note, and A. thereafter, before the trial term, pays in part his original obligation to B., and C. on his part has paid to A. either the whole or a part of the amount of the note held by B. as collateral, B. is not entitled to recover in his action against C. a sum larger than the amount of the unpaid balance due him by A. at the date of the judgment.

Where the contract for attorney's fees contemplates that it shall be fixed upon a percentage basis, the amount due as attorney's fees is determined with reference to the amount actually due upon the obligation at the time of the trial, and not by the amount alleged to be due when the suit was filed.

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Eve, Judge.

Action by O. H. Elkins, administrator, against S. G. Slack. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

On May 18, 1909, S. G. Slack executed and delivered his promissory note for $2,500 to J. H. Harris, due 16 months after date, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum from date of said note. J. H. Harris in turn indorsed the note sued on to G. E. Walters, administrator, who was afterwards succeeded by the defendant in error. On January 14, 1911, Elkins, as administrator de bonis non, filed suit against S. G. Slack in the city court of Tifton to recover principal, interest, and 10 per cent. attorney's fees provided for in said note. At the appearance term in February, 1911, the case was marked in default; no plea being filed. At the March term, the defendant, S. G. Slack, appeared in court, and, before final judgment was rendered, paid the court costs and filed his plea to said suit. He charges in his plea that the note sued on was by J. H. Harris deposited with the defendant in error as collateral security to a note signed by J. H. Harris et al. to G. E. Walters, former administrator, and that the indebtedness existing between J. H. Harris and the estate represented by the defendant in error had been satisfied, and that by operation of law the collateral security had answered its purpose, thereby reverting back to J. H. Harris.

Defendant further charged in his plea that the indebtedness between J. H. Harris and the estate represented by O. H. Elkins had been sued to judgment in the city court of Fitzgerald, and that said judgment had been fully paid, and that said payment occurred on March 10, 1911, after the default judgment and before final judgment in the city court of Tifton. It was there alleged in the plea that J. H. Harris had been paid the sum of $592.20 on March 10, 1911, on the note sued on in the city court of Tifton, it being the same day that the judgment in favor of this defendant in error against J. H. Harris et al. was marked satisfied and canceled of record in the clerk's office in Ben Hill county. The court declined to open the default, and on March 16, 1911, entered judgment as in default in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, S. G. Slack, for $2,500 principal, $368.30 interest, and $286.53 attorney's fees. The plaintiff in error then and there excepted to this judgment, and tendered the court his bill of exceptions, which was duly certified. Exception is taken to the refusal to open the default.

On March 16, 1911, the court, without the intervention of a jury, and before entering up a judgment, heard the evidence of S. G. Slack and O. H. Elkins, and also inspected the documentary evidence; but it will be observed that the judgment in this case is entered up independent and aside from the evidence of S. G. Slack and O. H. Elkins, and on April 15, 1911, after the bill of exceptions had been certified by the court, the court, on complaint of the defendant in error, ordered the clerk to certify and send up the evidence of Slack and Elkins and the documentary evidence introduced.

J. B. Murrow and J. J. Murray, for plaintiff in error. Geo. E. Simpson, W. H. Horne, and O. H. Elkins, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Judgment reversed.

KIGHT v. ROBINSON. (No. 3,137.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 423*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—MORTGAGES.

Parol evidence is inadmissible to extend or increase the amount of indebtedness specifically secured by a mortgage, where the mortgage does not on its face show that it was given to secure advances. Evidence that a mortgage was intended to secure a note not specified in it is properly repelled, in the absence of any averment that by reason of fraud, accident, or mistake the correct amount was not stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1963; Dec. Dig. § 423.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 146*)—LIEN.

A mortgage foreclosure is a proceeding stricti juris, and the lien of the mortgage cannot be extended to secure any indebtedness other than that specifically mentioned in the condition of the mortgage.

Error from City Court of Wrightsville; J. L. Kent, Judge.

Action by Mrs. N. J. Kight against Louis Robinson to foreclose a mortgage. Defendant interposed an affidavit of illegality. Judgment for plaintiff for less than the amount claimed, and she brings error, which is here prosecuted in the name of B. T. Kight, as administrator. Affirmed.

Wm. Faircloth and Chas. S. Claxton, for plaintiff in error. E. L. Stephens, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Mrs. N. J. Kight foreclosed a chattel mortgage executed by Louis Robinson, and to the foreclosure the mortgagor interposed an affidavit of illegality. The mortgage and the note which it was given to secure were included in the same writing. By its terms Robinson promised to pay N. J. Knight, or order, on October 1, 1908, $500, with interest at maturity at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and to secure the payment of the note he mortgaged a growing crop of 75 acres in cotton and 38 acres in corn on a designated farm, with several head of live stock. The condition of the note was that, if he should "truly pay the above note at maturity, then this mortgage to be null and void." There is no intimation, from the language of the note or mortgage, that it was executed to secure future advances. The consideration of the note is not stated, further than by the usual phrase "value received." The affidavit of illegality set up that the mortgagor had paid the plaintiff the amount of the mortgage which was given to secure payment for supplies to be furnished to make the crop for the year 1908, but specifically denied that the mortgage was to secure the purchase price of any guano. Another ground of the affidavit of illegality was that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover more than three-fourths of the amount of the account for supplies, because she had not at any time applied to the ordinary and had her weights and measures marked, sealed, and stamped as required by law. Another ground of illegality was that the mortgage was void on account of usury. Upon the trial (in which all issues of fact were submitted to the judge without the intervention of a jury) a judgment was rendered, finding the defendant to be indebted to the plaintiff $65.66, with $10.51 interest, and to this judgment exception is taken.

There is no conflict in the evidence as to the fact that the defendant sustained by uncontradicted testimony the ground of illegality based upon the provisions of section 1882 of the Civil Code of 1910, and established by the plaintiff's own witnesses that he was entitled to have a deduction of one-fourth of $330.89 of supplies sold to him by the plaintiff. It was also admitted that the defendant had paid upon the supplies advanced him from the store $368.08. Under this view of the evidence the defendant would have owed for supplies from the store only $366.64, instead of $444.42, and therefore would also have sustained the ground of illegality in which he asserted that he owed nothing upon the mortgage. Under this view of the case, it seems to us that the defendant could well have complained of the judgment for $65.66 rendered against him, but he has not done so. So much as to the evidence which was admitted by the court, and upon this branch of the case it appears that the only ground for complaint by the plaintiff in error consists in the fact that, if she was entitled to recover at all, she was entitled to a finding for a larger amount. This contention rests upon two propositions: First, that under the evidence which was excluded, and not considered by the court, the levy of the mortgage fi. fa. was entitled to proceed for the full amount of the fi. fa.; and, second, that even if the first proposition be not sound, the judge should have entered judgment for $76.34, instead of $65.66, upon the evidence which the judge did consider. We shall therefore first consider the assignments of error which complain of the exclusion of testimony.

[1, 2] It appears from the evidence that the defendant purchased from the plaintiff supplies to the amount of $444.42, and also bought of her $225 worth of guano. The plaintiff's contention in the lower court was that the mortgage for $500 was given to secure this entire sum of $669.42. The plaintiff admitted that Robinson had paid $368.08 upon the running bill at the store. The difference between the two, of course, would be $76.34. As evidence of the indebtedness for guano, the plaintiff tendered in evidence a note of $225, payable to the Mutual Fertilizer Company, or bearer, signed by Robinson. This note, upon objection, the court repelled from the evidence, and in his judgment he states that it was not considered. As to whether the guano was intended to be included in the $500 note, the parties were in direct conflict in their testimony, and for that reason the judge would have been authorized to find either way upon the issue; but since the court states in the judgment that the note, which was admitted by both parties to represent the purchase price of the guano, was not considered by him, the question is squarely raised as to whether evidence was admissible to the effect that, while the mortgage purported to secure an indebtedness stated in its face to be $500, it was in fact intended to secure a considerable larger amount. In other words, where the amount of the note to be secured by the mortgage is definitely stated in the mortgage, can it be shown aliunde that a different amount was intended to be secured, and that thereby the lien of the mortgage for an amount different from that specified therein attached to the personal property upon which a lien was created? We have been unable to find any adjudication upon the direct point in this state. We are cited by counsel for the plaintiff to the rulings in Hester v. Gairdner, 128 Ga. 531, 58 S. E. 165, and Emerson v. Knight, 130 Ga. 105, 60 S. E. 255. Neither of these cases, however, appear to be in point.

Judgment affirmed.

WILHELM v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§§ 66, 73*)—DELAY IN TRANSMITTING MESSAGE—PRESUMPTION.

Where a telegraph company has notice of the urgency of a message, and its agent promises to rush it, an unexplained delay in transmission and delivery of more than 18 hours raises a presumption of a willful disregard of the sender's rights, and in an action against the company the question of punitive damages should be submitted to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 61, 76; Dec. Dig. §§ 66, 73.*]

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 69*)—DELAY IN TRANSMITTING MESSAGE—DAMAGES.

In an action for delay in transmitting a telegram, the nominal damages to which the sender is entitled for loss of the fee paid are sufficient actual damages to support a recovery of punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 71; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—DELAY IN TRANSMITTING MESSAGE—DAMAGES.

In an action for delay in transmitting a telegram, it appeared that the message was sent by plaintiff's agent to notify plaintiff of the time of trial of an action against her. By reason of the delay, she was unable to be present, and lost the case. The testimony in the prior case was introduced in evidence, and presented a conflict as to her liability in that action. Held that, if such damages could be recovered, the court invaded the province of the jury in holding that she ought to have lost her case.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chesterfield County.

Action by Louisa S. Wilhelm against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for defendant on a directed verdict, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Stevenson & Matheson, for appellant. Willcox & Willcox and Edward McIver, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover actual and punitive damages for alleged negligent and willful delay by defendant in the transmission and delivery of a telegram. The testimony introduced at the trial tended to prove the following facts and circumstances: Plaintiff was sued in the court of a justice of the peace at Monroe, N. C., by a firm of attorneys at law for a fee, which they alleged she owed them for professional services rendered in the preparation of a certain statement showing the cause and manner of her husband's death, which statement was asked for by the agent of a fraternal insurance order in which her husband was insured. It appears that these attorneys were familiar with the facts and circumstances connected with the death of her husband, because they had been employed to assist, and did assist, in the prosecution of the person who killed him. Therefore it seems that the agent of the insurance order applied to them for the statement. They in turn applied to plaintiff to know whether she wished them to prepare it. At the trial in the justice's court, she and her sister, Miss Cora Steen, testified that she refused to consent for them to do so until the attorney, who consulted her about the matter, assured her that there would be no charge for it. On the other hand, the attorney testified that she agreed to pay $25 for the preparation of the statement. The justice found in favor of Mrs. Wilhelm, and gave judgment accordingly. The attorneys appealed to the superior court, where, according to the practice in North Carolina, the case was tried de novo. About midday, on August 20, 1906, the case was set for trial on August 21, 1906, and plaintiff's father, who was looking after the matter for her, filed with the defendant's agent at Monroe, at 2:25 p. m., a telegram, addressed to his daughter, Miss Cora Steen, at Middendorf, S. C., where she was with the plaintiff, Mrs. Wilhelm, saying: "Both come to-night. Get B. to stay at night." Plaintiff and her sister were expecting the message, and were ready to go, and made inquiry of the agent at Middendorf about it. Middendorf is a small station on the Seaboard Air Line Railway, about 90 miles from Monroe. Plaintiff's residence was about 150 yards from the station, which is a combined railroad and telegraph station, at which the office is kept open until about 9 o'clock at night. It does not appear at what hour it opens in the morning, nor does it appear at what hour the office at Monroe opens or closes, nor whether there is direct connection between the two, or an intermediate relay station. It appears that plaintiff's father informed defendant's agent at Monroe of the importance of the message and the reasons thereof, and asked him to rush transmission and delivery, which he promised to do. There were two trains upon which plaintiff and Miss Steen could have taken passage from Middendorf and reached Monroe in time for the trial. One left Middendorf about 8 o'clock p. m., August 20th, and the other about 8 a. m., August 21st. The message was not delivered until 9 a. m. on August 21st, too late for them to get to Monroe in time for the trial. The same witnesses testified in the superior court as in the justice's court, except plaintiff and Miss Steen. The result of the trial was a judgment against plaintiff for $25 and costs. Plaintiff and Miss Steen both testified that, if the telegram had been delivered in time, they would have gone to Monroe, and have testified the same as they had done in the justice's court. The testimony which was taken in the trials in North Carolina was introduced in this case. The defendant offered no explanation of the delay in transmitting or delivering the message, except as it may be based upon and inferred from the testimony, brought out of plaintiff's witnesses on cross-examination, that the office at Middendorf closes about 9 o'clock p. m.

At the close of all the testimony, defendant moved for the direction of the verdict on the grounds: (1) Because there was no allegation in the complaint that plaintiff and her sister would have gone to Monroe, if the telegram had been delivered in time. (2) The damages sued for are speculative. (3) No evidence to warrant punitive damages. (4) No evidence of damages resulting proximately from the alleged delay. (5) No allegation or evidence of actual damages. Hence no punitive damages can be recovered. The court granted the motion, on the ground that there was no evidence warranting a verdict for punitive damages, and on the ground that, under the testimony introduced, plaintiff ought to have lost her case in North Carolina; and therefore she should not in justice have any cause of action against the defendant.

[1] The rule is well settled that delay in the transmission or delivery of a telegram raises a presumption of negligence, which casts upon the telegraph company the burden of explaining the delay; and that long and unexplained delay raises a presumption of wantonness. Baker v. Telegraph Co., 84 S. C. 477, 66 S. E. 182, 137 Am. St. Rep. 848, and cases cited. In that case, the court said that no hard and fast rule could be adopted as to the duration of the time of delay that would raise a presumption of wantonness, but that each case must be decided according to the circumstances, and a delay of between four and five hours was held insufficient to carry the issue of punitive damages to the jury, in the absence of other circumstances tending to show willfulness. In this case, special notice was given to defendant of the urgency and importance of the message, and the agent promised that it should be rushed. We think, under these circumstances, the unexplained delay of more than 18 hours in transmitting and delivering the message affords a reasonable inference of a conscious disregard of plaintiff's rights. It is true that a good part of this time was not office hours at Middendorf; but the judge states that the telegram showed that it was received at Middendorf at 8:50 a. m. on August 21st. Therefore it is inferable that it was not sent from Monroe until the morning of the 21st. If, for any reason, it could not have been sent from Monroe on the afternoon or evening of the 20th before the office at Middendorf had closed for the night, the sender should have been notified, so that he might take other steps to communicate with his daughter. The court erred, therefore, in directing the verdict on the issue of punitive damages.

[2] Passing the question as to whether the actual damages alleged to have been sustained in the loss of her case in North Carolina, as the result of the delay complained of, are too remote and speculative to be recovered, it appears that plaintiff paid the defendant the usual fee for transmitting and delivering the message. Her purpose in having the message sent was thwarted by the delay. She was therefore entitled to recover at least nominal damages for the breach of defendant's duty to her, as a member of the public, even if she suffered no other actual damages than the loss of the fee paid, and such nominal damages was a sufficient basis for the recovery of punitive damages for the wanton disregard of her rights. Arial v. Telegraph Co., 70 S. C. 418, 50 S. E. 6; Doster v. Telegraph Co., 77 S. C. 56, 57 S. E. 671; Gens v. Telegraph Co., 86 S. C. 242, 68 S. E. 530.

[3] As the circuit court did not rule upon the question whether the damages sustained by the loss of her case were too speculative and remote, that question is not properly before this court for consideration. But, if such damages may be recovered, as to which we express no opinion, the circuit judge invaded the province of the jury in holding that the plaintiff ought to have lost her case in the superior court in North Carolina. There was a sharp issue of fact in the testimony as to whether plaintiff agreed, expressly or impliedly, to pay the fee for which she was sued.

Judgment reversed.

of the probate court denying probate, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

L. D. Jennings, for appellants. Lee & Moise, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal taken from the order of Judge Shipp, dismissing an appeal from the probate court of Sumter county, and affirming the judgment of the probate court in this cause.

The facts are that Ransom Dicks died in 1906, and shortly after his death two of his children, Ransom Dicks, Jr., and Rose Willis, presented an alleged will to the judge of probate, and the same was proven in common form; the alleged will being filed October 11, 1906. This alleged will devised all of his property to these two children. Subsequently, on October 31, 1906, David Dicks, Kate Brunson, and Abram Dicks, three children of the deceased, petitioned the judge of probate, praying that the court require Ransom Dicks, Jr., and Rose Willis to prove the said will in due and solemn form of law. Thereupon due notice was given by the judge of probate that he would require said alleged will proven in due and solemn form of law on August 15, 1907. Nothing was done in pursuance of this notice, and a rule to show cause was served on Ransom Dicks, Jr., and Rose Willis why they should not be attached for contempt in not proceeding to prove the said alleged will in accordance with the order of the judge of probate. Afterwards, about March 7, 1908, an action was commenced in the court of probate to prove the alleged will in due and solemn form. After taking testimony and hearing argument, the judge of probate, on July 1, 1909, made his decree, adjudging and holding that the said alleged will was a forgery, and refused to admit it to probate. On the same day, a formal written notice of the filing of the decree was given to Ransom Dicks, Jr., and Rose Willis. On July 8, 1909, the appellants served notice of appeal, and grounds thereof, upon the respondents, stating that they intended to appeal from the court of probate to the court of common pleas for the county of Sumter. Nothing further was done to perfect the appeal. The appellants failed to file in the circuit court a certified copy of the record of the proceedings appealed from, or the grounds of appeal, or the proper evidence that notice had been given to the adverse parties according to law. The appellants having taken no steps whatever to perfect their appeal, and five terms of the court of common pleas for Sumter county having passed since the notice of intention to appeal was served, the respondents served on the appellants, on February 28, 1911, a notice that they would move to have the said appeal dismissed. Upon hearing the motion upon this notice, Judge Shipp dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the judgment of the court of probate.

There is only one question involved in this appeal: Did his honor, Judge Shipp, err in making this order? Notice of the filing of decree in probate court was given appellants on July 1, 1909, and on July 8, 1909, notice of intention to appeal therefrom, and grounds of appeal, were duly served upon respondents, and no further steps were taken to perfect the appeal until February 28, 1911, when attorneys for respondents served notice upon the appellants that they would move, on March 20, 1911, or as soon thereafter as counsel could be heard, to dismiss the appeal, on the grounds that the petition had not been filed in the circuit court in the time required by law. After this notice on March 10, 1911, the attorneys for appellants filed a certified copy of the proceedings appealed from and the grounds of appeal filed in probate court, together with proper evidence that notice had been given adverse party according to law. The court of common pleas had convened five times since July 1, 1909. Judge Shipp passed his order July 20, 1911. It is unnecessary to decide whether or not it was necessary for appellants to file a certified copy of record and proceedings, etc., appealed from before the next stated session of the said court of common pleas after such appeal is taken. But we do say that this must be done within a reasonable time, and to let five terms of court convene without doing this is unreasonable. Notice was given on February 28, 1911, that on March 20, 1911, a motion would be made to dismiss the appeal. This motion was not heard until July 20, 1911, and during all this time, and at the hearing, no effort was made or urged by the appellants to be relieved, under section 339 and 349, Code of Laws of South Carolina, volume 2, and there was no error on part of circuit judge in dismissing the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

SMITH v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 1, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—INVASION OF PROVINCE OF JURY.

In an action by a car repairer against a railroad company for injuries from being struck by a car in defendant's yards while attempting to cross a track, instructions that it was not necessary to have the bell rung or whistle sounded in moving engines and cars in a railroad yard, nor to have a man posted in front of the cars to warn the railroad's own employes in its switching yard, invaded the province of the jury; it being for the jury to say whether any warning was necessary, and, if so, what warning.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by P. J. Smith against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

De Pass & De Pass, for appellant. E. M. Thomson, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This case was tried in Richland county before his honor, Judge Prince, and a jury, and was an action for damages for personal injury. The exceptions deal entirely with the charge to the jury. A short statement, eliminating all extraneous matters, will make the questions simple and clear.

The plaintiff contends that he was a car repairer in the employ of the defendant on its Royster yard near Columbia. That there were 10 tracks in said yard. That while working on a car on track No. 3 he and his assistant were directed by the proper officer of the defendant company to repair the door of a car on track No. 1 as soon as they finished the work on which they were then engaged. That track No. 2 was situated between track No. 3 and track No. 1, and that it was necessary for them to cross track No. 2 in order to reach track No. 1. That there were lines of cars on tracks No. 2 and No. 3. That in going to track No. 1 he found an open space between two cars on track No. 2. That he stopped and looked and listened, but could see no indication of any movement of the cars on track No. 2, and undertook to cross track No. 2 to reach track No. 1. That while he was in the act of crossing track No. 2 the defendant, through its agents and servants, by shoving in another car on track No. 2, thus suddenly moved the cars on track No. 2, which struck the plaintiff and knocked him to the ground, ran over his foot, cut off a part of it, and did him serious bodily injury. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant was negligent in this matter in not giving warning of the movement of the cars on track No. 2, and that his injury was caused by defendant's negligence.

The specifications of negligence that are now before this court are: "(3) In causing said car to violently strike with great force and shove backwards a long line of cars upon another track within the yard where workmen are constantly at work, without giving any warning of their intention so to do. (4) In shoving, kicking back, said car in the manner aforesaid, without having an employé on the forward part to protect same."

The defendant admitted that it was necessary for plaintiff to cross track No. 2 in order to reach track No. 1, but not that it was necessary for him to cross track No. 2 at the time he did, denied that it was necessary to give warning before moving the cars on track No. 2, and pleaded that the sudden movement of these cars was to be expected, and that plaintiff had assumed the risk with the employment.

Exception 4 was abandoned at the hearing, and need not be considered.

[1, 2] Exceptions 1, 3, and 5 complain of error in the circuit judge in charging that it was not necessary to have the bell run or the whistle sounded in moving engines and cars in a yard. In this charge, his honor invaded the province of the jury. When the statute directs a certain thing to be done, it is negligence per se not to do what the law requires; but it does not follow that these things are not to be done at other times and under other circumstances. His honor charged the jury, "the duty is placed upon the defendant by law in thus operating its engine that these engines and cars must be shifted with due regard for the safety of its employes," but the sounding of the bell or whistle had been excluded. It was the province of the jury to say what due regard for the safety of its employes required. It was the province of the jury to say whether any warning was necessary under the circumstances, and, if warning was necessary, what warning. His honor erred in this, and these exceptions are sustained.

Exceptions 2 and 6 complain of error in the charge, in that his honor charged the jury that it was not necessary to have a man posted in front of its cars to warn its own employes in its switching yard. For the reasons stated above, this, also, was error. It was the jury's province to state what, if any, warning was necessary.

The seventh exception cannot be sustained. It is an isolated sentence. Almost immediately before, his honor had limited the expression "any damages," and in his main charge had fully explained. This exception is overruled.

For the errors which we have pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

GARY, C. J., and WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ., concur. WATTS, J., did not sit in this case.

CAROLIAN TIMBER CO. v. HOLDEN et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 2, 1912.)

1. CONTINUANCE (§ 7*) — DISCRETION OF COURT.

The granting of a continuance is in the discretion of the trial judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 17, 18; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 204*)—OBJECTION IN LOWER COURT—NECESSITY—EVIDENCE.

The admission of a deed in evidence was not reversible error, though a subscribing witness was incompetent by reason of interest, where no objection to the admission of the deed was made, and the objection to the deposition of the witness was withdrawn.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1258-1280; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 47*)—SUBSCRIBING WITNESSES—INTEREST.

A subscribing witness to a deed is not incompetent, where he is entitled to commissions on the sale of the land, since this is not an interest in the land itself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 106; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 273*)—EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

An exception to the admission in evidence of certain statements, which does not identify the statements nor specify the grounds of objection, will be overruled.

5. DEEDS (§ 126*)—ESTATES CREATED—CONDITIONAL FEES.

A conveyance to a person "and the heirs of her body and assigns forever" creates a fee conditional in the grantee, and, upon the birth of children, she may convey in fee simple.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Oconee County; G. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by the Carolian Timber Company against W. V. Holden and another. From a judgment for plaintiff on a directed verdict, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. R. Earle and M. G. Long, for appellants.
Haynsworth & Haynsworth, for respondent.

WATTS, J. This is an action of trespass upon a tract of land described in the complaint; both parties claiming under a deed bearing date March 13, 1886, and made by Robert Johnson to Artemissa Chapman. The action was tried before his honor, Judge Gage, and a jury on March 2, 1911. After all the testimony was in, upon motion of plaintiff's attorney, the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff. Judgment was entered thereon, and defendants appeal on 10 grounds.

In the deed from Johnson to Chapman, the habendum reads, "unto Artemissa Chapman and the heirs of her body and assigns forever, reserving a life estate to her husband, Jackson Chapman." The language of the granting clause was similar. On January 11, 1890, Artemissa and Jackson Chapman, having at that time children, executed a deed purporting to convey this land to M. C. Newton, who, on January 16, 1890, conveyed it to W. J. Duffie. W. J. Duffie having died, his executors, in accordance with authority contained in his will, conveyed it to R. E. Bowen by deed, dated March 1, 1902; and Bowen on the same day conveyed it to the Benedict-Love Company, who in turn conveyed it to the Montvale Lumber Company on February 2, 1904. This company conveyed it to plaintiff on June 10, 1909. The defendants claim title under deeds made by children of Artemissa and Jackson Chapman, both of whom have died. There was evidence as to the alleged acts of trespass. The defendants by their answer to the complaint denied, for the purpose of this action, that the plaintiff had capacity to sue, and that plaintiff was the owner of the land, and that the defendants had trespassed on the land. W. V. Holden denied plaintiff's title to land, and asserted and set up title in himself, alleging that the Chapmans only had a life estate in the lands, and that after their death their children took possession of the land, and remained in possession until they sold to him, and that defendants had no notice of the claims of any one to the land until the commencement of this action. They further allege that the deed under which plaintiff claims was obtained by fraudulent representations from the Chapmans and for a nominal sum and inadequate price.

[1] Exception 1 "assigns error and abuse of discretion for the court to force defendant to trial under the peculiar circumstances as set out in the case." We see no error on the part of Judge Gage in refusing to grant a continuance of the case on the showing made. Granting of a continuance is a matter entirely in the discretion of the judge; and the record shows no abuse of this discretion. This exception is overruled.

[2, 3] Exception 2: "That it was error for the court to admit in evidence the deed of Artemissa Reid Chapman and Jackson Chapman to M. C. Newton, as it appears that W. J. Roark was the real party in interest who was purchasing the land, and that he was one of the subscribing witnesses thereto. That the said grantee never had any knowledge or gave her consent to the transaction, or no delivery of the deed was made." The deed from Artemissa and Jackson Chapman to Newton was witnessed by W. K. Stewart, and W. J. Roark. The testimony shows that, before the execution of the deed, Roark had bid off the land in question at tax sale, and that J. H. Newton had told him that he could sell the land to Duffie if he (Roark) would get a deed to it from the Chapmans to Mrs. Newton. Roark undertook to obtain the deed, and was to receive $50 from Newton. Roark was to have no interest in the land itself, but was to be paid upon the condition that he obtained the deed. When Mr. Haynesworth read the testimony of W. J. Roark, taken before the clerk of court under an order of Judge Gary, Mr. Earle objected and said: "We object to that. We would like for the court to pass upon that question first as being the interest witness; further on in his testimony he was a beneficiary under this deed which he was undertaking to execute. I think the balance of his testimony which follows this shows that he is an incompetent witness, and we would like for your honor to pass upon this question." Judge Gage made no ruling. The plaintiff put up W. K. Stewart, the other subscribing witness, who testified that he saw the Chapmans sign the deed, and that he and W. J. Roark witnessed it. B. R. Roark, a son of W. J. Roark, testified for the plaintiff that his father lived at Raleigh, N. C.; that he knew his handwriting; and that the signature to the deed was the handwriting of W. J. Roark. Later Mr. Earle said: "We want to offer the cross-examination in. Mr. Haynesworth: My friend can offer the entire testimony. By the Court: You can't put part of what was said, and not the whole. Mr. Earle: Then we withdraw our objection to the deposition, as my friend there started to read it. (Deposition of W. J. Roark introduced in evidence and read to the jury by Mr. Earle.)" After this testimony as to execution of deed, plaintiff's attorney, Mr. Haynesworth, said: "This deed is over 20 years of age. I now introduce it in evidence, dated January 11, 1890, from Artemissa and Jackson Chapman to M. C. Newton. (Introduced and marked 'Exhibit C'.)" This deed purported to convey land in question, and was put in without objection on part of defendants. If they intended to object they should have done so at the time it was offered in evidence. Having failed to make any objection, they are precluded from raising the question on appeal. But even between the parties to the deed, the fact that one of the subscribing witnesses had an indirect interest in the transaction, such as the commissions due a real estate agent, or a claim on the part to be received, would not make him incompetent, as he had no interest in the land itself. This exception is overruled.

[4] Exception 3 charges error in admitting "certain statements of J. H. Newton in reference to the execution of the deed from the Chapmans to M. C. Newton, and to the contents thereof, as appears upon the record." The exception does not make it clear what statements are referred to, and no grounds are stated in the exception. This exception is overruled.

Exception 4 is overruled for the same reason.

Exception 5 charges "error in refusing the motion for a nonsuit, on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to show title." This is overruled as the circuit judge made no mistake in refusing motion.

Exception 6 alleges error in excluding certain testimony of the witness George Holcomb. The ruling of the court was proper, as the testimony referred to was incompetent to show undue influence. This exception is overruled.

[5] Exception 7 charges error in construing the deed to the Chapmans as a conveyance of a fee conditional, and in construing the deed made by the Chapmans as conveying a fee. The Chapmans having children living at the time of the execution of their deed conveying the land to M. C. Newton, it is clear that this deed conveyed to Newton the fee simple, provided the Chapmans, or either of them, held the fee conditional. Both the habendum and the granting clause in the deed from Johnson to the Chapmans read, "unto Artemissa Reid Chapman and the heirs of her body and assigns forever," reserving a life estate to her husband, Jackson Chapman, that this conveyed to Artemissa Reid Chapman a fee conditional, and under the authorities of this state she had a right to alienate by deed. Miller v. Graham, 47 S. C. 288, 25 S. E. 165; Bethea v. Bethea, 48 S. C. 440, 26 S. E. 716; Mattison v. Mattison, 65 S. C. 345, 43 S. E. 874. This exception is overruled.

Exception 8 alleges "error in holding that there was no testimony upon the issue of fraud, and directing the jury to find verdict for plaintiff." We have carefully considered all the testimony, and we find no competent relevant testimony tending to show fraud. This exception is overruled.

Exception 10 alleges "error in not holding that the testimony of W. K. Stewart, W. J. Roark, George Holcomb, M. C. Newton, W. M. Chapman, and R. L. Smith was some testimony to go to the jury on the question of fraudulent representation to obtain the execution of the deed." We have carefully considered all the testimony, and we find there was no competent evidence introduced to show fraud on the part of Roark in obtaining deed. The exception is overruled.

The judgment of the circuit is affirmed.

1. STREET RAILROADS (§ 117*)—INJURIES TO TRAVELERS—WILLFUL INJURY.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1062*)—REVIEW—REVERSAL.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Actions by A. J. Humphries and Docia Humphries against the Spartanburg Railway, Gas & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff in each case, and defendant appeals. Reversed on condition in the first case, and reversed and remanded in the second.

Sanders & De Pass, for appellant. Stan-yarne Wilson, for respondents.

WATTS, J. By agreement, these two cases were tried together in the circuit court. The plaintiff, A. J. Humphries, seeks to recover $2,000 damages on account of the alleged negligent, willful, and wanton breaking of his wagon, killing of his mule, and jarring and frightening the plaintiff by being struck by a car of the defendant in a street in the city of Spartanburg.

The plaintiff, Docia Humphries, seeks to recover $2,000 on account of injuries received by her while riding in a wagon with her husband on a street in the city of Spartanburg, caused by said wagon being struck by a car of defendant which was carelessly, willfully, and wantonly run against said wagon. The answer of the defendant was a denial of each and every allegation of the complaint, and set up the defense of contributory negligence. At conclusion of the evidence, defendant moved the court to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant as to the cause of action for willfulness and wantonness. This motion was refused. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $300, and in favor of the plaintiff Docia Humphries for $133. The exceptions question the correctness of his honor's rulings and refusal to direct verdict in favor of defendant as to the cause of action for punitive damages, and also the correctness of his charge in several particulars shown in the exceptions.

[1] Was it error on the part of his honor in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendant as to punitive damages? We think so. The testimony of plaintiffs tend to show that on May 15, 1906, the plaintiff was driving on North Church street in the city of Spartanburg on left side of street, and, coming to a place where the street hands had thrown out a pile of dirt, his mule stopped, and, getting scared at the pile of dirt, started to back the wagon, cutting it in towards the track of defendant company. When the mule stopped at this pile of dirt, a car of defendant company was opposite the post office, a short distance in rear of the wagon. This car started forward just about the time the mule began to back and cut the wagon in towards the track of defendant. The wagon in which plaintiffs were riding was covered from front to rear, both ends being open. The plaintiff was sitting in front part of wagon on right side driving his mule. While the mule was backing, the plaintiff was holding the lines in his right hand, slapping or whipping the mule with them. The plaintiff A. J. Humphries testified that, while the mule was backing and when the car was within about 10 steps of the wagon, he motioned with his left hand and the motorman said, "Get out of the way." That almost immediately afterwards, and about the time the mule backed the wagon on the track, the car collided with the left hind wheel, breaking the wheel and throwing the mule to the ground, and that the mule died about a month thereafter. The plaintiff also testified that the car came to a stop four or five feet after it had passed the wagon. That the conductor immediately got out of the car, came back and inquired whether plaintiff or his wife had been injured and offered assistance. The injuries to the wagon were about $5 or $10. The mule was worth $100. No bodily injuries were inflicted on A. J. Humphries. The plaintiff, Docia Humphries, was injured, receiving a bruise on one of her limbs which was sore for some time. There was no testimony showing that the employes of the defendant saw the plaintiff waving his hand, or as to what the speed of the car was. The defendant's evidence tended to show that the car had stopped at the post office, not quite 100 yards away from where the collision occurred, for the purpose of letting a passenger off. That shortly after starting, and before the car had acquired much speed, it was discovered that the wagon was being backed toward the track of the defendant. That immediately the motorman began ringing the gong, and as soon as it was discovered that there was danger of the wagon being backed on the track, and danger of a collision, he began to put on brakes. A passenger who was on the front of the car called out, "Look out, look out." That the front step of the car struck the left hind wheel of the wagon, breaking the same, and that the car was stopped before it had fully passed the wagon. That, as soon as the car was stopped, the employes of the company went out to where the plaintiff, A. J. Humphries, was, offering to assist him, and inquiring as to whether any one was injured or not. They were then informed that neither had been hurt. From the testimony it will be seen there "was no conscious failure on the part of the defendant to observe due care," as laid down in Watts v. South Bound R. R. Co., 60 S. C. 67, 38 S. E. 240, and Tinsley v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. C. 350, 51 S. E. 913. There is no evidence showing that the servants of defendant consciously or intentionally did any act, or consciously or intentionally failed to do what it ought to have done, at the time of the collision of the wagon in which plaintiffs were riding. There was evidence to prove ordinary negligence, but none to show conscious, advertent wrong. The evidence indicates that an honest effort was made to prevent the injury, and, that being so, no inferences of a conscious failure to discharge the duty which defendant owed the plaintiffs could be drawn, and the question of punitive damages should not have been submitted to the jury. The plaintiff, A. J. Humphries, sued for personal injuries, as well as the value of his mule and wagon. His testimony shows that he received no personal injury, but that his mule was worth $100 and his wagon from $5 to $10. The judgment obtained by him as to punitive damages is reversed, but as to his actual damages, $110, it is sustained. He obtained judgment for $300, $190 of which necessarily was for punitive damages. As to this amount, the judgment is reversed.

[2] The plaintiff, Docia Humphries, sued for personal injuries. The jury awarded her as actual or exemplary damages $133. There is no way for the court to determine what amount the jury intended for either actual or punitive damages, and we have decided that the court should have directed a verdict for punitive damages, so as to her the case must be remanded for a new trial as to actual damages. The judgment as to A. J. Humphries shall be for a new trial, unless he remits $190 of the judgment in whole case within 10 days after remittitur is sent down. If this is done, the judgment for the remaining sum shall be affirmed.

HODGES v. GRAY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 1, 1912.)

EVIDENCE (§ 441*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—WRITTEN CONTRACT.

Where from the pleadings in foreclosure it appeared that the mortgage and note were given some time after the purchase of a sawmill to secure the price, an answer which averred that, in consideration of the execution of the mortgage, the plaintiff agreed to put the mill in good condition stated matters proper to be shown by parol, as they would merely add to the contract shown an independent and contemporaneous agreement; and a motion to direct a verdict on the ground that such evidence tended to vary a written instrument was improperly allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2030-2047; Dec. Dig. § 441.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by P. A. Hodges, trading as the Bennettsville Hardware Company, against Ansel A. Gray. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

T. I. Rogers, for appellant. D. D. McColl, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage on certain personal property, to wit, a sawmill and log cart.

At the close of the testimony, the plaintiff's attorney made a motion for the direction of a verdict, on the following grounds: "Mr. McColl: I move for the direction of a verdict, on the ground that all of the testimony goes to show that the chattels involved in this controversy were sold to Mr. Gray and kept by him, in his undisputed possession, for a period of about six months, and in reply to all of his criticisms and questions about the character of that property he was allowed to continue the use of it until such times as he was satisfied, and then, after the period of six months had elapsed, on the 17th day of June, he came in and signed an unequivocal promise to pay for all the chattels, amounting to $378; and that he is precluded by the terms of that written instrument from now raising the question of an acceptance of the goods under the sale, or from varying the terms of the written instrument to show that it is not an absolute promise to pay the definite sum of $378 at the ascertained and fixed time of November 1, 1904." The motion was granted, and the defendant appealed.

On the 17th of June, 1904, the defendant executed a certain instrument of writing, under his hand and seal, whereby he promised to pay to Bennettsville Hardware Company $378 on the 1st of November thereafter; and, in order to secure the payment of said indebtedness, bargained, sold, and delivered to the plaintiff one sawmill complete and one log cart.

For a defense to plaintiff's alleged cause of action, and by way of counterclaim thereto, the defendant alleged: "That heretofore, during the early part of the year 1904, or the latter part of the year 1903, this defendant made a contract with plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell, and did sell, to the defendant a sawmill complete, including saw, at and for the sum of $340, at the same time representing and guaranteeing to the defendant that same was first class in every respect, and would do good and satisfactory work; he well knowing at the time that the defendant was purchasing said sawmill for the purpose of sawing lumber as soon as same could be delivered to him. * * * That he could not get same to work in anything like a satisfactory manner, and immediately reported to the plaintiff that said sawmill would not work, and offered to return same to the plaintiff; but, at the earnest solicitation of the plaintiff, this defendant employed other millmen to make repeated efforts to get the mill to operate, but, finding that he could not do so, this defendant again notified the plaintiff that said sawmill was worthless to him, as same would not work in a satisfactory manner, and told the plaintiff that he would not pay anything more therefor, and offered to return the same, including the log cart covered by the chattel mortgage mentioned in the complaint, to the plaintiff and lose the $75 which he had paid in cash thereon. That thereupon the plaintiff persuaded this defendant to execute to him the note and chattel mortgage, mentioned in the complaint, by promising this defendant that he would send a man to put said mill in proper condition, and make it do satisfactory work to the defendant, as he had guaranteed it would do, and then and there promising this defendant that if he failed to make said mill do work satisfactory to the defendant he would take back the mill and cart, and surrender to the defendant the note and mortgage. * * * That, by reason of the inferior quality of said sawmill and its entire failure to come up to the representations and guaranty which the plaintiff made to the defendant concerning it, this defendant lost much valuable time and labor in trying to operate same, large sums of money which he had to pay out on account thereof, including freight on said sawmill, and other expenses which he had to incur, and buying lumber at a high price to supply the place of lumber intended to be cut with this sawmill, and was so hampered, hindered, and delayed in his sawmill business that he had to abandon same, to his damage $1,000."

The plaintiff, replying to the answer of the defendant and the counterclaim therein set up, alleged: "That he denies each and every allegation of the said answer, except as same may be hereinafter admitted or qualified. That the plaintiff admits that heretofore, on or about the 17th day of December, 1903, the defendant made a contract with the plaintiff whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell, and did sell, to the defendant a certain sawmill outfit and a log cart, including with the sawmill a certain saw, all for the price of $410; but the plaintiff denies that he represented and guaranteed to the defendant at the same time that the said sawmill was of any special class, other than it was a good sawmill for the money. The plaintiff, however, did state to the defendant that the said sawmill was guaranteed by the company from which the plaintiff purchased the same, and that in case the defendant became dissatisfied with said sawmill that he must report the same to the plaintiff, who would then have recourse on the company from which he purchased the same, under its guaranty to plaintiff; but the plaintiff did not represent that the said sawmill was sold as a standard one, but as a low-priced one. * * * That plaintiff, further replying to the answer and counterclaim of the said defendant, says that the chattel mortgage was given to secure, not only the purchase price of the sawmill outfit and log cart, but for other indebtedness due to the plaintiff by the defendant, and that the said note and chattel mortgage was not based on any other verbal understanding between the plaintiff and defendant."

It thus appears from the pleadings (1) that the mortgage executed on the 17th of June, 1904, was to secure the payment of the purchase money for the new sawmill, etc., which was sold and delivered during the latter part of 1903 or the early part of 1904; (2) that the instrument of writing executed on the 17th day of June, 1904, did not contain all the terms of the contract entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant when the property was purchased; and (3) that the defendant's answer alleges an independent agreement, and the following authorities show that it does not vary, contradict, or alter the terms of the written agreement, dated the 17th of June, 1904: Chemical Co. v. Moore, 61 S. C. 166, 89 S. E. 346; Ashe v. Railway, 65 S. C. 134, 43 S. E. 393; Earle v. Owings, 72 S. C. 362, 51 S. E. 980; Williams v. Salmond, 79 S. C. 459, 61 S. E. 79; Holliday v. Pegram, 89 S. C. 73, 71 S. E. 367.

We desire to call special attention to the case of Williams v. Salmond, 79 S. C. 459, 61 S. E. 79, in which it was held that a contract to repair houses, or to build new ones, is separate and apart from a lease of the premises. It may or may not be incorporated in the written lease. If not, it may be made and proved by parol, and an additional consideration to that expressed in the lease may be shown. Also the case of Holliday v. Pegram, 89 S. C. 73, 71 S. E. 367, in which it was held that, where a rent contract is silent as to repairs, evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that the landlord, as part of the consideration of the contract, agreed to make repairs. We see no difference in principle between these cases and that now under consideration.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

WOODS, HYDRICK, and WATTS, JJ., concur. FRASER, J., did not hear this case.

Where, in a suit to enforce a covenant in a deed by which defendants agreed to pay the cost of constructing a party wall, defendants claimed that such cost was limited to $750, that the wall did not cost the amount sought to be recovered, and that they were not to be called on to pay for the wall until they, their heirs, or assigns made use of it, they were not entitled to a jury trial as a matter of right.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; J. W. DeVose and S. W. G. Shipp, Judges.

Action by C. P. Osteen and another against F. A. Bultman and others, to recover the cost of the construction of a party wall, amounting to $1,684.93, under a covenant in a deed. Defendants answered, alleging that it was agreed that defendants were only to pay for a wall 80 feet long and two stories high of a certain character, of much less size than the wall constructed, and that it was also agreed that such wall was not to cost defendants more than $750, and that plaintiffs guaranteed to defendants that the wall would not cost more than that sum, and that they would have it constructed for that amount should they cause it to be built, that defendants purchased the lot of land described in the complaint from plaintiffs on the express understanding in contract and guaranty that the wall should not cost more than $750, which guaranty was a part of the consideration for the land, that the wall as actually constructed did not cost $1,684.93, and that such amount was an extortionate and exorbitant price for a wall of the character and kind constructed by plaintiffs on the land described. By a supplemental answer defendants alleged that since the commencement of the suit and the filing of the answer they had parted with the title to the land described in the complaint, and then had no title or interest therein, and for this reason prayed to be dismissed. Defendants moved for an order requiring issues as to the actual cost of the wall constructed, as to whether defendants had parted with their interest in the land, the amount, if any, due to plaintiffs in the action, and, if defendants were to pay plaintiffs the cost of the wall, when that payment was to be made, to be submitted to a jury, and from an order denying such motion, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

WATTS, J. This action was commenced on September 1, 1910, by service of summons and complaint, and its pendens was duly filed. The defendants answered, and subsequently the defendants conveyed the real estate referred to in the complaint by warranty deed, which was duly recorded, and thereafter having been granted an order by his honor, Judge Shipp, on June 13, 1911, served their supplemental answer, setting up the fact that they had parted with their title to the land described in the complaint. Within 10 days after the service of the supplemental answer, defendants served on plaintiffs a notice that they would move the court on the first day of the ensuing term, immediately after the call of calendar 3, to frame issues out of chancery for trial by jury. On July 20, 1911, Judge Shipp, then holding court in Sumter county, upon the call of the case on the calendar, was moved by defendants to transfer the case for trial by jury, the defendants taking the position that the transfer of the title by them had terminated the alleged lien, if any ever existed, and the cause of action remaining consisted only of a money demand. When this motion was made, the jury for the term had been discharged, and the court was engaged in hearing matters that did not require a jury. The motion was refused. The defendants then moved, upon notice previously served, to frame issues out of chancery for the jury. This was also refused. From this order defendants appealed, and raise two points to be considered by this court: (1) Are defendants entitled to trial by jury of the issues involved in this case as a matter of right? (2) If defendants are not entitled to have this case submitted to a jury as a matter of right, are defendants entitled to have issues framed out of chancery to be submitted to a jury in compliance with the notice given in the case?

[1] Judge Shipp by his order held that, upon the pleadings in the case, the defendants were not entitled as a matter of right to a trial by jury, and that they failed to comply with rule 28 of the circuit court, and that his order was not intended to affect the right of any subsequent judge to refer any issues which he might see fit for the purpose of enlightening his conscience.

[2] We do not think under the pleadings in the cause that the defendants had the legal right to demand a jury trial, and that the motion to frame issues was addressed to the discretion of the court and a refusal by him is not appealable, unless there was an abuse of such discretion. We find no such abuse when his honor decided that the defendants had waited too long to make the motion and refused the same. Neal v. Suber, 56 S. C. 303, 33 S. E. 463; Pruitt v. Pruitt, 57 S. C. 163, 35 S. E. 485.

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

MACKORELL BROS. v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 2, 1912.)

On petition for rehearing. Dismissed.
For former opinion, see 73 S. E. 359.

GARY, C. J., and WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ. After careful consideration of the within petition, we find no ground for a rehearing. The petition is therefore dismissed, and the stay of remittitur revoked.

FRASER, J. I did not sit in this case, had no access to the record, and therefore do not feel myself at liberty to sign an order in the cause.

WATTS, J. I did not sit in this case, but concur in the order dismissing petition for a rehearing, as the members of the court who heard the case now sign such an order. At the same time I am unwilling to commit the court on the point referred to in concurring opinion of Mr. Justice WOODS until a case arises in which that question is involved directly and the court has had the benefit of full argument.

DOBSON v. DUNCAN et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Feb. 29, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 303*)—PASSENGERS—DUTY TO STOP TRAINS.

A railroad company is bound to stop its train at stations long enough to give passengers therefor a reasonable time to alight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1226-1229; Dec. Dig. § 303.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—PASSENGERS—INJURIES AT STATIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ALIGHTING FROM MOVING TRAIN.

It is not contributory negligence as a matter of law for a passenger to alight from a moving train at the invitation of the carrier's agent, unless the danger is obvious to one of ordinary prudence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1391-1393; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—PASSENGERS—INJURIES IN ALIGHTING—JURY QUESTION—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Evidence in a passenger's action for personal injuries in alighting from a moving train at the porter's direction held to make it a jury question whether plaintiff was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 68*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—STANDARD OF CARE.

The legal standard of due care is the conduct of one of ordinary prudence under similar circumstances, irrespective of whether the person in question be careful or careless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 92, 94, 95; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—PASSENGERS—INJURIES—JURY QUESTION—DANGER IN ALIGHTING.

Evidence in a railroad passenger's action for personal injuries in alighting from a moving train at the porter's request held to make it a jury question whether the train was going so fast as to make it obviously dangerous for plaintiff to alight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 319*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

A railroad passenger who was ordered by the porter to alight from a train which was going so fast as to make it obviously dangerous for her to do so, thereby showing a reckless disregard of her rights as a passenger, could recover punitive damages for resulting injuries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1338-1345; Dec. Dig. § 319.*]

7. CARRIERS (§ 319*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—PUNITIVE DAMAGES—EFFECT OF CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A railroad passenger's contributory negligence in alighting from a moving train pursuant to an employe's direction would not prevent recovery of punitive damages, if the employe was guilty of a reckless disregard of her rights in ordering her to alight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1338-1345; Dec. Dig. § 319.*]

8. CARRIERS (§ 333*)—PASSENGERS—DUTY IN ALIGHTING.

Ordinarily a passenger should alight with reasonable promptness at his destination, provided the train stops long enough for him to safely do so, and he is not prevented from safely alighting by forces beyond his control, such as a severe storm.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1385-1397; Dec. Dig. § 333.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 260*)—REFUSING INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY INSTRUCTION GIVEN.

Plaintiff was not prejudiced by the refusal of requested instructions, where the parts thereof which were correct were given in the general charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

10. NEGLIGENCE (§ 68*)—“CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE”—“DUE CARE.”

The standard for determining whether plaintiff has exercised due care is the conduct of an ordinarily prudent person under similar circumstances; and, if plaintiff did not exercise the care which an ordinarily prudent person would have exercised for her own protection under similar circumstances, she was guilty of contributory negligence, irrespective of her actual intelligence or prudence in general.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 92, 94, 95; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1540-1547; vol. 8, p. 7617; vol. 3, pp. 2221-2222; vol. 8, p. 7643.]

11. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY GENERAL CHARGE.

In a passenger's action for personal injuries in alighting while the train was moving at the porter's direction, defendant requested a charge that the standard for determining whether plaintiff used due care was the conduct of an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances, and that, if plaintiff had not exercised the care of an ordinarily prudent and careful person under similar circumstances, she was guilty of contributory negligence, irrespective of her actual intelligence, prudence, etc. In refusing the charge the court stated that the statement of law therein was taken from a certain case, but he could not charge that as the law in this case; that in the other case a man who was seeing his family off stayed on the train too long and deliberately rushed off; and that, while the instruction was correct there, a railroad owed a passenger a higher degree of care than to a licensee, and the requested charge could not be given as applicable to the case of a passenger as here. Held that, notwithstanding that the jury were instructed substantially as requested in the general charge, the refusal of the requested charge was reversible error in view of the court's remarks as to its inapplicability; it being correct as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

12. TRIAL (§ 194*)—CHARGES ON FACTS.

A requested charge in a railroad passenger's action for personal injuries in alighting that, if plaintiff attempted to alight when the train was moving so rapidly as to make the danger of alighting obvious to an ordinarily prudent person, and was not compelled to do so by defendant's agent, but did so of her own free will, she was guilty of negligence barring recovery if contributory, was not a charge upon the facts, and was correct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

13. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—IRRELEVANT INSTRUCTIONS.

Irrelevancy in parts of the charge is not reversible error, unless prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

14. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS ON FACTS.

An instruction that certain facts stated therein would not be considered contributory negligence by a railroad passenger was erroneous as a charge on the facts and invading the jury's province, where the question of contributory negligence was for the jury under the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by Julia Dobson against E. C. Duncan and others as receivers of the Seaboard Air Line Railway. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wyman & Wyman and Lyles & Lyles, for appellants. Harley & Best, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. Respondent recovered judgment on circuit for damages for personal injury sustained while alighting from a moving train. Her testimony tended to show that she bought a ticket at Olar, a station on defendant's road, and got aboard the train as a passenger to Ulmers, another station on the same road; that the train did not stop at Ulmers long enough for her to get off; that after the train had started, and while it was moving pretty fast, the train porter urged her to get off, that he kept saying to her "get off," "get off"; that, in obedience to his orders, she attempted to get off, and was thrown or fell, and sustained a painful and permanent injury to her ankle joint.

At the close of plaintiff's testimony, defendants moved for a nonsuit on the ground that the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the testimony was that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to alight under the circumstances. The motion was refused, and, at the close of all the testimony, defendants moved for the direction of the verdict; the motion being made in the form of requests to charge that plaintiff could not recover because of her contributory negligence as in the motion for nonsuit; that there was no evidence upon which punitive damages could be awarded; that there was no evidence that plaintiff had paid her fare, and therefore no evidence that she was a passenger; hence she was only a licensee, and there was no evidence of any breach of duty to her. These requests were refused.

[1, 2] In Cooper v. Railway, 56 S. C. 91, 34 S. E. 16, the court said: "A railroad company is in duty bound to stop its train at the station to which it has agreed to carry a passenger, and give reasonable time and opportunity for a safe landing. It is also a breach of the carrier's duty to expressly or impliedly invite a passenger to alight from a moving train. But the circumstances, as the slow motion of the train, the distance from the platform step to the landing, the smoothness of the landing place, etc., may be such as to justify a person of ordinary prudence and senses in acting on such invitation and alighting from a moving train. The complaint does not show that the train was moving so fast as to make it obviously dangerous to alight. The authorities show that it is not negligence per se, or as a matter of law, for a passenger to alight from a moving train on the invitation of the carrier's agent, unless the circumstances are such as to make the danger of alighting obvious to a person of ordinary prudence and senses." This rule was adhered to and applied in Cooper v. Railway, 61 S. C. 345, 39 S. E. 543; Doolittle v. Railway, 62 S. C. 130, 40 S. E. 133; Creech v. Railway, 66 S. C. 528, 45 S. E. 86; Cooper v. A. C. L. R. Co., 69 S. C. 479, 48 S. E. 458; Gyles v. Railway, 79 S. C. 176, 60 S. E. 433; Smith v. Railway, 80 S. C. 1, 61 S. E. 206; Sevier v. Railway, 82 S. C. 311, 64 S. E. 390; Stephens v. Railway, 82 S. C. 542, 64 S. E. 601.

[3] There was conflict in the evidence as to the speed of the train at the time plaintiff got off. Some of the witnesses said it was going "pretty fast," and that they would not have attempted to get off. On cross-examination the plaintiff herself said it was going "fast," that she had never seen a woman try to get off a train going that fast, and that she thought it was dangerous, but that she was in the company's hands, and thought she had to get off, when they told her to do so. The train porter testified that, when plaintiff got off, the train had gone only about a car length, and the conductor said it had gone about a car and a half, and both said they got on about the time plaintiff got off. Notwithstanding plaintiff's own testimony that the train was going fast, and that she thought it was dangerous to attempt to alight when she did, in view of all the testimony as to the speed of the train at the time, and of the testimony that plaintiff was being urged, if not positively ordered, to get off by the porter, the court could not have said that the only reasonable inference to be drawn from the testimony was that it was obviously dangerous to a person of ordinary prudence and senses to attempt to alight under the circumstances, and therefore that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The plaintiff's own testimony that she thought it was dangerous was not conclusive of the question whether it would have so appeared to a person of ordinary prudence and senses. She may have been overly cautious and timid.

[4] The standard fixed by the law for the guidance of the courts in considering the conduct of one who is charged with negligence is the conduct of a person of ordinary prudence and senses under the given circumstances; and it is immaterial whether the party whose conduct is under consideration be exceedingly careful or exceedingly careless, his conduct must be tested by the same standard. Smith v. Railway, 80 S. C. 1.

[5-7] Moreover, if the train did not stop long enough for the plaintiff to get off, and if she was ordered by the train porter to get off while the train was going at such a rate of speed as made it obviously dangerous for her to do so, which were questions of fact for the jury, a case for punitive damages was made out, to which plaintiff's contributory negligence, if proved, was no defense; for, if the facts stated were true, they tended to show a reckless disregard of plaintiff's rights as a passenger. The ground that there was no evidence that plaintiff was entitled to the rights of a passenger was evidently taken under a misapprehension of the testimony.

Defendants' fifth and sixth requests to charge were as follows:

"(5) A passenger is under a duty to alight with reasonable promptness when the train reaches his or her destination, and a failure to do so constitutes negligence on her or his part, and, if such negligence contributes to his or her injury as a proximate cause, without which it would not have occurred, then he or she cannot recover therefor from the carrier.

"(6) A passenger is under a duty to use due care to alight from a train in the usual, ordinary, and safe manner, and, if he or she fails to do so, it constitutes negligence on his or her part, and if such negligence contributes to his or her injury as a proximate cause, without which it would not have occurred, then he or she cannot recover therefor from the carrier."

In disposing of these requests, his honor said of the fifth: "The fifth I cannot charge, because it is a point blank statement of what constitutes negligence, and the law is that negligence is a mixed question of law and fact. So I cannot charge that in the shape in which it is." As to the sixth, he said: "The sixth, of course, I have to refuse for the same reason. That is stating to you what set of facts would constitute negligence and that is for you." We think these requests were properly refused for the reasons stated by the circuit judge.

[8] Under ordinary circumstances, a passenger ought to alight with reasonable promptness when the train arrives at his destination, provided, it stops long enough for him to do so with safety. The fifth request was faulty in omitting the proviso which we have added, which was a vital issue in the case. Moreover, the court could not lay it down as a universal rule, applicable under all circumstances, that a passenger who fails to alight with reasonable promptness when the train reaches his destination is guilty of negligence. Such a storm may be raging that a passenger could not leave the train promptly, except at the peril of his life. The sixth request as clearly involves the issuable fact whether it was negligence for plaintiff to alight from the moving train. The court was asked to charge that a passenger who does not alight in the "usual, ordinary, and safe manner" is guilty of negligence. That would have been equivalent to saying that one who alights from a moving train is guilty of negligence, which we have seen is not the law; because the "usual, ordinary, and safe manner" is to alight when the train is at a standstill.

[9] The substance of these propositions in so far as they did not involve the facts was given to the jury in the general charge, and plaintiff was not prejudiced by their refusal.

[10, 11] The defendant's seventh request was as follows: "In determining whether the plaintiff has used due care, the standard for the jury is the conduct of an ordinarily prudent, careful, and sensible person, under the circumstances in question. If the jury concludes that the plaintiff has not exercised the care that an ordinarily prudent, careful, and sensible person would have exercised for her own protection under similar circumstances, then they must find that plaintiff has been guilty of negligence, irrespective of the particular intelligence, knowledge, or prudence of the plaintiff whose conduct is brought into question." In refusing this request his honor said: "Now that statement of the law, gentlemen, was referred to here during the trial, as taken from one of the law books, and is a direct citation from Smith v. Railroad Company, but I cannot charge you that as law in this case. It struck me as a remarkable proposition in this case. That is a case where a man went down with his family to see them off on a train, and he was on board the train seeing them off, and the law is that people have a right to do that, to go down with their families and see them off upon the train, and that they are not trespassers upon the train, but they are licensees. In that case the train started off, the man stayed too long on the train, and he deliberately rushed off the train and injured himself, and brought forth these propositions which is correct law in that case. In that case he was only a licensee on the car, with the permission of the railroad, and to him the railroad only owed ordinary care, whereas, with a passenger the railroad owes a higher degree of care with reference to his transportation and alighting than it does to a licensee. So, you see, there is where the difference comes in. I cannot charge you that proposition as applicable to a passenger; that is, if you find that she was a passenger, the plaintiff was a passenger." From a careful consideration of his remarks, it is apparent that the learned judge was momentarily confused as to the difference in the degree of care due to a passenger and due by a passenger for his own protection. The request stated a correct proposition, and should have been charged. As the jury were given in the general charge substantially the same proposition as that contained in the request, we would be inclined to hold that the refusal of the request was harmless error, but for the remarks of the court in refusing it, wherein the jury were explicitly and emphatically told that the proposition contained in the request was not sound law as applied to a passenger. Under the circumstances, we cannot safely say that the defendants were not prejudiced by the refusal of the request.

[12] The eighth request to charge was as follows: "If the jury find that the plaintiff attempted to alight from the train when the same was moving at such a rapid rate of speed as to make the danger of alighting therefrom obvious to an ordinarily prudent, careful, and sensible person, and shall further find that she was not compelled to do so by the agent of defendant, but did so of her own free will and initiative, then they must find that she was guilty of negligence, and if this contributed to her injury as a proximate cause thereof, without which it would not have occurred, then she cannot recover." The circuit judge refused this request on the ground that it was a charge upon the facts. The court evidently overlooked the fact that the request was predicated upon the action of "an ordinarily prudent, careful and sensible person," whose conduct is the standard fixed by the law with which the conduct of all others must be compared in determining whether they are guilty of negligence. This request contained a correct statement of law, and should have been charged.

The tenth exception covers two pages of the "case," and contains a long extract from the charge, wherein the jury were instructed as to the duty of a carrier to a passenger who asks for or apparently needs assistance in getting on or off the train. The ground of the exception is that this part of the charge was misleading and confusing because it was inapplicable to the case as made by the pleadings and evidence. It is true that the portion of the charge quoted in the exception is not strictly relevant.

[13] But digressions of this sort cannot be made ground of reversal, unless it is made to appear that they were prejudicial, and it does not so appear in this case.

The eleventh exception complains of the following charge: "If it should appear that a passenger was on a train, having a ticket for a certain point, which the conductor had taken up, and it should appear to that officer that that party did not know that he or she had gotten to the station, or was not in such a condition apparently as to realize that the time had come and she must get off the train, and then the passenger should rush forward, under orders to get off the train, as charged in this complaint, and she was then rushed to the front of the train by the officers in charge, or porter in charge, charged with the duty of assisting passengers to alight, and then the train was moving, and although the train was moving at a rate of speed which was obviously dangerous for a person to deliberately undertake to jump off, but acting under the impulse and being driven to the steps, and being brought into that position of peril by the negligence of the railroad officers and then and there made a mistake of judgment and fell off the train, it would be for the jury to say whether or not that was not a breach of duty of the railroad officials in the exercise of the highest degree of care, the high degree of care due a passenger, in putting that person in that position, whereby an error of judgment at the last moment having been put in that position by the orders of the officials of the railroad company, that could not be held as contributory negligence on the part of the person to defeat her rights."

[14] We think his honor invaded the province of the jury and charged upon the facts when he told them that, under the facts and circumstances narrated in the first part of the remarks quoted, "that could not be held as contributory negligence on the part of the person to defeat her rights." If the court cannot declare what facts, series of facts, or combination of facts constitute negligence, and we have seen that it cannot, except where only one inference is deducible from them, neither can it declare what facts, series of facts, or combination of facts constitute contributory negligence, unless they are susceptible of only one reasonable inference. Precisely the same rules and tests must be applied in determining whether a plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence as in deciding whether a defendant is guilty of negligence.

The rule by which the conduct of a passenger is tested who is injured on account of obedience to the orders of a conductor, or other employé of the carrier, acting within the scope of his authority, is very much the same as that by which a servant's conduct is to be tested who is injured while obeying the orders of his master. In Stephens v. Railway, 82 S. C. 549, 64 S. E. 604, the servant's rule is thus stated: "To show contributory negligence, it is not sufficient that the employé receiving the order should have misgivings, and believe the act required to be hazardous, unless the danger is so imminent and obvious that a man of ordinary prudence would not incur it. If there is ground for reasonable difference of opinion as to the danger, the servant is not bound to set up his judgment against that of his superior whose orders he is required to obey, but he may rely on the judgment of such superior. The matter is thus well stated by Mr. Justice Holmes in McKee v. Tourtelotte, 167 Mass. 68, 44 N. E. 1071, 1072 [48 L. R. A. 542]: 'When we say that a man appreciates a danger, we mean that he forms a judgment as to the future, and that his judgment is right. But, if against this judgment is set the judgment of a superior, one to whom from the nature of the callings of the two men and of the superior's duty seems likely to make the more accurate forecast, and if to this is added a command to go on with the work and to run the risk, it becomes a complex question of the particular circumstances, whether the inferior is not justified as a prudent man in surrendering his own opinion and obeying the command. The nature and degree of the danger, the extent of plaintiff's appreciation of it, and the exigency of the work all enter into consideration, and no universal rule can be laid down.' The numerous authorities sustaining this statement of the law are collated in the note in Houston, etc., Ry. Co. v. De Walt, 97 Am. St. Rep. 877." The rule applicable to a passenger is thus stated in 5 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) p. 648: "Where a passenger acts in conformity to a permission or direction given by a conductor or other agent of the carrier, acting within the scope of his authority, and such conduct on his part will not expose him to a known or apparent danger which a prudent man would not incur, he will not be guilty of contributory negligence, although his conduct may result in bringing injury upon him."

We think the court erred in taking from the jury the question whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in alighting under the circumstances.

Judgment reversed.

(90 S. C. 462)

LADSHAW et al. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 2, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 320*)—INJURY TO PASSENGER—CINDERS—NEGLIGENCE.

Where a passenger, who was injured by a cinder blown through an open door into her eye, alleged that the carrier was negligent in leaving the car door open, and also in failing to equip the engine with proper and suitable appliances to prevent the escape of such cinders, and to keep them in reasonably good repair, and there was evidence of a violation of a rule requiring that the vestibule doors of the cars must be kept closed while the train was in motion, and that such violation was a direct and proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, the court properly refused to direct a verdict for defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 320.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 52*)—GROUNDS—QUOTIENT VERDICT.

The court will not consider a motion for a new trial, grounded on affidavits that the jury settled the amount of damages by the quotient method, as the court will not take cognizance of what transpires in the jury room, unless the jury has been guilty of misconduct so great as to subject them to the animadversion of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 101-105; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Mrs. Johann Ladshaw and others against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The exceptions referred to in the opinion are as follows:

"(1) In refusing motion made on the part of the defendant to direct the verdict in its favor; the errors being: (a) That there was no sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant to warrant his honor in sending the case to the jury. (b) Because the evidence is uncontradicted that the defendant used due care in providing its engine with proper appliances to prevent the escaping of sparks, and that on this occasion said engine was prudently and properly run and managed. (c) Because there is no evidence tending to show any negligence on the part of the defendant in failing to properly equip its engine, or in failing to carefully and prudently run the same on this occasion. (d) Because the evidence shows that all proper efforts were made to prevent the escape of sparks, and that if any cinders did get into the eye of the plaintiff it was not a cinder which had been negligently allowed to escape from the engine of the defendant.

"(2) Because his honor erred in instructing the jury as follows: 'But if to the danger incident to the act of traveling under the circumstances and conditions of this particular case is added a danger caused by the negligence of the carrier, the passenger does not assume the risk of those combined dangers. If the catastrophe in question did not result alone from the danger incident to the act of traveling under the given circumstances and conditions, but resulted because to that danger was added the consequences of the negligent act of the carrier, there was no such assumption of the risks as would relieve the carrier from liability.' The errors being: (a) That his honor in so charging charged upon the facts, contrary to section 26, art. 5, of the Constitution, which prohibits judges from charging on the facts. (b) Because his honor in so charging instructed the jury in effect, as matter of fact, that the plaintiff was injured. (c) Because his honor in so charging instructed the jury as matter of fact that the defendant was negligent. (d) Because his honor in so charging intimated to the jury that there had been a catastrophe, and that the defendant was negligent. These all being questions of fact exclusively for the jury, and not for the court.

"(3) Because his honor, in connection with the first request of the defendant, to wit, 'If a railroad company equips its engine and smokestacks with a spark arrester of the latest and best pattern, and keeps the same in good order, and operates the engine in a careful and prudent manner, then it is not responsible for an injury which might come to a passenger from a spark escaping from the smokestack,' erred by charging the jury therewith as follows: 'If that is the only act of negligence alleged.' The errors being, as it is respectfully submitted: (a) That, as the plaintiff in her complaint charged the defendant with negligence in allowing a spark to escape from an engine that was improperly equipped and improperly managed, the request of the defendant contained a sound proposition of law applicable to the allegations of the complaint. (b) Because his honor, in instructing the jury as he did in connection with this request, led the jury to believe that, even if the defendant's engine was properly equipped and was properly managed, and that it was not negligent in allowing a cinder to escape, yet the plaintiff could recover if the evidence shows she was injured by a cinder getting in her eye, even though it did appear that the defendant was not negligent in allowing such cinder to escape from its engine. (c) Because, under the allegations of the complaint, the right of the plaintiff to recover depended upon her being injured by a cinder which the defendant had negligently allowed to escape from the engine that was improperly equipped and improperly managed; and his honor erred, as it is respectfully submitted, in not charging the jury as requested by the defendant, without qualification or the addition of any word thereto.

"(4) Because, it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in that connection with the defendant's second request, to wit, 'If the evidence shows that it is impossible, even by the highest degree of care, to so equip a smokestack as to prevent all sparks from escaping, then, if the evidence shows that a smokestack is equipped with a spark arrester of the latest and best pattern, and is kept in good order, and that the engine is managed in a careful manner, and notwithstanding this a spark does escape and inflict an injury upon a passenger, the railway company would not be responsible on this account,' and in instructing the jury in connection therewith as follows: 'If that is the only act of negligence alleged—you understand that I mean by that if the only act of negligence alleged is that a spark escaped from the smokestack—that would apply; but in this case there are other acts of negligence alleged; you have already heard the complaint.' The error being: (a) That, as the plaintiff in her complaint charged the defendant with negligence by allowing a spark to escape from an engine that was improperly equipped and improperly managed, the request of the defendant contained a sound proposition of law applicable to the allegations of the complaint. (b) Because his honor, in instructing the jury as he did in connection with this request, led the jury to believe that, even if the defendant's engine was properly equipped and was properly managed, and that it was not negligent in allowing a cinder to escape, yet the plaintiff could recover if the evidence shows she was injured by a cinder getting in her eye, even though it did appear that the defendant was not negligent in allowing such cinder in escaping from its engine. (c) Because, under the allegations of the complaint, the right of the plaintiff to recover depended upon her being injured by a cinder which the defendant had negligently allowed to escape from the engine that was improperly equipped and improperly managed, and his honor erred, as it is respectfully submitted, in not charging the jury as requested by the defendant, without qualification or the addition of any word thereto.

"(5) Because his honor, in connection with the defendant's fourth request, to wit, 'If the evidence shows that the smokestack of the engine, which was attached to the train of cars on which the plaintiff was riding was equipped with a spark arrester of the latest and best pattern, and that the same was in good order, and that the engine was prudently managed, then the company would not be responsible if the evidence does nothing more than show that an employé of the company opened the door of the passenger coach preparatory to the stopping of a train at the station and the alighting of its passengers, even though it might further appear that a cinder which escaped from the smokestack did enter the eye of a passenger,' erred by charging the following: 'Provided that the door was opened at a time and in the manner that a prudent employé should have opened it, in the opinion of the jury, under the circumstances.' The errors being, as it is respectfully submitted: (a) That this was a sound proposition of law applicable to the facts of the case as disclosed by the evidence introduced. (b) Because this request contained a matter of law for the court, and his honor erred in submitting it to the jury, to be passed upon by them. (c) Because under the law it is the duty of employés of a passenger train to open the doors of the coaches preparatory to the stopping of a train and the alighting of its passengers, and it was error for the court to submit it to the jury to be passed upon by them.

"(6) Because, as it is respectfully submitted, his honor erred in not granting a new trial on the ground that the uncontradicted facts show that the verdict rendered by the jury was an illegal verdict, in that it was a verdict reached by the jury agreeing that each one should put down the amount he thought the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and then divide the same by 12."

GARY, C. J. This is an action for damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the negligence of the defendant.

The allegations of the complaint material to the questions involved are as follows: "That on or about March 14, 1905, plaintiff, Mrs. Johann Ladshaw, was a passenger on defendant's train going from Spartanburg to Pacolet, sitting about three seats from the front door of the car, and while in her seat, through the negligence of the defendant, a cinder came through said door and struck her right eye, imbedding itself therein, to her great expense, suffering, and injury, which she believes and alleges will be permanent, to her damage in the sum of $2,000. That said injury was directly due to and caused by the negligence of defendant in the said door having unnecessarily and carelessly been left open by the employé of defendant, to wit, its flagman, brakeman, or trainman on said train, who threw it open and left it open, while said train was in motion and cinders flying, at a point near East Spartanburg, and by defendant's failure to equip, and keep in reasonably good repair, the engine with proper and suitable appliances for the prevention of the escape of such cinder, and by its negligent operation of the engine at said place by rendering such escape possible, in the then condition of said engine, in not being so provided with such appliances." The defendant denied the allegations of negligence.

At the close of all the testimony, the defendant's attorneys made a motion for the direction of a verdict, on the ground that the evidence discloses no actionable negligence on the part of the defendant; but the motion was refused. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $633, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions which will be reported.

[1] First exception:

The complaint specifies two particulars in which the defendant was negligent: (1) In carelessly leaving the door open, through which a cinder was blown into the plaintiff's eye; and (2) failure to equip, and keep in reasonably good repair, the engine with proper and suitable appliances to prevent the escape of such cinder. If there was testimony tending to sustain either of said specifications of negligence, then there was no error in refusing to direct a verdict.

S. D. O. Kelly, a witness for the defendant, who was flagman on the train when the plaintiff was injured, thus testified, on cross-examination: "Q. Is it not a rule of your company that these vestibule doors must be closed while the train is in motion—rules 314, 414? Isn't that a rule of your company? A. They must be closed on leaving a station, and kept closed until they arrive." There was testimony tending to show a violation of this rule, and that the failure to observe it was the direct and proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

Second exception:

When that portion of the charge set out in the exception is considered in connection with the entire charge, it will be seen that it is free from error.

Third, fourth, and fifth exceptions:

These exceptions are predicated upon the theory that the complaint only alleges negligence in a single particular, and are disposed of by what was said in discussing the first exception.

[2] Sixth exception:

The syllabus in the case of Sheppard v. Lark, 2 Bailey, 576, thus correctly states the rule therein announced: "The court will not consider a motion for a new trial, grounded upon affidavits that the jury had settled the amount of damages, in an action for a tort, by striking an average of the several sums suggested by each juror. To entertain such a motion would lead to the assumption of a power to inquire into the process of reasoning by which the jury arrived at their verdict, and violate the discretion confided to juries by the law and Constitution. The court will not take cognizance of what transpires in the jury room, with a view to control the verdict, unless the jury have been guilty of misconduct so gross, and violations of law so obviously manifest, as to subject them to the animadversion of the court."

Judgment affirmed.

In an action in a justice's court, plaintiff's claim was for rent of space in a storeroom, and defendant "denied the indebtedness, and alleged a breach of the contract by way of defense." In the superior court on appeal, after verdict for defendant, plaintiff moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Held, that the motion was properly denied; the answer being not a plea in confession and avoidance, and not to be so construed, though in justice's court, but merely equivalent to the general issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; H. W. Whedbee, Judge.

Action by J. J. Baxter against Mrs. B. A. Irvin. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. A. Nunn, for appellant. D. E. Henderson and A. D. Ward, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought in the court of a justice of the peace of Craven county to recover the sum of $100, with interest from July 31, 1910, and the plaintiff complained in that court that it was due by contract for the rent of space in a storeroom. The defendant "denied the indebtedness, and alleged a breach of the contract by way of defense." The plaintiff recovered in the justice's court, and defendant appealed to the superior court, where there was a trial by jury. Both parties introduced evidence, and the jury returned a verdict for the defendant. Plaintiff thereupon moved for judgment non obstante veredicto. The charge of the court is not in the record, and it appears that no exceptions were taken during the course of the trial, before the verdict was rendered. The court overruled the motion for judgment, and the plaintiff appealed to this court from a judgment for defendant.

[1] We think the ruling of his honor was correct. At common law a judgment non obstante veredicto would be allowed only when the plea confessed a cause of action and set up matters in avoidance which were insufficient, although found true, to constitute either a defense or a bar to the action. Moye v. Petway, 76 N. C. 327; Ward v. Phillips, 89 N. C. 215; Walker v. Scott, 106 N. C. 56, 11 S. E. 364; Riddle v. Germanton, 117 N. C. 388, 23 S. E. 332. It was said in Moye v. Petway, supra, that the motion for such a judgment must, of course, be made after verdict, and the practice in such cases is very restricted. The motion will not be granted, unless it appears from the plea and the verdict, and not from the evidence, that the plaintiff is entitled to the judgment. Before the verdict, the plaintiff could sign judgment as on "nil dicit," or as if there had been no plea or defense, treating the plea, or now the answer, as a sham one, and even if he traversed the matter relied on in avoidance, and the issue was found against him, he was still allowed to take judgment notwithstanding the verdict; the practice having been adopted to discourage sham pleas and defenses. No such case is presented in this record. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant is indebted to him for rent in the sum of $100, and the defendant simply denied the allegation, and alleged a breach of the contract as a bar to the action. This was not a plea by confession and avoidance; for it was tantamount to the general issue, or a direct traverse of the plaintiff's allegation. If there is no evidence to establish the plaintiff's case, the defendant should either demur to the evidence, or request the court to charge the jury that there is no evidence, and that therefore they should answer the issue in favor of the defendant, and likewise, if there is no evidence to establish the defense, the plaintiff should request the court to give a similar charge in his favor: but this must be done before verdict, and, as said by Chief Justice Pearson, in Moye v. Petway, supra, this practice "has not the slightest bearing upon a motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, which is made by the plaintiff, after verdict, for insufficiency of the defendant's matter in avoidance. There are no two matters of practice more entirely different in all respects." In addition to this, it is familiar learning that any defect or insufficiency in the evidence must be called to the attention of the court, by a prayer for instructions, before verdict, so that cases may be tried on their true merits, and to prevent the loss of rights by mere inadvertence. Sutton v. Walters, 118 N. C. 495, 24 S. E. 357; State v. Kiger, 115 N. C. 746, 20 S. E. 456; State v. Hart, 116 N. C. 977, 20 S. E. 1014. The party is not allowed to take two chances; that is, he may not speculate on the verdict, hoping that it will be in his favor, and, if he loses or is disappointed in his expectation, move, after verdict, to set it aside, because of a failure or defect of proof, when, if he had called the attention of the court to the matter before the case was submitted to the jury, his adversary might have remedied the defect or supplied the missing evidence.

[2] The plaintiff's counsel contended, though, that this rule of practice or procedure should not apply to cases in the court of a justice of the peace, for the reason that no pleadings are there required, or rather no formal pleadings; but this, we think, is a misapprehension. It is true that the pleadings in that court may be oral; but it is expressly provided by Revisal, § 457, that the "pleadings in the courts of justices of the peace shall be (1) the complaint of the plaintiff, (2) the answer of the defendant," and, by section 1458, that "the pleadings may be either oral or written; if oral, the substance may be entered by the justice on his docket; if written, they may be filed by the justice and reference to them be made on his docket." It is further provided by section 1459 and section 1460 that "the complaint must state in a plain and direct manner the facts constituting the cause of action," and "the answer may contain a denial of the complaint or any part thereof, and also a statement, in a plain and direct manner, of any evidence constituting a defense or counterclaim." This court has been liberal in construing pleadings filed in a justice's court; but nevertheless they should conform to the requirements of the statute. Illustration of the degree of particularity required in justice's courts is found in the requirement that "the general issue entered on the justice's docket will be considered as [merely] a general denial of plaintiff's cause of action" (Blackwell v. Dibrell, 103 N. C. 270, 9 S. E. 192); that the pendency of another action must be specially pleaded in the answer or deemed to be waived (Montague v. Brown, 104 N. C. 163, 10 S. E. 186; Hawkins v. Hughes, 87 N. C. 115); that a former judgment must be specially pleaded, as it will not be considered under an answer merely denying indebtedness to the plaintiff. Smith v. Lumber Co., 140 N. C. 375, 53 S. E. 233; Harrison v. Hoff, 102 N. C. 128, 9 S. E. 638; Blackwell v. Dibrell, supra. It appears in this case that the general issue was pleaded, and on the face of the answer there is no suggestion of any confession of the plaintiff's claim, with a statement of matter in avoidance. The case must therefore be governed by the general rule of practice, and we cannot examine the evidence for the purpose of determining whether there was a confession of the indebtedness and insufficient matter pleaded in avoidance.

No error.

1. SALES (§ 418*)—FERTILIZER—DEFICIENCY IN QUALITY—BUYER'S REMEDY.

In an action for the price of fertilizer, defendant buyer was not entitled to recover for crop shortage resulting from a deficiency in the quality of the fertilizer; he being entitled, under Revisal 1905, § 3949, to a proportionate abatement of the price.

In an action for the price of fertilizer, defended on the ground of the fertilizer's deficiency in quality, evidence as to the difference in the appearance and nature of crops on different farms on which the fertilizer was used and the crops under which defendant used other fertilizers was properly excluded, as calling for remote and speculative inferences; the best evidence being the official analysis.

In an action for the price of fertilizer, testimony that, when or before defendant signed the contract, it was agreed that, if the official analysis should show that the fertilizer did not come up to plaintiff seller's representation, defendant should not pay anything was properly excluded, as contradicting the terms of the written contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Carter, Judge.

Action by Armour Fertilizer Works against Charles McLawhorn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. G. James & Son, F. C. Harding, and Albion Dunn, for appellant. L. I. Moore and Harry Skinner, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. Under a written contract with the defendant as a del credere agent, the plaintiff shipped him certain fertilizers at prices specified in said contract, which the answer admits that he duly received. The defendant used a portion of these fertilizers himself, sold some to his tenants, and a large portion to other persons. For nearly all that which he sold, he has collected payment, except from his relatives, who are solvent. The fertilizers were analyzed by the Agricultural Department at the request of the defendant, and a small deficiency in quality found, for which the defendant has received the proper abatement in price.

[1] The defendant assigns 24 errors, but in his brief abandons the first 5, and groups the other assignments into 4 classes. The first class, consisting of the sixth, nineteenth, and twentieth assignments of error, is to the holding of the judge upon the pleadings that no defense was open to the defendant, except to show total failure of consideration. The deficiency in value was allowed him in abatement of price. The claim of consequential damages resulting in the alleged shortage in his crop was properly disallowed by the court. Carson v. Bunting, 154 N. C. 532, 70 S. E. 923, where the court holds that the measure of damages is in the abatement of the price, as is also provided by Revisal 1905, § 3949.

[2] Assignments of error 8, 9, 10, and 11 are to the refusal of the judge to allow defendant to prove, on the question of damages, the difference in the looks and nature of crops on different farms on which this fertilizer was used and the crops under which he used other fertilizers. This is essentially the same point as one above discussed. To consider the variety of soil and attendant circumstances would be purely speculative. The only pertinency of such evidence would be the inference that the ingredients were not as represented. This would be too remote, depending upon the nature of soil, weather, cultivation, and the like. The best evidence is the analysis by the Agricultural Department. When the defendant ascertained therefrom the deficiency in the quality of the fertilizers, it was his duty to have bought fertilizing materials or ingredients to make good the deficiency. Not having done so, he can properly claim only the abatement of the price by reason of such deficiency, and that he has been allowed.

[3] Assignments of error 7 and 15 are to the refusal of the judge to allow defendant to prove that, at or before the time he signed the contract, it was agreed that, if the analysis of the Department of Agriculture should show that the fertilizer did not come up to the representations as to the quantity of each ingredient set out in the contract, he should not pay anything. In Walker v. Venters, 148 N. C. 388, 62 S. E. 510, it is said: "It is true that a contract may be partly in writing and partly oral (except when forbidden by the statute of frauds), and in such case the oral part of the agreement may be shown. But this is subject to the well-established rule that a contemporaneous oral agreement shall not contradict that which is written. The written word abides." This has been cited with approval in Bowser v. Tarry, 156 N. C. 38, 72 S. E. 74. If the alleged oral contract was prior to the writing, the latter governs.

Assignments of error 12 and 13 are because the court sustained the plaintiff's objection to the defendant giving his reasons for refusing to execute his notes or pay the claim of the plaintiff. These are not pressed by the defendant in his brief, which states that the ruling of the court upon the other exceptions renders it unnecessary.

The defendant relies strenuously upon Pratt v. Chapin, 136 N. C. 350, 48 S. E. 768. But we do not think that case is in point. There it was in evidence that the contract was not to be effective until it had been approved by another party; and hence the contract was incomplete until this condition precedent was complied with. In this case, the defendant undertakes to sustain the proposition that the terms of the contract which required him to pay so much money per ton can be contradicted by a parol agreement that he was not to pay anything at all, unless the ingredients came up to the full analysis set out in the contract. The court properly held that he could not show such agreement to contradict the written contract, and that his remedy was to abate the price to the extent of the deficiency, and that he could only defeat recovery altogether by showing a total failure of consideration.

No error.

E. T. JENNETTE & CO. v. CITY HAY & GRAIN CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1912.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 176*) — CONSTRUCTION — PROVINCE OF COURT.

It is for a trial court to determine the meaning of a written contract in controversy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 176.*]

2. SALES (§ 84*) — CONTRACTS — CONSTRUCTION.

In response to defendant's letter offering to sell corn at a fixed price but not fixing time for shipment, plaintiffs wired: "Book 400 cracked corn. Shipment thirty days if possible." Defendant replied by wire: "Booked cracked corn." Held, that the telegrams constituted a contract by defendant to sell plaintiffs 400 sacks of cracked corn of the grade mentioned in the letter at the price mentioned therein on orders made within 30 days, but that plaintiffs could not call for shipment of any part of the 400 sacks after that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 234, 235; Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*) — HARMLESS ERROR — INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action on a contract to sell sacks of cracked corn, plaintiff buyers were not prejudiced by an instruction that a particular shipment became plaintiffs' property after it was shipped, and, when it was seized and condemned by the department of agriculture in the hands of plaintiffs' customer, they were bound to release the corn and look to defendant seller for the difference in the value of the corn contracted for and that delivered together with plaintiffs' reasonable costs and charges, the evidence showing that plaintiffs discovered that earlier shipments were short in weight and defective in quality, and yet continued to receive shipments, and made no effort to release corn from seizure, permitting it to remain in a warehouse until it became worthless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4221-4224; Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; J. S. Adams, Judge.

Action by F. T. Woolard and another, partners as E. T. Jennette & Co., against the City Hay & Grain Company. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiffs, F. T. Woolard and E. T. Jennette, trading as E. T. Jennette & Co., bring this action to recover $150, alleged to be due as damages on a contract for the purchase of 400 sacks of cracked corn. The plaintiffs contend that the contract between them and the defendant required the defendant to ship 400 sacks of corn at a stipulated price within 30 days from March 26, 1909, as ordered out by them, and to ship on orders after the 30 days upon adding two cents per sack, which addition was called "carrying charges," and the defendant contends that the contract was to ship 400 sacks if ordered out within 30 days. It is admitted that 150 sacks were shipped under said contract within 30 days from its date, and that the plaintiffs ordered out the remaining 250 sacks on the 29th day of April, 1909, after the expiration of the 30 days, which the defendant refused to deliver, and the plaintiffs offered evidence of their damages, sustained by reason of such refusal. The 150 sacks shipped by the defendant were in three shipments of 50 sacks each, the last shipment being about April 7, 1909. All of these shipments were made upon drafts with bills of lading attached, and the plaintiffs were compelled to pay the drafts before they could receive the corn, and tags, containing an analysis as required by chapter 149, Laws 1909, were not attached to the sacks, and the plaintiffs offered evidence that the sacks were less in weight than was required by said statute.

One of the plaintiffs testified that the first and second shipments were defective in quality and short in weight; that, when the third shipment was received, they sold 45 sacks of it to Smith Paul, who carried it to his place of business from the depot, and, after it had been in his possession about two weeks, it was seized and condemned by the department of agriculture on account of the shortage in weight and the defective grade; that after the seizure the plaintiffs never offered to sell it, and had nothing more to do with it; that they replaced the corn taken from Paul, and the last time they saw the corn seized it was rotten and worthless. The said plaintiff also testified that the order for the 400 sacks of corn was a telegram of date March 26th, 1909, at 9:28 p. m., which was as follows: "Letter 23rd. Book 400 cracked corn. Shipment thirty days if possible. Answer immediately by wire"—to which the defendant replied at 10:10 a. m. of March 27, 1909: "Booked cracked corn." The letter of March 23d, referred to in the first telegram, is one from the defendant to the plaintiffs, offering corn and naming the price, but making no statement as to time of shipment. On April 8th the plaintiffs wrote the defendant, complaining of the quality of the corn and the deficiency in weight, and on April 9th the defendant replied, saying, among other things: "We request that you dispose of these goods to the best advantage, sell it in bulk, or in any other way that you think best, and send us account of sales, and, if you so desire, we will cancel the contract with you for the balance, as the margins we are able to get on your contract are not adequate to all of the trouble we are having." The defendant sent to the plaintiffs the analysis tags required by the statute soon after the shipments began, and such tags were on the 45 sacks at the time of seizure. On the 24th day of April, 1909, the day of the said seizure, the plaintiffs notified the defendant thereof, and soon thereafter (the exact time not stated) the defendant paid the department of agriculture the charges assessed by it.

His honor charged the jury that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover anything on account of the refusal to ship the last 250 sacks, because ordered after the expiration of the contract, and the plaintiffs excepted. The plaintiffs requested his honor to charge the jury as follows: "It is contended by plaintiffs that of one shipment of 50 sacks 45 sacks were seized and condemned by the department of agriculture, and became a total loss to the plaintiffs, and that they replaced the same with other corn which they purchased at a higher price, or $1.65 per sack; that this shipment so seized was made by defendant, bill of lading attached, and was paid for by plaintiffs before the bill of lading was obtained and before the corn had or could have been examined in the usual course of business of this kind; that the same was taken direct from the depot to customer's place of business, and was thereafter found in defective condition and condemned; that said shipment was defective in quality and short in weight, and so much below the corn contracted for in grade as to be practically valueless on this market; that defendant was notified of this condition, and thereafter undertook to settle the matter with the department itself. If you find these contentions to be true from the evidence, the court charges you that the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover $1.50 per sack for the corn condemned, or so much thereof as was shipped by defendant, and, in addition thereto, would be entitled to recover the difference between $1.50 per sack on said shipment of 50 sacks and the market price of No. 2 cracked corn at the time and place of delivery, if you find from the evidence that such price had advanced." This was refused, and plaintiffs excepted. There are other exceptions in the record, but they embrace the same questions covered by the two exceptions stated. There was a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $38.25, and from a judgment rendered thereon, they appeal.

Small, MacLean & McMullan, for appellants. Rodman & Rodman, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. [1,2] The contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant is in writing, and consists of the telegram of March 26, 1909, sent by the plaintiffs, and the reply of the defendant of March 27, 1909, and, being in writing, it was for the court to determine its meaning. We think his honor held correctly, as he charged the jury, that "the contract between the parties was that the defendant would sell to the plaintiffs 400 sacks of No. 2 cracked corn, delivered in Washington, at $1.50 per sack, provided that the same was ordered out by the plaintiffs within 30 days, and plaintiffs were not entitled to call for shipment of any part of the 400 sacks after the 30 days had expired." This seems, also, to have been the understanding of the plaintiffs at the time this action was commenced, as they wrote the defendant on the 3d day of May, 1909: "We are reasonable and do not expect anything unreasonable, now if you will refer to the purchase of this goods, you will find that we ordered some of this shipment out at once, we could have put the entire shipment off until thirty days, it looks as this should give us consideration." They made no claim then that they had the right under the contract to order out any of the corn after 30 days.

This being the correct construction of the contract, there can be no recovery for refusal to ship the 250 sacks ordered by the plaintiffs after the expiration of 30 days.

[3] Instead of the prayer requested by the plaintiffs, in reference to the 45 sacks, his honor charged the jury: "As to the 45 sacks seized and condemned, the court charges you that, after this corn was shipped, it became the property of the plaintiffs, and, when it was seized and condemned in the hands of one of their customers, it was their duty to release the same, and the measure of damages in such case was the difference in value between No. 2 cracked corn, weighing 100 pounds per sack, at the time and place of delivery, and the corn which was actually delivered, together with such reasonable costs and charges as plaintiffs incurred on account of the seizure and rehandling of the corn in question. After this corn was delivered to the plaintiffs and seized by the state, it was the duty of the plaintiffs to do the best they could with it, and to pay the cost of forfeiture and other necessary expenses incurred, but it is admitted in this case that defendant paid the costs of the forfeiture, and the plaintiffs are therefore not entitled to recover anything on that account, but only the difference in the value between this corn and No. 2 cracked corn, as above stated, together with any other expenses actually incurred by them in its handling." In view of the evidence of the plaintiffs and the admitted facts, this instruction was as favorable to the plaintiffs as they were entitled to. They say they discovered that the corn being shipped by the defendant had no tags on it, and was short in weight and defective in quality, before the shipment containing the 45 sacks was made, and that they continued to receive and sell it. The defendant sent the analysis tags to the plaintiffs as soon as notified of the necessity for them, and wrote them on April 9th to dispose of the corn in any way they thought best. The corn seized by the department of agriculture was in the possession of Smith Paul two weeks before the seizure, and he says he made no complaint about the corn, and the defendant paid the charges to the department. During this time the plaintiffs made no effort to release the corn from seizure, and, as they say, they had nothing more to do with it and permitted it to remain in the warehouse until it became worthless.

We find no error.

No error.

NEWTON et al. v. SCHOOL COMMITTEE OF CITY OF CHARLOTTE et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1912.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 77*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—MUNICIPAL ACTS.

Courts cannot control municipal corporations in the discretionary matters and powers conferred upon local administrative boards for the public welfare, unless their action amounts to an oppressive and manifest abuse of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 128*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—MUNICIPAL ACTS.

In an action to enjoin a board of school commissioners from selecting a certain school site for a graded school district, evidence held to show that the board fairly exercised its vested discretion in selecting a site.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; W. J. Adams, Judge.

Injunction by J. A. Newton and others against the School Committee of City of Charlotte and others. From a judgment dissolving a restraining order, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Clarkson & Duls, El. R. Preston, and Maxwell & Keerans, for appellants. Burwell & Cansler and Tillett & Guthrie, for appellees.

HOKE, J. This was an action to restrain defendant the Board of School Commissioners of the city of Charlotte from the selection of a certain school site for the graded school district of North Charlotte, heard before his honor, W. J. Adams, on December 9, 1911. There was judgment dissolving restraining order, and plaintiffs, citizens and taxpayers of the district, excepted and appealed, assigning for error, first, that the power of supervising the action of defendant board and of ultimate decision in the premises was vested by law in the board of aldermen of the city; second, that, if vested in defendant board, they had selected a site so unsuitable and in such flagrant disregard of the rights and interests of the patrons of the school as to render their action illegal and void. On appeal by the board of aldermen of the city of Charlotte in a case just decided, and for the reasons therein stated, the first exception must be resolved against the plaintiff, and, this being true, and on the facts as they appear in the present record, we are of opinion that like decision must be made as to plaintiffs' second position.

[1] In numerous and repeated decisions, the principle has been announced and sustained that courts may not interfere with discretionary powers conferred on these local administrative boards for the public welfare, unless their action is so clearly unreasonable as to amount to an oppressive and manifest abuse of discretion. Jeffress v. Greenville, 154 N. C. 499, 70 S. E. 919; Board of Education v. Board of Commissioners, 150 N. C. 116, 63 S. E. 724; Rosenthal v. Goldsboro, 149 N. C. 128, 62 S. E. 905, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 809; Ward v. Commissioners, 146 N. C. 534, 60 S. E. 418, 125 Am. St. Rep. 489; Small v. Edenton, 146 N. C. 527, 60 S. E. 413, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 145; Tate v. Greensboro, 114 N. C. 392, 19 S. E. 767, 24 L. R. A. 671; Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244. In some of the opinions, decided intimation is given that, in so far as the courts are concerned, the action of these administrative boards must stand, unless so arbitrary and unreasonable as to indicate malicious or wanton disregard of the rights of persons affected. It is undesirable and utterly impracticable for the courts to act on any other principle. Speaking to this question in Ward v. Commissioners, our present Chief Justice quotes with approval from the opinion in Brodnax v. Groom, supra, as follows: "In Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244, Pearson, C. J., discussed this subject, and said: 'The case before us is within the power of the county commissioners. How can this court undertake to control its exercise? Can we say such a bridge does not need repairs, or that in building a new bridge near the site of an old bridge it should be erected, as heretofore, upon posts, so as to be cheap, but warranted to last some years, or that it is better policy to locate it a mile or so above, where the banks are good abutments, and to have stone pillars, at a heavier outlay at the start, but such as will insure permanence and be cheaper in the long run? In short,' the court continued, 'this court is not capable of controlling the exercise of power on the part of the General Assembly or of the county authorities, and it cannot assume to do so without putting itself in antagonism as well to the General Assembly as to the county authorities and erecting a despotism of five men, which is opposed to the fundamental principles of our government and the usages of all times past. For the exercise of powers conferred by the Constitution, the people must rely upon the honesty of the members of the General Assembly and of the persons elected to fill places of trust in the several counties. This court has no power, and is not capable, if it had the power, of controlling the exercise of power conferred by the Constitution upon the legislative department of the government or upon the county authorities.'"

[2] Considering the evidence presented in the light of these authorities, the court below has clearly made correct decision on the rights of these litigants; while the plaintiffs, acting, no doubt, under full belief that their rights and interests have been entirely disregarded, have filed strong affidavits tending to show that another place for a school site should be selected, and, in fact, that in the present state and placing of the population there should be two schools maintained in the district. There is satisfactory evidence on part of the defendants tending to show that the site determined on is near the physical center of the school district; that it is a most attractive site, having desirable elevation and affording ample space for the buildings for the school and playgrounds for the children.

Among other affidavits in support of their position, defendants offer that of Alexander Graham, Esq., the superintendent of the city schools. The affiant, who has now held this position for the past 23 years, and whose administration has been again and again approved by his associates and fellow citizens, makes oath as follows: "That he was in attendance, in his capacity as superintendent of the schools, at the several meetings of the board of school commissioners when the location of the school spoken of in the complaint was determined by these commissioners, and he verily believes that in the selection of this site they, and each one of them, were actuated solely by their interest in the promotion of the cause of education in the city of Charlotte, and the proper use of the fund which the people have put at the disposal of the board for the purpose of buying sites for buildings and erecting houses thereon. He further swears that he is acquainted with the other sites for buildings selected by the board, and he verily believes that each one of these sites is the proper site for school buildings, and will serve the community as proper sites for schools. He further swears that he is familiar with the other sites mentioned in the complaint, and which the plaintiffs in this action allege should have been selected, instead of the one offered by the Pegram-Wadsworth Land Company, and he expresses the opinion that the board, in rejecting each one of these sites, did that which was best for the interests of the public and the children of that vicinity. He further swears that he believes that the best interests of the administration of the fund of the city will be promoted by consolidating, as much as possible, those few to be well equipped, and, at the same time, to be so located as to be convenient, as far as they may be, to the children of the different portions of the city, and that these selections of sites, in his opinion, should be made, and, as he believes, have been made thus far, by the board, with a view to the convenience and interest, not only of the present generation, but of those who are to come after, and who will hereafter attend these schools. He further swears that, before the Pegram-Wadsworth Land Company had made any offer whatever in regard to the site in question, he had looked over this school district with a view to determining, in his own mind, what would be the best location for a school building for these two wards, and that he had selected the very site that has been selected by the board; his impression being that the site must be purchased, and would not be donated."

In view of this and other supporting evidence, we think his honor might well hold, as he did in his judgment, "that the board of school commissioners has fairly and properly exercised the discretion vested in the board in respect to the selection of the site for the school building referred to in the complaint." And certainly there is nothing in the record to justify the courts in undertaking to disturb the conclusion they have reached.

There is no error, and the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

Affirmed.

THOMPSON et al. v. APPALACHIAN POWER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1912.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 95*)—CONTRACTS RELATING TO REALTY—INDEFEASIBLE TITLE.

Specific performance of a contract for the purchase and sale of land will not be decreed where the plaintiffs are unable to make a good and indefeasible title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 257-277; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 106*)—PROCEEDINGS—PARTIES.

Where persons who seek the specific performance of a contract to purchase land are merely trustees thereof, and the cestuis que trust are not parties, specific performance will not be granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 342-351; Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Polk County; Long, Judge.

Submission of controversy between David A. Thompson and others and the Appalachian Power Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Action dismissed.

The plaintiffs seek to compel the defendant to specifically perform a contract for the purchase of a large tract of land, and to pay to the plaintiffs the sum of $40,000 purchase money. The judge below rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, decreeing specific performance of the contract, and requiring the payment of the purchase money. The grounds upon which specific performance is resisted by the defendant is that the plaintiffs are unable to make a good and indefeasible title to the property.

Bomar & Osborne and Tillett & Guthrie, for appellant. Smith & Shipman and Jas. H. Merrimon, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] In view of the doubtful character of the title offered by the plaintiff, and further considering the fact that the cestuis que trust have not been made parties to this action, the court is of the opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, specific performance should not be decreed.

The action is dismissed without prejudice. Dismissed.

TERRELL v. CITY OF WASHINGTON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 124*)—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES—DUTY OF INSPECTION.

A telephone, telegraph, or electric light company owes a duty to its employés to inspect poles before using them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 235-242; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 733*)—LIABILITY—GOVERNMENTAL OR CORPORATE POWERS.

When a city operates an electric light plant, its duties toward its employés are the same as those of an individual in like circumstances, since it is exercising a corporate, and not a governmental, function.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1547-1549; Dec. Dig. § 733.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 124*)—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 847*)—DUTIES TOWARD SERVANTS—INSPECTION.

A city operating an electric light plant does not perform its whole duty by merely selecting sound and safe poles for use, but must, by proper inspection, keep them safe for the use of its employés and the protection of the public.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 235-242; Dec. Dig. § 124.* Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 847.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 101, 102*)—DUTIES TOWARD SERVANT—PLACE AND APPLIANCES.

A master owes to his servant the duty of using ordinary care to provide reasonably safe instrumentalities of service suitable to the work to which they are applied, and properly adjusted to each other, among which instrumentalities are safe places to work or to stay while awaiting orders, reasonably safe ways of entrance and departure, and an adequate supply of sound and safe materials, implements, and accommodations, with such other appliances as may reasonably be required to assure their safety while at work or passing over his premises to or from work.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 125*)—UNSAFE PLACE OR DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES.

If a master knows, or with ordinary care would have known, that the buildings, ways, machinery, tools, or materials which he provides for the use of his servants are unsafe, and the servant, without contributory fault, suffers injury thereby, the master is liable, but he is not liable without actual or constructive notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 243-251; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 124*)—DUTIES OF MASTER—INSPECTION.

When appliances are defective when put in use, a master is not entitled to time to discover the defects, but should examine them before using, and he cannot evade his responsibility by directing his servants to inspect them before using.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 130*)—UNSAFE POLES—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A master fails to provide a safe place for work, if he allows work to be conducted there habitually in a manner needlessly dangerous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 103*)—DUTY OF INSPECTION—PERFORMANCE.

A master's duty of inspection must be continuously fulfilled and positively performed, and is not discharged by directing its performance or by employing competent and careful persons for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 175; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 125*)—DEFECTS—DUTY TO REPAIR.

A master is not liable for failure to repair defects when he had neither actual nor constructive notice of their existence, and this notice must be proved, but he is chargeable with constructive notice of whatever he might have discovered by ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 243-251; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

10. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 126*)—DUTY TO REPAIR—REASONABLE TIME.

A master is entitled to a reasonable time after notice of a defect to make repairs, and if, during that period, a servant is injured, the liability of the master depends upon his diligence under the circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 253; Dec. Dig. § 126.*]

11. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 235*)—INSPECTION—DUTY OF SERVANT.

A lineman employed by a city, which was operating an electric light plant, was not chargeable with negligence for failure to inspect a pole before climbing it, especially where the defect was below the ground and would not have been discovered except by digging, since he was given an implied assurance that it was safe when he was ordered to climb it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 710-722; Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

12. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 231*)—MASTER'S DUTIES—RELIANCE ON PERFORMANCE.

A servant, in the absence of warning or knowledge of a defect, has a right to rely upon the safety of instruments and appliances which he is required to use, since he may assume that the master has performed his duties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 675-677; Dec. Dig. § 231.*]

13. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—EVIDENCE.

In an action by a lineman against a city operating an electric light plant for injuries from a falling pole, evidence held sufficient to justify submission to the jury whether the city was negligent in selecting and maintaining the pole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1010-1050; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

14. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 1022*)—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—EXCUSE.

A failure to present a claim against a city within the time fixed by its charter does not defeat the right of action where the claimant was mentally and physically unable to present it during that period, and did present it within a reasonable time after he was able to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2193; Dec. Dig. § 1022.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; Cline, Judge.

Action by Joe Terrell against the City of Washington. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligence. Plaintiff was employed by the defendant as a lineman in connection with the operation of its electric lighting plant, and on the day of his injury he was directed by his foreman to climb one of the poles for the purpose of repairing or removing one of the wires attached thereto. In order to perform his work, it was necessary for the defendant to wear spurs or spikes on his feet, and to fasten himself with his belt to the pole, and, while he was near the top doing his work, the pole fell to the ground, rebounded, and caused him serious injury, by reason of which he became unconscious and was confined to the hospital under medical treatment for a long time. There was evidence tending to show that the pole was rotten and in very bad condition several inches under the ground, and that it broke three or four inches below the surface of the ground. It was a juniper pole and should have lasted, so as to be used with perfect safety, from 6 to 20 years, and it had been standing only three years when it fell with the plaintiff. There was no rule or custom imposing upon the plaintiff the duty of inspection before ascending the pole, and there was nothing in its appearance calculated to put him on notice as to its condition. Above the ground it seemed to be sound and trustworthy, except, as one of the witnesses testifies, at the very top it was rotten, but that part of it which he was required to use was apparently sound and safe. There is ample evidence in the record to show that the pole was not one which should have been selected in the beginning, and after ordinary inspection, as sufficiently sound and strong for the uses to which it was intended to be applied. An arc light was suspended from the pole by a wire, the other end of which was attached to another pole on the opposite side of the street. A witness for the plaintiff gave the following description of the pole: "I looked at the pole after he fell. I do not know what became of it. The pole was rotten. It was as rotten as it could be. It broke off between three and four inches under the ground. They did not have any guy wires supporting the pole at that time. They did not have any braces of any sort on it to support it. It had the strain of the light on it. They did not have anything on it to relieve that strain; they only had the pole set back like this. It was leaning from the lamp. The lamp pulled it in the street. If it had not been for the lamp on it, it would have fallen like it started. It was a juniper pole. It was rotten between three and four inches below the ground. It was rotten on the outside." This witness further stated that the pole was not rotten above the ground and that, if an inspection had been made, it would have been taken down, and that no inspection was made to his knowledge. Another witness gave this description of the pole: "The pole was broken off three or four inches under the ground, and was decayed or rotten. You could take little pieces of the wood in your hands and break it up into dust. It had heart that looked sound, but you could take it in your hands and break it up. No one passing there could tell whether the pole was rotten or not, on account of the shell on the outside being hard. You could not tell whether the pole was rotten by the outside, nor unless you pried into the skin on the outside. You could tell by digging around it. There were no guy wires or braces supporting the pole." The defendant introduced the affidavit of Manly Pearson, made a few days after the pole fell, and therein, among other things, he made this statement: "There was grass grown around the pole at the bottom. Pole seemed to be solid. Showed no appearance of decay above ground, or above grass. Pole broke off about three inches under ground. Where pole broke—that is, place on pole—it was rotten and decayed; you could stick your finger in it; it was spongy, soft, thoroughly decayed; and the only solid spot in pole was a streak in center, the heart, about an inch or so in diameter. There was no support to poles. There were no 'guy' wires on poles. The only wire on pole that fell was wire running from it across street to other pole, from the center of which in the middle of street was suspended an electric 'arc' light; weight about 50 pounds. Distance from pole to pole about 40 feet. There was a powerful strain on poles, pulling against each other, and weight of light, and no supports, 'guy' wires, or anything behind poles to resist this pressure. I have been engaged in this kind of work for 18 years. Have worked in South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and other states, and most all poles had 'guy' wires on back of poles to support them. These 'guy' wires are necessary to hold poles in position. It is not customary for a lineman to examine poles under the ground when working on them. That is always done by another man." There was evidence to the effect that it was not customary to guy poles like the one in question with no more strain on them than it had, and that the appearance of the pole above the ground did not indicate that it was rotten or unsound, and the city did not have its poles inspected except in a casual or general way; "that is, by passing and looking at them." If the pole had been guyed, it would not have fallen, though there was evidence it was not customary to guy such poles. There was much additional evidence introduced by the parties to sustain their respective contentions, but it is not necessary to an understanding of the case that we should set it out.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The court, among other instructions, charged the jury as follows: "If Terrell was an experienced lineman and there was no regular pole inspector employed by the defendant, the duty of inspecting a pole, as to its safe or dangerous condition, rested as much upon the plaintiff, Terrell, as it did upon the defendant town, and if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was a person of ordinary information and had experience in the business in which he was engaged, and the town employed no regular or special pole inspector, then he assumed the risk of the breaking of any pole which he was called upon in the line of his duty to climb, not due to any defect in the original setting, and the town owed him no duty to inspect it and inform him of its defects, or to keep it sound, and if you find these to be the facts, you will answer the first issue [as to negligence] 'No.' If you find from the evidence that the pole, at the time it was set in the ground, was sufficiently sound and solid and of sufficient size not to have broken with the plaintiff and was properly erected, as has been explained to you, and you should further find that the plaintiff was an experienced lineman, then the changes by time and exposure produced in the pole was a risk the plaintiff assumed, and you will answer the first issue, 'No.' If you find from the evidence that the pole which broke and fell with the plaintiff was properly set originally and the breaking was not from any negligence in the original setting, but only from failure to keep it inspected and examined, and the plaintiff was an experienced lineman, you will answer the first issue, 'No.' If you find that the plaintiff had the experience, which I have spoken of, as a lineman, and that the pole was properly erected in the first instance, as I have heretofore fully instructed you, then I say that no further duty of its inspection from time to time rested upon the town, and if, under such circumstances, he was hurt by the falling of the pole, it would not be negligence attributable to the defendant, and you would answer this first issue, 'No.' Or if the pole fell because there was some rottenness in it and below the surface of the ground, and it was concealed by reason of any hard shell on the outside of the pole, so that if the ordinary inspection of poles of this kind, either by the defendant or the plaintiff, or both of them, would not have disclosed the defect and the consequent danger in climbing it, as it was, and because of this hidden defect in the pole, when it was subjected to the additional weight of his body and the necessary movements of his arms, and handling the wires, etc., it fell and injured him, his fall would be an accident for which no one would be blamable in law, and in such case you will answer the first issue, 'No.'"

The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, and, judgment having been entered thereon, the defendant appealed.

Ward & Grimes and H. C. Carter, Jr., for appellant. Norwood L. Simmons and Small, MacLean & McMullan, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The court, in addition to the instructions we have taken from the charge, told the jury that if the defendant set a pole in the ground which was unsound or unfit for use, or the defectiveness of which it could have ascertained at the time by the exercise of ordinary care, and also failed to brace or guy the pole, if the jury found that persons of ordinary prudence used the guy or brace under such circumstances, they would answer the first issue, as to the defendant's negligence, in the affirmative, provided they also found that the pole fell with the plaintiff, and its fall was caused directly and immediately by its unsoundness and the failure of defendant to brace the same, and that guys or braces were appliances which were approved and in general use for securing a pole like this one in a safe position. It is evident that the jury found, under the evidence and the instructions of the court, that the pole was originally defective, either to the actual or constructive knowledge of the defendant, and was not such a one as should have been used for the purpose to which it was applied. We emphasize the foregoing instruction of the court and the fact found by the jury to distinguish this case in limine from those cited by the defendant's counsel, as authorities for his contention that the duty of inspection rested upon the plaintiff and not upon the defendant.

[1] We believe that they all hold that this principle does not apply if the pole was originally unsound and unfit for use, and that it is the duty of a telegraph or telephone or electric light company, when it selects a pole for use in its line, to inspect it for the purpose of ascertaining if it is sound and fit.

[2] By parity of reason, the same is the duty and obligation of a city to its employes when it constructs and operates an electric light plant of its own, for it is not a public or governmental function, but a private and corporate duty, in the discharge of which the municipality will be held to the same degree of liability as an individual in like circumstances. Fisher v. Newbern, 140 N. C. 506, 53 S. E. 342, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 542, 111 Am. St. Rep. 857.

[3] But we are of the opinion that a city does not perform its whole duty by merely selecting a sound and safe pole in the beginning, but it must, by proper and reasonable inspection, keep it sound and safe for the use of its employes and the protection of the public, and in this respect we can perceive no valid reason why its duty should be less strict than is generally required of a master to exercise reasonable precaution for the safety of his servant. This general duty has been thoroughly settled by the authorities.

[4] The master personally owes to his servants the duty of using ordinary care and diligence to provide for their use reasonably safe instrumentalities of service. Among these are a reasonably safe place in which to do their work or to stay while waiting orders, reasonably safe ways of entrance and departure, an adequate supply of sound and safe materials, implements, and accommodations, with such other appliances as may reasonably be required to insure their safety while at their work or passing over his premises to or from work. These things must, moreover, be adapted to the work in hand. It is not enough that they should be good under ordinary conditions. They must be suitable for the work to which they are applied by the master, and properly adjusted to each other.

[5] If, therefore, the master knows or would have known if he had used ordinary care to ascertain the facts that the buildings, ways, machinery, tools, or materials which he provides for the use of his servants are unsafe, and a servant, without contributory fault, suffers injury thereby, the master is liable therefor, although he is not thus liable in the absence of actual or constructive notice.

[6] The master is not entitled to time to discover defects in things which are defective when put in use. He should examine them before putting them in use. He cannot evade his responsibility in these respects by simply giving general orders that servants shall examine for themselves, before using the place, material, etc., furnished by him. The fact that a servant could, by care and caution, so operate a defective and dangerous machine as not to produce injury to his fellow servants does not exempt the master from his liability for an omission to exercise reasonable care and prudence in furnishing safe and suitable appliances.

[7] The master fails to supply a "safe place" for work if he allows work to be conducted there habitually in a manner needlessly dangerous to servants. The master is also personally bound, from time to time, to inspect and examine all instrumentalities furnished by him, and to use ordinary care, diligence, and skill to keep them in good and safe condition.

[8] The duty of inspection is affirmative and must be continuously fulfilled and positively performed. Such duty is not discharged by giving directions for its performance, or by promulgating rules requiring it to be performed, or by employing competent and careful persons for that purpose.

[9] The master is not responsible for the want of repairs when he has neither actual nor constructive notice of their need; and this notice is not presumed, but must be proved, by the servant. And it must be proved that he was chargeable with notice of the particular defect complained of. But he is chargeable with constructive notice of whatever, by the use of ordinary care and diligence, he might have discovered, and thereby avoided the danger incident thereto.

[10] He is entitled to reasonable time, after a notice of a defect, within which to make repairs, and if, during that period, or while he is repairing, an injury occurs to a servant, the question of a master's negligence depends upon his diligence under all the circumstances. This statement of the law has been adopted in Sh. & Redf. on Negligence (5th Ed.) § 194, and in the main is sustained by our own decisions. Cotton v. Railroad, 149 N. C. 227, 62 S. E. 1093, and cases cited; Leak v. Railroad, 124 N. C. 455, 32 S. E. 884. We think the principle applies to the case in hand. The question in one form was presented in Harton v. Telephone Co., 146 N. C. 429, 59 S. E. 1022, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 956, and we then said: "The duty of reasonably careful construction is followed by like care in maintenance and inspection. Joyce, Elec. Law, 605. The duty of inspection, in regard to its frequency, cannot be made definite, but regard must be had to the character of the soil, the condition of the weather, the season of the year, and such other conditions as may affect the security of the poles and the safety of the traveling public."

[11] It is contended, however, by the defendant that the duty of inspection belonged to the plaintiff, and his failure to discover the defect in the pole was his own and not its fault. The proof is that the unsoundness of the pole was not apparent to the naked eye. It was below the ground and would not be discovered except by digging around the pole and removing the earth which concealed it. We cannot yield assent to the argument, at least under the circumstances of this case, that such a duty was imposed upon the plaintiff in caring for his own safety, and we discover nothing in the evidence to indicate that the plaintiff was guilty of any contributory negligence. In Barkley v. Waste Co., 147 N. C. 585, 61 S. E. 565, Justice Brown, in discussing the liability of the defendant for injuries to one of its employes who, while performing his work, fell from a defective scaffold and was injured, said: "The defendant owed to its employes, who were directed to work on this scaffold, the duty to exercise due care in selecting materials reasonably suitable and safe for its construction. 2 Labatt, § 614; Bushwell on Personal Injuries, §§ 196, 391, 392; Brewing Co. v. Wood, 87 S. W. 774 [27 Ky. Law Rep. 1012]; 4 Thompson, Neg. § 3957, note 30; Stanwick v. Butler [93 Wis. 430] 67 N. W. 723; Phoenix Bridge Co. v. Castleberry, 181 Fed. 181 [65 C. C. A. 481]. If defendant delegated the performance of this duty to Michael, it is responsible for the manner in which he discharged it. Tanner v. Lumber Co., 140 N. C. 475 [53 S. E. 287]; Avery v. Lumber Co., 146 N. C. 562 [60 S. E. 646]; McCarthy v. Clafin [99 Me. 290] 59 Atl. 293. The evidence of witness Wooten is to the effect that the scaffold was built of old material that was scorched in the fire when the building was burned. There is also evidence that the wood was knotty, and that the piece which gave way broke at a knot. These facts, if true, do not per se constitute negligence, but we think they are some evidence to be considered by the jury as bearing upon the inquiry as to whether the defendant exercised reasonable care in selecting material suitable for the construction of a lofty scaffold upon which its servants were required to work. We fail to see any evidence of contributory negligence. The plaintiff took no part in selecting the material or in erecting the scaffold, and knew nothing of the character of the material out of which it was constructed. The scaffold was a completed instrument and supposed to be safe when plaintiff was directed to work upon it. The fact that he made only a casual examination does not make plaintiff culpable. He had a right to rely upon the assurance of the foreman that the scaffold was safe, as he was unacquainted with either the character of the construction or the quality of the material. Liedke v. Moran [43 Wash. 428] 86 Pac. 646 [117 Am. St. Rep. 1058]; Ingram v. Railway Co., 99 S. W. 666 [30 Ky. Law Rep. 713]; Silver- sen v. Jenks [102 App. Div. 313] 92 N. Y. Supp. 382; Standard Oil Co. v. Bowker [141 Ind. 12] 40 N. E. 128." There are two propositions stated in the quotation: (1) That the condition of the material, or lum- ber, which entered into the construction of the scaffold, was at least evidence of neg- ligence; (2) that the plaintiff was not re- quired, himself, to make more than a casual examination of the scaffold, and his failure to do so was not contributory negligence, as he had the right to rely on the assurance of the foreman that the scaffold was "all right"—that is, a safe one. There is no sub- stantial or practical difference between the two cases. We do not see why a master should be excused from setting an unsound and unsafe pole or for permitting it to be- come and remain so, when he would not be, under similar circumstances, for erecting a scaffold, both having been constructed for the use of his servant. There is one differ- ence between the two cases, for in the case of the scaffold the servant was expressly told that it was safe, while in the case of the pole he was given an implied assurance that it was sound and safe when he was ordered to climb it for the purpose of re- moving or adjusting the wires; but this is a difference in form and not in substance.

[12] It is a general rule that the servant, in the absence of any warning from his mas- ter, or knowledge of a defect, has a right to rely upon the safety of instruments and ap- pliances which he is required to use in the service, because it may fairly be presumed that the master has performed his primary duty—that is, care in the original selection and subsequent inspection of such instru- mentalities. In Electric Co. v. Kelly, 57 N. J. Law, 100, 29 Atl. 427, the company was held not to be liable for injuries to the plaintiff, Kelly, produced by the falling of a pole, but for the reason that the fall was caused by a weakness in the pole, brought about by a previous fall or by a defect which the evidence showed was not discovered by "the most rigid scrutiny." But, in deciding that case, the court, by Justice Magie, said very much that is applicable to our case: "There was no pretense in this case that the company had been guilty of any willful wrong to Kelly. His claim was, and is, that the injury he received was the result of a breach of a duty which the company owed him. The better view of a master's duty to a servant is that which, taking into con- sideration the well-settled doctrine that a servant, by accepting employment, consents to take the risk of all dangers obviously or naturally incident to such employment, im- poses on the master a positive duty to take reasonable care and precaution not to sub- ject the servant to other or greater dangers.

The rule thus formulated is of wide applica- tion, but, with reference to such cases as that now under consideration, may be thus stated: The master must take reasonable care to have the tools and appliances with which, and the places on or about which, the servant is to be employed reasonably safe for the work the latter is employed to do. Shear. & R. Negl. §§ 92, 93; Smith, M. & S. 236; Harrison v. Central Railroad Co., 31 N. J. Law, 293; Hutchinson, Y. N. & B. Rail- road Co., 5 Exch. 843. Applying the rule thus stated to the case before us, it is obvious that, to justify the submission to the jury of the liability of the company to Kelly, the facts established must have warranted the inference that the breaking of the pole, which was the cause of his injury, resulted from a breach of the company's duty to him in respect to that pole. The company did not guarantee the safety of the pole, nor was it the duty to pro- vide a sufficient pole, as was erroneously held below. Its duty was less extensive and would have been satisfied if it had taken reason- able care to provide a pole of sufficient strength to bear the strain of the wires and the weight of the servant employed thereon to do what was required to fit them for the service of the company." While there is no evidence in this case upon the question whether the company made any inspection or not, the court virtually told the jury that it was not its duty to do so if plaintiff was an experienced lineman (of which there was no doubt), and the duty of inspection was his, provided the pole was not originally defective. This instruction was, in our view, favorable to the defendant, because it made its duty "less extensive" than in law it really was. The city was required to inspect its poles at reasonable intervals of time, for the safety of its employes and the public, as we have shown, and its failure to do so was negligence, and nothing appears in the evi- dence to show that it was not the prox- imate cause of the injury. If it had made the proper inspection, the rottenness of the pole below the surface of the ground could easily have been discovered, for the wood was so badly decayed that it would crumble in the hand under the slightest pressure.

Edison Co. v. Street Railway Co., 17 Tex. Civ. App. 320, 42 S. W. 1009, was a case in which it appeared that one Dixon, the appel- lee, who was a lineman or repairer, was in- jured by the falling of a pole belonging to another company but used, with its permis- sion, by the defendant, appellant. The pole proved to be rotten near its base and broke in two and Dixon fell with it to the ground and was injured. In an elaborate opinion, the court reviews the facts and the law, and comes to this conclusion: "Where the de- fects in the materials or resources of the work are obvious and known to the servant, or he had the same opportunities of knowing that the master had, and he is injured by rea- son of such defects, he cannot recover, for the reason that he assumed the risk in undertaking the work. But where, as in this case, the master could, by the use of ordinary care in testing the condition or strength of the pole, have ascertained its defect, and its defect was not known to appellee, and was obvious to him, the master is guilty of a breach of duty to his servant, and is liable for the consequences of it." The following facts, among others, were found by the lower court in that case: "On December 28, 1895, appellee, J. W. Dixon, with other hands, was employed by appellant to take down and remove a feed wire from the poles on the west side of Pine street, and put the same in a new position on its poles on the east side of that street. It was necessary for the appellee, in the pursuance of his employment, to climb the poles for the purpose of detaching the feed wire from the brackets to which it was attached, and for that purpose he climbed one of the poles on the west side of Pine street, and, while engaged in loosening the feed wire from the brackets at the top of the pole, it broke near its lower end, and appellee was thereby with great force and violence thrown upon the ground and seriously injured. The place where the pole broke was rotten at and from its center near to its circumference, the unsound part at that place being surrounded only by a thin shell of sound wood, through which hacks had been cut before the pole was erected. On account of its rottenness, the pole was unfit and unsafe for the purpose for which it was used, and too weak to sustain appellee's weight in the performance of his duty in taking down the wire. Its defective condition was not obvious or patent to the eye, and appellee was unaware of it. By the exercise of ordinary care and inspection, which it was appellant's duty to appellee to perform, it could, by testing the pole in the ordinary manner, have ascertained its defects and known the danger to any one in discharging the duty it had employed the appellee to perform." The court held that "in failing to discharge its duty in inspecting and ascertaining the defect in the pole, which it could have done by the use of ordinary care, it was negligent, and this negligence was the proximate cause of appellee's injury. The appellee was guilty of no negligence contributing in any way to the accident." This judgment, as we have seen, was affirmed on appeal.

In S. W. Telegraph & Telephone Co. v. Woughter, 56 Ark. 206, 19 S. W. 575, the court held, upon a state of facts much like those in this case, that it was the duty of the defendant (plaintiff in error) to have used reasonable care and diligence by an inspection to discover latent defects, and, if ascertained to exist, then to warn its employé of the probable danger in ascending the pole. These are the words of the court: "While he does not insure the safety of his servants, yet he is bound to take heed that he does not, through his own want of care and prudence, expose them to unreasonable risks or dangers, either from the character of the tools with which he supplies them, or the place in which he requires them to operate. He is in duty bound not to expose them to danger of which he knows or has reason to know they are not aware. Before ordering them to perform any service, he should warn them fully of the latent dangers incident thereto, if there be any, of which he knows, or in the exercise of proper diligence ought to know; and this duty 'extends even to patent dangers when he knows the servant, by reason either of his youth or his inexperience, is not aware of the danger to which he is exposed, or * * * which are unknown to the servant from any cause, and which cannot readily be ascertained except by a person possessed of peculiar knowledge, which he has no reason to suppose the servant possesses'"—citing many authorities. The appellate court awarded a new trial in that case, because the instruction of the lower court made it the absolute duty of the company to discover the defect without any regard to the question of care or diligence in attempting to do so. Unless we hold that the duty of seeing that this pole was in proper condition rested upon the plaintiff, Terrell (and we have shown that the contrary is the true rule), the case of Ward v. A. & P. Telegraph Co., 71 N. Y. 83, 27 Am. Rep. 10, is in point, and is to this effect: "The defendant had the right to place its line in the street, and hence it can be made responsible for the accident only by proof of culpable negligence on its part, either in the construction of the line or its maintenance. If the post which broke and fell was originally not reasonably sufficient, or if it was permitted carelessly to become and be insufficient by decay, then responsibility attaches to the defendant for the accident."

Applying the law to facts similar to those in this case, the court in McGuire v. Bell Telephone Co., 167 N. Y. 208, 60 N. E. 433, 52 L. R. A. 437, said: "If the pole had injured a passer-by, it would be no answer for the defendant to say that it did not own the pole. It was bound, both as to third parties and as to its own workmen, to erect and maintain a reasonably safe structure, and it had no right to use for that purpose an unsafe appliance, whether its own or that of a third party. By using the pole as part of its line, it adopted it as its own. As it would have been liable had the pole when first used been decayed and insufficient for the purpose of carrying its wires and supporting its linemen, it was equally liable when the pole subsequently became unsafe from decay, which reasonable inspection would have discovered. The duty of the defendant was just as great to safely maintain as to safely construct, and that duty cannot be delegated so as to exempt the master from liability." As said by the court in the case just cited, "If each lineman was to dig around and test every pole before he ascended it, a large part of his time would be taken up by this work alone, and repeated tests would soon impair the stability of the pole itself," and from this consideration it was deduced by the court that the advantage to the company in undertaking itself to make the inspection is plain.

There are authorities in other jurisdictions which hold that it is the lineman's duty to make the inspection, but the ruling in most, if not all of them, was influenced by facts or considerations not applicable to the case at bar. The uncontroverted proof shows conclusively, we think, that the pole was not originally sound, and consequently not safe. In fact, we do not see why a casual inspection in the beginning would not have discovered its defective condition, for it had scarcely survived one-sixth of its allotted span of life, and, when it was broken, it had become decayed and rotten almost entirely through its base. The lineman had no reason whatever to suspect its bad condition, and was not required by his contract or any custom or usage to inspect the pole before he climbed it to adjust the wires, but had every right to rely upon the original careful selection and inspection of his employer. Clairain v. Telegraph Co., 40 La. 178, 3 South. 625; McDonald v. Telegraph Co., 22 R. I. 131, 46 Atl. 407.

[13] We conclude, therefore, that the motion of the defendant to nonsuit the plaintiff was properly overruled, and that there was no error in refusing the peremptory instructions it requested, to find for the defendant. There was evidence that the pole had not been inspected by defendant; that it fell three years after it was first set in the ground, when it should have lasted from 6 to 16 or 20 years; that its condition, on inspection after it fell, was found to be very bad, it being rotten to the core; that the strain on it was apparently not sufficient to have broken a sound pole—these and other facts and circumstances, of which there was some evidence, were sufficient to carry the case to the jury, it being a primary and non-delegable duty of the master to see that his servants are not subjected to unnecessary risk or hazard by any failure on his part, in the exercise of due and proper care, to furnish a plant with instrumentalities adapted to the performance of the work, and reasonably sound and safe, at least in original structure, and this the defendant failed to do.

[14] One other question calls for notice. The defendant alleged that the claim of the plaintiff had not been presented within the time fixed by its charter. But the jury have found, under proper instructions, that by reason of his injuries, which affected him both mentally and physically, the plaintiff was unable, during that period, to transact ordinary business or to present his claim, and that he did so within a reasonable time after he was restored sufficiently to do so. This, we think, excused the delay. The general rule in such cases seems to be that, in order to excuse a strict compliance with the provision, it must be shown that there is such physical or mental incapacity as to make it impossible for the injured person, by any ordinary means at his command, to procure service of the notice or a filing of the claim, whichever is required, and, if there is an actual incapacity, it can make no practical difference in reason whether it is mental or physical in its nature. Born v. Spokane, 27 Wash. 719, 68 Pac. 386; Barclay v. Boston, 167 Mass. 597, 46 N. E. 113. It may very properly be said that it would, in truth, shock the sense of justice and right if this provision was construed so as to hold the notice of the plaintiff's claim insufficient under the circumstances. It is an accepted maxim that the law does not seek to compel that to be done which is impossible. It cannot reasonably be presumed that the intention of the Legislature, in enacting this charter, would lead to any such unjust conclusion, and it is a fundamental canon of interpretation that a thing which is within the letter of a statute is not within the statute itself, unless it is within the intention of the makers. Walden v. City of Jamestown, 178 N. Y. 213, 70 N. E. 466. Speaking of a similar statute, the court said in Forsyth v. City of Oswego, 191 N. Y. 441, 84 N. E. 392, 123 Am. St. Rep. 605: "In the absence of any explanation of plaintiff's delay in this respect, the direction of the statute would have been conclusive and final. There was an explanation, however, and it was for the jury to say whether it was credible and satisfactory. If the plaintiff was, as he claimed, physically and mentally unable to prepare and present his claim, or to give directions for its preparation and presentation during the whole of the three months within which he was required by the defendant's charter to present it, then he was entitled to a reasonable additional time in which to comply with the charter in that regard. This is because the law does not seek to compel that which is impossible." Numerous cases support this reasonable doctrine. Ehrhardt v. Seattle, 33 Wash. 664, 74 Pac. 827; Williams v. Port Chester, 97 App. Div. 84, 89 N. Y. Supp. 671, affirmed 183 N. Y. 550, 76 N. E. 1116; Webster v. Beaver Dam (C. C.) 84 Fed. 280; Hungerford v. Waverly, 125 App. Div. 311, 109 N. Y. Supp. 438. The court in Green v. Port Jervis, 55 App. Div. 58, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1042, used strong language upon the subject: "The provision of the charter requiring preliminary notice of an intention to sue attaches only, as has been said, as a condition precedent to the commencement of an action against the village (Reining v. City of Buffalo, 102 N. Y. 308, 6 N. E. 792; Curry v. City of Buffalo, 135 N. Y. 366, 32 N. E. 80), and, if compliance with the condition is rendered temporarily impossible by the wrongful act of the defendant, it would be monstrous to allow the defendant to assert that fact as a defense to the action. The requirement of notice necessarily presupposes the existence of an individual capable of giving it, and not one deprived of that power by the operation of the very wrong to be redressed. That the defendant should be permitted to take advantage of its own wrong is clearly not within the purview of the law." On this branch of the case, we decide, upon principles of reason and justice and from high authority, that, under the facts as presented, the defendant cannot rely upon the failure to give notice of the claim within the time limited as a bar to the action.

The other assignments of error we think are without merit.

No error.

TRIPP et al. v. COMMISSIONERS OF PITT COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1912.)

1. ANIMALS (§ 50*)—RESTRAINT—STOCK LAW TERRITORY—STATUTES—OBLIGATION.

Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 702, to enlarge the stock law territory of Pitt county, referred and was only intended to enlarge the territory embraced within the description of Laws 1901, c. 386, entitled, "An act to consolidate and enlarge the stock law territory of such county."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Animals, Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

2. COUNTIES (§ 62*)—FENCE COMMISSIONERS —APPOINTMENT.

County commissioners at their regular meeting on the first Monday in January, 1912, elected three men new fence commissioners, two of the old commissioners holding over, and adjourned, "subject to the call of the chairman." Two of the fence commissioners failed to qualify, whereupon the commissioners were called in session at an adjourned meeting and two others were elected in their place. Held, that the commissioners so last elected were at least de facto officers whose title could not be collaterally questioned on the ground that they could not legally be elected at a special meeting without notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

3. COUNTIES (§ 85*)—FENCE COMMISSIONERS —ELECTION.

Where the election of a majority of a board of fence commissioners was unquestioned, their action was valid, notwithstanding the election of a minority of the board might be illegal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

4. STATUTES (§ 47*)—CERTAINTY AND DEF-INITENESS.

Since stock law territory to which new territory was added by Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 702, was the territory described in Laws 1901, c. 386, and the penalties therein prescribed are the same as those in the Revisal, the act of 1911 was not invalid as indefinite and uncertain as to the penalties that would apply, because there were other inclosures in the county constituting stock law districts as to which different penalties were applicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

5. ANIMALS (§ 50*)—STOCK LAW DISTRICT—FENCES.

Where county commissioners were grading, building, and widening the public road along which a new boundary fence, inclosing a stock law district created by Act Gen. Assem. 1911 (Pub. Loc. Laws 1911, c. 702), ran, the commissioners were entitled to construct a fence on the territory of the road as provided by Laws 1905, c. 714, it being also the duty of the commissioners to build the fence under the general law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Animals, Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

6. ANIMALS (§ 50*)—STOCK LAW DISTRICT—FENCES—ASSESSMENT—REFERENDUM VOTE.

An assessment for the building of a stock law fence is not a tax which must be submitted to a referendum vote of the people.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Animals, Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

7. CONVICTS (§ 10*)—CONTRACTS FOR LABOR —STOCK LAW FENCE.

The county commissioners having hired the county convicts out to fence commissioners to construct a fence along a county road, as they were authorized to do by Pub. Laws 1907, c. 87, it was no objection to their employment thereon that the fence was also to form a boundary of a stock law district.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County;
H. A. Foushee, Judge.

Suit by H. E. Tripp and others against J. P. Quinerly and others, as Commissioners of Pitt County, and W. S. Moye and others, Fence Commissioners, to restrain the enforcement of Public Laws 1911, c. 702, enlarging the stock law territory of Pitt county. An injunction granted against the County Commissioners was dissolved but sustained as against the Fence Commissioners, and both parties appealed. Modified and affirmed.

W. F. Evans and Harry Skinner, for plaintiffs. F. G. James & Son and Albion Dunn, for defendants.

CLARK, C. J. The General Assembly of 1911 (Pub. Loc. Laws 1911) enacted chapter 702 "to enlarge the present stock law territory of Pitt county." Section 1 provides that "the following prescribed line shall constitute a part of the boundary line of the stock law territory of Pitt county." Then follows a well-defined description of the only line (which is about 14 miles long), and it is added "all of the territory west of said boundary line not included within the stock law territory shall be established and added to and consolidated with the present stock law territory of said county." The new territory has only this one boundary, as all the other boundaries of that territory are those which were the eastern boundary of the "stock law territory" created by chapter 386, Laws 1901, with which it was consolidated. Section 2 provides that "on and after January 1, 1912, the territory so becoming a part of the now existing stock law territory of Pitt county shall be subject to all the provisions of the law that now apply or may hereafter apply to the stock law territory of said county."

Prior to 1901 there were several small stock law inclosures in Pitt county. The Legislature that year passed chapter 886, entitled "To consolidate and enlarge the stock law territory of said county." The territory so styled "the stock law territory of Pitt county" is the only one which, in the language of chapter 702, Laws 1911, could be "enlarged" by this newly-added territory, for it is the only stock law inclosure which the newly-added district would touch and of which the prescribed line could become "a part of its boundary line," and the only one to which (in the language of the act) it could be "added to and consolidated with the present stock law territory of said county." Said "stock law territory of Pitt county," as it is styled in said chapter 886, Laws 1901, is also the only stock law territory which would come within the description of chapter 702, Laws 1911, "west of said boundary line."

The "stock law territory" described by that term in Laws 1901, c. 886, covers something over four townships and lies wholly on the south side of Tar river, and is the only considerable body of stock law territory in Pitt county. It touches and reaches half way round the new district added by the act of 1911, which therefore, as already said, requires only one boundary, the 14-mile line above referred to. The other stock law districts in Pitt county are inconsiderable in area and are not contiguous to the new district nor to each other. They are: (1) Part of Belvoir township on the other or north side of Tar river and does not lie "west" of the new boundary line as required by the act of 1911. (2) A narrow strip about two miles wide lying on the south side of the river and running down to the Beaufort line and east of the new boundary. (3) A small territory around each of the towns of Ayden and Winterville, but these are within the limits of the new territory and themselves fall within the terms of section 2 of the act of 1911.

[1] It is thus plain that chapter 702, Laws 1911, "to enlarge the present stock law territory of Pitt county" refers to, and can only refer to, "the territory" embraced in chapter 886, Laws 1901, entitled "To consolidate and enlarge the stock law territory of Pitt county."

This action is brought by three plaintiffs who aver that they own land embraced within the district to be added to the aforesaid stock law territory by the act of 1911. They seek to enjoin the commissioners of Pitt county and the fence commissioners from building a fence along said boundary described in the act of 1911. Owing to the great curve in the eastern boundary of the "stock law territory" embraced in the act of 1901, c. 886, it is averred that the fence hitherto kept up on said eastern boundary is some 80 miles long. The county commissioners in their affidavit aver that the new 14-mile fence required by the new act relieves them from at least 50 miles of fence—that is, that the old eastern boundary was at least 64 miles long. This act of 1911 was doubtless passed with some view to that economy.

[2-5] The plaintiffs ask the restraining order on the following grounds: (1) That the appointment of the fence commissioners by the county commissioners was illegal. The facts are that at the regular meeting on the first Monday in January, 1912, the county commissioners elected three men new fence commissioners, two of the old commissioners holding over, and the board of county commissioners adjourned "subject to the call of the chairman." Two of the fence commissioners failing to qualify, the county commissioners were called in session in an adjourned meeting and two others were elected in their places. The plaintiffs contend that said meeting was illegal and therefore the board of fence commissioners is an illegal body because a special session of the county commissioners could not be held except after public notice in the manner required by Revisal 1905, § 1817. The object of this provision is to protect the county against excessive per diem on the part of the county commissioners. These fence commissioners were de facto officers, recognized by the elective body as such, and their title cannot be called in question in this injunctive proceeding and in this collateral way. Besides three of the commissioners have an unquestioned title and their action would be valid. (2) The plaintiffs contend that the act is invalid because it is indefinite and uncertain what penalties would apply because there are other inclosures in Pitt county of stock law districts. But as we have seen the "stock law territory" to which this new territory is added is that described in chapter 886, Laws 1901, and the penalties therein prescribed are "the same as those in the Revisal," as, indeed, are also the penalties in the stock law district in Belvoir township north of Tar river and nearly so there in the district east of the new boundary. The penalties in the two little inclosures around Ayden and Winterville are slightly different, but they are inside the territory newly added, and therefore would come within the terms of the act of 1911 which makes applicable the penalties in the other stock law districts, which as is above said are those of the Revisal. Besides all this, the penalties to be imposed are not a matter which arises in this proceeding which is to restrain the erection of the stock law fence. That matter would properly come up in any proceeding to impose a penalty. (3) The plaintiffs further contend that the county commissioners have no right to trespass on private property to erect the fence. The county commissioners are grading and building and widening the public road along which the new boundary fence runs. And they are erecting the fence on the territory of said road. The road is being graded by virtue of chapter 714, Laws 1905, which provides how the right of way shall be acquired, as also does the act of 1901, c. 386, in regard to the fence. Even if this last did not apply, it would be the duty of the commissioners to build the fence under the provisions of the general law. Busbee v. Commissioners, 93 N. C. 143.

[6] The plaintiffs further contend that the act is unconstitutional because the tax for building the fence is laid without being submitted to a vote of the people. It has been settled by repeated decisions of this court (Busbee v. Commissioners, supra, and cases there cited) that an assessment for the building of a stock law fence is not a tax which requires a referendum vote by the people. Besides, it is not contradicted that no assessment has been made, or is now necessary, to build this 14 miles of new fence, because there is in hand the sum of $4,000 raised in the "stock law territory" created by chapter 386, Laws 1901, which has been saved by it becoming unnecessary to maintain the long line of 64 miles of fence which was formerly the eastern boundary of that territory and which has now been allowed to go down. Should it become necessary in the future to lay an assessment, it would be laid under the act of 1901, c. 386, for the repair of this 14-mile fence in common with the other fencing required for said territory, or it could be laid under the general statute. Busbee v. Commissioners, supra.

[7] The last ground of the plaintiffs is that county commissioners had no right to use the county convicts to build said fence. It appears that the county convicts are grading the county road and that county commissioners have hired them out to the fence commissioners to put up this fence alongside the road, as they are fully authorized to do by virtue of chapter 87, Pub. Laws 1907.

This is the not unusual case where those living within territory to which the stock law is applied are more or less divided in regard to the advisability of a stock law. Very often the General Assembly in passing such acts submit, as in the general act in the Revisal, the question of the acceptance of the act by a referendum to the people. In 25 states there are provisions which give the people a right to call for a referendum or a popular vote to decide whether any act passed by the Legislature shall be approved or not, at the ballot box. But in this state there is as yet no such provision in the Constitution, except as to taxes in certain cases (Const. art. 7, § 7), nor by statute, and whether an act of this kind shall be submitted to the people or not is as yet left to the discretion of the General Assembly. The courts have no power to require that an act be submitted to popular approval of the people interested by a referendum. The courts all hold that assessments for building stock law fences, paving streets, and the like, do not come within the Const. provision, art. 7, § 7, which requires a submission to a referendum. Cain v. Commissioners, 86 N. C. 8, and cases citing it in Anno. Ed.; Raleigh v. Peace, 110 N. C. 32, 14 S. E. 521, 17 L. R. A. 330. The courts are required to hold every act constitutional unless, as the United States Supreme Court says, it is unconstitutional "beyond all reasonable doubt." Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, 6 L. Ed. 606. It is the bounden duty of the courts also not only to hold an act valid, if by any reasonable construction it can be so held, but they should give to every statute a reasonable construction and effectuate as far as possible the intention of the Legislature.

However desirable it might be that there should have been a referendum vote on this measure by the people of the territory added by the act to the "stock law territory of Pitt county," the Legislature did not see fit to so order and the court has no power to change the action of the Legislature.

The injunction as to the county commissioners was properly dissolved as should also have been done in regard to the fence commissioners.

Modified and affirmed.

THOMAS v. BUNCH et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1912.)

DEEDS (§ 182*)—DOWER (§ 18*)—HOMESTEAD (§ 81*)—CONSTRUCTION OF DEED—ESTATES CREATED—RIGHTS OF WIDOW OF GRANTEE.

Where a deed specified that the grantee was obligated to care for the grantors during their natural life, and that a life estate was reserved by the grantors, and that the deed should be void if the grantee failed to comply with its terms, and at the grantee's death one of the grantors was yet alive, the grantee was merely the owner of an estate in remainder, so that his widow was not entitled to dower or to a homestead.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 366-373; Dec. Dig. § 132;* Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 63-65; Dec. Dig. § 18;* Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 114-118; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Justice, Judge.

Action by George W. Thomas, administrator of Charles B. Bunch, against Hattie Bunch and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding by the administrator of Charles B. Bunch to sell land for assets, and the only question presented by the appeal is the right of the widow of the intestate to dower or to a homestead in the land described in the petition. A jury trial was waived and the following facts agreed to: "First. That on the 9th day of March, 1899, Asa Cooper was the owner in fee simple and in possession of the following described tract of land in Bertie county, N. C., to wit: The Asa Cooper tract of land which is bounded by the lands of H. W. Bazemore and Mrs. J. J. Cobb, and by the public road leading from Republican Church to Windsor, and being the tract of land Asa Cooper that day was living on, and containing 40 acres, more or less. Second. That on the said 9th day of March, 1899, Asa Cooper and wife, S. A. Cooper, conveyed said land to Charles B. Bunch by deed of record in Book 94, page 397, Bertie register of deeds office, a copy of which deed is annexed as part hereof. Third. That immediately upon the execution of the said deed Charles B. Bunch and wife moved upon said land and took charge thereof, and in all respects cared for and supported the said Asa Cooper and his wife, S. A. Cooper, until the death of C. B. Bunch, and then his heirs at law continued to do so. Fourth. That Asa Cooper died on the 21st day of June, 1906, and his wife, S. A. Cooper, died on the 2d day of January, 1910. Fifth. That Charles B. Bunch died intestate and without leaving any children, on the 29th day of December, 1909, leaving his wife, Hattie I. Bunch, him surviving. Sixth. That Hattie I. Bunch does not own any real estate of any kind and has no homestead of her own. Seventh. That Geo. W. Thomas has been regularly appointed and is now the duly qualified administrator of all and singular the rights and credits, goods and chattels of the said Charles B. Bunch. Eighth. That the personal property of the said Charles B. Bunch has been exhausted in the payment of his debts, and there is indebtedness still outstanding, and for the payment of which it will be necessary to sell the land of the said Bunch. Ninth. That Hattie I. Bunch claims to own and demands a homestead in the said tract of land, and in the surplus arising from the sale of the same, which is under mortgage, and she consents that the administrator sell said land for assets to pay said debts, costs, and charges of administration, and asks for a homestead in the excess. Tenth. That if the said Hattie I. Bunch is not entitled to a homestead in said land, she demands her dower therein, and she consents to a sale and to have the value of her dower calculated and paid to her. Her age is 28 years. Eleventh. That James H. Bunch, Wm. Bazemore, Mattie Bazemore, and Thos. H. Bazemore are the heirs at law of Charles B. Bunch."

The deed referred to is dated March 9, 1899, and the grantors therein are Asa Cooper and S. A. Cooper. It conveys the land described in the petition to Charles B. Bunch and his assigns, and after the description of the land contains the following clause: "The terms and conditions of this deed is as follows: That the said Charles B. Bunch obligates on receipt of this deed executed to him by said Asa Cooper and wife, S. A. Cooper, to support and care for them during their natural life time, and a life estate is hereby reserved by said Asa Cooper and S. A. Cooper, his wife. Should the said Chas. B. Bunch, party of the second part, fail to comply with the terms of this deed, then the same shall be null and void." The habendum follows, and then covenants of seisin and warranty.

His honor held that S. A. Cooper was entitled to a life estate in said land under said deed, and as she was living at the time of the death of Charles B. Bunch, he was not seised of said land, and his widow was not entitled to dower or a homestead therein, and she excepted and appealed.

Winston & Matthews, for appellants. Pruden & Pruden, S. Brown Shepherd, and Gilham & Davenport, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The right of the widow of Charles B. Bunch to dower or to a homestead depends on the estate and interest in her husband at the time of his death. If there was an outstanding life estate, there was no seisin in him which would entitle her to dower. Houston v. Smith, 88 N. C. 313; Barnes v. Raper, 90 N. C. 190; Redding v. Voght, 140 N. C. 562, 53 S. E. 337. Nor was he entitled to a homestead in the remainder. Murchison v. Plyler, 87 N. C. 79; Stern v.

Lee, 115 N. C. 427, 20 S. E. 736, 26 L. R. A. 814. And it is only in the contingency that the husband is the owner of a homestead at the time of his death, leaving a widow but no children, that the exemption from debts inures to her benefit. Const. art. 10, § 5. The decision of this appeal depends, therefore, on the construction of the deed from Asa Cooper and S. A. Cooper to Charles B. Bunch, and if, by correct interpretation, a life estate is reserved therein to S. A. Cooper, the widow of Bunch would not be entitled to dower or a homestead, because S. A. Cooper was living at the time of the death of Bunch, and his estate would be in remainder.

It is true that, under the modern rule of construction, little importance is attached to the position of the different clauses in a deed, and the courts look at the whole instrument, without reference to formal divisions, in order to ascertain the intention of the parties. Gudger v. White, 141 N. C. 512, 54 S. E. 386; Featherstone v. Merriman, 148 N. C. 205, 61 S. E. 675; Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 396, 63 S. E. 79, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 514; Real Estate Co. v. Bland, 152 N. C. 231, 67 S. E. 483. But rules of construction can only be resorted to when the meaning is doubtful, and each and every part of the deed must be given effect, if this can be done by any fair or reasonable construction. Davis v. Frazier, 150 N. C. 451, 64 S. E. 200.

Language of similar import and almost identical with that in the deed before us was considered in the case of In re Dixon, 156 N. C. 26, 72 S. E. 71, and it was there held that the grantee took an estate in remainder after the death of the husband and the wife. In this deed the language is, "and a life estate is hereby reserved by said Asa Cooper and S. A. Cooper, his wife," and in the deed in the Dixon Case, "I, the said R. A. L. Carr, reserving a life interest for myself and wife, Sarah A. L. Carr, in the above described land," and it was said in the latter case: "The reservation in the deed is valid, and said deed did not become effective till after the death of the grantor and his wife." And again: "Construing the whole deed as written, there is here a reservation of the whole for the life of the grantor and his wife, with remainder in fee to their daughter." If there is any difference in the meaning of the clauses in the two deeds, there is stronger reason for saying that the deed in this case conveys an estate in remainder to the grantee, because in the deed in the Dixon Case the husband alone was the grantor, and a life interest was reserved, while in this the husband and wife are the grantors, with the reservation of a life estate.

The provision for support is in consideration of the conveyance of the remainder, and the clause of forfeiture was inserted to compel performance of the obligation.

We conclude that a life estate was reserved to Asa Cooper and S. A. Cooper, and that Charles B. Bunch was, at the time of his death, the owner of an estate in remainder, the said S. A. Cooper being then alive, and that the widow of said Bunch is not entitled to dower or a homestead therein.

Affirmed.

BERRY, Tax Collector, v. DAVIS et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 23, 1912.)

1. TAXATION (§ 502*)—LIEN—VALIDITY OF STATUTE.

Revisal 1905, § 2863, as amended by Pub. Laws 1911, c. 207, providing that no mortgage or deed of trust upon personal property shall create a lien thereon superior to the lien of a subsequent levy upon the property for taxes, is not invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 502.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 599*)—COLLECTION OF TAXES—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN—PERSONAL PROPERTY.

Under Revisal 1905, § 2866, and section 2863, as amended by Pub. Laws 1911, c. 207, providing that mortgages on personalty shall not be superior to subsequent tax liens acquired by levy thereon for taxes, a tax collector is given no right, prior to making a levy, to resort to the process of claim and delivery against the personal property of taxpayers who are in full and undisputed possession of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 599.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 978*)—TAXATION—PAYMENT BY TAX COLLECTOR—SUBSEQUENT RIGHT TO ENFORCE PAYMENT.

Where the tax collector for a municipal corporation paid over to the corporation the amount of delinquent taxes before he had collected the same, he did not thereby lose his statutory right to collect the tax against the personal property of the delinquent taxpayers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2104-2119; Dec. Dig. § 978.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 978*)—TAXATION—COLLECTION—TIME ALLOWED.

In view of the statute conferring upon tax collectors the same rights and powers in collecting corporation taxes as are conferred upon sheriffs, and of Revisal 1905, § 2869, providing that the sheriff is allowed only one year from the day prescribed for his settlement and payment of taxes within which to furnish the collection of all taxes, a tax collector for a municipal corporation has no right to enforce the collection of a tax after the expiration of the year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 978.*]

5. TAXATION (§ 599*)—COLLECTION—LIEN ON PERSONAL PROPERTY—JUDGMENT.

Where a tax collector brought claim and delivery to enforce a tax lien on personal property without having first made a levy thereon, and judgment was entered by default and without exception, establishing the plaintiff's ownership, and a mortgagee intervened, and the parties proceeded with the trial as though a proper levy had been made, and submitted the question of the superiority of their claims, the plaintiff was entitled, notwithstanding ing the want of a levy, to a judgment giving him priority over the mortgagee for the amount of such taxes as he was not barred by limitations from recovering.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 599.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; E. B. Cline, Judge.

Action by M. W. Berry, as Tax Collector of Elizabeth City, against W. T. Davis and another, and G. H. Wood, intervener. From a judgment for intervener, plaintiff appeals. Modified.

One G. H. Wood, holding a mortgage on the property seized in the cause, having intervened, it was adjudged that the plaintiff owned the property to an amount sufficient to pay the taxes due from the delinquents, to wit, $84.68—$42.74 for 1909 and $41.94 for 1910—and the question of the right to this sum, as between the plaintiffs, the tax collector of Elizabeth City, and the mortgagee, being reserved, the property was turned over to the mortgagee, who sold the same as per agreement B made, of date, August 11, 1911, and paid $100 of proceeds into court, subject to the judgment. On the hearing, it appeared that the tax collector, before bringing suit, had paid over the amount of tax to the city, and that the property was not sufficient to pay the debt secured by mortgage and the taxes; that action was commenced on August 11, 1911, mortgage executed June 7, 1911, verbal notice given of amount of taxes due to mortgagee's attorney, when agreement B was made, to wit, August 11, 1911. On question reserved, judgment was given in favor of mortgagee, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

J. Kenyon Wilson, for appellant.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). Plaintiff, the tax collector of Elizabeth City, having by statute all the rights and powers conferred upon sheriffs by the general revenue laws, held a claim for unpaid taxes against W. T. and G. M. Davis to the amount of $84.68, $42.74 of which was for unpaid taxes for 1909, and $41.94 was for taxes for 1910. Having settled with the corporation of Elizabeth City, plaintiff, holding the tax lists and the claim arising thereon, on August 11, 1911, instituted claim and delivery in enforcement of the demand, and under process seized a considerable lot of personal property owned and in the possession of the principal defendants. Thereupon, and on the day the action was instituted, G. H. Wood, having a mortgage on the property, duly registered in said county on June 7, 1911, on application, was allowed to intervene and claim the property under said mortgage. Plaintiff and the intervener, with the assent of defendants, thereupon entered into an agreement in the cause (Exhibit B), by which the property was turned over to the mortgagee for purpose of sale under the mortgage, and $100 of proceeds were paid into court, "to abide the results of the cause as to the claim of said G. H. Wood." Judgment was entered that plaintiff was owner of the property seized to the extent of the $84.68, subject to the rights of the mortgagee. On question reserved, the court, being of opinion that the mortgagee had the superior claim, entered judgment in his favor, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

[1] As heretofore stated, the present plaintiff, the tax collector of Elizabeth City, has been given all the rights and remedies for collection of taxes possessed by the sheriffs under the general revenue laws of the state, and it may be well to note that this right of collecting taxes is a statutory right, and, as a rule, the collecting officer is confined to methods which the statute specifies. True we have held in this state that, where these methods are unavailing or inadequate, the authorities are allowed to resort to a civil action, a modification of the more general principle applied and sustained in a forcible opinion by the present Chief Justice in Guilford County v. Georgia Co., 112 N. C. 34, 17 S. E. 10, 19 L. R. A. 485, though in that case decided intimation is given that as to the executive officers, and under ordinary conditions, the remedies provided by the statute must be pursued. Recurring, then, to the portions of the statute more directly relevant, it is provided by section 2863 that taxes shall not be a lien on personal property, except where otherwise provided by law, but form a levy thereon. By section 2886, all personal property, subject to taxation, shall be liable to be seized and sold for taxes, etc., and all transfers of personal property by any taxpayer, made after his taxes are due, by way of gift or mortgage, or deed of trust, or of assignment for creditors, or bequest by will, or any other way, or for any other purpose than a bona fide sale for value in the ordinary course of dealing, shall be null and void as to said taxes, and shall have no effect upon the rights, powers, and duties of the sheriff to levy upon and sell such property for such taxes, provided such levy be made within 60 days after such transfer.

By chapter 207, Public Laws 1911, section 2863 of the Revisal 1905 is amended as follows: "Provided, that no mortgage or deed of trust executed upon personal property shall have the effect of creating a lien thereon superior to the lien acquired by a subsequent levy upon said property for the payment of the state, county and municipal taxes, assessed against the same; but the sheriff or other tax collector levying upon such property, for the purpose of collecting the taxes due thereon, shall give due notice to the mortgagee or trustee of such property of the amount of such taxes at least ten days before the sale of the same, and such trustee or mortgagee shall have the right to pay said taxes and the costs incident to making said levy, when the sheriff or tax collector shall release the same to such trustee or mortgagee, and the amount so paid by said trustee or mortgagee shall constitute a part of the debt secured in said mortgage or deed of trust."

[2] There is no doubt as to the power of the General Assembly to enact legislation of this character, certainly as to mortgages and deeds of trust, etc., made subsequent thereto (37 Cyc. p. 714), and a proper consideration of these and other sections of the Revisal bearing on the subject leads to the conclusion that, while the Legislature intended to make the claim for taxes, in the cases and to the extent specified, a superior claim on personal property, such claim, as a rule, could only be made efficient by proper levy on same. A different rule exists in reference to real estate. By section 2864, the tax list is made a lien on all the real estate of a taxpayer within the county from and after June 1st in every year, and, in addition to the remedies by summary process, provides, in certain cases, for a foreclosure of the lien by action (Revisal, § 2866); but, as heretofore stated, there is no such provision as to personal property, and the only remedy expressly given is that by seizure and sale, and, in the absence of some exceptional conditions rendering such remedies inadequate and unavailing, an executive officer, holding the tax list and charged with the duty of collection, is confined to this. A tax list here is in the nature of an execution, and until levy made an officer may not resort to process of claim and delivery in enforcement of his claim. 34 Cyc. p. 1392, citing Mulheisen v. Lane, 82 Ill. 117. There were no exceptional circumstances present in this case justifying a departure from the ordinary methods, the principal defendants being in full and undisputed possession of the property as owners; and we would feel constrained to dismiss the action but for the fact that judgment by default, and without exception, has been entered, establishing plaintiff's ownership, and the mortgagee having intervened, the parties treating the proceedings as a proper levy, have submitted the question of the superiority of their claims on the facts heretofore stated.

[3] It was chiefly urged for the mortgagee that the plaintiff had lost his rights as collecting officer, because he had accounted to the corporation for the taxes claimed; but authority with us is against defendants' position. Jones v. Arrington, 94 N. C. 541. In that case it was held, in effect, that, when a sheriff or collecting officer had advanced the amount of taxes in settlement with the county, this would not constitute a payment, and that the remedies provided by the law for the enforcement of collections would still exist. To the extent, then, that the plaintiff retained the statutory powers conferred for this purpose, his claim must be upheld. As we have seen, he had all the rights and powers in collecting corporation taxes conferred by the general law on sheriffs.

[4] By chapter 72, § 2869, "the sheriff, and in case of his death, the sureties on his tax bond, is allowed one year and no longer from the day prescribed for his settlement and payment of taxes, within which to finish the collection of all taxes." As to the taxes for 1909, the time allowed by this section had expired, and, plaintiff having no further right to enforce collection by levy as to this, his demand must fail.

[5] As to the taxes due for 1910, to wit, the sum of $41.94, the right of collection coming within the provisions of the statute, the claim, to that extent, must be sustained, and judgment will be entered for that amount and costs.

Judgment modified.

ROPER LUMBER CO. v. RICHMOND CEDAR WORKS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 28, 1912.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 46*)—TRESPASS—DEFENDANT'S SOLVENCY—MATERIALITY.

Under Revisal 1906, § 807, which obviates necessity for pleading defendant's insolvency in an action to enjoin a continuous trespass or a destruction of timber trees, a complaint, which alleges both kinds of trespass and unauthorized appropriation of part of plaintiff's land for operation of a steam railroad, is sufficient without allegation of defendant's insolvency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 98-106; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

2. EASEMENTS (§ 12*)—GRANTS—SUFFICIENCY.

A letter from a landowner, stating that if the addressee should desire to remove timber cut on the landowner's land he would not be unwilling to give permission, is insufficient to entitle the addressee to construct a steam railroad over the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-41; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. EASEMENTS (§ 44*)—CREATION—EXTENT—CONSTRUCTION OF JUDGMENT.

An order, in a suit where both parties claimed title to a particular tract, that each might remove such timber as had already been cut, did not grant a right of way across the other's land for a steam railroad.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 98-100; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

4. EASEMENTS (§ 44*)—CREATION—EXTENT—DECREE—CONSTRUCTION—"CARTING."

A decree in partition in 1817, when steam railroads were unknown, giving each tenant the right of "carting" timber across the other's land, does not authorize a present owner of a tract of the land to construct a steam railroad over an adjoining tract, especially since the privilege was not incorporated in conveyances subsequent to the decree under which the parties claimed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 98-100; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 984.]

5. EASEMENTS (§ 61*)—WAYS BY NECESSITY—PLEADING.

In pleading a way by necessity, the facts on which it is based must be specially pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

6. EASEMENTS (§ 18*)—WAY BY NECESSITY.

Under grants without reservation of a way, way of necessity passes as an incident to the grant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-55; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

7. EASEMENTS (§ 18*)—"WAY BY NECESSITY."

A "way by necessity" arises only between grantor and grantee; none arising where there is no privity of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-55; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7418, 7419.]

8. EASEMENTS (§ 18*)—WAY BY NECESSITY—REQUISITES.

An owner of timber is not entitled to an easement for its removal as a way by necessity on the ground of mere inconvenience in adopting any other possible way, and a plea of such way is insufficient where it fails to show no other possible way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Easements, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-55; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

9. PRIVATE ROADS (§ 2*)—REMOVAL OF TIMBER—ACQUISITION OF RIGHT OF WAY—METHOD.

Except as to ways by necessity, the right to establish cartways, tramways, etc., over the lands of another for the removal of timber, depends upon a purchase or acquisition under Revisal 1905, § 2686.

Appeal from Superior Court, Camden County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Actions by the Roper Lumber Company against the Richmond Cedar Works and others were consolidated. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Angus D. MacLean, and W. M. Bond, for appellant. Aycock & Winston and Starke, Venable & Starke, for appellees.

BROWN, J. It is admitted for the purposes of this appeal that the plaintiff is the owner of lots 2, 3, and 12, and the defendant of Nos. 7 and 8, in the division of the lands known as the New Lebanon estate, and it also appears that defendant has purchased an interest in lots 1 and 4 of said division. It also appears that the defendant claimed the Allen swamp, lying south of the New Lebanon lands, in which defendant had cut certain timber before the beginning of this suit. Neither the Cedar Works Corporation, or its codefendant and subsidiary, the Dismal Swamp Railroad Company, are common carriers, and they do not assert any right of eminent domain. All of the evidence shows, plaintiff's affidavits being uncontradicted in this respect, that defendants were constructing and operating railroads and carrying away timber over plaintiff's land, occupying the camps thereon, and cutting out trees and undergrowth along the roadways.

The defendant contends that the injunction was properly dissolved for five reasons:

[1] 1. Because the complaint fails to allege the insolvency of the defendant.

We disagree with counsel that plaintiff's allegations do not bring its case within the spirit of section 807 of the Revisal. That act distinctly relieves the plaintiff in an action to enjoin a trespass upon land from alleging insolvency "when the trespass complained of is continuous in its nature, or is the cutting or destruction of timber trees." Lumber Co. v. Cedar Co., 142 N. C. 418, 55 S. E. 306. The complaint in this case alleges both species of trespass, and an appropriation of a part of plaintiff's property, without authority, for the purpose of operating a steam railroad over it. Such trespasses as those alleged would have been enjoined at common law without the aid of the statute. Gause v. Perkins, 56 N. C. 181, 69 Am. Dec. 728; Tise v. Whitaker, 144 N. C. 511, 57 S. E. 210. Even a railway corporation, a common carrier, possessing the power of eminent domain, may be enjoined from an extension of its track unauthorized by its charter. The right to enjoin in such cases does not depend upon the insolvency of the corporation, but the remedy is given because of the extraordinary character of the act sought to be enjoined. 1 High on Injunctions, § 599; People v. Railroad Co., 45 Barb. (N. Y.) 63. It would be a most extraordinary destruction of the rights of property if a private corporation, possessing no power of eminent domain, could seize the lands of another, to which it had no semblance of title, and appropriate them to its own use, simply because it was able to respond in damages. This contention of the defendant is, in our opinion, without support in reason or authority.

[2] 2. Because the defendant had the permission of the plaintiff to remove its timber from the Allen swamp, and this permission carries with it the power to remove it by the usual and ordinary methods.

The only foundation for this claim is a letter from C. I. Millard, written to W. J. Parrish, general manager of defendant in reference to the litigation concerning Allen swamp (no part of the New Lebanon lands), in which this expression is used: "Should there be any desire on your part to remove the timber which you have cut, you will not find us unwilling to give our permission." We are cited to no authority by defendant tending to support this contention. Assuming that the letter was authorized by plaintiff, its language is too indefinite to convey any right on estate in lands, much less a right of way for a railroad across plaintiff's New Lebanon lands, or even to be effective by way of an estoppel.

[3] 3. The defendant rests its third claim upon an order at spring term, 1911, made by Ward, judge, in a suit in the superior court of Gates county, wherein this defendant was plaintiff, and this plaintiff was defendant, in which is this paragraph: "It is further ordered and adjudged that each party shall have the right to remove such timber as it has already cut on said land."

It is admitted that the suit in which this order was made concerned the Allen swamp only, and had no connection with the New Lebanon lands. The record in that case shows that both parties claimed title to the Allen swamp and had cut timber in it at the time the order was made. While the learned counsel for defendant in their brief profess to rely on this order "above and beyond all other contentions," they cite no authority and give no substantial reason why such order can reasonably be construed to include the grant of a right of way across lands not connected in any way with the subject of litigation. Both parties had cut timber in the Allen swamp, the title to which was in litigation, and the order was intended to give to each party the right to remove such timber as it had already cut from the swamp, and does not purport to go beyond that. The order does not undertake to provide any means of transportation for the timber after it is removed from the confines of the swamp.

[4] 4. It is again contended that the partition proceedings of the New Lebanon estate gives defendant authority by virtue of its ownership of lots 7 and 8 to construct and operate its railroad across plaintiff's lots 2, 3, and 12.

The facts are that in the year 1817 the New Lebanon estate, a large tract of land in Camden county, was partitioned among the several tenants in common. The Cross Canal runs through this land eastwardly and is tributary to the Dismal Swamp Canal. It was used to float juniper logs down to the Dismal Swamp Canal, a navigable waterway, and in order that this use of the Cross Canal might be preserved, it was provided in the division that "it will be a convenience in carting to the Cross Canal, or Crooked Ditch, for one proprietor to cross the land of another; therefore every proprietor is to have the free privilege of carting across another proprietor's share, but not to have any privilege to cut any timber except for the making or repair of the road." This provision was not incorporated nor the privilege specially reserved or granted in any of the subsequent conveyances under which either party derives its title in severalty to parts or shares of said land. It is contended by defendant that the word "carting" was used by the commissioners who made partition of the New Lebanon estate in a broad or generic sense and comprehended any method of carrying off timber which might thereafter be generally adopted. In 1817 steam railroads were unknown, and we cannot suppose that transporting timber by such instrumentality could have been in contemplation of the commissioners who divided the lands. Even in this day and generation a grant of a cartway would hardly be construed to include a right of way for a railroad. The use of a cartway may be general and enjoyed by a neighborhood, while that of a railroad is of necessity exclusive and confined to the proprietor operating it. We think that an examination of the map and of the division itself clears up any doubt as to the meaning and purpose of the commissioners. They evidently intended that the proprietors, who theretofore owned the land in common, should thereafter have the same access to the Cross Canal or Crooked Ditch as they before enjoyed, and the right to use it was thereby made appurtenant to each tract instead of in gross. As is well said in the plaintiff's brief: "If in place of the Cross Canal there had been a public road running through the land, with the right reserved to each proprietor, in severalty, to cross the land of another, 'as a convenience in carting,' to the public road, no different principle would be invoked, and yet it is difficult to imagine that this would confer the right of building a private railroad and operating log trains thereon in order to cart timber from Gates county to Virginia, in a direction and manner opposed to use of the public road altogether."

[5-8] 5. The last reliance of the defendant is upon a "way by necessity."

We think the defendant could not avail itself of any such plea without setting it up in an answer and setting out the necessary facts. To plead a way by necessity in general terms will not suffice. Bullard v. Harrison, 4 M. & Sel. 387. But we will consider it as fully and sufficiently pleaded and undertake to show that the defendant cannot justify under it. What constitutes a "way by necessity" is not very clearly defined or agreed upon by the early sages of the law. Sergeant Williams was of opinion that there is no such thing as a right of way by necessity except when it is pleaded by way of prescription or grant. Pomfret v. Ricroft, 1 Saund. 323, note 6. Chancellor Kent agrees with Sergeant Williams, and says "that it places the doctrine upon a reasonable foundation, and one consistent with the general principles of the law." 3 Kent, Com. 341. This learned judge and commentator says: "A right of way may arise from necessity in several respects. Thus, if a man sells land to another which is wholly surrounded by his own land, in this case the purchaser is entitled to a right of way over the other's ground to arrive at his own land. The way is a necessary incident to the grant, and without which the grant would be useless." 3 Kent, Com. (13th Ed.) p. 421. What is meant by the term "way by necessity" is laid down by Woolrych as follows: "All the authorities support the doctrine that, in the case of a grant of land without a reservation of any way, a way of necessity will pass as incident to the grant." Treatise on Ways, p. 21. This way of necessity as known to the common law arises only by implication in favor of grantees. Since the way is founded on a grant, it can arise only between grantor and grantee. No way of necessity can be presumed or acquired over the land of a stranger. It does not arise where there is no privity of title. Trump v. McDonnell, 120 Ala. 200, 24 South. 353. Without privity of estate and unity of ownership there will be no way of necessity. Ellis v. Blue Mount Ass'n, 69 N. H. 385, 41 Atl. 856, 42 L. R. A. 570; Powers v. Hefferman (Ill.) 122 Am. St. Rep. 210, note C, where the authorities are collected; Cooper v. Maupin, 6 Mo. 624, 35 Am. Dec. 464, and notes; Woolridge v. Coughlin, 46 W. Va. 345, 33 S. E. 233.

There is nothing in the record to show that there is any privity of estate between the plaintiff and defendant in respect to the Allen swamp or any other land from which defendant is removing the timber. Even if that were so, there is nothing to show that defendant has no other possible way to remove the timber. Even where there is a grant from which the law may possibly imply a way of necessity, a mere inconvenience is not enough to justify it. It is necessity not inconvenience that gives the way. Pettingill v. Porter, 8 Allen (Mass.) 1, 63 Am. Dec. 676; Powers v. Hefferman (Ill.) 122 Am. St. Rep. 211, note D. So far as we can see, the case cited by defendant in support of this contention (Lumber Co. v. Hines Bros., 127 N. C. 130, 37 S. E. 152) has no bearing upon this question, as it was a controversy over the location of an unlocated floating right of way granted to plaintiff. The doctrine of a way by necessity does not appear to be discussed in the opinion.

[8] The right to establish cartways, tramways, etc., over the lands of another, when no such right arises by implication of law, as herein pointed out, is in North Carolina regulated by statute, and one who desires to cross the land of another for the purpose of removing his timber, or for other purposes, must follow the statute or else purchase the right. Revisal, § 2686. The General Assembly has attempted to clothe private lumber railways with the power of eminent domain and the right to condemn property for a very limited period, impelled to do so by the immense growth of the timber industry and the consequent necessity for the operation of steam railways in such enterprises. But the court has held such legislation beyond the power of the General Assembly, upon the principle that private property can only be taken for a public use, and not for private gain. Cozard v. Hardwood Co., 139 N. C. 296, 51 S. E. 937, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 969, 111 Am. St. Rep. 779. In concluding the opinion of the court in that case, Mr. Justice Conner uses the following expressive language: "While, as found by his honor, it is reasonable and even necessary to the successful operation of defendant's enterprise that they carry their timber over the plaintiff's land to reach the markets, and while there may be no injustice to him in permitting them to do so, and while his opposition may be either sentimental or selfish, yet the courts may not violate or weaken a fundamental principle upon the strict observance and enforcement of which the security of all private property, so necessary to the safety of the citizen, is dependent. The guaranties upon which the security of private property is dependent are closely allied, and always associated with those securing life and liberty. Where one is invaded, the security of the other is weakened."

We are of opinion, upon a review of the record, that the defendants have shown no semblance of right to operate their railroad over plaintiff's land, or to cut and remove timber therefrom, and that plaintiff is entitled to an injunction as prayed. The cause is remanded to the superior court of Camden county, with directions to the judge resident or the judge riding the district to issue the injunction until the final hearing, as prayed upon the plaintiff giving the undertaking required by law.

Reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mecklenburg County; Lyon, Judge.

Mandamus by the School Commissioners of the City of Charlotte against the Board of Aldermen and Treasurer of the City of Charlotte to compel the turning over to the treasurer of the school board proceeds of the sale of school bonds. From a judgment awarding the writ, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Civil action, instituted by the school commissioners of the city of Charlotte to compel the board of aldermen and treasurer of said city to turn over to treasurer of the school board the proceeds arising from the sale of certain school bonds, issued by the city of Charlotte, under and by virtue of chapter 317, Priv. Laws 1911, heard before his honor Judge C. C. Lyon, at January term, 1912, superior court, Mecklenburg county. On the hearing, judgment was rendered in manner and form as follows: "This cause coming on to be heard pursuant to the summons issued therein, and the court having heard and considered the pleadings in the cause and argument of counsel: Now, therefore, upon motion of Burwell & Cansler and Tillet & Guthrie, attorneys for the plaintiff, it is adjudged that the plaintiff is entitled to have the proceeds of the school bonds referred to in the pleadings paid over to its treasurer as soon as the said treasurer shall give bond in proper form and in the amount required by the statute; and the said defendants and each of them are hereby commanded to turn over and deliver to the treasurer of the plaintiff all of the proceeds of the said school bonds now under their custody and control as soon as the treasurer of the plaintiff shall give a bond approved by the plaintiff. It is further adjudged that the plaintiff recover the costs of this action, to be taxed by the clerk of this court. Heard, considered, and decided upon this 24th day of January, 1912. C. C. Lyon, Judge Presiding." Defendants having duly excepted, appealed to Supreme Court.

Chase Brenizer, for appellants. Burwell & Cansler and Tillet & Guthrie, for appellees.

HOKE, J. Chapter 317, Private Laws 1911, conferred upon the board of aldermen of the city of Charlotte the power, on approval of the popular vote, to issue bonds for various purposes, not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $1,065,000, and specified that a portion of these bonds, not to exceed in amount the sum of $100,000, should be known as "school bonds," and to be used for the purpose of purchasing lands for schools and of building schoolhouses for the graded schools of the city. The act also providing "that moneys arising from the sale of the bonds" should be used for no other purpose than that for which they were authorized to be issued. In taking the sense of the qualified voters, the different purposes were to be submitted as separate propositions, and the votes taken in five different ballot boxes, and, in reference to the effect of the election, the act in question further provides: "If a majority of such qualified voters shall vote 'issue' on any one or more of the five propositions submitted for issuing bonds for the purposes aforesaid, then it shall be deemed and held that the proposition receiving a majority of such votes is favored and approved by a majority of the qualified voters of the city of Charlotte, and the board of aldermen shall cause bonds to be prepared and issued for the purposes so approved of by a majority of qualified voters of the city, and levy a tax in accordance with the provisions of this act." The measure having been approved by the popular vote, the bonds in question were issued and sold, and the proceeds are now held by defendants, subject to the provisions of the law and the judgment of the court on the questions presented.

[1] It further appears that the plaintiffs, the school board of the city of Charlotte, having made selection of certain sites for school purposes, have made demand on defendants that the fund in question be turned over to their treasurer, and defendant the board of aldermen, professing a willingness to turn over $80,000 of said fund, the amount apportioned for four of the school sites, has refused to turn over the remaining $20,000, the amount apportioned for the public school of North Charlotte, contending that the site selected for school purposes in that section of the city is not a suitable or proper one, and that, under the charter of the city of Charlotte and other acts relevant to the inquiry, and by reason of the powers conferred in said acts on the board of aldermen of the city, said body must of necessity have a discretionary supervision of these matters and the ultimate power of determining whether the moneys in question shall or shall not be expended in the purchase of the site selected. If defendants are correct in their position that they are possessed of discretionary power in the premises, the present action must fail; for it is familiar doctrine that mandamus does not lie to enforce the exercise of discretionary power in any given or specified way. Board of Education v. Board of Commissioners, 150 N. C. 116, 63 S. E. 724; Barnes v. Commissioners, 135 N. C. 27, 47 S. E. 737; Ewbanks v. Turner, 134 N. C. 77, 46 S. E. 508. Coming, then, to this, the principal question presented, the revised charter of the city of Charlotte, enacted by the General Assembly in 1907 (Priv. Laws 1907, c. 342), in reference to the public school system of the city and on matters more directly relevant to the inquiry, makes provision as follows:

"Sec. 193. That there shall be maintained in the city of Charlotte a system of public schools to be kept open not less than nine months in each year, without charge, for the education of the children of the said city within the ages of six and twenty-one years.

"Sec. 194. That said system of public schools shall be under the control of a board of school commissioners composed of seventeen members, who shall be elected biennially at the general election held for mayor and other city officers, and shall hold office for two years and until their successors are duly elected and qualified, and shall serve without compensation. Any vacancy in said board of school commissioners shall be filled by an election held by said board, and the person so elected shall hold office for the unexpired term.

"Sec. 195. Said board of school commissioners shall be a body corporate and politic under the name of 'The School Commissioners of the City of Charlotte,' with all rights and powers of the school committees of the respective townships in addition to the powers in this act granted.

"Sec. 196. That the mayor of the city of Charlotte shall be ex officio chairman of said board of school commissioners, and shall be entitled to vote in any of the meetings of said board only in the case of a tie; and in all meetings of said board a majority of the membership thereof shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

"Sec. 197. That said board of school commissioners shall have exclusive control of the public schools of the city of Charlotte, and shall have full and ample powers to purchase sites, to provide necessary school buildings and facilities, to appoint examiners, employ teachers and fix their salaries, prescribe courses of study and in general to do everything that may be necessary and proper to open and conduct a sufficient number of schools to meet the needs of the scholastic population of the city of Charlotte. And it shall be lawful for said board of school commissioners, in its discretion to receive into the public schools of the city of Charlotte, upon such terms as they may think reasonable, any children of school age residing beyond the limits of said city."

"Sec. 201. The said board of school commissioners shall appoint a treasurer and prescribe his duties and compensation. He shall give bond for the faithful performance of his duties in such sum as the said board may prescribe, which bond shall not be less than double the amount which may reasonably come into his hands at any one time, and with sufficient security to be approved by said board.

"Sec. 202. It shall be the duty of the board of aldermen of the city of Charlotte to provide for the payment to said treasurer of all moneys collected under this act; and it shall be the duty of the treasurer of Mecklenburg county to pay to the treasurer of said board of school commissioners, to be used in carrying out the objects of this act, all school moneys in his hands from time to time to which the city of Charlotte shall fairly be entitled."

"Sec. 204. That the board of aldermen shall provide for all expenses arising from permanent repairs and improvements made from time to time by said board of school commissioners upon any of the buildings and premises in use for school purposes within the city of Charlotte."

"Sec. 206. That the board of aldermen of the city of Charlotte shall levy an annual tax for the support and maintenance of said system of public schools in the city of Charlotte, which annual tax shall not exceed twenty cents on the hundred dollars valuation of property and sixty cents on the poll."

[2] Considering these sections, it is the well-recognized principle that the object of all interpretation is to ascertain the meaning of the Legislature as contained in the statute, and to this end resort must primarily be had to the language of the act itself. Where the statute is free from ambiguity, explicit in terms, and plain of meaning, it is the duty of the courts to give effect to law as it is written, and they may not resort to other means of interpretation. The position, as applied to the present case, is very well stated in Black on Interpretation of Laws, as follows: "The object of all interpretation and construction of statutes is to ascertain the meaning and intention of the Legislature, to the end that the same may be enforced. This meaning and intention must be sought, first of all, in the language of the statute itself. For it must be presumed that the means employed by the Legislature to express its will are adequate to the purpose, and do express that will correctly. If the language of the statute is plain and free from ambiguity, and expresses a single, definite, and sensible meaning, that meaning is conclusively presumed to be the meaning which the Legislature intended to convey. In other words, the statute must be interpreted literally. Even though the court should be convinced that some other meaning was intended by the lawmaking power, and even though the literal interpretation should defeat the very purposes of the enactment, still the explicit declaration of the Legislature is the law, and the courts must not depart from it"—and numerous decisions here and elsewhere are in approval of the principle as stated. Kearney v. Vann, 154 N. C. 311, 70 S. E. 747; In re Applicants for License, 143 N. C. 1, 55 S. E. 635, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 288; Commissioners v. Pkg. Co., 135 N. C. 70, 47 S. E. 411; 11 Ency. U. S. Supreme Court Rep. p. 110; Sedgwick, Statutory Constructions, p. 231. In Kearney's Case, supra, it was held: "In interpreting a statute, the intent is to be first sought in the meaning of the words used, and when they are free from ambiguity and doubt, and express plainly, clearly, and distinctly the sense of the framers of the instruments, no other means of interpretation should be resorted to." And in the citation to Sedgwick, the author quotes with approval from United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 399, 2 L. Ed. 304, as follows: "When a law is plain and unambiguous, whether it be expressed in general or limited terms, the Legislature should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently no room is left for construction."

[3] This charter of the city of Charlotte, and its framers, recognizing the prime importance of affording education to its people, have provided that these schools shall be kept open nine months in each year, without charge, for the children of the city, etc. For the control and management of the school system, a board of commissioners is established, to be elected by the people of the city. The mayor, while chairman ex officio, is not allowed to vote, except in case of a tie. The aldermen are required to provide by taxation for the support of the schools and for all expenses arising from permanent repairs and improvements made, from time to time, by said board of commissioners, and, as bearing more directly on the question, section 197 of the charter enacts: "That said board of school commissioners shall have exclusive control of the public schools of the city of Charlotte, and shall have full and ample power to purchase sites, to provide necessary school buildings and facilities, to appoint examiners, employ teachers and fix their salaries, prescribe courses of study, and, in general, to do anything that may be necessary and proper to open and conduct a sufficient number of schools to meet the needs of the scholastic population of the city of Charlotte." The Legislature could not have selected language more explicit. There is no ambiguity nor room for construction, and, applying the principle, we are constrained to hold that in giving the board of school commissioners "exclusive control of the public schools of the city," and conferring upon them "full and ample power" to purchase sites, etc., and "do everything that is necessary and proper to open and conduct" these schools, the Legislature intended what this language means, and that the board of aldermen are without discretion in the matter. This, in our opinion, being the clear import of the words used in the statute, the position is not affected because, in other portions of the charter, general powers are given to the board of aldermen, looking to the control and well ordering of the city and its government, more particularly section 48, which provides that said board shall have control of the "finances and of the property, real and personal, belonging to the city," and confers upon said board power to provide for the city's obligations for lighting streets and constructing sewers, etc.

[4] There is no necessary conflict of powers presented in the record, and, if there were, the ordinary and accepted rule of interpretations is that, when a "general intent is expressed in a statute and the act also expresses a particular intent incompatible with the former, the particular intent is to be considered in the nature of an exception. 1 Lewis, Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 268; Rodgers v. U. S., 185 U. S. 83; Stockett, Adm'r. v. Bird, 18 Md. 484; Dahnke v. People, 168 Ill. 102, 48 N. E. 137, 39 L. R. A. 197. Doubtless, as suggested by defendants, if the board of school commissioners should select a site so remote, or enter on schemes so extravagant, that to carry them out would threaten bankruptcy or serious embarrassment to the city in its financial and business life, these conditions would be relevant as tending to show such manifest abuse of discretion on the part of the commissioners as would render their action illegal; but these considerations would involve the abuse of admitted powers, and in no way affect the existence of the powers themselves; this being the question presented here. In view of the fact admitted that these funds have been devoted exclusively to school purposes, and of the comprehensive and definite power expressly conferred by the law upon plaintiff board, we are of opinion, as stated, that the board of aldermen are without discretion in the matter, and the judgment of the superior court, directing payment to plaintiffs, should be affirmed. Battle v. Rocky Mount, 156 N. C. 329, 72 S. E. 354.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County.

Bill by Arthur F. Bennett and another against F. M. Booth. Decree for defendant, and complainants appeal. Affirmed.

Ware & Viquesney and Wm. T. George, for appellants. Warren B. Kittle and C. M. Murphy, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. Arthur F. Bennett and Lloyd J. Booth filed their bill in the circuit court of Barbour county, praying for a mandatory injunction to compel defendant to remove a milldam, located on his own land across a stream of water flowing through plaintiffs' land, causing the overflow of plaintiffs' land above. The case was heard upon pleadings and proof, on the 6th of October, 1906, and the temporary injunction, which had been previously awarded, was dissolved, and plaintiffs' bill dismissed. They have appealed.

Defendant claims the right to flood plaintiffs' land, as a right appurtenant to his own land. Frederick Booth, grandfather of defendant and of one of the plaintiffs, was originally the owner of both tracts of land, and while such owner he erected a gristmill and built a dam on a portion of the tract. Some time thereafter, in the year 1887, he conveyed to his son, Jeremiah Booth, by deed with general warranty of title, 102 acres, which is the land now owned by plaintiffs, and a portion of which is submerged by the millpond. Plaintiffs purchased the land at a judicial sale, made and confirmed, in 1906, in a suit by J. N. B. Crim against Jeremiah Booth and others. About the year 1901 a part of the forebay washed away, and it was not repaired until six or seven years thereafter, which was a short time prior to the bringing of this suit, and after Frederick Booth had conveyed the land with the mill on it to his son William, who, in turn, conveyed it to his son, the defendant.

One of the plaintiffs is a son, and the other a son-in-law, of Jeremiah Booth, the former owner of the land burdened with the easement, if, indeed, it is so burdened, and notwithstanding the dam was out of repair and the mill not in use, at the time of their purchase, still they took the land subject to whatever burden, if any, existed upon it in the hands of Jeremiah Booth to whose title they succeeded. By their purchase they became his privies in estate. 24 Cyc. 62; Hurxthal v. Boom Co., 53 W. Va. 87, 44 S. E. 520, 97 Am. St. Rep. 954; Long v. Weller, 29 Gratt. 347.

[1, 2] When a landowner has created a servitude upon one portion of his land for the benefit of another portion, and conveys the servient part, there is an implied reservation of the easement, if it is essential to the use and enjoyment of the land reserved, and such right passes with the dominant estate, as appurtenant thereto. Nor does the existence of such an easement constitute a breach of the covenant of general warranty, if the easement is so open and apparent that the contracting parties must have known of it. In such case the parties are presumed to have contracted with reference to the condition in which the land then was, and it is not to be supposed that the purchaser agreed to pay any more for the land than he thought it was worth with the burden on it. Such a burden has been held not to constitute a breach of covenant against incumbrances. Kutz v. McCune, 22 Wis. 628, 99 Am. Dec. 85; Devlin on Deeds, § 908; Prescott v. Williams, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 429, 39 Am. Dec. 688. If not a breach of covenant against incumbrances, a fortiori it is not a breach of a covenant of general warranty, which relates more particularly to the title than it does to incumbrances.

The decisions of other states are not uniform upon the doctrine of an implied reservation in favor of a grantor; but we think the rule, as we have stated it, is supported by the better considered cases, as well as by the more modern text-writers on the subject. See the following: 10 A. & E. E. L. 427; Prescott v. Williams, supra; Cary v. Daniels, 8 Metc. (Mass.) 466, 41 Am. Dec. 532; Seibert v. Levan, 8 Pa. 383, 49 Am. Dec. 525; Kutz v. McCune, supra; Jones on Easements, § 136; Lampman v. Milks, 21 N. Y. 505; Mason v. Horton, 67 Vt. 266, 81 Atl. 291, 48 Am. St. Rep. 817.

[3] A milldam is essential to a water power gristmill. Without it the mill, which is a part of the realty on which it stands, would be useless. Plaintiffs' predecessor in title knew that it backed the water upon his land. It had done so for many years before he bought it, and he is presumed to have taken the land subject to a continuation of that condition. Plaintiffs, his privies in estate, took the land subject to the burden upon it as appurtenant to the other tract of land with the mill on it, and the mill, together with the appurtenant easement, passed to defendant.

[4] The fact that the mill and dam were in a dilapidated condition at the time plaintiffs purchased does not affect the case. Defendant's right was appurtenant to the dominant land and passed with it. It was such a right as could be lost only by adverse possession by the owner of the servient land, for such length of time as would bar an action of ejectment. Clark v. Beard, 71 S. E. 188.

Appellants contend that defendant, in repairing the dam, raised it higher than it was before, and caused more of his land to be overflowed. This, of course, he could not lawfully do. But their contention, in this regard, is not supported by the evidence. Two or three of their own witnesses testified that the dam was about as high as it was before, and some of defendant's witnesses say that it is no higher than it was at first. We will affirm the decree.

NEASE v. SMITH, Sheriff, et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. TAXATION (§ 549*)—COLLECTORS—COMPENSATION—INTEREST ADDED TO TAX BILL.

A sheriff has no right to retain as his own the 10 per cent. interest added to tax bills of those taxpayers not paying until after the 1st day of January by Code 1906, c. 30, § 8, but must account to the public treasuries therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1043-1050; Dec. Dig. § 549.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 545*)—COLLECTORS—COMPENSATION—STATUTES.

A sheriff is entitled to a commission of 7½ per cent. on collections of road taxes under Acts of 1909, c. 52, § 68 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 43).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 545.*]

3. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 71*)—COMPENSATION—COMMISSION—AMOUNT PAYABLE TO COUNTY.

Under chapter 15, § 9, Acts Ex. Sess. 1908 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 137), commissions on taxes collected by a sheriff are to be included in making up the sum on which he is to pay 15 per cent. to the county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. § 98; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

4. SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES (§ 29*)—COMPENSATION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—REPEAL.

Section 9, c. 15, Acts Ex. Sess. 1908 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 137), is not repealed by section 31, c. 69, Acts of 1909 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 30).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sheriffs and Constables, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. WORDS AND PHRASES—"FEES"—"ALLOWANCE."

"Fees" are sums fixed by law, while "allowances" are those made under the discretion of court, and not fixed.

Poffenbarger, J., dissenting in part.

Error from Circuit Court, Kanawha County.

On settlement between S. P. Smith, sheriff of Kanawha county, and the county, district, and district school funds, H. E. Nease, as citizen and taxpayer, intervenes. From a judgment of the circuit court on certiorari to review the judgment of the county court, Nease brings error, and the sheriff cross-assigns error. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

Fred O. Blue, for plaintiff in error. Williams, Scott & Lovett, Dillon & Nuckolls, and W. G. Mathews, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. In a settlement between S. P. Smith, sheriff of Kanawha county, and the county, district, and district school funds, the county court, acting upon a report of such settlement made by commissioners for the year ending June 30, 1910, refused to charge the sheriff with the interest collected by him on taxes unpaid until after January 1st, and refused to charge him with 15 per cent. on commissions on taxes collected, and allowed him 7½ per cent. commission on road taxes. H. E. Nease, as citizen and taxpayer, intervened in the proceeding in the county court, and excepted to such action of the court, and carried the matter to the circuit court by writ of certiorari. The judgment of the circuit court allowed Smith to retain the 10 per cent. collected by him as interest on taxes not paid until January 1st, and allowed him 7½ per cent. on road taxes, and charged him with 15 per cent. on commission on taxes collected. Nease brought the case to this court, complaining that the circuit court had not charged Smith with the 10 per cent. penalty collected by him on taxes collected after January 1st, and had allowed him 7½ per cent. on road taxes, instead of 5 per cent., as Nease claimed was legal commission. Smith cross-assigned error in the action of the circuit court in charging him with 15 per cent, on commission on taxes collected.

[1] Is Smith chargeable with that 10 per cent. per annum interest imposed as a penalty to compel prompt payment on all taxpayers in default of payment before January 1st? Code of 1906, c. 30, § 8, demands payment of taxes by November 30th. On taxes in default, it says "interest" at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum on the amount of each tax bill shall be added thereto from said 1st day of January until payment. One question will answer the claim of the sheriff to this interest. Whose money is it bearing that interest? Not the sheriff's, but money of the public. Who ever heard of any one getting interest on money not belonging to him? We would expect that for such an extraordinary claim some statute allowing it should be shown; but it is admitted that no express statute doing so can be found. But the argument is that by implication the sheriff may retain such interest, because Code, c. 39, § 33, charges the sheriff with the amount of the county levy, and because section 139, c. 27, Acts 1908 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 45) charges him with amount of taxes levied by the board of education, and because Code, c. 49, charges him with amount of district levies; in other words, only the amounts of levies shown by assessment books, and those statutes do not say that he shall pay interest. Two answers here. One is that when such books of levies are made no interest has accrued or collections made. Another is that those charging statutes and settlements surely mean to charge all taxes, and interest is a part of the taxes, first, because interest is an increment or increase of money, following it as shadow follows its substance, adhering to it. The letter of the statute is that "interest shall be added thereto." Another cogent answer to this claim is that chapter 69, § 31, Acts 1909 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 30), fixes what commissions on taxes the sheriff shall get, and does not give him that 10 per cent. interest. He is limited to that commission. And it is undeniable law that a sheriff can get no reward from the public, unless statute concedes it. 35 Cyc. 49. I find that 25 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 730, says that a sheriff, at common law, could receive no compensation, other than that received from the king. "His right to it is wholly derived from statutes which, being in derogation of common law, must be strictly construed."

[2] What commission shall Smith receive on road taxes? Section 31, c. 69, Acts 1909, fixes 5 per cent. commission on county levy, district levies, and district levy for schools. This would apply to road taxes. But chapter 52, § 66, Acts 1909 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 43), a later act by four days, says that commission on road levy shall be the same as on state taxes, which, by chapter 69, Acts 1909, is 7½ per cent. So it is clear that the sheriff gets that commission on road taxes.

[3] Must the sheriff pay the county treasury 15 per cent. of his official emolument? This depends on section 9, c. 15, Acts of 1908 (Code Supp. 1909, c. 137). It reads as follows: "Each sheriff, clerk of the county court, clerk of the circuit court, or clerk of the circuit and criminal or intermediate court and prosecuting attorney in the counties of the state, shall receive as compensation for his services as such sheriff, clerks and prosecuting attorney, the following sums, to wit: (a) The salaries authorized by law to be fixed by the county court of the respective counties and paid out of the county treasury. (b) Such allowance or allowances as may be made by the county court of the different counties to such officers by authority of law now in effect. (c) Eighty-five per centum of all other fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions and emoluments: Provided, however, that such sheriff, clerks and prosecuting attorney shall receive all fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, emoluments and commissions collected or received by him, until the gross income of his office from all sources including salaries and allowances as aforesaid shall equal the following sums, that is to say: For the office of sheriff, three thousand dollars. For the office of clerk of the county court, two thousand dollars. For the office of clerk of the circuit court, two thousand dollars. For the office of clerk of the circuit court and criminal court or intermediate court, three thousand dollars. For the office of clerk of the county and circuit court when held by the same person, two thousand dollars. For the office of prosecuting attorney, fifteen hundred dollars. When said salaries, allowances, fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, emoluments and commissions exceed the sum hereinbefore mentioned to be retained by such officers, then such officers shall pay to the sheriff as treasurer of his county, fifteen per centum of all fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, penalties, commissions and emoluments collected by him, excluding therefrom the salaries of such officers paid out of the county treasury, and allowances made by authority of law as aforesaid: Provided, however, should the gross income from all sources, aforesaid, for any of the said offices, exceed the amounts hereinbefore specified, but insufficient to net said amounts so specified, after deducting the said fifteen per centum aforesaid, then in such event said officers shall retain respectively, said amounts specified as aforesaid, and the residue of said gross income pay into the county treasury."

[4] It is first said that the provision of this statute, if calling on the sheriff to pay this 15 per cent., has been repealed by section 31, c. 69, Acts of 1909. We do not think so. The acts are on different subjects. Section 31 of chapter 69 has for its purpose the fixing commissions of sheriff on money coming to his hands from taxes, while section 9, c. 15, Acts of 1908, does not fix commissions, but deals with what the sheriff shall retain of his emoluments from all sources, what is the minimum he shall receive therefrom, and what part he shall pay into the county treasury. Both statutes can stand in harmony.

What is the purpose of this section? The purpose is to fix minimum incomes, prescribe their sources, and raise revenue by imposing what I may call a "tax" upon the income of the officers named in it. Its plain purpose is to require payment to the county treasury of 15 per cent. of official income. In conference upon this case, the point of discussion was whether sheriff's commission on taxes should bear the 15 per cent. exaction; must it be included or excluded in the sum subject to that 15 per cent.? The statute does not fix the sheriff's commission. It does fix the minimum of emolument which he is entitled to receive clear from all sources. It says he shall receive (a) salaries fixed by the county court, and (b) such allowances as may be made by the county court, and (c) 85 per cent. of all other fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions, and emoluments. Here are three distinct sources of income. The proviso says that he shall receive and keep free of tax all fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, emoluments, and commissions until they, with salaries and other county court allowances, shall amount to a certain sum. Having fixed what the officers shall receive from all sources up to at least certain sums, the section, proceeding to say what they shall pay out of the total into the county treasury, says that when the income from salaries and allowances by the county court, fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, emoluments, and commissions exceeds $3,000, in the case of sheriff, he shall pay the treasury 15 per cent. thereof, excepting from the sum total of taxable receipts, salaries, and allowances by the court. It is contended that commissions on taxes shall not be counted in ascertaining the sum taxable or chargeable with 15 per cent. To exclude it, we must make it an "allowance" under clause "b." It is so claimed. But this cannot be so. The word "allowance" does not mean "commission." It means an allowance mentioned in clause "b," made by order of the county court. Clauses "a," "b," and "c" specify the only sources of income under the act. Observe that clause "c" gives the sheriff 85 per cent. of all "other fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions and emoluments"; that is, all receipts, other than those specified in clauses "a" and "b." The use of the word "other" just after those clauses shows that it is things not named in them on which he gets 85 per cent.; shows that commissions are included in those things on which he gets 85 per cent.; in other words, shows that commissions are not allowances by the county court. If commissions are allowances, then clause "c" does the useless thing of giving 85 per cent. of them, since it would be simply specifying the same thing the second time, when the language is "other fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions," etc. Commissions are not allowances.

Note that the close of the section, before the repealing clause, says that, when said salaries, allowances, fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, emoluments, and commissions exceed the sum to be retained by the officer allowed him as a minimum, then he shall pay the county treasury 15 per cent. of all fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, penalties, commissions, and emoluments collected by him, excluding therefrom salaries of such officers paid out of the county treasury, and allowances made by authority of law, "as aforesaid." Here we see that in making up the sum taxable commissions are in words included, and, while salaries and allowances made by authority of law, "as aforesaid," are excluded from the tax charge, commissions are not excluded. Allowances and commissions are both counted in making up the total income; but only allowances and salaries are released from the tax. They are excepted from the tax, but commissions not. If the intention was to exempt commissions from the tax, why not exempt them by name, as they are included by name in total income? They are left taxable. The real question is, Do commissions come under the head of allowances, under clause "b"? They do not. The allowances meant are those (not salaries) fixed by the court, in its discretion, by special order, not a commission fixed by positive statute, as commissions on taxes. Commissions are not allowances under clause "b."

It is said the commissions charged with the 15 per cent. are commissions on execution or other process. The section does not so limit or declare. It used the generic word "commissions," which applies to taxes. There is no subject to which it more plainly applies under statute law and common understanding. The question was asked, What allowances are meant in clause "b"? and it was asserted that there are no such allowances under existing law, but salaries and commissions. I think the word "allowances" was intended as a safety clause to include any allowances that could be made, not salaries. Again, the Legislature thought there might be in this county or that allowances lawfully made under special local acts. I further answer that question by saying that, if there are no allowances that can be made to a sheriff, there are allowances that can be made to the clerk; for instance, the reasonable allowance which the county court can make to him for the financial statement under Code of 1906, c. 39, § 35. Both the words "commissions" and "allowances" are used to meet the case of both. Sheriff's commissions on taxes are not "allowances" made by the court, but are fixed, without any order of allowance by the court, by chapter 69, Acts of 1909, § 31; the court having no power over them. If a clerk pays this 15 per cent. on fees, why should not the sheriff pay on commissions? Both are emoluments coming from public service. The tax is levied on clerk's fees. If this were not so, there would be little revenue from that source. Did the Legislature intend to tax clerk's fees and release the large amount of sheriff's commissions? The bulk of clerk's income is fees, and the bulk of sheriff's income is commission. We say that the intent of said section is to impose a tax on incomes from office, when such incomes amount to certain sums, for revenue, and we cannot think that the Legislature intended to emasculate the act and defeat it largely as a revenue measure by excluding from the 15 per cent. large sums of commissions.

[5] Just here I note that section 31, c. 69, Acts 1909, instead of repealing, by either expression or implication, the act of 1908, regards it as still to continue. "Every sheriff or collector shall be allowed a commission of five per cent. on the amount of all county levies, district levies, and district levies for free school purposes, collected from the taxpayers, except those taxes for said purposes paid through the auditor's office from railroads and other persons and corporations, on which last mentioned taxes he shall receive a commission of one and one-half per cent.; provided however, that in any county where the gross income of the sheriff's office, including the salaries authorized by law to be fixed by the county court of the respective counties, and paid out of the county treasury, the commissions allowed by this section, and all other allowances, fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions and emoluments, amounts to less than three thousand dollars, the sheriffs of such counties may be allowed such additional commissions," as will make up $3,000. Observe that it fixes $3,000 as a minimum. That is the sum fixed by the act of 1908. And it uses the same words found in that act to make that sum—salaries, commissions, allowances, fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions, and emoluments, evidently regarding it. But, moreover, note that, making up the $3,000, it includes "the commissions allowed by this section, and all other allowances, fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions and emoluments." Both tax commissions and allowances are named, showing that they are different things. This feature of this case has been much contested, and but for this I would not have written this prolix discussion of it, as, in my humble opinion, it presents no serious difficulty. I think the statute plain, and it is only a matter of obeying its plain letter to execute its plain intent. We cannot put into the statute what is not there. Therefore the sheriff is required to pay the county treasury 15 per cent. on commissions on taxes. Everything that is a fee is counted in the taxable sum; fees are those sums fixed by law. Allowances are those made under the discretion of court, not fixed, as, for instance, the reasonable compensation for financial statement under Code 1906, c. 39, § 35. They are not allowances. Allowance is where the court must make an order fixing the amount. The sheriff pays this tax of 15 per cent. on gross income, except salaries and county court allowances, if any. But by a proviso of the statute, if the imposition of the tax would leave him less than the minimum sum prescribed by the statute, he is entitled to retain up to that sum, though the treasury may not get that per cent., and it gets what is left over that sum.

Our conclusion is to reverse the judgment of the circuit court, in so far as it allows the sheriff said 10 per cent. interest, amounting to $160.48, and affirm it, in so far as it allows the sheriff 7½ per cent. on road taxes ($158.37), and in so far as it charges the sheriff with $2,963.06 for the 15 per cent. on commissions on taxes collected.

POFFENBARGER, J. (dissenting in part). From so much of this decision as requires the sheriff to return to the county treasury 15 per cent. of his commissions on county, district, and school district levies, I am compelled to dissent. The proposition violates both the spirit and the letter of the statute, and deviates from the obvious purpose of the Legislature.

In the cases of each of the officers to which the act in question applies (the sheriff, county clerk, circuit clerk, and prosecuting attorney), two items of income are admittedly excepted from the 15 per cent. deduction or concession to the county treasury—the salary and allowances made to the officer out of the county treasury by the county court by authority of law. As to what constitutes the salary, there is no difference of opinion. Now, does anybody doubt that the allowance mentioned in clause "b" is a different and additional thing? In other words, the salary and the allowance are not one and the same thing. The only controversy or difference of opinion is as to what constitutes an allowance, within the meaning of clause "b," and whether commissions allowed the sheriff by the county court on county, district, and school district taxes are such allowances. The solution of this question, in accordance with sound legal principles, involves consideration of the general policy of the act and its terms.

These officers all derive considerable compensation from sources other than the county treasury. All receive fees from private individuals for services performed for them. The sheriff is allowed commissions on sales and collections in proceedings between private individuals, or by the state and municipal bodies against private persons, and vice versa, and on state and license taxes, with which the county court has nothing to do, and is not in any way concerned. Some or all of the other officers may receive commissions, not allowed by the county court. These sources of income are clearly within clause "c." There are both commissions and fees, therefore, not allowed by the county court, and there are, no doubt, perquisites, percentages, and allowances to some or all of these officers that cannot or may not be covered by the terms "fees" and "commissions." It was the clear intention of the Legislature to require all of them to pay into the county treasury 15 per cent. of all of these classes of fees, commissions, perquisites, percentages, and allowances, emanating from sources other than the county, when it can be done without reducing the compensation below the amount specified in clause "c" of section 9.

It is clear that all of these officers receive salaries, and most of them fees, and the sheriff undoubtedly commissions, which are allowed by the county court. In one form or another, these allowances come out of the county treasury. The salaries are paid by orders expressly drawn upon the treasury in favor of the officers. Some of the fees are paid in that way. Possibly some commissions are so paid. But the sheriff's commissions are allowed to him by way of credit in his settlement. No order is drawn for them. There is no reason why there should be an order in his case, since he has the money in his hands, and his settlements, showing how much is allowed, are entered upon the record of the county court, after confirmation by an order of that body. This order of confirmation is the practical equivalent of an order drawn upon the treasury for so much money, and turned in by the sheriff as a voucher by way of credit in his settlement. It is as distinctly and substantially an allowance to him by the county court as would be an order for the amount of his commission. The statute providing for the sheriff's commissions, using a term corresponding with the one used in clause "b," says the sheriff "shall be allowed" certain commissions on county, district, and school district levies, and certain fees, payable out of the county treasury. As the sheriff must settle the levies with the county court, the commissions to which he is entitled are necessarily allowed by the county court. Thus these commissions comply fully and strictly with the description contained in clause "b," saying these officers shall receive for their services, in addition to their salaries, "such allowance or allowances as may be made by the county court of the different counties to such officers by authority of law now in effect." All fees, payable out of the county treasury to the sheriffs and the other officers to whom the act applies, are allowed by special orders drawn upon the treasury. Some, if not all, of the other officers receive certain fees, payable out of the county treasury. Here, then, we have a second class of fees, perquisites, percentages, commissions, and emoluments, coming to these officers from a source from which their other compensation in various forms does not come, namely, from the county court, by authority of law, and the clause just quoted relates to the income from that source alone; and clause "c" says that, from the obligation to pay 15 per cent. into the treasury, the salary mentioned in clause "a" and the allowances mentioned in clause "b" shall be excluded.

The shibboleth of the argument for the construction adopted by the majority of the court is lack of reference in clause "b," in express terms, to commissions, and the presence of such reference in clause "c." This argument wholly fails, for the reason that clause "b," necessarily relating to fees, perquisites, percentages, allowances, and commissions, covering in general terms all of the income of these officers from the county treasury, does not mention any of them in express terms. An allowance must be for something. An allowance without any basis therefor, such as a fee, a commission, a percentage, a perquisite, or an emolument, would be as illegal and unwarranted by law as it would be ridiculous and absurd. The language of clause "b" was adopted for convenience. General terms were used to cover any and all of these things, coming to the officer from the county treasury by authority of law. It is not disputed here that certain "fees" allowed by the county court to the sheriff and the other officers are allowances, within the meaning of clause "b," because they are allowed by the county court. On the same principle and for the same reason, a commission allowed to any of them by the county court must fall within the meaning of clause "b." It was practicable, as the legislative draftsman observed, to express the legislative intent in general terms, by describing the common source from which certain kinds of income emanate, and thus to avoid unnecessary and useless verbiage, incident to an attempt to enumerate and specify them. Intending that no officer should be required to pay back into the county treasury any part of any sum derived by him from that treasury, be it a "fee," "commission," or what not, it amply sufficed to say so in the terms employed in clause "b." General terms could have been used and a large saving in words and space effected in clause "c" by simply declaring the officers should pay into the county treasury 15 per cent. of all their incomes derived from sources other than the county, subject to the limitation guaranteeing certain minimum compensation if the salaries and other compensation, without deduction, should prove to be sufficient to make it. Why different methods of expression were selected for the two clauses is immaterial; but that the legislators, like judges and all other persons, may and do have wide latitude in the selection of terms to express their thoughts and intentions must not be overlooked. We must also remember the advantages of generalization and its prevalence, when practicable, as a means of combining perspicuity and comprehensiveness in short time and limited space. All courts, legislators, attorneys, and other writers adopt it, and the proper use of it is evidence of skill and ability.

Viewed in the light of the positive and unequivocal classification of income, made by the general scope and import of the act, the word "other" in clause "c" is highly significant. It qualifies and limits "fees," "costs," "percentages," "perquisites," "commissions," and "emoluments," of which officers are to receive, under certain conditions, only 85 per cent. Not all fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions, and emoluments are included in or contemplated by clause "c"; but only those that are "other" than some others. What others? Not fees and commissions, other than those covered by clause "a," for that clause includes only salaries; but they are "emoluments," more than emoluments—emoluments and salaries at the same time—as a commission or fee may be that and an allowance at one and the same time, or a fee or commission before allowance and as the basis for an allowance, and ultimately and finally an allowance. Not other than salaries, but necessarily other than those included in and covered by clause "b"; for that is the only provision, going before clause "c," that can include fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, and commissions. That it may do so is too plain for argument—so plain that nobody denies it. It not only may, but the adjective "other," qualifying, limiting, and distinguishing fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions, and emoluments in clause "c," proves that it does. If not, why were they so limited and distinguished? Clauses "a" and "b" and the first sentence of clause "c" give the officers absolutely (1) their salaries, (2) their allowances by the county court, and (3) 85 per centum of "all other fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions and emoluments." This is the minimum. It is then provided that, under certain circumstances, they may have the salaries and allowances and 100 per centum of all other fees, etc. Then all of this is virtually repeated and further elaborated by the last paragraph of clause "c," requiring each officer, when his entire compensation, accruing from all sources, shall exceed a certain sum, to pay into the county treasury 15 per centum of "all fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, penalties, commissions and emoluments collected by him, excluding therefrom" his salary, "paid out of the county treasury, and allowances made by authority of law as aforesaid." This express exclusion of salaries and allowances in the last paragraph dispensed with the necessity of the use of the word "other" before "all" in that paragraph, and consequent omission thereof shows careful adherence to the plan or scheme of legislation previously expressed, and makes section 9 systematic and harmonious from beginning to end.

Salaries are given in full and absolutely, because they come out of the county treasury. Salaries coming from other sources, if any, as from the state, must suffer an abatement of 15 per centum; for they are "emoluments." Clause "a" allows in full only salaries "paid out of the county treasury." Clause "c" exonerates from the abatement only salaries "paid out of the county treasury." Clause "b" gives in full only allowances "made by the county court * * * by authority of law." Clause "c" exonerates from abatement only allowances "made by authority of law as aforesaid"—necessarily those mentioned in clause "b"; for none are elsewhere mentioned by that description. All this evinces intent to adopt the reasonable and consistent plan of allowing county officers to retain what comes to them from the county treasury, and avoids the conflict and contradiction involved in permitting them to receive money from the county, and then requiring them to pay it back.

As the county court is, for the most part, a police and fiscal board, having no actual custody of funds with which to pay anything, and adjudges nothing, the word "allow" more fittingly expresses its action than, perhaps, any other. As to claims and disbursements, its real function is to audit and order paid, or, in statutory phraseology, "allow" claims and demands, upon whatever account, consideration, or basis they may be due, or however they may arise. Thus section 40 of chapter 39 of the Code says, as to claims: "The clerk shall present the account or statement to such court at its first meeting thereafter, which shall allow the whole or such part thereof as they may deem just, or disallow the whole." Section 41 of said chapter says no suit shall be brought on such claim until the court shall have disallowed it. Section 37 thereof, prescribing the forms of county orders, says each shall order the sheriff to pay — dollars and — cents, allowed by special order. Section 18 of chapter 39a says the sheriff shall have certain sums for certain services on the allowance of the county court. Section 29 of chapter 63 says the clerk of the county court shall be allowed certain fees to be paid out of the county treasury. Section 35 of chapter 39 says he shall be allowed a reasonable compensation for preparing a statement. Section 11a of chapter 29 says he shall be allowed the actual cost of making up the land book. Section 93 of chapter 3 says he shall be allowed a reasonable compensation for keeping the registration of voters.

Section 31 of chapter 30 says every sheriff or collector "shall be allowed" certain commissions for collecting the county, district, and school district levies. Finding the term "allow" so often and so aptly used in the statutes to express the function of the county court in appropriating money to pay claims, fees, and demands of all kinds, and authorizing or confirming credits or deductions by the sheriff from funds in his hands as treasurer, I have no difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of its derivative "allowance," embodied in clause "b" of section 9 of the act we are considering, inserted by the same tribunal that has used its parent in so many other places to cover and include fees, commissions, and compensation for services. As the Legislature made it applicable to fees elsewhere, why not here? As it applies to commissions elsewhere, why not here?

If any of these items of income from the county treasury are included in clause "b," they are all so included; for any reason justifying the inclusion of one will necessarily sustain inclusion of all. They all come from the county treasury as compensation to county officers, and are allowed out of the treasury by the county court. While they arise out of divers kinds of county service and under divers designations, they all reach a point at which they fall under the common and general designation of "allowances." Moreover, there are no other allowances materially differing from them in character. The law justifies all of them and obliges the county court to make them. They are not discretionary allowances; nor are there any such. Just a few days ago we decided, on an application for a writ of error, that a county court cannot allow any claim on any account, or to anybody, without express or clearly implied statutory authority. No officer can obtain anything out of the county treasury by the mere grace of the county court. The law must give it; else he is not entitled to it. Though the law gives it, the county court must appropriate the money to him by an "allowance" in the form of an order or otherwise, before he can obtain payment. No instance of a discretionary allowance to any officer has been pointed out, and I apprehend that the members of this court uniting in the majority opinion would not for an instant sanction a claim of any such authority in any county court, unless it pertained to some of the county court's own rights or undertakings, and, in such cases, the allowances would necessarily be made to persons, other than the county officers, whose services may be demanded on account of the salaries allowed them, and without additional compensation. The statute itself impliedly forbids discretionary allowances to county officers. Section 49 of chapter 39 of the Code says: "The county court of every county shall allow annually to the county officers, hereinafter mentioned, for their public services, for which no other fee or reward is allowed by law, such sums to be paid out of the county treasury as are deemed reasonable by the court, within the limits ascertained by law; that is to say"—and then sets forth maximum and minimum limits of salaries. Thus the salary mentioned in clause "a" covers all public services for which "no other fee or reward is allowed by law," and all the discretion the court has must be exercised in fixing that item, leaving none applicable to items falling under clause "b." In other words, all the discretion it has in favor of these officers must necessarily be exercised in fixing their salaries, falling under clause "a," which proves that allowances contemplated by clause "b" are such as the court are not only authorized by law to make, but are also legally bound to make.

Clause "b" therefore must apply to and include fees, commissions, perquisites, and emoluments charged by law upon the county treasury, but not payable, except upon allowance by the county court, which means appropriation of the money to pay them, or be denied any force or effect whatever. If it does not include such items, it is a dead letter, and performs no office or function whatever. It cannot be deprived of any function and made useless, consistently with the rules of construction. In construing a statute, the court must give to every clause, phrase, and word a meaning and effect, if it is possible to do so. State v. Harden, 62 W. Va. 313, 347, 58 S. E. 715, 60 S. E. 394; Baxter v. Wade, 39 W. Va. 281, 19 S. E. 404; Argand v. Quinn, 39 W. Va. 535, 20 S. E. 576; Bank v. County Court, 36 W. Va. 341, 15 S. E. 78; Jackson v. Kettle, 34 W. Va. 207, 12 S. E. 484. Being elementary, this proposition requires no further discussion or citation of authorities.

The majority opinion seems to assert two supposed reasons for its refusal to adopt this construction. One of these is that the officer would get commissions twice, once under clause "b" and again under clause "c," and the other that both allowances and commissions go into the total sum upon which the 15 per centum is charged, and allowances only are excepted. As to the first objection, it is to be noted that the officer does not get his commissions twice. The totaling of salaries, allowances, fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, emoluments, and commissions in the last paragraph of clause "c" is not made for the purpose of determining a total sum out of which the 15 per centum is to be taken, but for the purpose of determining whether it can be taken out at all. Notice the terms: "When said salaries, allowances, fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, emoluments and commissions exceed the sum hereinbefore mentioned to be retained by such officer, then such officer shall pay to the sheriff as treasurer" of the county, not 15 per centum of any total sum, but 15 per centum of all of certain items, fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, penalties, commissions, and emoluments collected by him, except such thereof as are salaries and allowances made by authority of law. This paragraph does not require all of the emoluments or compensation of the officer to be added up and certain deductions made (salaries and allowances), and then 15 per centum of the remainder of the total sum to be paid into the treasury. The abatement of compensation and augmentation of the treasury will be exactly the same, if 15 per centum of each of the several items is turned in. But, if it did require aggregation, fees and commissions constituting allowances under clause "b" would not be put in once as allowances and again as commissions and fees, and then stricken out only as allowances. They would go in only once under the general designation of allowances. After putting in salaries and allowances, which include fees and commissions allowed by the county court, only the other fees, commissions, etc., would be added; but the terms require no aggregation of these items into a sum total from which to take the 15 per centum for the treasury.

As to the second objection, we may say the same reasoning would prevent the exclusion of anything. The paragraph puts into the enumeration emoluments, and the excepting clause does not exclude them. Emoluments is broad enough to cover the salary, as well as all fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, penalties, commissions, and allowances. It would cover discretionary allowances, if there could be any. If commissions are not excepted, because they are put into the enumeration and not excluded in words, emoluments, covering salaries, allowances, perquisites, and every other conceivable thing, would not be excluded for the same reason, so that everything any of these officers get would be subject to a deduction in favor of the county treasury of 15 per centum. The theory of the majority, consistently applied, subjects all fees allowed by the county court to the 15 per centum deduction; for fees, as well as commissions, are specifically mentioned in the supposed aggregation, and not excluded by name. So does it cut out of clause "b" the allowance to the county clerk for preparing the financial statement, which is an emolument of the office, and not a salary; for emoluments are specified in the supposed aggregation, and not excluded by name. Yet the opinion, in violation of the theory and in flat contradiction of its own argument, says this item falls under clause "b." If so, why not a fee allowed by the county court? If so, why not a commission allowed by the county court? The argument applied to keep commissions on county and district levies out of clause "b," directly applicable to fees and emoluments, other than salaries, is thus cast to the winds, in the effort to find something for the operation of clause "b," other than these commissions. Is not the allowance to the clerk an emolument? Certainly.

Are not emoluments included in the alleged aggregation? Yes. Being so, is it excluded by name? No. Then if, because of these facts, the commissions in question are not excluded as being in clause "b," how can this emolument be excluded; the facts in each case being the same?

All such allowances are emoluments. How can any of them belong to clause "b," under the majority theory, let them be discretionary with the court or obligatory upon it? I repeat they are emoluments, and the argument that cuts out commissions cuts out emoluments, other than salaries and allowances. Is it included in clause "b" because it is an allowance? So is a fee, because an order must be drawn for it. So is a commission, because a settlement must be made and recorded, allowing credit for it. The allowance to a clerk for preparation of the financial statement is not discretionary. It is obligatory. The court is bound to allow it. The statute says "he shall be allowed a reasonable compensation" for it. Code, c. 39, § 35. If the court should cut his claim for it below the standard of reason, the clerk may sue and recover the value of the service. For this reason, as well as for others stated, this item—the only one conceded to be an allowance under clause "b"—must go out, and the clause becomes a dead letter, made so here in plain violation of the rules of construction. There are no such difficulties and inconsistencies as the majority opinion supposes. The excluding clause in the last paragraph embraces all that is included in clause "b." The majority opinion admits this. Hence the crucial question is, What does clause "b" include? To determine that, we must look at clauses "a" and "b" and the first paragraph of clause "c." We cannot ignore these and go to the final paragraph of the section and make everything turn on a few words found in it. The rules of construction require the court to read the whole section together, give effect to all of its parts, every word of it, and then harmonize them and make the section operate as a consistent whole. Clause "a" gives absolutely the salary. Clause "b" gives absolutely the allowances. The first paragraph of clause "c" gives 85 per centum of all other fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, and emoluments. The word "other," qualifying all these items, proves, beyond doubt, that those things are included in clause "a" or "b." If they are not, we must attribute to the Legislature the stupidity of having inserted a useless, meaningless and confusing word ("other"), and also of having inserted a clause (clause "b"), without giving it any office in the world to perform, or anything to act upon; for I have shown allowances must include fees and commissions, or nothing. No court can do this consistently with the rules of construction, as I have shown by authorities already cited. Having thus shown that clause "b" includes such fees, costs, percentages, perquisites, commissions, and emoluments as are allowed to the officers by the county court by authority of law, we turn to the excluding clause in the last paragraph, which says, "excluding therefrom the salaries of such officers paid out of the county treasury, and allowances made by authority of law as aforesaid." The allowances so excluded are all the allowances covered by clause "b."

I have demonstrated the impossibility of discretionary allowances to officers. That proves they could not have been contemplated as falling under clause "b"; but, if there could be such allowances, no word found in the clause limits it to mere discretionary or even extraordinary allowances, if there could be such. On the contrary, the clause says the officers shall receive such allowance or allowances as the county court may make by authority of law. Where is the warrant of the court in the terms of the clause or the spirit of the act for addition or interpolation of the word "discretionary"? Allowances under special statutes, as suggested in the majority opinion, exist only in imagination. Nobody has pointed out any, or can do so. They are myths, pure and simple.

The opinion seems to assert that commissions cannot go into clause "b," because not allowed by a special order drawn on the county treasury, thus impliedly admitting that allowances to county officers by the county court by special order may go in, and yet it concedes to that clause but a single item so allowed, upon the false assumption that its allowance is discretionary. Now, clause "b" says nothing about the form of the allowance. It excepts allowances, and, if an allowance is made by credit in an officer's settlement, it is as much an allowance as if made by a special order. Indeed, there is an order of allowance in the entry of the settlement upon the court's records and approval thereof. No rule of interpretation justifies or permits interpolation of the word "special" before "allowance or allowances" or the words "by special order" after these terms.

This construction, susceptible of the equivalent of mathematical demonstration, is sustained by other considerations pertaining to the status of the officer in question, the conditions in view of which the legislation was enacted, and its objects and purposes. The collection of taxes is not strictly within the legal theory and scope of a sheriff's office. In handling levies, he acts as collector and treasurer. Section 32 of chapter 39 says: "The treasury of each county shall be kept by the sheriff thereof, who shall be ex officio treasurer of such county and of each district therein." His compensation as such consists wholly and solely of commissions on levies and other receipts into the treasury. He is the collector, as well as the treasurer, and this compensation to him is charged with enormous expense in the employment of deputies to aid in the collection and disbursement of the levies. It is not a net receipt. His salary, fees, and commissions as sheriff constitute but a small portion of his income. The highest salary allowed to a sheriff is only $500, and many of them receive only $200. The highest salaries allowed for clerks will average in the several counties of the state, three, four, or five times the salaries allowed to sheriffs. They are not required to abate any portion of these salaries. The sheriff's commissions on county and district levies are to him what the salaries of the clerks are to them. He is virtually denied any salary, because he gets these commissions, and his expenses for assistance are much heavier than those of clerks. The Legislature allows him commissions in lieu of a salary. All these facts are known to the Legislature. To allow these clerks their several salaries without abatement and, at the same time, require the sheriff to turn into the treasury 15 per centum of his commissions on these levies works an unjust and unreasonable discrimination against the latter, which the Legislature cannot be deemed to have intended, and this applies another settled rule of construction. "Of two permissible constructions of a statute, one working manifest injustice and the other equity and fairness, the latter is adopted, upon the presumption that the Legislature did not intend the results flowing from the former." Hasson v. Chester, 67 W. Va. 278, 67 S. E. 731; Old Dominion, etc., Ass'n v. Sohn, 54 W. Va. 101, 46 S. E. 222; Dickey v. Smith, 42 W. Va. 806, 26 S. E. 373. Besides, the Legislature knew the sheriff's commissions had been largely cut down and reduced by the revision and alteration of the tax system. In almost every county in the state, large levies on public service corporations, other than railroad companies, were formerly collected by the sheriff, and were subject to his ordinary commissions. At the time of the passage of this act, all of those levies were collectible by the auditor, and the sheriff's commission on them reduced from 7½ and 5 per cent. to 1½ per cent. The Legislature thus appears to have reduced the income of the sheriff's office to a point deemed reasonable, without the imposition of this 15 per centum abatement.

The income of the sheriff's office in a few of the larger counties, such as Ohio, Wood, Cabell, and Kanawha, may be larger than is necessary, and this may be equally true of the offices of the clerk of the circuit court and clerk of the county court. But that constitutes no reason for a construction or interpretation of this statute that will make it operate harshly and unjustly upon the officers of the smaller counties in which the offices do not pay sums commensurate with the services performed and the liabilities incurred. The Legislature, passing this act without sufficient information as to the compensation of these officers to enable it to see what would be just and right, put itself on the side of safety and justice. When the act was originally drafted and introduced, it provided for specific salaries for all these officers, and required them to pay into the treasury all of the receipts from all sources in excess of the prescribed salaries. Seeing the possibility of injustice in an attempt to fix compensation without full knowledge of material facts, this plan was altered by amendment, and section 9 put into its present form. This entirely changed the nature and purpose of the act as a whole. Its main object then was to effect a slight reduction for the time being, and obtain, for the purposes of future legislation, information which the Legislature did not have. Formerly no officer was required to disclose in any manner the amount of fees received by him. The first eight sections of this act are so drawn as to require all these officers to give accurate accounts of all fees, commissions, perquisites, and emoluments received by them, or to which they are entitled, and they are inhibited from performing any gratuitous services. These provisions were intended to make public, as a matter of record, the income of these offices which had been previously secret and unknown, except to the officers themselves. Salaries and allowances by the county courts were not of that class. The records had always disclosed them, including the sheriff's commissions, and the Legislature had altered them from time to time, so as to conform to its notion as to what was commensurate with the service and responsibility. His settlements have always been made matter of record, open to the inspection of the public, just as the salaries of county officers have been. Now that these officers, under the act here involved, are required to make full disclosure of their incomes, the Legislature at any of its future sessions may deal intelligently, wisely, and justly with the subject of compensation to county officers. It could not do so when this act was passed, and for that reason desisted from the attempt. These general considerations fully sustain the interpretation I have hurriedly outlined here.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§§ 279, 285*)— REMEDIES OF VENDOR—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN—PARTIES

The purchaser of a defined part of the timber on a tract of land subject to a vendor's lien is a necessary party to a suit to enforce the lien, and, in formulating the decree of sale, the court should observe the equitable rule, requiring sale of land so situated in parcels or portions, corresponding with the interests of the parties, in the inverse order of the alienations, commencing with the original vendee, if he retains any of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 780, 803; Dec. Dig. §§ 279, 285.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 285*)—RE-MEDIES OF VENDOR—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN—
TERMS OF SALE.

In prescribing terms of sale of a large body of land to satisfy a vendor's lien of nearly $233,000, the trial court does not abuse its discretion by requiring only $30,000 of the purchase money to be paid in cash and the balance in three equal installments in one, two, and three years, respectively, from the date of sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 804, 805; Dec. Dig. § 285.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 279*)—RE-MEDIES OF VENDOR—ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN—PARTIES.

In a suit to enforce a vendor's lien, a purchaser of the land on which the lien is at a tax sale is not a necessary party.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 238*)—OBJECTIONS IN LOWER COURT—ERROR IN DECREE.

Where a decree is entered against one of the defendants upon the bill taken for confessed, an appeal therefrom without application first made to the circuit court to correct any error therein will be dismissed.

Poffenbarger, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pocahontas County.

Bill in equity by Harry E. Clark and others against the Harpers Ferry Timber Company and others. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Appeal by defendant the Harpers Ferry Timber Company dismissed, and decree reversing cause remanded on appeal by W. O. Bond and another.

Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, L. M. McClintic, and Price, Osenton & Horan, for appellants Bond, Talbott & Hoover, for appellees.

Samuel T. Spears, for appellant Harpers Ferry Timber Co. Talbott & Hoover, for appellees Clark and others. Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for appellees Wm. O. Bond and others.

POFFENBARGER, J. The relation of the appellants, W. O. Bond and N. U. Bond, to the land and debt involved in this suit will appear from the facts stated in Bond v. Taylor, 68 W. Va. 317, 69 S. E. 1000. The Pocahontas Tanning Company assigned the unpaid purchase-money notes mentioned in the statement of that case to Harry E. Clark and John W. McCullough, partners, under the firm name of Clark & McCullough, and they brought this suit while that of Bond v. Taylor was pending to enforce the vendor's lien reserved to secure the payment of the notes, making their assignor, the Pocahontas Tanning Company, the Harpers Ferry Timber Company, W. C. Bond, N. U. Bond, W. S. Taylor, and the Durbin Lumber Company, a corporation, defendants. The Bonds appeared and answered the bill, claiming to be owners in common with Taylor of certain portions of the timber on the lands, as purchasers thereof from the Harpers Ferry Timber Company, and insisting that, in case a sale should be decreed to satisfy the lien of the plaintiffs, the land and timber not included in their purchase, should be first sold, and, if the proceeds thereof should be insufficient to pay the debt, then only so much of the timber they had purchased as should be necessary to cover any deficiency should be sold. The bill was taken for confessed as to the Pocahontas Tanning Company, W. S. Taylor, the Harpers Ferry Timber Company, and the Durbin Lumber Company, and the court pronounced a decree ascertaining that there was due the plaintiffs $232,770.86, including interest, and ordering the land, including the timber, sold, by special commissioners appointed for the purpose, in default of payment thereof within 30 days, on terms which are complained of, $30,000 in cash and the balance in three equal installments payable in one, two, and three years. As this decree disregards the alleged equitable right of the Bonds to have the land only first sold, they have appealed. Though the Harpers Ferry Timber Company made no appearance, it has also appealed.

[4] A motion made here to dismiss the appeal of the Harpers Ferry Timber Company will be sustained. As to it, the decree is one upon the bill taken for confessed. Hence, if it is erroneous in any way, an application should have been first made to the circuit court to correct the error. That is a condition precedent to the right to appeal from such a decree.

[1] The equitable claim of the Bonds, already stated, should have been sustained and provided for in the decree. They bought certain portions of the timber from the Harpers Ferry Timber Company, the vendee of the Pocahontas Tanning Company. At the time of their purchase both land and timber were subject to the vendor's lien for the enforcement of which this suit was instituted, but their contract of purchase did not provide for the payment of that debt in addition to the other consideration they agreed to pay. On that point the contract is clear and unequivocal. They agreed to take from the land and pay for enough timber each month to enable the Harpers Ferry Timber Company to meet its obligations to the Pocahontas Tanning Company on the purchase-money notes here involved, and also to provide and pay such sum each month, in the event of their failure to take off enough timber to equal it at the price agreed upon, $2.50 per thousand feet. The agreement recites that $4,000 had been paid, not to the Pocahontas Tanning Company, but to the Harpers Ferry Timber Company, and also that future payments should be made to the Harpers Ferry Timber Company. Hence, the Bonds and Taylor, the latter representing the firm in said tract, as it appears from the decision in Bond v. Taylor, already referred to, became purchasers of the timber, and did not assume the payment of the debt due from the Harpers Ferry Timber Company to the Pocahontas Tanning Company. They are in the same situation, therefore, as purchasers of a portion of mortgaged premises from the mortgagor, without assumption of the mortgage debt. In such case, the foreclosure decree should order a sale of the property in the inverse order of the alienations of the mortgagor, first subjecting to sale such portions of the property as he still owns. Gracey v. Myers, 15 W. Va. 194; Jones v. Myrick's Ex'rs, 49 Va. 179; Hinkle's Ex'r v. Allstadt, 4 Grat. 234; Wilcox v. Musche, 39 Mich. 101, 104; Huxley v. Rice, 40 Mich. 78-77; Jones, Mortg. § 1576; 9 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 411. This rule is equally applicable in the enforcement of vendor's liens. Litchfield v. Preston, 98 Va. 530; Whitten v. Saunders, 75 Va. 563; Boyce v. Stanton, 15 Lea (Tenn.) 346; Alabama v. Stanton, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 423; 29 Cyc. 792. The decree would be erroneous for another reason. As there are separate interests in the land considered as a whole, soil and timber, the sale should have been ordered by parcels so as to keep the proceeds of the several interests separate and render it possible to determine and conserve the rights of the parties respecting them. McCleary v. Grantham, 29 W. Va. 301, 11 S. E. 949; Bank v. Wilson, 25 W. Va. 242. This conclusion is not inconsistent with the principle of Hart v. Larkin, 66 W. Va. 227, 66 S. E. 331, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1027. It does not allow a creditor's debt to be postponed by subsequent acts of the debtor. Both land and timber are liable for the debt, and the creditor is entitled to a decree of sale now, but the method of sale must respect equitable rights of all persons interested in the property.

If any equitable right in the plaintiffs to sell the timber along with the land, treating both as one, or in the Harpers Ferry Company to have the timber sold first, could have been founded upon the expectation of the latter to pay the original purchase money out of the proceeds of the timber, such right was destroyed by the conduct of the Harpers Ferry Company in preventing the cutting of the timber by its collusion with Taylor in the effort to preclude the Bonds from any share in the timber. The decree in the cause of Bond v. Taylor, reciting the facts in that cause, was exhibited in this with the Bond answer, from which the failure of Taylor and the Bonds to comply with their contract with the Harpers Ferry Company, which would have enabled the latter to pay the Pocahontas Tanning Company, clearly appeared to have been caused in part by the Harpers Ferry Company.

In disposing of these questions, we have said enough to demonstrate the right of the Bonds to be heard in this cause. Though their purchase was subsequent to the vendor's lien, they were nevertheless interested in the subject-matter of the suit.

[2] A cross-assignment of error is based upon the terms of sale, prescribed by the decree, which requires only $30,000 of the purchase money, less than the interest on the debt, to be paid in cash, and the balance, over $200,000, in three equal installments, payable respectively, in one, two, and three years from the date of the sale. These terms are somewhat liberal to the purchaser, but the cash required to be paid is a considerable sum, and the deferred installments are not unreasonably postponed. The creditors will receive all their money with interest in a reasonable time, if the property sells for enough to cover the debt. Unable to see any abuse of the court's acknowledged discretion in the prescription of these terms, we overrule this assignment.

[3] Shortly before the institution of the suit, B. M. Hoover purchased all the land as delinquent for nonpayment of taxes. Showing this fact, the answer of the Bonds claimed he was a necessary party to the suit. In the final decree, his appearance is recited, but he filed no answer, and the bill was not amended by the addition of any allegation as to him. Upon this state of facts, the Bonds assign error in proceeding to a decree without such allegation. I think there was error for this reason, but my associates are of a different opinion, for the reason that Hoover's right was definite and certain, and all the other interested parties could protect their rights by redeeming.

For the reason stated, the decree will be reversed and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Pocahontas county, with direction to enter a decree, requiring a sale first of the land, excluding the timber thereon sold to Taylor and the Bonds, and, if the proceeds thereof shall be insufficient to pay the purchase money due the plaintiffs and their costs, then so much of the timber sold as aforesaid as shall be necessary to satisfy the balance of the purchase money lien and costs, and for further proceedings. Costs in this court will be decreed to W. C. Bond and N. U. Bond, the parties substantially prevailing here.

DEVENY et al. v. COOK et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. COSTS (§ 279*)—ERROR IN TAXATION—MOTION TO RETAX.

An execution on a judgment for costs will not be quashed because the taxation is erroneous. The error must be corrected by motion to retax the costs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 1068; Dec. Dig. § 279.*]

2. COSTS (§ 264*)—EXECUTION FOR COSTS—AMENDMENT.

The circuit court has no authority to amend an execution therein issued on a judgment for costs rendered by the Supreme Court of Appeals, if the proposed amendment involves a change in the taxation of the costs as certified from the appellate court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

3. COSTS (§ 216*)—TAXATION—JURISDICTION.

The jurisdiction to retax costs belongs to the court in which they are recovered and originally taxed. Proceedings to retax must as a general rule be heard before the court of which the clerk who taxed the costs is an officer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 823; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

4. COSTS (§ 264*)—COSTS ON APPEAL—TAXATION.

When for any reason there remains an undecided question regarding costs after decision on appeal, the court by which the judgment in relation to those costs was rendered is the court to determine it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Marion County.

Action by Thomas A. Deveny and others against James F. Cook and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

W. S. Meredith, Geo. M. Alexander, and Chas. Powell, for plaintiffs in error. Harry Shaw, for defendants in error.

ROBINSON, J. The circuit court overruled a motion to quash an execution and the plaintiffs in the motion have prosecuted this writ of error to reverse the order made in the premises.

The execution issued on a judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeals, which judgment is in the following words: " * * * and that the appellees * * * do pay to the appellants their costs about the prosecution of their appeal and supersedeas in this Court in this behalf expended." The mandate which certified this judgment to the circuit court was accompanied by a taxation of the costs incurred and recovered by the appellants, according to the usual practice in that regard. The execution on this judgment for costs properly issued in the circuit court, pursuant to the following statutory provision: "The court from which any case may have come to the supreme court of appeals, shall enter the decision of the appellate court as its own, and execution thereon may issue accordingly." Code 1906, c. 135, § 29. The execution called for the exact amount of the costs taxed in the Supreme Court of Appeals. It followed the mandate of the appellate court and the taxation which accompanied that mandate. That taxation had been made by the clerk of the Supreme Court of Appeals under the authority of this provision: "The clerk of the court wherein a party recovers costs shall tax the same." Code 1906, c. 138, § 12.

One item of the costs so taxed was the expense of the bond required to perfect the appeal and supersedeas. The bond was furnished the appellants by a surety company. The law allows the inclusion of the reasonable expense of a suit bond in the costs recovered by the party from whom such bond is required. Code 1906, c. 87, § 17a1. The parties against whom the execution issued, the appellees in the former proceeding, conceived that the sum taxed against them for the expense of the appeal bond was not warranted by the statute last cited, nor by the judgment on the appeal. As a remedy to prevent the collection of this item, they chose the motion to quash the execution which is now before us.

[1] The case does not call for a construction of the statute allowing as costs the expense of a suit bond. We need not say when and in what amount this expense may be included as costs. Let us assume that the complaining parties are right in their contention that the item in this case is unwarranted. A motion to quash totally the execution could not prevail merely because an improper or unwarranted item was included in the costs. There was unquestionably a valid judgment for costs. That judgment would support an execution for the proper amount. Some amount was proper. An execution on a valid judgment for costs cannot be quashed merely because of clerical irregularities in the amount. The proper course is to move for a correction in this particular. An erroneous taxation of costs furnishes no ground for quashing the writ. The error may be corrected on a motion to retax the costs. Freeman on Executions, § 78; Herman on Executions, § 404; 11 Cyc. 161, 162; 17 Cyc. 1155. There are many cases in point. "The refusal of courts to quash writs because of some irregularity therein and the directing amendments instead is based upon the ground that the irregularity has been of no injury to the moving party and that it is unjust to punish the plaintiff, and to deprive him of some right, because of an error of an officer in issuing the writ, to which the plaintiff did not contribute." Freeman on Executions, supra.

[2] Plaintiffs in the motion submit that the circuit court at the least should have amended the writ so as to exclude the item as to which objection is made. If the taxation had pertained to a judgment of the circuit court, such amendment could have been made by that court. On the motion to quash, the circuit court could have done what would have merely amounted to a re-taxation of costs recovered in that court. But did not the circuit court properly dismiss the motion to quash without amending the writ since the execution was in direct accord with the taxation made in the appellate court? Clearly so, we hold: The circuit court had no authority to do that which would retax the costs recovered in the Supreme Court of Appeals. It could only follow the mandate and taxation that came down to it. No statute gives it any other power. Surely an inferior court is warranted in honoring as correct and legal a taxation of costs made in a superior court wherein those costs are recovered.

[3] The jurisdiction to retax costs belongs to the court in which they are recovered and originally taxed. "Proceedings to retax must as a general rule be heard before the court of which the clerk who taxed the costs is an officer." 11 Cyc. 160. These complaining parties have a clear remedy by which to eliminate the item of expense for the bond, if it is not legal. They may apply to the Supreme Court of Appeals for a re-taxation of the costs. Armed with a re-taxation made by the appellate court and certified to the circuit court, they will be able readily to have the writ amended. No other course would be regular. The item for the expense of the bond, if taxable anywhere, is taxable in the Supreme Court of Appeals, for that item of costs was incurred in a suit or proceeding pending in that court. It was incurred there on an appeal and supersedeas. The bond pertains to the proceedings above. The expense of the bond was incurred by reason of the appellate proceedings. It must be taxed as costs thereof, for it can only be recovered as appellate costs. The fact that the bond is given and filed in the office of the clerk of the court below does not change the relation that this expense bears to the appellate proceedings. If we must permit the re-taxation of such an item in another court, then we must permit the re-taxation of all other items of appellate costs there. The costs due the clerk of the court of last resort, the expense of orders of publication made in that court at the capital, the expense of printing records, and many other appellate charges, may be called into question in distant parts of the state before tribunals which do not have on file the original proofs warranting those charges. Orderly and satisfactory procedure demands that the taxation of the costs of a suit be called into question in the court in which those costs were incurred.

[4] Other courts have dealt with the question which this case presents. An inferior appellate court in Missouri held: "A motion to retax costs will not be entertained where the costs have been taxed in accordance with the mandate of the supreme court." Ames v. Scudder, 20 Mo. App. 64. The Supreme Court of Louisiana denied that there was jurisdiction in the inferior court in relation to the amount of costs recovered above. State ex rel. Johnson v. Judges, 107 La. 69, 31 South. 645. One of the points held in that case may be fittingly quoted here: "The judgment is intended to embrace within its terms all questions regarding costs. If, for any reason, there remains an undecided question regarding the costs, after the decision has been rendered, and a question of interpretation or construction arises, the court by which the judgment was rendered, is the court of competent jurisdiction." The same rule is elsewhere expressed as follows: "If for any reason there remains an undecided question regarding costs after decision on appeal, the court by which the judgment is rendered is the court to determine it." 11 Cyc. 161.

The order overruling the motion to quash the execution is not erroneous. It will be affirmed.

WILLIAMS, J. (concurring). I concur in the decision for the reason that no motion to retax the costs had been made, and overruled. Assuming, for the sake of argument only, that the premium on the appeal bond was an improper taxation of costs by the clerk of this court, I do not believe there is any power in this court to correct such erroneous taxation after the mandate has been certified to the court below. Jurisdiction over the case has then passed from this court. If the clerk's taxation of costs, made pursuant to a judgment of this court carrying costs, becomes a part of the judgment itself, it cannot be corrected here or in any other court after it has become final. Beecher v. Foster, 66 W. Va. 453, 66 S. E. 643; Johnson v. Gould, 62 W. Va. 599, 59 S. E. 611; and Henry v. Davis, 13 W. Va. 230. On the other hand, if the taxation is not a part of the judgment itself, it is the ministerial act of the clerk and may be corrected on motion, after due notice, in the court from which the execution issued. This court has no power to enforce its judgments, on appeals, by execution. Its judgments and decrees become, in effect, judgments and decrees of the lower court, and are enforced by execution thereon as if there had been no appeal. Code 1906, c. 135, § 29. The majority opinion would establish a rule requiring the execution debtor to apply, in the first place, to this court for a retaxation of the costs, and then return to the lower court to have the execution corrected accordingly. To my mind this appears to be an unnecessarily circuitous performance, and in cases where the judgments of this court had become final, which is generally the case even before the taxation of costs has been made by the clerk of this court, would amount to a denial of relief. Our statute, in respect to the effect to be given to the judgments and decrees of this court, on appeals, is peculiar. For this reason the text cited from Cyc. is inapplicable here. By reference to the decisions which the author cites in support of the text, I find that those of them that present conditions which are at all analogous to the case we are deciding, are from states wherein the appellate courts are vested with the power by statutes to enforce their own judgments and decrees. In the Louisiana case, cited by Judge ROBINSON, that court, in its opinion, says: "It is Code law that primarily the inferior, and by appeal the appellate, court shall determine the manner of the execution of the judgments which they have rendered, when the proper manner of executing them is to be determined." The subject of costs is purely statutory, and there are no common-law precedents for the procedure in relation thereto. We should establish a rule in conformity with our own statute and in aid of justice. It is consistent with both justice and reason that the lower court should be allowed to entertain a motion to correct a taxation of costs made by the clerk of this court, as preliminary to passing upon the validity of an execution issued by the lower court, when the taxation of costs was not specifically directed by the order of this court.

DEMAIN v. HUSTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 327*)—ACTION FOR DISSOLUTION—PLEADING—REPLY.

An answer to a bill for dissolution of a copartnership, claiming a larger share in the firm than the bill admits, not merely a large value of an admitted share, is in substance and effect a cross-bill, to which a special reply may properly be filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 774; Dec. Dig. § 327.*]

2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 76*)—SHARE IN PROFITS—PRESUMPTIONS.

Persons entering into a copartnership relation without an agreement as to their respective interests in the firm are presumptively equal partners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 124; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 53*)—EXISTENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Omission of the name of one of the members of a firm from affidavits made and deeds executed and accepted by other members thereof, purporting to name all the members, do not as evidence prevail over constant and uniform recognition in other respects of the membership of the omitted person, on an issue as to whether he is a member and the extent of his interest.

Robinson, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monongalia County.

Bill in equity by Robert Henry Demain against Chauncey W. Huston and others. From a decree for complainant, defendants appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part and remanded.

Donley & Hatfield and Wm. S. John, for appellants. Moreland, Moreland & Guy and Cox & Baker, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. In this suit to determine the rights of the members of a copartnership, settle the accounts and dissolve it, brought by Robert Henry Demain, what interests or shares he and the other members have is the important question. Claiming a one half interest and conceding the other half to Chauncey W. Huston, he brought the suit against him alone. After the entry by agreement of an order of reference, Huston filed an answer, asserting membership of his father, Samuel P. Huston, in the firm and ownership of a one-third interest therein on the part of his father and another third on the part of himself, and conceding the remaining third to the plaintiff. A general and special replication was filed to this answer. At or about the same time Demain filed an amended bill to which Samuel P. Huston was made a party, and in which he still claimed a one-half interest, conceding that originally the firm had consisted of himself and Samuel P. Huston, and that subsequently Chauncey W. Huston had been admitted into it, but denying any abatement of his own half interest on the admission of Chauncey W. Huston. The matter contained in this amended bill is substantially the same as that set forth in the special replication. To this bill, the two defendants filed a joint and separate answer. This was also replied to generally and specially. In these pleadings the entire history of the transactions of the parties is set forth, and the issue already stated raised, upon which a considerable amount of evidence was taken and filed, and the court entered a decree, declaring Demain entitled to a one-half interest and the two defendants to a one-fourth interest each. From it the latter have appealed.

[1] The overruling of motions to strike out the special replications to the answers is assigned as error upon the theory that the answers are not in effect cross-bills, praying affirmative relief. As they assert a larger interest in the firm on the part of the defendants than the bills admit, we are of the opinion that they are, in effect, cross-bills in so far as they claim such larger interests and aver facts in support of the claim. We are not unmindful of the general rule that, in the settlement of partnership accounts, the rights of the parties may be adjusted and settled on the allegations of the bill, but ordinarily there is no controversy as to the interests of the parties. Here the bill does not admit certain averments of fact upon which the defendants found their claims. On the contrary, it denies their claim to two-thirds of the assets, after the payment of debts, and the allegations upon which that claim rests. The answers demand something the bill does not admit. It stands upon the averments of the answer, and not upon the allegations of the bill. Hence, we think the case is not within the general rule and the special replications were necessary.

Review of the decree complained of necessitates consideration of the following material facts: About the year 1879 a copartnership was formed by Samuel P. Huston and Robert H. Demain for the purpose of doing business as carpenters and builders, and continued until about March 1, 1888. The business of the firm was neither heavy nor extensive. It consisted largely of work charged and paid for by the day and the cost of materials furnished by them, and the income and profits were, for the most part, divided equally between the members as collections were made. There was, however, an accumulation of some firm property. They had a shop and some small pieces of real estate. According to the testimony of the two defendants, Chauncey W. Huston, the son of Samuel P. Huston, was taken into the firm on the 1st day of March, 1888. Demain is not positive as to the date. He says it was about 1888-90 or 91, or within a year or two of 1890. As to the terms on which he was taken in there is controversy; he and his father testifying positively to an express agreement that the three members of the firm were to have equal interests, and Demain denying such an agreement, and saying he admitted the son at the request of the father, without making any agreement with either of them as to what interest he should have. His theory seems to be that Samuel P. Huston took his son into the firm upon some agreement between them of which he had no knowledge. An expression used by Samuel P. Huston in his testimony is relied upon as an admission of an agreement in accord with the theory of the decree, but, reading it in connection with its context, we do not so interpret it. In other places he swears positively to an agreement to a copartnership with equal third interests. The new firm has never been dissolved, but it has done very little business, if any, since about the year 1903. On the admission of the new member, they did a larger business, taking contracts for buildings and structures of various kinds, and the firm prospered. Chauncey W. Huston had sole charge of the books, contracts, collections, and bank accounts, and seems to have made all important estimates, purchased materials, and superintended the business generally. Some of the earnings of the firm were invested in real estate which rapidly grew in value, and yielded considerable profits. Demain had the outside management of the structural work, such as getting materials upon the grounds and superintending the employees in their work. Samuel P. Huston worked in their carpenter shop and in the mills from which they procured finished lumber and materials. He had practically nothing to do with the general management of the business, and his name was dropped out of its documentary and contractual business transactions with third parties. Mechanic's liens were taken in which the affidavits to the accounts, made by Chauncey W. Huston, stated the firm consisted of himself and Robert Henry Demain. On one occasion he made an affidavit for a continuance in an action against the firm in which he stated it consisted of himself and Demain. Some deeds for real estate were made to him and Demain as constituting the firm, and others were executed by himself and Demain as the only members of the firm. The record shows one deed executed by all three, describing themselves as partners. Demain and Chauncey W. Huston seem to have been severally engaged in real estate speculations on their individual accounts as well as in the firm name, and to have drawn considerable sums of money from the firm for that and other purposes. Samuel P. Huston, less active and energetic, seems to have required and drawn much smaller amounts, only about $300 a year, according to the testimony of the son. The record does not disclose in detail nor approximately how much any of them drew from the firm. The books, though demanded by Demain, have not been produced, and the record shows no application for any order from the court to compel him to produce them.

[3] The circuit court rightly found, upon uncontradicted facts disclosed by the evidence, that the firm consisted of three members. Samuel P. Huston was an original member, and did not wholly cease from active participation in the business. He was an equal owner with Demain in such property as the firm had at the time of the admission of his son. He afterwards contributed labor with the knowledge and consent of the other members of the firm, and drew money from it. Recognition of his membership was wholly undisputed and uniform during the whole period of the actual business career of the firm. That his name was dropped out of its transactions with third persons is neither conclusive against him, nor very significant. Setzer v. Beale, 19 W. Va. 274. Though an actual contract or agreement of copartnership among the members of the firm is essential to the existence of the relation, it need not be in any particular form. It may be verbal as well as written and inferred from conduct when not expressed in terms. Setzer v. Beale, cited. The omission of Samuel P. Huston's name by his copartners from affidavits, deeds, and other documents is not sufficient to overcome the force and effect of the acts and conduct of the parties in relation to their business. Setzer v. Beale, cited.

[2] After the admission of Chauncey W. Huston into the firm, it consisted of three members, and, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, they were presumptively equal partners. Williamson & Co. v. Nigh, 58 W. Va. 629, 53 S. E. 124; Clark v. Emery, 58 W. Va. 637, 52 S. E. 770, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 503; Berry v. Colborn, 65 W. Va. 493, 64 S. E. 636, 17 Ann. Cas. 1018. In our opinion the evidence does not overthrow this presumption. There was either no agreement as to the relative interests of the partners or there was an agreement for equal interests, if we are governed by the testimony of the parties as to what took place at the inception of the copartnership relation, and each of these theories conforms to the presumption. Most of the other evidence relied upon by the appellee tends to prove the firm consisted of only two members, a theory it does not suffice to establish. Moreover, this is not consistent, for we find one deed in which all three of the parties united, describing themselves as partners, constituting the firm of Huston & Demain. The proceeds of sale of one piece of firm real estate were equally divided between Chauncey W. Huston and Demain, but this transaction is not shown to have been part of a settlement of the firm accounts or distribution of profits. It is perfectly consistent with the theory of drafts by these members upon the firm assets, and there is evidence tending to show Demain needed at the time just about the amount he so received. All agree that there never has been a settlement or formal distribution of profits among them. The principal facts and circumstances are in agreement with the legal presumption. Chauncey W. Huston seems to have been the most important and valuable man in the firm. He alone had the capacity to keep the books and make estimates for large contracts. Demain had charge of the outside work as he had formerly had it. Samuel P. Huston continued in charge of the shop and millwork. The duties and services of the two old members of the firm were in the new firm about what they had been in the old, when no bookkeeping or estimating of any consequence was necessary. Young Huston came in and performed duties for the new firm essential to its augmented business and larger undertakings, which had not previously been done, and which neither of the original members had the capacity to do. It is hardly conceivable that this man of far greater business capacity than Demain should give the firm 15 years of his services with the expectation of realizing only half as much as Demain, or that his father gave that period of service for his "board and clothes," and these to be a charge upon his son's interest and reduce it below Demain's.

The order of reference entered by consent on the original bill, in advance of the filing of the answer thereto, was not an irrevocable adjudication of the rights of the parties, if any at all. It does not expressly declare or even recite their respective interests, and any implication arising from the reference is overcome by express reservation of leave to answer and make full defense. Again, the decree was rendered in the absence of a necessary party.

Though we always hold in highest esteem the opinion of the learned judge who rendered the decision, we are unable to adopt his conclusion, and must reverse the decree, in so far as it determines the interests of the parties, and here adjudge, order, and decree that Robert Henry Demain, Samuel P. Huston, and Chauncey W. Huston constitute the firm of Huston & Demain, and have equal interests therein, one-third each. In all other respects the decree will be affirmed, and the cause remanded.

BASSFORD v. PITTSBURGH, C., C. & ST. L. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Feb. 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

RAILROADS (§ 330*)—INJURY AT CROSSING — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

It is negligence for a pedestrian at a crossing to step in front of an approaching train when the train is in full view and so near that no prudent man would undertake to cross, notwithstanding those in charge of the train may be negligent in running at an excessive speed or in failing to give signals. No recovery can be had for injury received under such circumstances.

Error to Circuit Court, Brooke County.

Action by Crawford Bassford, administrator, against the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. O. Hertzler and J. C. Palmer, for plaintiff in error. J. B. Sommerville, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. Plaintiff's decedent was killed by a train of the defendant company at a railroad crossing on one of the streets in Wellsburg. The action is for the recovery of damages on the ground of alleged negligence in running the train so as to cause the loss of life. At the trial, the court sustained defendant's motion to exclude the evidence offered by plaintiff, as being insufficient to maintain the issue on his part, and directed a verdict for defendant. Plaintiff insists that the evidence introduced by him warranted the submission of the case to the jury. He seeks a reversal and a new trial.

There is no error. The case is ruled by principles enunciated in Riedel v. Traction Co., 63 W. Va. 522, 61 S. E. 821, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1123. The evidence was properly excluded. It proved that plaintiff's decedent came to his death by his own contributory negligence. Two minds cannot reach different conclusions on the facts proved in this particular. The act of the unfortunate young man in stepping on the track at one side of the crossing when the engine was already at the other side of the crossing was unquestionably contributory negligence. He could have seen the train if he had looked before stepping on the track. There was nothing to obstruct his full view of the train as he approached the track. His faculties of sense were good. Others, from positions no better than his, saw the train approaching. Its bright headlight was clearly discernible. The evidence is conclusive that he either failed to look or assumed a deadly risk in attempting to cross the track in front of the train. There is no conflict of evidence in this regard. Decedent negligently attempted to cross the track when the train in plain view was so near him that no prudent man would have taken the risk. If the jury had found a verdict for plaintiff, it would have been the duty of the court to set aside the same.

That those in charge of the train may have been negligent in running the train at an excessive rate of speed, or in failing to give signals, does not alter the case. No one is excusable for stepping in front of a train, though it is negligently run, when it is only a few feet away and he can plainly see it. He assumes the risk when he does. It is his duty to look and to exercise the prudence which the situation demands. Before crossing a railroad track a person should look both ways and listen for an approaching train. This duty he must perform whenever its performance is reasonably certain to avail. Generally, diversion of attention does not excuse the performance of the duty; nor does misconduct on the part of the railway company excuse that performance. Patterson on Railway Accident Law, § 179; Beach on Contributory Negligence, §§ 180, 181.

Let the judgment be affirmed.

MILLS et al. v. McLANAHAN et al.(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 6, 1912.)(Syllabus by the Court.)1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121)—PROCEEDINGS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

A case in which the evidence is sufficient to establish the loss, and the contents of a title bond, entitling plaintiffs to specific execution thereof.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 22*)—REQUISITES AND VALIDITY OF CONTRACT—DEFINITENESS.

The practical location of land sold by title bond, by survey and plat thereof, directed by the vendor or his authorized agent, and possession by the vendee in accordance with such survey and plat, will, as a general rule, be sufficient to give the requisite definiteness to a contract, though it may be otherwise defective.

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*)—PROCEEDINGS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a suit for specific performance of a contract by an administrator to sell land, a plat and survey ordered by the administrator in 1874 is not rendered inadmissible by proof that his successor had been appointed by the circuit court in 1867; the circuit court having had no probate jurisdiction at that date, and it being shown that the administrator who entered into the contract of sale acted as the agent of his successor in ordering the plat and survey, and the successor being bound by the act of his predecessor in making the contract.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Suit by J. B. Mills and others against Johnston McLanahan and another. From a decree for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. W. Smith, for appellants. Hale & Pendleton and Sanders & Crockett, for appellees.

MILLER, J. In the decree appealed from, the court below decreed that plaintiffs and other heirs at law of Robert Mills, deceased, were entitled to specific execution of the contract of sale of the one thousand acres of land proven to have been made in 1866, by John B. Dunlap, administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Robert McCulloch, deceased, to said Robert Mills, and particularly described in the decree, by metes and bounds, according to a plat and survey thereof, made by Stinson, surveyor, in 1874, filed in the cause. And being of opinion that the defense of innocent purchasers set up by said defendants, Johnston McLanahan, as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, of said Robert McCulloch, deceased, and in his own right, and by Ephemia P., Marcia P., and Emma P. Moore, in their own right and as trustees, and by Robert M. Henderson, trustee, was not sustained, and that they held the legal title to said land for the benefit of the heirs at law of said Robert Mills, and that the purchase money for said land had been fully paid, and that said heirs at law were entitled to have said land conveyed to them, the court further decreed that the said defendants as individuals and fiduciaries aforesaid, do within thirty days from the date of the decree, by apt and proper deed with covenants of special warranty of title, convey the said one thousand acres to said children and heirs at law of Robert Mills, deceased, to be held by them in such interests and proportions as the law prescribes, and deposit the same in the clerk's office of the court, and upon default thereof that the commissioner thereby appointed convey the same to them as therein directed.

Many points are raised and elaborated in the briefs and arguments of counsel; but after careful consideration thereof, and a review of the pleadings and proofs we conclude that but four questions are fairly presented, and that a proper response to these will substantially dispose of all the errors assigned and relied on by appellants.

[1] The first is, was there in fact such a contract as is alleged, describing the land sold, sufficiently accurate for identification, and as entitles plaintiffs to specific execution thereof? Though denied in the answer no serious question of the authority of Dunlap, administrator, to make the contract, is presented. The will of Robert McCulloch proven in the cause fully authorized his executor to sell and convey a tract of 35,500 acres of which the land in controversy is a part. Defendants themselves purchased from Dunlap's successor, and the title of both parties goes back to a common source.

The immediate parties to the contract are and were at the date of the suit both deceased; but the existence of a contract between them is proven by reference to it in the original receipt given by Dunlap to Mills, December 5, 1866, for four hundred dollars, reciting it as the first "payment upon a tract of land sold said Mills out of the McCulloch tract of 35,500 acres lying in the County of Mercer," and further reciting that "said tract sold is to contain one thousand acres and to be run in accordance with a contract in writing held by said Mills, executed some time in the year 1866." Besides this receipt, its existence and contents are proven with more or less accuracy, by four or five living witnesses, who saw the contract and either read it or hear it read, three of them wholly disinterested, including French, the attorney in whose hands it was placed for suit some time between 1876 and 1897, time not more definitely fixed, and by whom it was lost, Foley, for many years a nearby neighbor, and Stinson, the surveyor, employed by Dunlap in 1874 to survey out and plat the thousand acres called for in the contract. While these witnesses do not exactly agree in all the details they substantially agree as to the terms of the contract, and prove the same with such substantial and sufficient certainty as to call for its specific execution. The oral testimony as to the description of the land called for in the contract is sufficiently definite; besides the survey of the land by Stinson, surveyor, in 1874, by the direction of Dunlap, which is definite and accurate, fully identified the land surveyed on the ground, and if competent, fully identifies the land intended to be sold, and nothing more is required. This plat and survey was procured with a view to making a deed to the heirs of Mills. And Stinson proves the acknowledgment by Dunlap, at the time he employed him to make the survey, that all the purchase money had been paid by Mills.

[2] Are the plat and survey made by Stinson, objected to, legal and competent evidence? Appellants contend they are not. The evidence of Stinson is that he delivered this plat and survey to Douglass, Dunlap's attorney; and they were by some one turned over to Mrs. Mills, or the heirs of Robert Mills, and were produced by them in evidence. They claim to have held possession under and according to contract, and this plat and survey, continuously ever since. High authority is found holding that "a practical location of the premises intended pursuant to the agreement is, in many cases, sufficient to give the requisite definiteness to a contract otherwise defective," and that "it will, as a rule, be held sufficient if the property intended to be conveyed can be identified by evidence properly admissible." 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 36, citing Dewey v. Spring Valley Land Co., 98 Wis. 83, 73 N. W. 565, and Lundgreen v. Stratton, 73 Wis. 659, 41 N. W. 1012. In Norman v. Bennett, 32 W. Va. 614, 9 S. E. 914, the land sold was, by direction of an agent, run off and platted by a surveyor, and this court observes: "It must be presumed, that this land was run off to said James J. Norman by Marshall about the time the agreement was made, and Norman took possession of the land then pointed out and designated by Bennett through his agent, Marshall, and after said tract of land was so laid off and accepted by James J. Norman, the survey became a part of the contract, and Norman could not claim beyond its limits."

[3] But are the plat and survey otherwise legal and competent evidence? An objection to them is that at the time Dunlap, administrator, in 1874, is proven to have ordered the survey, his powers and authority had been revoked, and his successor appointed by the Circuit Court in 1867. Three answers are replied to this proposition: First, that Dunlap's appointment was by the Recorder of the County, and that as the law then was, the Circuit Court had no probate jurisdiction; and no authority to revoke or annul letters of administration; second, that if the authority of Dunlap was legally revoked and a successor legally appointed, he continued as the agent of his successors, and claimed to have authority in the premises, and is proven by defendants by competent evidence to have been in fact the agent of McClellan, administrator, his successor, in 1874, the same year he employed Stinson to make the survey and plat of the Mills land, and that he so acted and was recognized as his agent. Strengthening the claim of agency the record shows that Dunlap became and was surety on the fiduciary bond of McClellan, his successor, appointed in 1867; third, that the successor of Dunlap, administrator, was bound by the acts of the latter while exercising his fiduciary office, and was bound to carry out and fulfill his contracts of sale, and that having through Dunlap as agent run out and platted the land he and his successors are bound for fulfillment of the contract of sale.

Much is said and many authorities cited in support of these propositions, but as we think the agency of Dunlap and his authority to have ordered and directed the survey and plat of Stinson fully established, no other reason for holding the survey and plat legal and competent evidence need be given, and we will not go into the other questions presented. Norman v. Bennett, supra, we regard authority for the admissibility and competency of the survey and plat of Stinson. So we are of opinion that the contract, and its contents, have been sufficiently established and the land sold so definitely located as to entitle plaintiffs to specific execution so far as these facts have to do with the question.

[3] The next question is, has it been clearly proven that the purchase money was all paid? We think it has. The court below so found, and we can not say its finding is wrong. There are slight discrepancies in the evidence of the witnesses as to the amount of the purchase money, but none as to the fact of payment. The bill alleges, one thousand dollars as the amount of the purchase money, and that four hundred dollars thereof, evidenced by the receipt of Dunlap, administrator, had been paid; but plaintiffs were not fully advised whether the residue had been paid or not, but if not they stood ready to pay the balance, and proffered the same into court. An amended bill alleged discovery since suit brought that the entire sum had been paid, and charged the fact to be as discovered. French, the attorney who lost the contract or title bond, swears that the consideration recited in the contract was one thousand dollars, and that receipt of six hundred dollars thereof was acknowledged therein. This statement, however, is not entirely in harmony with the language of the receipt of December 5, 1866, which, as already indicated, describes the four hundred dollars paid, as the first payment; however, we have the positive evidence of Stinson, the surveyor, that Dunlap, administrator or agent, as he may be regarded, admitted to him in 1874, at the time the survey was made that the purchase money had all been paid. We regard this admission as administrator or agent, under all the facts and circumstances, legal and competent evidence. It is not likely that Mills would have paid four hundred dollars, and not paid the balance. At least defendants offer no evidence in rebuttal of the evidence of plaintiffs and we think the fact must be regarded as fully established. Moreover, the law is, that after twenty years, there is a presumption of payment. Roush v. Griffith, 65 W. Va. 752, 65 S. E. 168; Seymour v. Alkire, 47 W. Va. 302, 34 S. E. 953; Calwell v. Prindle, 19 W. Va. 604, 640.

[4] The third question is, were Moore and McLanahan innocent purchasers without notice of plaintiffs rights? It is conceded that none of the papers under which plaintiffs claim were ever recorded so as to give constructive notice to subsequent purchasers. Plaintiffs rely solely on actual notice imputed to McLanahan, administrator, etc., of McCulloch, as the successor of Dunlap, and upon the fact of actual possession begun by their father Robert Mills, and by his tenants, and after his decease in 1870-72, continued by his heirs and tenants down to the date of this suit. McLanahan deeded to Moore, July 24, 1884, according to the recitals in the deed, "the whole of the unsold land," describing it by metes and bounds, as "being the rest and residue of the tract of land belonging to the estate of Robert McCulloch, deceased." Notwithstanding these recitals in the deed, it is conceded, that the boundary described is inclusive of the thousand acres claimed by the plaintiffs, and if the defendants are innocent purchasers without notice, as they claim, they would be entitled to the land, as covered by the deed to Moore under which they claim. McLanahan, who conveyed to Moore as administrator, acquired a one half undivided interest in the tract conveyed, by deed from Moore of March 13, 1897, and it is claimed by plaintiffs that conceding Moore to have been an innocent purchaser, McLanahan, as purchaser from him, would not be protected as an innocent purchaser, with notice of their rights imputed to him, as administrator, selling and conveying the land to Moore, in 1884. But if both Moore and McLanahan were charged with notice of the plaintiffs rights by their actual possession and occupancy of the land, as is claimed, we need not trouble ourselves about the relative rights of Moore and McLanahan, due to the notice imputed to McLanahan, as administrator, successor to Dunlap.

The crucial question then is, did Robert Mills, his heirs and tenants under him, in 1884, have and hold such possession, under the contract from Dunlap, as to put the purchasers on notice of their equitable rights? The court below by its decree found that they did. After a careful review of the evidence, without taking time to recite it in detail, our conclusion is, that actual possession and occupancy of the land, first by Robert Mills and by his tenants, continued during his life, and after his decease by his son Hugh G. Mills, Jesse Monk and others. The evidence clearly establishes the fact, that there were some six several improvements upon the tract as surveyed by Stinson, designated in the record, as "Snead Place," "Clark Place," "Halstead Place," "Little John Snead Place," "Dock White Place," and "Hubbel Place." These were all occupied continuously, either actually or by cultivation and improvements, by Mills or his sons or other tenants, down to the time of the institution of this suit. One of the contentions of the appellants is, that as the evidence shows, Robert Mills, prior to his purchase of the land, in 1866, had bought out some squatter rights, and had previously occupied the land by himself or his sons, that had previously been in possession of these squatters, he cannot be said to have taken possession under his contract with Dunlap, or to have held possession by virtue thereof. We see no merit in this position. Though Mills may have purchased squatter rights, after he bought the land from Dunlap, administrator of McCulloch, thereby recognizing the superior rights of his vendor, he must in law be regarded as having taken and as holding possession under him. According to the evidence, most, if not all of these different places or improvements were much improved by the erection of buildings, planting of orchards, clearing and cultivation, by Mills and his heirs and tenants. They were certainly sufficient to put purchasers on notice of the rights of the occupants.

McLanahan professes to have gone over the land on several occasions before his sale to Moore, in 1884. Moore does not profess to have been upon the land, indeed his deposition does not seem to have been taken in the cause. The deed to him shows him to have been a resident of Pennsylvania. If either Moore or McLanahan had gone upon the land and made inquiry of Hugh G. Mills, Jesse Monk, or of any of the other occupants of the land, such inquiries would undoubtedly have led to a full disclosure of the rights under which this land was occupied, by Mills, his heirs and tenants. The law not only imposes the duty upon a purchaser to make such investigation, but imputes to him notice of all facts which such inquiry would have disclosed, and of all the rights of those in possession, depriving him of the defense of an innocent purchaser. Frame v. Frame, 32 W. Va. 463, 9 S. E. 901, 5 L. R. A. 323; Ellison v. Torpin, 44 W. Va. 414, 436, 440, 442, 30 S. E. 183; Weekly v. Hardesty, 48 W. Va. 39, 44, 35 S. E. 880; Marshall v. Hall, 51 W. Va. 569, 577, 578, 580, 42 S. E. 641; Nutter v. Brown, 51 W. Va. 603, 42 S. E. 661, and other cases, digested in 13 Cyc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Reports, 598.

[5] The fourth and last question is, are plaintiffs barred by laches, or lapse of time. Our decisions say no. They hold that the defense of laches will not avail a defendant in a suit for specific performance of a contract, where the vendee, his heirs or assigns, are in possession, acquired under the contract, though many years may have elapsed between the date of the contract and the time of the suit for specific performance. The following authorities affirm the proposition, as well as illustrate its application: Marling v. Marling, 9 W. Va. 79, 99, 27 Am. Rep. 535; Abbott v. L'Homedieu, 10 W. Va. 678, 711, 712; Steenrod v. Railroad Co., 27 W. Va. 1; Norman v. Bennett, supra; Weekly v. Hardesty, supra; Nutter v. Brown, supra; Ratliff v. Sommers, 55 W. Va. 30, 44, 46 S. E. 712, 1 Ann. Cas. 970; 2 Minor's Inst. (4th Ed.) 892, 893; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 125; 2 Lomax Dig. 103; Fry on Specific Performance, 530, 531; 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 498, 516, 523; Simmons Creek Coal Co. v. Doran, 142 U. S. 417, 12 Sup. Ct. 239, 35 L. Ed. 1063; Ruckman v. Cory, 129 U. S. 387, 9 Sup. Ct. 316, 32 L. Ed. 728.

Perceiving no error in the decree we must affirm it, with costs to the appellees incurred in this court.

(70 W. Va. 296)

ARNETT et al. v. FAIRMONT TRUST CO.
et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. CHARITIES (§ 22*)—BEQUESTS—INDEFINITENESS.

Bequests by a testatrix, one of $40,000, to trustees named, "to be placed and used to the very best of said parties knowledge in helping the poor those who are deserving, in lifting young men up and helping the work along in putting down intoxicants drinks and saving souls. Let this money be used in the way God may direct for His cause;" the other of "$10,000 to be placed in the Baptist Church to be used for Lord's work in the way he may direct," are void for uncertainty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Charities, Cent. Dig. §§ 51-56; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

2. WILLS (§ 512*)—CONSTRUCTION—RESIDUARY DEVISE.

The residuary clause of the will of the testatrix, containing said void bequests, is: "If any money left after distribution let it be returned to the estate of C. W. Arnett." The money bequeathed by the testatrix had all been derived by her through the executor of the will of her husband, C. W. Arnett, by her act of renunciation. Under the proof, said residuary clause is valid, and by proper construction means: If any money is left, after distribution, let it be returned to the executor of the will of C. W. Arnett, deceased, and go and be distributed as a part of his estate and as directed by his will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1074, 1075; Dec. Dig. § 512.*]

Robinson and Williams, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.

Bill by Glenn J. Arnett and others against the Fairmont Trust Company and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

George M. Alexander and Charles Powell, for appellants. W. S. Meredith, for appellees Arnett. William S. Haymond, for appellees Ogden and others.

MILLER, J. On July 8, 1907, Mrs. C. W. Arnett, by an instrument, wholly in her own handwriting, undertook to make a testamentary disposition of her property, as follows:

"Should I not live I place in the hands of my two brothers, Dr.'s W. C. Jamison and J. A. Jamison and Rev. W. J. Eddy the sum of $40,000 dollars (or if one or more of said parties should not be living that the Trust Company select two Christian men in place of absent one) to be placed and used to the very best of said parties knowledge in helping the poor those who are deserving, in lifting young men up and helping the work along in putting down intoxicants drinks and saving souls. Let this money be used in the way God may direct for His cause.

"To my sister Lou John I give $3,000 my brother Pierce L. Jamison $1,000 my sister Ellen Fear $2,000 my brother David Lee Jamison $1,000 $1,000 to Mrs. Rie Arnett. Let her use all that may be needed to make her daughter Ora comfortable.

"$3,000 I put into the hands of my brother, Doctor W. C. Jamison or should he not be living let the Trust Company select a true competent man. the money to be used for my son Glenn J. Arnett if at any time he may be in need of help but in no way or at any time to be instrumental the use of said money in causing him to do wrong. But should he prove worthy, and live right let the money be used in helping him in business or in any way right.

"$50.00/00 fifty dollars I place for an office desk my son Glenn J. Arnett.

"$125.00/00 for the best Type writer.

"$1,000 to be used in buying a home for Miss Dora Bell Arnett and to make her comfortable.

"$10,000 to be placed in the Baptist Church to be used for Lord's work in the way he may direct.

"If any money left after distribution let it be return to the estate of C. W. Arnett."

The plaintiff, Glenn J. Arnett, son of the testatrix, and for whom provision is made in the will, charges in his bill that the purported bequests, of $40,000 in the first clause, and of $10,000 to the Baptist Church, in the next to the last clause, as well as the last or residuary clause, providing, that "If any money left after distribution let it be return to the estate of C. W. Arnett," are each wholly void for uncertainty. He professes his willingness, however, that the Baptist Church, to whom $10,000 is given, should be paid, not the full amount, but a ratable proportion of the net amount of the estate, alleging that the estate is not sufficient to pay all bequests in full.

It is charged, among other things, that as to said $40,000, and $10,000 bequests, the testatrix died intestate, and that plaintiff as her sole heir at law is entitled to the whole amount thereof.

The Fairmont Trust Company, administrator with the will annexed of the estate of said testatrix, and as executor of the estate of C. W. Arnett, deceased, with others, is made a defendant. An injunction is prayed for restraining the payment of said legacy of $40,000; and there is also a prayer for an accounting; for a decree for the money found due plaintiff on settlement, and for general relief.

We think the bill is good on demurrer, and that the demurrer was properly overruled.

The Fairmont Trust Company in its answer, as administrator with the will annexed of said testatrix, admits that the two bequests of $40,000 and $10,000 respectively, and the last or residuary clause, are all very indefinite, and that it is unable to administer the estate without a construction of the will, and the advice of the court. In its answer and cross bill, as executor of the will of said Calvin W. Arnett, deceased, said company admits and charges the invalidity of the bequests, $40,000 and $10,000, and prays that they be so declared. But it denies that the last or residuary clause is invalid; on the contrary it charges the same to be legal and valid, and competent to carry the whole of the estate of said testatrix, not legally disposed of by her will, back into the estate of said testator, from which it was derived by her, by her act in renouncing his will, and it prays for that relief.

On this appeal, by Marguerite Wilcox (late Arnett) and by the Fairmont Trust Company, in both its fiduciary capacities, two questions are presented, first, whether the court below erred in its final decree, in adjudging on bill and cross bills, the bequests of $40,000 and of $10,000 respectively, to be void; second, whether the court erred in decreeing also said last or residuary clause to be also void for uncertainty.

[1] Clearly the two bequests of $40,000 and $10,000 are void for uncertainty. This is practically conceded. The main contention is as to the last or so called residuary clause. Is it also void, or is it competent to carry the money covered by the invalid bequests back into the estate of C. W. Arnett? Section 13, chapter 77, Code 1906, relating to wills provides: "Unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will, such real estate or interest therein as shall be comprised in any devise in such will, which shall fail or be void, or otherwise incapable of taking effect, shall be included in the residuary devise (if any) contained in such will; and if there be no residuary devise therein, such real estate or interest shall go to the heirs-at-law of the testator, as if he had died intestate."

The clause in question is in form clearly a residuary clause, but if it be also void for uncertainty, as it is claimed it is, and as the court below decreed, there is no error in the decree; otherwise there is, and for which it must be reversed. The language is: "If any money left after distribution let it be return to the estate of C. W. Arnett."

It is evident from the language used, that to sustain the clause as a valid disposition of property, we must be able, under recognized rules of construction, to interpret the words "estate of C. W. Arnett," as definitely referring to the executor of the will of C. W. Arnett, deceased, and also to interpolate after them these words, or their equivalent, "to be taken, held and administered as a part of his estate and according to the terms and provisions of his will." If the intention of the testator be clear, well recognized rules of construction permit courts to supply and interpolate words, and even to fix the sense of ambiguous words. It is well settled, that in the disposition of property by will, the subject and object of a devise or bequest must be definite and certain. 4 Minor, Inst. 96; Pack v. Shanklin, 43 W. Va. 304, 27 S. E. 389. In the application of these rules, however, the decisions are not all in harmony. In this case do the words of the residuary clause indicate with reasonable certainty a person capable of taking the bequest? The rules require us to gather the meaning and intent from the whole will. Can we say with any certainty that by the words "estate of C. W. Arnett," the testatrix meant executor of the will of said decedent, and that the property should go and be administered in the same way in which his property is directed to go? We observe in the residuary clause, the words "return to" immediately preceding the words quoted, plainly implying that the money bequeathed had at some time been a part of that estate, else it could not be returned to it. May we not say with reasonable certainty that as the evidence shows her husband left a will, and the will is produced in evidence, and as it is shown she obtained the money disposed of in her will, from the executor of her husband's will, by renouncing the provision thereof in her favor, that by directing the residue of her estate thus acquired to be returned to his estate she meant to say to his executor, and through the same channel it had come to her, and to go as by his will it was originally intended to go. We think we may safely infer this to have been her intent, but are the words employed susceptible of that interpretation? We know by reference to a copy of her answer filed in another suit, brought by said company as executor, to construe the will of her husband, and vouched with the answer and cross bill of said company in this suit, that, except as to the amount of the annual allowance provided for her therein, she was fully satisfied with his will, and expressed her desire, if a larger annual allowance was provided for her, that the residue of his estate should go as directed by his will.

Let us refer to some authorities bearing on the question. In an old English book, Hawkins on Wills, cited by the Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey, in Halsey v. Paterson, 37 N. J. Eq. 445, 448, it is laid down as a rule that a bequest of personal estate to the "representatives," or "legal," or "personal" or "legal personal representatives" of any one, means prima facie executors or administrators. By the will of the testatrix in that case, after certain specific bequests, by the fourth clause, she gave all the rest and residue of whatever kind and nature, which she owned or was possessed of, prior to the death of her husband, to four persons, to be equally divided among them. She next gave all the property and estate which might have been devised or bequeathed to her by the will of her late husband, "to his legal representatives." It was held that by the gift to her husband's "legal representatives" she had intended a gift to his executors. In another case, of Long v. Watkinson, 17 Beaven, 471, the testator by his will, directed his executors to pay the residue and remainder of his estate and effects to his sister, with this proviso: "But, in case of my said sister's death, my instructions are then to pay over all the residue and remainder of my estate and effects to the executors or executrixes which my said sister, Mrs. Mary Fowler, may appoint." His sister died a few days before the testator, leaving Mary Long her sole executrix, and Isabella Watkinson, her sole residuary legatee. After citing some prior decisions the Master of the Rolls held, that the true interpretation of his will was, that his residuary estate was to go to the executrix of his sister, though she died before him, to be administered by her as a part of her estate. In 2 Redfield on Wills (2d Ed.) 409, the author, after citing some cases, observes: "But after some dissent, it seems now finally settled, both by decisions of the English courts, and finally by statute, that unless a contrary intention appear by the context, whatever is bequeathed to the executors or administrators vests in them, as a part of the personal estate of the testator or intestate." And in the following section this author says: "And it seems that bequests to the executors, &c. of any person, will make the estate a portion of the estate of such person in the fullest sense, so that it will be subject to the disposition of the will of such person, notwithstanding such person may die before the testator."

In Webb v. Den, 17 How. 576, 15 L. Ed. 35, the terms of a deed were under construction. It contained no words of give, grant, bargain and sell, and so forth, but only "a release and quit claim forever, unto the legatees and devisees of Anthony Bledsoe, deceased." The will of Bledsoe was in evidence. The objection to the deed was, that it had no effective words of grant in fee, and neither stated a consideration nor sufficiently described the grantees. The court held, that the deed necessarily referred to the will, to ascertain the persons who were such "legatees and devisees," and thus far incorporated it, and that it contained therefore a sufficient description of the grantees.

We understand counsel for the appellees to practically concede that if in place of the words used, by the testator, she had said "let it be returned to the executor of the estate of C. W. Arnett," the effect of the bequest of the residuum of her estate, would have been to put it back into the estate of her husband, to be distributed as a part of his estate. His position furthermore is that as the will of the testator, though in evidence, is nowhere referred to in the will of the testatrix, the former cannot be looked to to render certain the bequest of the testatrix, or to determine to whom the residuum of her estate is to go, or how to be distributed. Besides the general rules which counsel invoke, as to the certainty and definiteness of the subjects and objects required in a devise or bequest, he relies upon Clinton v. Hope Insurance Co., 45 N. Y. 455, 461, and Simmons v. Spratt, 20 Fla. 495, 505. The Florida case was an ejectment suit. The deed involved was that of the executors of one I. D. Hart. The executors by it, "sets apart, distributes and conveys unto the estate of Daniel W. Hart," a certain lot. The court in that case observes: "The question is, does a deed of conveyance by the executors of I. D. Hart, who, under his will and an order of the court, are authorized to distribute I. D. Hart's estate, conveying and setting apart this lot to the estate of Daniel W. Hart, vest such title in the devisee of Daniel W. Hart who alone under the terms of his will could acquire it as would enable such devisee to maintain ejectment?" The Florida court thought in that case that the description of the grantee, "the estate of Daniel W. Hart" in the deed, was too vague and uncertain to constitute a good grant at law, and observed: "Here there is no grantee by name or otherwise, and no reference to the will of D. W. Hart is made." No authorities are cited by the court for this conclusion; but it is admitted that there are some cases, which make such a deed effective to pass title to the administrator, where he takes the title of the intestate, but the court did not think that a parallel case. It is then observed: "The greatest extent to which the courts have gone in the matter of ascertaining the grantees in an uncertain deed is to permit extraneous evidence to be given to ascertain to whom such description is meant to apply when such evidence can explain the plain uncertainty, but at the same time accomplish a manifest intention." By way of illustration the court cites Webb v. Den, supra, where the deed was to the "legatees and devisees of the late Anthony Bledsoe." This language, says the court, necessarily restricted the grantees to such persons as took under the will. The court places its decision mainly upon the ground, that the deed was without the most remote reference to the will of Daniel W. Hart, or anything by which it could be contended that his niece, Mrs. Dearing, was the grantee intended.

The case of Clinton v. Hope Insurance Co., supra, was an action upon a fire insurance policy, insuring the "estate of Daniel Ross." The property insured was destroyed by fire pending negotiations for the sale and conveyance of it by the parties who owned it when the policy was issued, but after the vendee had gone into possession. After the fire a new contract was entered into between the same parties, the vendee purchasing the real estate and claims for insurance, and taking a deed. It was held, that the vendee by the first contract acquired no title to the property, and that by his second contract the claims to cover the amount insured were not extinguished; that the destruction of the property which fixed the liability of insurance, at the same time discharged the vendee from his obligation to purchase; and therefore, that the insurers could not be subrogated to that obligation to the extent of their liability for insurance. In the body of the opinion the court says: "The person or persons to be insured are not named in the policy, nor is this essential to the validity of the contract of insurance."

"If the name of the person for whose benefit the insurance is obtained does not appear upon the face of the policy, or if the designations used are applicable to several persons, or if the description of the assured is imperfect or ambiguous, so that it cannot be understood without explanation, extrinsic evidence may be resorted to, to ascertain the meaning of the contract; and when thus ascertained, it will be held to apply to the interests intended to be covered by it, and they will be deemed to be comprehended within it who were in the mind of the parties when the contract was made. (1 Phil. on Ins. 163; Colpoys v. Colpoys, Jacob., 451; Burrows v. Turner, 24 Wend. [N. Y.] 277 [35 Am. Dec. 622]; Davis v. Boardman, 12 Mass. 80; Newson's Adm'rs v. Douglass, 7 H. & John. [Md.] 417 [16 Am. Dec. 317].)"

We do not say, or mean to be understood as saying that the rule applicable in an action upon a policy of insurance, laid down in the New York case, is applicable to the full extent in cases involving the construction of wills; but if a policy of insurance in favor of the "estate" of one named is not void for uncertainty, and may be rendered certain by extrinsic evidence, why on like principle, may not extrinsic evidence be employed to render certain who was in the mind of the testator when employing similar language to describe the object or objects of her bounty? Of course there is a distinction to be recognized between the words of a will and of a contract inter partes. If, however, the object of a testator's bounty can by extrinsic evidence, and without doing violence to the language of the will, be definitely ascertained, what reason can be assigned against its admission? The New York case was cited by counsel for appellees, for the proposition that "the estate of R.," in the policy, did not have a definite legal significance, "meaning R.'s administrator."

Though the language of the will here is not as clear as might be desired, in manifesting the intentions of the testatrix, yet we think it bears evidence on its face of a clear intent and purpose, on the part of the testatrix, that the plaintiff, her son, for whom the father in his will, had made an elaborate "spendthrift" provision, well known to and understood by her when she made her will, should take nothing under her will, except as specifically provided. In making the small provision for him, and in attempting to dispose of the bulk of her estate, so derived, to religious and charitable uses, she evidently intended that he should look for his main support to the will of his father, and the estate devised to him therein, and subject to the terms and conditions thereof, wisely made. Therefore, the main provisions of her will having failed because of uncertainty, justice demands, that we should give such construction to the residuary clause thereof as will clearly effectuate the intent and purpose of the testatrix, if we can find legal justification for so doing. It is just and right, her bequests having failed for uncertainty, that the money covered by the void bequests, should by the residuary clause of her will, go back into the estate of her husband to be disposed of as his will had directed.

[2] We are of opinion, therefore, taking the will of the testatrix by its four corners, that the words of the residuary clause, "let it be return to the estate of C. W. Arnett," means to the executors of the will of said C. W. Arnett, deceased, to go and be distributed as, by the terms of his will, his estate is directed to be distributed to his legatees. We think the principles of the authorities cited justify this conclusion.

Our opinion, therefore, is to reverse so much of the decree appealed from as adjudges said residuary clause invalid; and gives decree in favor of P. B. Ogden and others, trustees of the Baptist Church, for $10,000, as provided therein. In other particulars the decree will be affirmed.

ROBINSON, J., dissents.

WILLIAMS, J. I dissent for the reason that I believe the residuary clause is void for uncertainty. Testatrix bequeathed the residue of her estate to the "estate" of her husband, who was then dead. An estate is not a person, either natural or artificial; nor can the word be properly construed, in my opinion, to mean a person. It means the quality of interest in property, or property rights. It is a thing as much incapable of taking and holding property, either by deed or will, as it is of taking by inheritance, or of disposing of property. What right has the court to say that testatrix meant her husband's executors, by the use of the word "estate," and that they were to take, not absolutely, but in their official or representative capacity? None, whatever, as I see it. Testatrix made no reference to her husband's will, and yet the majority opinion holds that she disposed of her property in the manner in which her husband had disposed of his! But suppose he had not made a will, and the bequest had been made, as it is now, to his estate, would the word "estate" then have meant his administrator, or would it have meant his distributees? Would it have been liable for the husband's debts? Unquestionably it would have been liable for testatrix's own debts, but would it have become liable for the debts of both estates? The fact that testatrix acquired the property by renunciation of her husband's will can not aid in the interpretation of her will. The property was then her own, and no longer subject to her husband's will. It was as if he had never owned it. If she had bequeathed it to her husband's executors, to be administered by them according to the terms of her husband's will, it would have been a valid will, such as this court, by its majority opinion, has made for her. But, she not having referred to her husband's will herself, what right has the court to do so, in order to supply something vitally important to give effect to her own will? There is no latent ambiguity, to give the right to resort to extrinsic evidence to determine the meaning of her words. The will must be determined from the words she used. It cannot be inferred from extrinsic circumstances. It is not possible to interpret her will without reading her husband's will in connection with it, and his will is no part of her will. I think the unconscious desire of the majority of the court to do what they have conceived to be absolute justice in this particular case, by preventing an improvident and reckless son from squandering the property which his father's frugality and business sagacity had enabled him to accumulate, has led them farther into the realm of speculation than the well established rules of law governing the interpretation of wills will warrant. They have adopted the will of the husband as the will of his wife, a thing which she did not do herself.

HARRIS et al. v. MICHAEL et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 78*)—OIL LEASE
—CONSTRUCTION.

When a lessee for oil and gas producing purposes segregates the lease by assigning to another all rights thereunder as to a distinct parcel of the land, a discovery of oil on the part assigned will give the lessee a vested right to produce oil on the part retained, though he has taken no possession of that part.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 205-207; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

2. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 77*) — VESTED RIGHTS OF LESSEE—WAIVER.

Where a lessee acquires a vested right to produce oil from land, but never takes actual possession of the premises, it may be shown that he has abandoned the right by proving his intention to do so from any facts and circumstances evidencing a voluntary waiver of the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 204; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

3. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 77*)—OIL LEASE—ABANDONMENT BY LESSEE.

A failure for ten years, on the part of a lessee holding a vested right to produce oil from land, to enter on the premises and undertake a fulfillment of the implied covenants of the lease which obligate him to operate the property, during all of which time an adjoining well is producing oil and presumably draining the neglected premises, sufficiently evinces an intention of the lessee to abandon his right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 204; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

4. EQUITY (§ 219*)—LACHES—DEMURRER.

A lessee, having a vested right to produce oil from land, who takes no possession and does nothing on the premises for ten years, and then, while a subsequent lessee is operating the property, remains silent as to his rights for seven years more, is so clearly barred by laches from asserting his neglected rights that his bill in equity showing the delay and silence will be dismissed on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 496-499; Dec. Dig. § 219.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marlon County.

Bill by Carey C. Harris and others against Pinkney Michael and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. M. Hess, for appellants. U. N. Arnett, Jr., for appellee Michael. Neely & Lively and L. D. Beall, for appellee Freeland Oil Co.

ROBINSON, J. In 1889, Pinkney Michael leased to Harris and Steel a tract of 146 acres for oil and gas producing purposes. The lessees agreed to drill a well on the premises within twelve months or thereafter to pay five hundred dollars a year until a well should be drilled. The lessor was to receive one-eighth of all the oil produced and saved from the premises and two hundred dollars for each gas well. If a well was not drilled, a failure to pay the five hundred dollars for any year rendered the lease void. No term was fixed for the continuation of the privileges granted if oil was produced within the time provided for drilling. In this respect the lease is different from those usually employed.

No well was drilled within the twelve months; but the payment was made, so that the right to drill continued through the second year. Within the second year, in 1891, the lessees assigned their rights in the lease, as to 55 acres of the tract only, to Frank Burt, for no other consideration than Burt's promise to drill a well thereon within the limit of that year. They retained no interest whatever in that part. The 55 acre tract transferred to Burt was laid off and described by metes and bounds. Burt, or those to whom he assigned, put down a well on the 55 acres and produced oil. The well continued to be a producing one. In 1898, through various transfers or assignments, that well and the rights pertaining to it under the assignment to Burt came to the ownership of the original lessor, Pinkney Michael. Thus that portion of the original lease was merged into his greater estate, the ownership of the land itself.

The residue of the 146 acres was never developed by Harris and Steel, the lessees, or by anyone for them. They had wholly parted with their leasehold rights in the 55 acres of the original lease, as we have shown. The same had gone back to the lessor. They made no use of their leasehold rights in the residue of the 146 acre tract. So, in 1901, ten years after the drilling of the well, and more than three years after the rights on the 55 acres passed back to Michael, he ignored the former lease, as to which the holders thereof had for so long remained inactive, and again leased the residue of the tract, all but the 55 acres, to one McBride. Operations under the McBride lease were begun and continued. Oil was produced. The McBride lease was assigned to others. Five wells were drilled under this later lease on the residue of the tract. Still for seven years more, the original lessees remained inactive as to use or claim of their rights under the original lease. They silently permitted the five wells to be drilled during the seven years by McBride and those claiming under him. Then, in 1908, seventeen years after the drilling of the Burt well, during all of which time Harris and Steel indicated no purpose to make the property beneficial to themselves or to the lessor, though for a great period of the time others were using it for profit, they filed their bill in equity claiming to be entitled to the oil, by virtue of their original lease, in that portion of the tract outside of the 55 acres, and demanded an accounting from those who had taken oil therefrom. They plead no excuse for the delay in the assertion of their alleged rights. The defendant demurred to the bill. The circuit court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the bill. Plaintiffs have appealed.

The statement of the case which we have made is a fair presentation of the material facts as they appear upon a reading of the bill. The direct allegations together with the reasonable inferences therefrom arising make the case as we have stated it. Are plaintiffs entitled to be heard in a court of equity?

[1] The drilling of the Burt well was a compliance with the lease as to the whole tract. Harris and Steel, by the contract with Burt, caused that well to be drilled. As to them it pertained to the lease on the whole, though as to Burt it pertained only to the 55 acres. The drilling of this well and the producing of oil therefrom gave to Harris and Steel a vested right to produce oil and gas under their lease. As to all but the 55 acres which they had assigned away, that right remained to them under the lease on the whole. After the production of oil under the lease on the whole, they had a vested right to produce on the residue. We must inquire whether or not they lost that right.

It is assuredly true that where a lessee enters upon the leased premises and discovers oil or gas his right to produce the oil or gas becomes a vested right. It is equally true that he may divest himself of this right by intentional abandonment and relinquishment of the premises. Archer on Oil & Gas, 547. When there is such abandonment and relinquishment, the lessor may declare the lease forfeited by leasing to another. Guffy v. Hugill, 34 W. Va. 49, 11 S. E. 754, 8 L. R. A. 759, 26 Am. St. Rep. 901. And, if the lessee has not actually entered on the land the relinquishment of his right to do so, or his abandonment, becomes purely a question of his intention; in which case, his intention to abandon may be established by proof of such facts and circumstances as evince a voluntary waiver of his rights. Smith v. Root, 66 W. Va. 633, 66 S. E. 1005, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 176.

Harris and Steel never entered into possession of the premises to which their rights in the residue of the lease pertained. The possession of Burt, even if considered in their behalf, was of course limited to the 55 acres. If, as is said, he took possession for them, his possession extended no further than over the 55 acres which they sold him. They put him into possession of that part alone, so that he might drill a well and cause them to have vested rights as to the residue. But as to that residue his possession for them could not go, and they entered not upon it themselves. Besides, they had absolutely no concern in the part sold Burt when the sale to him had fulfilled their purpose in getting a well drilled. After the drilling of this well it cannot be said that he was in any manner acting on the premises for them. All their concern in the 55 acre part ceased as soon as Burt's agency in drilling the well was performed. As to Burt that well related to the 55 acres; as to Harris and Steel it related to the residue, but only to the extent of causing rights therein to vest in them. Both were interested in the drilling of the well, but neither was interested in the parcel of the other. Burt's remote relation to the original lease as an undivided one ceased absolutely when he finished the well. He was never in possession of the residue as to which Harris and Steel now claim rights. He was simply in possession of his own parcel, on which the drilling of a well gave them rights in the other parcel. But as to that other parcel they never saw fit to take possession.

[2] Since the lessees never entered into actual possession of the premises to which their vested oil rights pertained, the question whether they relinquished their right to do so, whether they abandoned that right, must be determined alone by their intention in this particular. Their intention to abandon the lease may be established, as we have seen, by the proof of any facts or circumstances evidencing a voluntary waiver of their rights.

[3] Surely, a failure for ten years to enter and at the least to make a start to develop the parcel which plaintiffs segregated to themselves from the whole, evidences intention on their part to abandon their rights under the lease as to it. If men ever intended to make use of such oil rights, it is reasonable to conclude that they would do so before the lapse of so long a period. If they really meant to make use of such rights, would they neglect those rights for ten years and all that time allow the oil to be drained from their lease by an adjoining producing well? They were getting nothing by the production of that well. If they ever meant to claim under the lease as to the residue, why let Burt and others drain it so long? Why stand by and see the lessor himself take the oil by the Burt well which became merged in his estate in the land? Surely their long and palpable neglect of the part of the lease which they retained, in the light of the circumstances surrounding that neglect, is evidence that they waived their rights. They divided into two parts the original lease so they could profit from one part of the land, in case Burt by a well on the other part proved the territory to be good. But for some reason they did nothing for ten years. Must we not conclude that they deemed the property unprofitable and cast it aside? Why allow Burt, and even the lessor himself, to take their oil by this well if they deemed it worth taking themselves? Moreover they were bound by implied covenants to produce and make a return for the lessor, if the property could be profitably worked. Would men ordinarily incur liability for failure to develop a profitable property? Indeed the facts and circumstances sufficiently establish that the lessor had right to conclude, at the time he gave the second lease, that the original lessees had deemed their rights not worth while and had waived them.

In cases of the character of this one, a failure to continue explorations for so long a period should raise a presumption of abandonment as matter of law. The very nature of the contract would seem to raise a presumption of abandonment when there is unreasonable delay in doing under the lease what the parties originally contemplated should be done under it. "There is no case which goes so far as to announce that after mere discovery of oil, the lessee, upon the assumption of vested interest or title, may cease operation, refuse to develop the property, tie up the oil by his lease and simply hold it for speculative purposes, or to await his own pleasure as to the time of development." Parish Fork Oil Co. v. Bridgewater Gas Co., 51 W. Va. 583, 42 S. E. 655, 59 L. R. A. 566. Where one under duty to explore or to continue explorations for oil neglects to do so for a period plainly inconsistent with an intention to fulfill the duty or contract, his neglect should be taken to mean a waiver of his rights in the premises. In the case last cited, it was held: "The law recognizes a distinction between the abandonment of operations under an oil lease and an intention to abandon or surrender the lease itself. Unless bound by the terms of the lease so to do, it will not permit the lessee to hold the lease without operating under it, and thereby prevent the lessor from operating on the land or leasing it to others." And by an eminent authority it is said: "When there is an obligation expressed or implied to operate under the lease, the failure to do so either within the prescribed time, if there be a time prescribed, or within a reasonable time, will, if unexcused, amount to an abandonment." Barringer and Adams on Mines and Mining, 170.

[4] But, aside from the question of abandonment, there is another feature of the case fatal to plaintiffs. They clearly show themselves guilty of laches in the assertion of their rights. They have remained silent so long and have allowed such rights of others to attach that it would now be inequitable to hear them. For seven years after the giving of the second lease to McBride they have passively allowed operations for oil to be prosecuted thereunder. The property has passed from McBride to others. Five wells have been put down under the McBride lease. Plaintiffs have stood silently by and made no objection to the use and occupancy of the property—the great investment of money in it—by subsequent lessees. By their long silence, they have misguided others into expending money on the property. They show no justifiable excuse for their silence. It is not enough to say simply as they do that they were "seldom in the community." They are chargeable with knowing what was going on in relation to this property. If they were seldom in the community, then they were there at times. They had the opportunity of observing what was being done by others. They have plainly acquiesced in the operation of the property under the McBride lease. They cannot decline to assert their rights for seven years and then be heard to assert them. "Where one has means of knowing or ascertaining his rights, where he is put on inquiry, where ordinary prudence should impel him to inquire, he must do so or else time runs against him in the assertion of those rights. One who would repel the imputation of laches by showing ignorance of his rights must be without fault in remaining in ignorance of those rights. Indolent ignorance and indifference will no more avail to prevent the bar of laches than will voluntary ignorance. Equity aids only the vigilant." Plant v. Humphries, 66 W. Va. 88, 66 S. E. 94, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 558.

This additional seven years of neglect of the rights now claimed is another strong element proving that the lessor rightly assumed that plaintiffs had abandoned their rights when he gave the second lease. If they had not then abandoned, why did they so long allow others to operate the property?

The bill is pregnant with an intention to abandon the rights now claimed, and with delay in asserting the claim. The demurrer was rightly sustained. The decree will be affirmed.

BUSKIRK et al. v. SANDERS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 26*)—SUBJECTS OF RELIEF—ACTION AT LAW.

If any affirmative equitable relief is necessary to a full settlement of the controversy a court of equity will interfere, and entertain a suit for such relief, and enjoin the action at law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 24, 28; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 16*)—NATURE OF REMEDY—ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW.

The mere existence of a legal remedy is not of itself sufficient ground for refusing relief in equity by injunction; nor does the existence or non-existence of a remedy at law afford a test as to the right to relief in equity. It must also appear that it is as practical and efficient to secure the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

3. EQUITY (§ 43*)—JURISDICTION—REMEDY AT LAW.

Though defendant has legal and equitable defenses he has the right as a general rule to go into a forum where he may have the benefit of all his defenses, and thereby be afforded complete protection against the claims of his adversary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 121-140, 164-166; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

4. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 43*)—CUSTODY OF ESTATE—AUTHORITY TO SELL.

If a guardian, of his own volition and without authority of the court, sever standing trees from his wards' lands, they are thereby converted into personal property; and his duty then, though wrongfully imposed, is not to suffer the timber to remain on the ground to rot and perish, but to sell it and account to his ward for the proceeds, and the purchaser thereof from the guardian, in good faith, and for a fair price, will acquire good title thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 173, 186-188, 190, 191; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

5. CONTRIBUTION (§ 5*) — LIABILITY FOR WRONGFUL ACTS.

To deprive one of his right of recourse upon or contribution from one with whom he may have co-operated in the wrongful act of cutting timber from another's lands, such act must have been malum in se.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-9; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

6. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 39*)—CUSTODY AND CARE OF ESTATE—RIGHTS OF THIRD PERSONS.

If timber trees be cut from a ward's land, without fraud and in good faith, and by permission of his guardian, no trespass is committed, and the infant, even after the guardianship has ceased, must look to the guardian for compensation for the timber taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 170, 171; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

7. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 148*)—ACCOUNTING BY GUARDIAN—CREDITS—NECESSARIES.

A guardian, without previous order of the court, unless for necessities, is not entitled to credit for disbursements out of the principal of his ward's estate. Such necessities may include necessary repairs on his ward's houses, fences, etc., but not permanent improvement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 497; Dec. Dig. § 148.*]

8. SUBROGATION (§ 10*)—PAYMENT OF MONEY FOR ANOTHER—GUARDIAN AND WARD.

If a guardian out of her own money, or money obtained from another, and for which she is liable, pay purchase money lien or other debts for which the land of her ward is liable, she or her estate, is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose debts have thus been discharged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Subrogation, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

9. EQUITY (§ 52*)—RELIEF GRANTED.

With all parties or their legal representatives before it, a court of equity may in a proper case take a short cut in re-adjusting complicated and involved accounts, so as to do equity between the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 172; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wyoming County.

Bill in equity by U. B. Buskirk and another against Herbert W. Sanders and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and rendered.

Jno. M. McGrath, C. E. Pyle, Jas. H. Gilmore, and Campbell, Brown & Davis, for appellants. J. A. Toler, M. F. Matheny, and Sanders & Crockett, for appellees.

MILLER, J. The preliminary injunction awarded plaintiffs, restraining defendants from prosecuting their suit at law against them to recover the value of timber alleged to have been taken from their land, was by the final decree on demurrer and motion of defendants, wholly dissolved and the bill dismissed.

The grounds of demurrer relied on here, are: First, that plaintiffs had already submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court in the suit at law; second, adequate remedy at law; third, want of equity, and, fourth, other reasons to be assigned.

The theories of the four special counts of defendants' declaration are as follows: First, that plaintiffs themselves sold the timber trees to defendants, and that the latter cut, and carried them away, and in consideration thereof promised to pay plaintiffs therefor the sum of $25,000.00: Second, that plaintiffs had before that time, at the special instance and request of defendants, bargained and sold the timber trees to defendants, who had cut and carried them away, and in consideration thereof had promised to pay plaintiffs what they were reasonably worth: Third, that plaintiffs being the owners of a tract of 3,000 acres, on which said timber trees stood, defendants had cut and carried them away, whereby they had become indebted to plaintiffs the value thereof, alleged to be $25,000.00: Fourth, that plaintiffs had inherited said land from their father, J. O. Sanders, deceased, and that defendants had entered into a contract with their mother, the administratrix of their father's estate, whereby they purchased from her, with notice of her want of authority, said timber trees, and that pursuant thereto they had cut down, removed and sold said trees in the market, but took no title thereto, well knowing the same belonged to plaintiffs, whereby they became indebted to plaintiffs in the sum of $25,000.00, the value thereof, and which they thereafter in consideration of the premises faithfully promised to pay plaintiffs.

Appellants admit that prior to filing their bill they appeared to said action at law, demurred to the declaration, and took leave to file special pleas.

Besides the prayer for an injunction, there is a prayer that plaintiffs be adjudged not liable to pay a second time for said timber; that it be ascertained, by a commissioner, what disposition was made by Ida Sanders of the money paid her therefor, with all the facts in relation thereto; that it be also adjudged that all expenditures for repairing the dwelling house, fences, barns and other improvements on the land descended to defendants, were for their benefit; that if plaintiffs, who in good faith, and without notice that said timber had been taken from defendants' lands, purchased the same, and paid full market price therefor, should in any event be again held liable therefor, the estate of said Ida Sanders be decreed to refund to them the amount so paid, and that defendants, her wards, and as distributees of her estate, be charged in equity, when ascertained, with the balance on settlement of her guardianship accounts, and with the amount received by them as distributees of her estate, and with the amount expended by her, out of her own funds, in excess of assets, in paying debts in repairing and improving their lands, and that their liabilities thereby incurred to her estate be offset against the liability, if any, of plaintiffs to them.

Defendants have apparently abandoned the first point of their demurrer, though fully argued, with citations of authorities, in the brief of appellants' counsel, it is not referred to by counsel for appellees or discussed by them in their brief. We will not further notice it therefore.

The material facts well pleaded in the bill and taken for true on demurrer, present the following propositions relied on as a basis for equitable relief:

First, that the timber was not cut or removed by plaintiffs, but by defendants' mother and guardian, having, by virtue of section 7, chapter 82, Code 1906, the care and management of their estate, real and personal, and who after severing said timber sold and delivered the same to plaintiffs, at the place of delivery, and that they in good faith paid her for same, the full market price therefor, and that she and not they, if any one, should be rendered liable to defendants therefor, and for any waste committed; that if this, a legal defense, be not sustained, they, nevertheless, have complete equitable defenses not available at law, which they are entitled to interpose, namely, that should they, for any reason, be rendered liable to defendants for said timber, their mother and guardian would become liable to them for the amount recovered; and as defendants, as alleged, would be liable to her estate on settlement of her guardianship accounts, for moneys paid out for necessary repairs and improvements on their lands, and for their maintenance and education, in a large sum; and also in settlement of her administration accounts, as administratrix of their father's estate, for money paid out beyond assets, to discharge a lien on their lands for purchase money, and to pay borrowed money and other debts for which his estate was liable, alleged to be about $1,800.00; and as they also as distributees of her estate had received about $3,700.00, and could be required to refund the same, to pay debts, their claim against appellants, if valid, should in equity be offset by her liability to them.

The first inquiry is, has equity jurisdiction where defendant has a legal and also an equitable defense? Little need be said in affirmance of this proposition. Plaintiffs might fail in their legal remedy, and yet if their several grounds of equitable relief be good, they should prevail. To make these equitable defenses available settlements of the guardianship, and administration accounts of defendants' mother, would be necessary, involving an ascertainment of the value of any repairs, or improvements, if allowable, on the lands, and the amount expended by her in their maintenance and education, and which could not be done on the trial of the action at law.

[1,2] Though one have a defense at law, yet if it be doubtful, and he also have equitable defenses, and his legal defense would not be as adequate and certain as in a court of equity, he may go into equity, at once, without awaiting the result of the lawsuit, or even being compelled to confess judgment at law. Gas Co. v. Window Glass Co., 63 W. Va. 266, 61 S. E. 329; Eastern Oil Co. v. Coulehan, 65 W. Va. 531, 64 S. E. 836. "If any affirmative equitable relief is necessary to a full settlement of the controversy, and to a complete protection of defendant's rights, a court of equity will interfere, and entertain a suit for such relief, and enjoin the action at law." 4 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1363, page 2706; 22 Cyc. 799, 801, and cases cited; Knott v. Seamands, 25 W. Va. 99, 105; Dudley v. Miner's Ex'r, 93 Va. 408, 25 S. E. 100, 101; High on Injunctions (4th Ed.) §§ 30, 66. The mere existence of a legal remedy, says Mr. High, section 30, "is not in itself sufficient ground for refusing relief in equity by injunction; nor does the existence or non-existence of a remedy at law afford a test as to the right to relief in equity."

* * * It must also appear * * * that it is as practical and efficient to secure the ends of justice, and its proper and prompt administration as is the remedy in equity."

[3] Assuming the law to be that the application of these principles to a particular case must depend upon the character of the case as disclosed by the pleadings, we have here facts alleged which on plaintiffs' theory may constitute a complete defense to the action at law; but they also allege facts which on their theory, if their defense at law should fail, would, nevertheless, in equity constitute good defenses, not available on the law side of the court. We understand the authorities to hold that a defendant has the right to the benefit of all his defenses, and that when some are legal, and others equitable, the one at law, which in the exigencies of a trial might fail, can not be said to be as adequate and certain, and as complete a protection to defendants' rights, as all combined, and in a forum where he may have the benefit of all. Wherefore he may then go into equity for a vindication of his right.

[4] The first proposition of appellants that defendants' guardian, if any one, is liable to them for the timber taken, is not conceded, but controverted by appellees. They contend that standing timber being real estate cannot be severed or sold by a guardian, without authority of a court, and though severed in fact, it still remains real estate, and that purchasers from a guardian acquire no title, and are liable to the owners of the land. That standing timber is real estate, and that a guardian can not, generally, lawfully convert his ward's realty into personality, or personality into realty, or sell and convey it to a purchaser, by deed or otherwise, without previous sanction by the court, are propositions not controverted by appellants' counsel. But such is not the case presented by the bill, and the authorities cited and relied on by appellees' counsel are for the most part inapplicable.

The case here is one where a guardian, in lawful control and management of the infants' lands, has in fact and of her own volition severed the timber, and after so converting it into personality, has sold it in the market. Having done so, the duty, though wrongfully imposed, is not to let it rot and perish on the ground, but to sell it, accounting for the proceeds to her wards. This seems a self evident proposition. No other course would be open to her. The infants could not sell it or pass good title. She could.

That timber severed from land becomes personality is fully sustained by our decisions. Null v. Elliott, 52 W. Va. 229, 43 S. E. 173; Buskirk Bros. v. Peck, 57 W. Va. 360, 50 S. E. 432. That a guardian may in good faith and free from fraud lawfully sell his ward's personal property, particularly when perishable and liable to waste, and give the purchasers good title, is too well settled to admit of controversy. MacLay v. Equitable Life Assurance Society, 152 U. S. 499, 14 Sup. Ct. 678, 38 L. Ed. 528; 21 Cyc. 146; Windon v. Stewart, 43 W. Va. 711, 28 S. E. 776; Woerner Am. Law Guard. 179; Hunter v. Lawrence, 11 Grat. 130, 62 Am. Dec. 640. In 2 Barton's Ch. Pr. 753, it is said: "He may sell the whole or any part of his ward's personal property, whether it is perishable or not, and may pass a good title to it unless the sale be fraudulent, and the purchaser collude with the guardian by co-operating in the fraud." The bill negatives all fraud or collusion with the guardian in severance and sale of the timber. After she cut the timber and converted into personality, as counsel for appellees in their brief believe in good faith, whose property was it? Was it not the wards' personal property? And who besides the guardian had lawful authority to sell it and preserve, or lawfully dispose of the proceeds? Certainly no one but the guardian could do so.

[5] But assuming that the foregoing defense, good at law, we may say, should fail for any reason, what about the equitable defenses? Suppose, for example, that it should turn out on the trial, on the theory of the fourth special count in defendants' declaration, that appellants purchased from the administratrix, or the guardian, the standing timber in place, and thereby became parties to a wrongful act, having paid her the purchase price, would not she or her estate, be liable individually to repay or refund the money paid her by appellants? Appel-lees answer no; on the principle announced in Asberry's Adm'r v. Asberry, 33 Grat. 463, that one "who concert or unites with a fiduciary in a misapplication of the trust funds, or in any other act contrary to the duty of the fiduciary, becomes a particeps criminis, and will be held liable accordingly." That case involved the misapplication by the guardian of his ward's funds in payment of his individual debt, and the principle was there clearly applicable. Boisseau v. Boisseau, 79 Va. 73, 52 Am. Rep. 616, involved the investment by a guardian of the ward's money in real estate and the reservation by the vendor of lien for the unpaid balance, rendering the property purchased liable to be sold for the payment thereof, which was the purpose of that suit, and involving the loss of the ward's entire estate. The purchase of the real estate was held a breach of trust, and a vendor a participant therein, and liable to refund the money of the infant, quite a different case from the case in hand, and to which the principle was clearly applicable.

The principle, which we think is applicable here, is, that to deprive appellants of recourse, upon the estate of Mrs. Sanders, or contribution by her, she being at least equally liable for the alleged wrongful act, their act in purchasing and severing the timber must have been malum in se. 6 Pomeroy Eq. Jur. § 916; Thweatt v. Jones, 1 Rand. 328, 10 Am. Dec. 538. We see nothing on the face of the bill, or in the nature of the transaction between appellants and the administratrix or guardian, justifying the theory of fraud or bad faith, to deprive them of the benefits of the equitable defenses interposed, if they are otherwise well founded.

[6] These defenses, moreover, do not stand alone on the general rule applicable to persons jointly responsible for the wrongful act. The alleged wrongful act here consists in an alleged trespass or waste committed on infants' lands. An old Virginia case, Truss v. Old, 6 Rand. 556, 18 Am. Dec. 748, cited and differentiated in McDodrill v. Pardee & Curtin Lumber Co., 40 W. Va. 564, 21 S. E. 878, says: "Possession is indispensably necessary to support trespass quare clausum fregit. * * * Guardians in socage, and testamentary guardians, (although they have no beneficial interest, yet) have a legal interest, and the possession of the ward's land during the guardianship. If, therefore, a person trespass on the lands of an infant and cut and carry away his trees, without license of the guardian, the ward cannot maintain trespass, but the guardian may, and must account to the ward for the damages recovered. * * * If the trees are cut and carried away by permission of the guardian, no trespass is committed, and the infant even after the guardianship has ceased, cannot maintain trespass for the act. The wrong must be compensated to the ward by the guardian."

In the McDoddrill Case this court held that the doctrine of the Truss Case did not apply to guardians by nature, but only to guardians appointed, who as in this case had given bond, &c. It should apply in full force, we think, where as in this state, the statute gives the guardian control and management of the wards' real estate; and we agree with appellants' counsel that though defendants' action at law is in assumpsit and not, as in Truss v. Old, in trespass, the plaintiffs who may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit must be those who could have maintained trespass. Of course this argument relates more particularly to the legal defense interposed; but it is also applicable to the position of appellees' counsel, based on the theory of joint tort feorsors.

If Truss v. Old is good law appellants committed no trespass on the appellees' lands, and are not joint tort feorsors, but are in a position to hold her and her estate liable for any liability to them on the theory that her act was unauthorized and they liable to appellees for the timber taken.

[7] The question remains, are appellants' equitable defenses well founded? If upon the rules and principles already enunciated, appellants who have paid the guardian of the appellees in full for the timber taken, she and her estate would certainly be liable to appellants, if they should for any reason be held liable to the appellees for the timber purchased. Another proposition equally fundamental is, that if the guardian received the purchase money for the timber, as guardian, she would be bound to account for it in settlement with her wards, and would be entitled to credit, in equity at least, for any disbursements legally made. Appellees contend that without previous authority, as provided by section 8, chapter 82, Code 1906, she would be entitled to no credit for disbursements out of the principal of her wards' estate. We think this not a well founded proposition. The statute we think so far as it relates to disbursements by guardians for necessities must be construed to be permissive, on the principles of Maclay v. Equitable Society, supra, construing a statute in Mississippi, and as only providing a mode by which the guardian may obtain in advance judicial approval of his act, instead of leaving the question open for dispute at a future day. At common law expenditures made by a guardian in good faith, and for the benefit of the ward, would be confirmed by the court. This rule is recognized in Myers v. Myers, 47 W. Va. 488, 35 S. E. 868, and Campbell v. O'Neill, 72 S. E. 732, 738. Necessaries within this principle, we think, would include necessary repairs to a dwelling house, in order to make it tenantable, necessary repairs to fences, necessary food and clothing, and a common school education. Woerner Am. Law Guard. 202; 2 Barton's Ch. Pr. 156. We do not think under the principles of our decisions, a guardian without previous authority would be entitled to credit for disbursements for permanent improvements of the wards' real estate, though in Jackson v. Jackson, 1 Grat. 148, decided before our present statute, it would seem he might even have been entitled to credit for such expenditures, if obviously for the wards' benefit. Under our decisions expenditures so made without court authority must fall within the rule of necessities. Clearly, therefore, appellees would not be entitled to charge their guardian with the money received from appellants, without at the same time giving her credit for disbursements out of that fund for such necessities; and appellants would certainly be entitled in equity to offset so much of their money as she has expended in this way, out of their money, against any legal liability to appellees for the timber taken.

[8] A still stronger ground of equitable relief is, that a purchase money lien on defendants' lands and debts for borrowed money and other debts of the estate of J. O. Sanders, were paid off and discharged by the guardian. This land was liable for these debts. If Mrs. Sanders, either as administratrix or guardian, discharged them out of her own money, or out of money paid her by appellants, not being a volunteer but having a duty in relation to such debts, she would be entitled to subrogation to the rights of creditors, and her creditors, she being dead, would now be entitled to have her claims against her husband's estate, and against her wards, treated as assets subject to their debts. 37 Cyc. 444, and notes. If out of the money obtained from appellants, as the bill charges, the guardian paid these debts, and appellees or the estate of their father became liable by subrogation to her estate, it would be most inequitable to hold that the several liabilities should not be adjusted on principles of equity to relieve appellants.

[9] Still another, and perhaps a stronger basis of equitable relief is, that appellees, as distributees of their mother's estate, have received large sums of money. If Mrs. Sanders should be held liable to appellants for the purchase money paid her for the timber, her heirs and distributees, to the extent of personal assets received, would be liable either directly or through her administrator, who is now before the court, to refund the money or property received in distribution, to pay that liability to appellants, and this being so, a court of equity with all parties before it ought to take the short cut by offsetting the appellants' claim against their guardian's estate, against their claim against appellants, for the timber taken from their land. On the subject of compelling legatees and distributees to refund where no bond has been taken, see 5 Cyc. Dig. Va. & W. Va. Rep. 631, 635; 2 Lomax on Ex'rs, 175.

For these reasons we are of opinion to reverse the decree below dismissing the bill on demurrer, and to enter here the decree which we think the court below should have pronounced, overruling the demurrer, and giving appellees a reasonable time within which to answer the bill.

JONES v. RIVERSIDE BRIDGE CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 13, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 55*)—CARE REQUIRED.

A contractor, having servants at work in the erection of a building along with the servants of another contractor, owes to the latter the duty of care for their safety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 267-272, 285; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 121*)—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

If, in such relation, a servant of one of the contractors is injured under circumstances creating a reasonable probability that the injury was caused by the omission of such duty on the part of the other or the negligence of his servants, the maxim res ipsa loquitur applies, making the circumstances, without more, evidence of negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 217-220, 224-228; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§§ 134, 136*)—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Ordinarily such circumstantial evidence is not conclusive of the question of negligence, and only suffices to carry the issue to the jury and sustain a verdict for the plaintiff, if found.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 267-272; Dec. Dig. §§ 134, 136.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 203*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DUTY OF COURT.

If it affords bases for inferences favorable to each of the parties, the court, upon request therefor, must give instructions submitting the hypotheses such inferences appreciably tend to sustain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 477-479; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—INVASION OF PROVINCE OF JURY.

In an action for injuries to a person employed in a building through the fall of a board from an upper floor through the negligence of employes of defendant also employed in the building, instructions stating the duty of defendant to exercise care for the safety of the men known to be working in the basement of the building, and to afford plaintiff reasonable protection from objects caused to fall from the fourth floor by the negligence of the agents, servants and employes of defendant, and the duty of defendant to give plaintiff reasonable warning of objects caused to fall from the fourth floor by its agents, servants and employes, did not assume that the defendant's servants caused the board inflicting the injury on plaintiff to fall.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-431; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS — INVASION OF PROVINCE OF JURY.

In an action for personal injuries, an instruction allowing the jury to consider the health and condition of plaintiff before the injury as compared with his condition in consequence of the injury was not objectionable as assuming facts in controversy, where all the evidence adduced relating to the plaintiff's physical condition at the time of the trial tended to show a continuance of the effect of the injury he had received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 237*)—INSTRUCTIONS — INVASION OF PROVINCE OF JURY.

In an action for personal injuries caused by the negligence of defendant's servants, an instruction requiring the jury and each member thereof to believe the defendant liable beyond a reasonable doubt as requisite to a verdict for plaintiff was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 548-551; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 263*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

There was no error in refusing defendant's request for an instruction after amendment on the ground that it had not been presented to plaintiff's attorney for inspection after the final alteration thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 263.*]

Robinson and Williams, JJ., dissenting.

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by James M. Jones against the Riverside Bridge Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant, brings error. Reversed, and new trial awarded.

Hubbard & Hubbard, for plaintiff in error. Noyes & Ritz and John S. Ritz, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. On this writ of error to a judgment for $1,016.67, the amount of a verdict rendered, the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict was raised by a request for a peremptory instruction to find for the defendant. The principle governing the disposition of the assignment of error founded upon the refusal of that instruction will solve most of the other questions presented.

The plaintiff below was injured by the fall of a board while employed in and about the work of constructing a building, several stories high, in the city of Wheeling. The action was not brought against his employer nor the owner of the building, but against a contractor engaged in the installment of the steel work of the building. The servants of the structural iron company, the defendant, were placing a steel beam or girder for the fourth floor of the building, and the plaintiff, employed by the brick work contractor, was in the basement, handling some pieces of terra cotta, when he sustained the injury. Just what he was doing at the instant of the fall of the board does not appear, but he was on duty in the basement. Another servant of his employer was hauling the terra cotta to the front of the building and sliding it into the basement, and he was carrying or wheeling it back from the front. Who let or caused the board to fall is not expressly shown. Nothing in this connection is disclosed except that it came from the fourth floor, and that at that time the servants of the defendant company were working on that floor, or rather where it was intended to be. One witness says: "They were throwing in a beam; getting ready to place one. * * * They were adjusting this platform on the fourth floor. They had boards laid around." Another witness says it came from "upon top somewhere," and that a gang of bridge men were working where it came from. Another witness says it came from about the fourth tier of iron or the ceiling of the third floor, and that the structural iron workers were working on that floor. No witness states specifically that any other persons were on that floor, but one witness said, responding to a question as to whether any persons were working between the fourth floor and the first: "Yes, sir; they was working all over the floors." The defendant company had its hoisting engine in the basement, and for about 12 feet back from the street no flooring of any kind had been put in for any of the stories. Back of the 12-foot space, some fire proofing had been laid on some of the floors, but how much space was so covered is not shown. In this 12-foot space at the front of the building there seems to have been nothing to break or prevent the fall of any object and the board by which the plaintiff was injured seems to have come down through it. This open space or some other was no doubt needed for the work of hoisting materials. Some testimony was adduced to the effect that, under such conditions, the contractor putting in the steel work does not lay any floors below the workmen to prevent tools and materials from falling, even though other persons are working below, and that such articles frequently fall in the course of the work.

[2] The trial court disposed of the case upon the theory that the lack of evidence, showing just how the board happened to fall, is aided by a presumption or inference of negligence, which the jury might draw, under the rule res ipsa loquitur, applied in several cases by this court, notably Bice v. Electrical Co., 62 W. Va. 685, 59 S. E. 626, and Snyder v. Electrical Co., 43 W. Va. 661, 28 S. E. 733, 39 L. R. A. 499, 64 Am. St. Rep. 922. The argument against the application of this doctrine is based largely upon the definition of the rule or doctrine stated in the syllabi of the two cases just cited, embodying certain specifications of conditions under which it is applicable, and the assumption that every case falling under the principle must come within those specifications. Accordingly it is said the agency causing the injury must be definitely known, and appear to have been under the management and control of the defendant, and the occurrence such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen, if proper care is used by those who have the management. The language of this court thus relied upon does not purport to be a general definition of the rule. It is rather an application of the rule to the particular facts and circumstances of the cases. The principle is broader. "When the physical facts of an accident themselves create a reasonable probability that it resulted from negligence, the physical facts themselves are evidential, and furnish what the law terms evidence of negligence in conformity with the maxim, 'res ipsa loquitur.'" Seybott v. Railroad Co., 95 N. Y. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 75, quoted in Snyder v. Electrical Co. "I have ventured to call it demonstrative evidence of negligence; for, although the evidence must always be detailed by the mouths of witnesses, yet, when the facts are thus disclosed, they either demonstrate negligence conclusively or tend to demonstrate it, subject to explanation by the defendant, showing that his conduct was consistent with due care." 1 Thomp. Neg. § 15, p. 16. "Where an accident itself, with all its surroundings, speaks in such way and is of such character as to show negligence on the part of the defendant, the doctrine res ipsa loquitur applies, and the plaintiff is allowed to recover in the absence of other proof." Wood v. Railway Co., 5 Pennewill (Del.) 369, 64 Atl. 246. However, we perceive no difficulty in applying the terms of the supposed definition to the facts here disclosed. The board was the agency causing the injury. Ordinarily a board is not a dangerous article, but, under given circumstances, it may be very dangerous. If a board be insufficiently suspended or fixed over a street or walk for some purpose so that it may fall upon a pedestrian passing under it, it is a dangerous agency, and is under the management or control of him who maintains it there in an insecure condition. So a board in the hands of a workman at the top of a four-story building is a dangerous agency to other persons passing under it in the discharge of their duties. Owing to the peculiar circumstances and the very great danger of injury in case it should fall, a very high degree of care is exacted on the part of him who holds it, just as in the case of one who erects or constructs a fixture over a road or passageway, likely to be used by travelers or other persons. The duty imposed under such circumstances is so great that ordinarily it is not omitted and injury does not result. Hence, when injury does result, there is a probability of omission of the care, prudence, and diligence exacted by law. Instances of the application of the doctrine are given in Snyder v. Electrical Co., as follows: "Mulcairns v. City of Janesville, 67 Wis. 24, 29 N. W. 565, wall of a cistern falling; Dixon v. Plums, 98 Cal. 384, 33 Pac. 268 [20 L. R. A. 698, 35 Am. St. Rep. 180] chisel falling from a scaffold; Houston v. Brush, 66 Vt. 331, 29 Atl. 380, injury from being struck by a wheel from a tackle block, attached to a derrick; note in Railroad Co. v. Anderson (Md.) 20 Am. St. Rep. 493 (a. c., 72 Md. 519, 20 Atl. 2, 8 L. R.

A. 673); Thomas v. Telegraph Co., 100 Mass. 156, telegraph wire swinging over a street too low, so as to obstruct travel; Clare v. Bank, 1 Sweeny (N. Y.) 539, injury from plank falling from one's premises; Howser v. Railroad Co., 80 Md. 146, 30 Atl. 906, 27 L. R. A. 154, 45 Am. St. Rep. 332, cross-tie falling from a moving car; Ugla v. Railway Co., 160 Mass. 351, 35 N. E. 1126, 39 Am. St. Rep. 481; Morris v. Strobel & Wilken Co., 81 Hun, 1, 30 N. Y. Supp. 571, signboard falling in street." Applications of the doctrine in cases of the class to which the one now under consideration belongs will be found in Guldseth v. Carlin, 19 App. Div. 588, 46 N. Y. Supp. 357; Reilly v. Construction Co., 83 Hun, 196, 81 N. Y. Supp. 618; Thrusell v. Handyside, L. R. 20 Q. B. D. 359; Sheridan v. Foley, 58 N. J. Law, 230, 33 Atl. 484.

As to whether the board working the injury complained of was under the management or control of the defendant's servants, the evidence is not direct and positive, as will appear from the statement already given. It is readily inferable, however, from the facts stated. Defendant's servants were working at the point or place from which the board fell and using boards in connection with their work. No reason is perceived why evidence sufficient to sustain a finding by the jury that the agency working the injury was under the control of the defendant should not suffice to establish the facts as in other cases. It is a question for the jury rather than for the court. We do not understand the rule to require conclusive evidence of control or management of the agency by the defendant. The declaration fully sets forth the facts and circumstances here stated, and specifies the means or agency by which the injury was inflicted, charging it to have been negligently done. This makes it clearly good under our decisions, and the surplusage therein, if any, does not vitiate it. So the demurrer was properly overruled.

[5] Exception was taken to the action of the court in giving three of the plaintiff's instructions under the impression that they assumed certain facts. One of these stated the duty of the defendant to exercise care for the safety of the men known to be working in the basement of the building and afford the plaintiff reasonable protection "from objects caused to fall from the fourth floor by the negligence of the agents, servants, and employes of the defendant." Another stated the duty of the defendant to give the plaintiff reasonable warning "of the objects caused to fall from the fourth floor by its servants, agents, or employes." These instructions did not assume that the defendant's servants caused the board inflicting the injury to fall. They stated the duty of the defendant under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence. Not mentioning the board which caused the injury, they stated the general duty of the defendant to take precaution against injury from falling objects. We do not think the jury could have considered the language used as importing that the defendant's servants had caused the board to fall.

[6] The other instruction complained of allowed the jury to consider the health and condition of the plaintiff before the injury as compared with his "condition in consequence of said injury" at the time of the trial. All the evidence adduced relating to the plaintiff's physical condition at the time of the trial tended to show a continuance of the effect of the injury he had received. Nothing was adduced in contradiction thereof. He proved it by his own testimony and that of a physician. The assumption in the instruction is the relation of his condition to the injury, not the extent of the impairment of health or physical capacity. As to the latter, nothing was taken from the jury. As the fact assumed is sustained by direct, positive, and uncontradicted evidence, we perceive no error in the assumption thereof.

[3] Six several instructions, propounding inquiries as to whether the defendant had exercised reasonable care for the safety of the plaintiff and whether the latter had assumed the risk of injury in the manner in which it occurred or the injury was accidental, were requested by the defendant and refused by the court. In thus disposing of these requests, the court must have considered the evidence conclusive on the question of liability or as having established a legal presumption of negligence, precluding inquiry as to accidental injury or assumption of risk. This is a misapprehension of the effect of the rule. Under it, the evidence only carries the case to the jury, as sufficing to justify an inference of negligence. Duhme v. Packet Co., 184 N. Y. 404, 77 N. E. 386, 112 Am. St. Rep. 615; Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 188, 59 N. E. 925, 52 L. R. A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630; Ross v. Cotton Mills, 140 N. C. 115, 52 S. E. 121, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 298; Judson v. Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146. The rule is a mere application of the law of circumstantial evidence.

[4] The evidence goes to the jury for such inferences as may arise out of the facts disclosed, and each party is entitled to instructions submitting the hypotheses in his favor for which any basis is found in the evidence. Our own cases as well as the definitions of the rule found elsewhere say no more than that the circumstances constitute evidence tending to prove negligence. Both the Snyder and Bice Cases say the facts, unexplained, afford "reasonable evidence" that the injury arose from want of due care, not that they are conclusive, inhibiting any other theory. There may be, and no doubt are, cases in which the circumstances are conclusive, allowing only one inference, and so precluding instructions favorable to the defendant, but this evidence is not of that character.

If there is a contractual relation, as between passenger and carrier, the circumstances unexplained are generally conclusive, when sufficient to take the case to the jury, but this case involves no breach of contract. Here a witness says men were working all over the floors. Boards were placed on the beams on all the floors to enable workmen to get around over them. Another says bricks and other objects were falling frequently. The plaintiff himself says he would have been out of danger had he stepped 4 or 5 feet in one direction, instead of running 20 feet in another. Another witness says the defendant was conducting its work in the customary manner, and all agree that warning was given when the board fell. Under all these circumstances, we are unable to say there was no basis in the evidence for an inference of assumption of risk or accidental injury. The request for these instructions did not challenge the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict for the defendant. It only asked the court to say whether there was any evidence of any kind appreciably tending to sustain the hypotheses embodied in the instructions. Newhouse v. Railroad Co., 62 W. Va. 562, 59 S. E. 1071; State v. Clifford, 59 W. Va. 1, 52 S. E. 981. No peremptory instruction to find for the plaintiff was asked. Upon these principles, we think the court erred in refusing defendant's instructions Nos. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9.

[7] Defendant's instruction No. 10, requiring the jury and each member thereof to believe the defendant liable beyond a reasonable doubt, as requisite to a verdict for the plaintiff, was properly overruled. Ordinarily the reasonable doubt rule does not apply to civil cases. Simmons v. Insurance Co., 8 W. Va. 474. There are exceptional cases in which it does apply (Brockerbrough v. Spindle, 17 Grat. 21; Greenhow v. Harris, 6 Munf. 472, 8 Am. Dec. 751; Swayne v. Riddle, 37 W. Va. 291, 16 S. E. 512; Hall v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 44 W. Va. 36, 28 S. E. 754, 41 L. R. A. 869, 67 Am. St. Rep. 757), but this is not one of that class.

[8] Defendant's instruction No. 11, as originally tendered, objectionable in its requirement of "weighty proof" of plaintiff's inability to escape injury, was amended by the court, so as to eliminate that, and also an additional requirement that each juror must find a preponderance of evidence in favor of the plaintiff, in order to justify a verdict for him. To the giving of the instruction as so amended the defendant objected, and, after further amending it, so as to restore requirement of belief on the part of each juror, again offered it, and the court refused to give it as last amended, because it had not been presented to plaintiff's attorney for inspection after the final alteration thereof. We think there was no error in this. The court may prescribe and enforce reasonable rules for the regulation of practice at its bar.

For the errors noted, the judgment will be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded. The request for judgment here must be denied, since we reverse for error in the course of the trial, and it does not appear that a good case cannot be made on another trial.

ROBINSON, J., dissents.

WILLIAMS, J. (dissenting). I do not think it was error to refuse defendant's instructions. The falling of the board upon plaintiff is prima facie proof of defendant's negligence under the rule res ipsa loquitur, and, in the absence of any explanation of the cause of its falling, established plaintiff's right to recover, provided he was not negligent himself, and there is no evidence that he was. If plaintiff had asked for a peremptory instruction directing the jury to find for him, the court should have given it; or if, on the facts proven, the jury had found for defendant, it would have been the duty of the court to set it aside, on motion of plaintiff, because it would have been clearly against evidence. This is not a case involving conflict of evidence, which would give the jury the right to weigh and determine its relative value. The fact that the board fell from defendant's working place upon plaintiff, and injured him, is not denied. The law says that such fact unexplained is prima facie proof of negligence, and casts the burden upon defendant to rebut it. No attempt was made to discharge that burden, and, under the rules of evidence, plaintiff's case was as fully established as if negligence had been proven by the most direct testimony. His proof was full and complete, because it was not denied, the presumptive negligence was not explained. How can it be logically said that defendant is prejudiced by the refusal of the court to give its instructions, when there is no evidence on which to predicate them; and, if their refusal works no prejudice, why should this court reverse the judgment? The refusal was harmless error, if error at all. But I say it was not error, because there is not a particle of evidence contradicting the legal presumption of negligence arising from the fact of the falling of the board from defendant's work place without proof of any particular cause. It was incumbent on defendant to show that it was not caused by its negligence. It did not discharge the burden, thus shifted to it; and the rule res ipsa loquitur supplies what plaintiff could not, and did not actually prove, and says that the cause of the board's falling was defendant's negligence. If the jury are given no facts to which to apply legal principles, there is no duty on the court to instruct them as to the law. Cases are tried on law and fact, not on law alone, and, if there are no facts to support a case, there is no need to give the jury the law. The board that struck plaintiff was 2 by 12 inches by 16 feet. Defendant knew that men were working in the basement. They had a right to work there. The surroundings made it incumbent upon it to use greater care than if no one had been working below. When the board started to fall, warning was given to those below, and plaintiff immediately ran to escape danger. It appears that he would not have been hurt if he had run in some other direction, but the board would not have fallen on him where he did take refuge, if it had not struck a girder on the first floor and broke, and a piece of it glanced over to where he was. There is nothing in his conduct, or in the circumstances proven, from which the jury could even infer that he was negligent.

Defendant could make but two defenses: (1) That the board did not fall for want of due care of its servants; and (2) that plaintiff was himself negligent. Defendant was not plaintiff's master. No contractual relation existed between them, hence the law of assumption of risk has no application. One cannot plead assumption of risk in defense of his own negligence. That is against the policy of the law. As I see it, no other verdict could have been found. Because, in view of the facts established by proof; aided by a legal presumption, the rule res ipsa loquitur, negligence of defendant, as the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, is established.

DAVIS v. DAVIS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 16, 1911.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 15*)—FORMER INDICTMENT.

Where one or more counts in an indictment state offenses not embraced in indictments previously dismissed, though provable by evidence which would have been admissible under the dismissed indictments, the prisoner cannot be discharged on habeas corpus, but must be remanded for trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 132*)—ELECTION BETWEEN COUNTS.

Where one or more counts in an indictment state offenses not embraced in dismissed indictments, but provable by evidence which would have been admissible under the dismissed indictments, it is proper practice, when the prisoner is brought to trial, to require the attorney for the commonwealth to state upon what counts he relies as setting forth offenses not embraced in the dismissed indictments.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

Application by Charles Hall Davis for writ of habeas corpus to Arthur Kyle Davis. Denied.

George S. Bernard, John L. Lee, James Mann, and Charles T. Lassiter, for petitioner. Samuel W. Williams, Atty. Gen., and Richard H. Mann, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] This day came again the parties in obedience to the writ of habeas corpus awarded herein, and the court, having maturely considered the petition of the plaintiff, the return and answer of the said defendant to said writ, and arguments of counsel, is of opinion that, while it may be true, as claimed by the petitioner and conceded in argument by the Attorney General and attorney for the commonwealth for the city of Petersburg, that all of the evidence which will be admissible upon a trial of the indictment found at the June term, 1911, of the corporation court of Petersburg could have been introduced under some one of the indictments which were dismissed, it may also be true that there are offenses charged in that indictment not embraced in the indictments which were dismissed, and the court is further of opinion that if there be one or more counts in the indictment of the June term aforesaid which state offenses not embraced in the dismissed indictments, though provable by evidence which would have been, as above indicated, admissible under those indictments which were dismissed, the prisoner cannot be discharged, but must be remanded for trial; and being further of opinion that it will be proper practice for the corporation court of Petersburg, when the prisoner is set to the bar for trial, to require the attorney for the commonwealth, before going into trial, to state upon what counts he relies as setting forth offenses not embraced in the indictments which have been heretofore dismissed, to the end that the court, with the aid of counsel, may determine upon which counts the accused may now properly be tried, and thus eliminate much that would tend to confuse the material issues and greatly protract the trial, it is therefore considered that the petitioner is not illegally detained in custody, and his petition to be discharged is denied, and the prisoner is remanded to the custody of his surety on his bail bond, to be tried on the charges pending against him in the hustings court of the city of Petersburg.

Petition denied.

BROWN et al. v. TOMBERLIN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

PROCESS (§§ 4, 63*) — JUDGMENT (§ 106*) — PLEADING (§§ 129, 336*)—SERVICE OF PROCESS—DEFAULT JUDGMENT—ADMISSIONS BY PLEADING—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

Where an equitable petition is filed against several defendants, against whom substantial relief is prayed, they are not called upon to answer the petition, unless they are served with a copy of the petition and process as provided by law.

(a) Nor are they in default unless such service has been perfected; it not appearing that they have waived service and process.

(b) The provision of the Code requiring defendants to admit, deny, or explain why they do not admit or deny, each paragraph of plaintiff's petition, under penalty of having the allegations in plaintiff's petition taken as true, applies to the original petition.

(c) Where defendants fail to answer an amendment, or a cross-petition in equitable proceedings, filed by a codefendant against the other defendants (which cross-petition was not served upon them), the failure so to answer does not authorize the court and jury to treat the allegations in the amendment and cross-petition as admitted.

(d) A judgment by default will not bind a defendant who has not been served with a copy of the petition and process in an action brought against him, unless he has waived service in some manner provided by law.

(e) Mere service of the original petition and process on a defendant, made after the appearance term of the court to which it is returnable, is a nullity, in the absence of an order to perfect service.

(f) The court is not authorized to direct a joint verdict against defendants, based on pleadings being taken as true, when a portion only of the material pleadings were served on some of the defendants, and no valid service of any of them was had on one of the defendants.

Error from Superior Court, Appling County; C. B. Conyers, Judge.

Action by O. F. Dean and others against J. H. Tomberlin and others. Judgment for plaintiffs against defendants, and for defendant Tomberlin against defendants W. F. Brown and another, and defendants W. F. Brown and another bring error. Reversed.

W. W. Bennett, for plaintiffs in error. V. E. Padgett and Jas. R. Thomas, for defendant in error.

HILL, J. O. F. Dean and others filed their equitable petition against J. H. Tomberlin, W. F. Brown, and J. T. Brown, to the March term, 1910, of Appling superior court, alleging Tomberlin to be a resident of Pierce county, W. F. Brown to be a resident of Appling county, and J. T. Brown to be a resident of Florida, and praying for an injunction, appointment of a receiver, cancellation of the transfer of certain letters patent, judgment against the defendants, and the sale of the letters patent. A temporary order was granted by the judge, restraining the defendants from selling or in any manner disposing of the letters patent in question. W. F. Brown was served with a copy of the petition and process on the 22d day of November, 1909, and J. T. Brown, who was a resident of Wayne county, Ga. (although alleged to be a citizen of Florida), was served with a copy of petition and process May 2, 1910, by the deputy sheriff of Wayne county, Ga. The plaintiffs amended their petition, after the service of J. T. Brown, by alleging that the latter was not a citizen of Florida, but was a citizen of Wayne county, Ga. At the interlocutory hearing, and at the first term of the superior court when the petition was made returnable, one of the defendants, Tomberlin, filed his answer and cross-bill, admitting that he sold a certain interest in the letters patent to W. F. and J. T. Brown, and alleged that W. F. and J. T. Brown were indebted to him in the sum of $2,000 for the letters patent, and prayed for a judgment against the two defendants, W. F. and J. T. Brown, neither of whom appeared in person or by counsel, nor did either of them file any defense or other proceeding in the case. At the March term, 1911, the plaintiffs filed certain amendments to their original petition, and, upon application, made W. R. Beach a party plaintiff. Neither the cross-bill and answer of Tomberlin nor the amended petition of the plaintiffs was served upon either W. F. or J. T. Brown. Upon call of the case at the March term, 1911, counsel for the plaintiffs announced that they desired to take a verdict and decree in an uncontested case; and under said statement and by direction of the court he did take a verdict and decree. No evidence was introduced on behalf of the plaintiffs, or on the part of Tomberlin. The court having directed a verdict and rendered a decree in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendants, and in favor of Tomberlin against W. F. and J. T. Brown, the two last named excepted.

We think the court erred in directing the verdict of which complaint is made. Undoubtedly, where suit has been properly brought, and the defendants are served with copies of the petition and process, and fail to appear in court or make answer, and are in default, the averments plainly and distinctly made in the plaintiff's petition shall be taken as prima facie true, unless the defendant states in his answer that he can neither admit nor deny such averments because of the want of sufficient information. Civil Code 1910, § 5539. The record shows that W. F. Brown, one of the defendants, was served with a copy of the petition and process, but not with the amended petition. J. T. Brown, although alleged to be a citizen of Florida, was served with a copy of the petition and process in Wayne county, Ga., personally by the deputy sheriff of that county, but not with the amended petition. In fact, the service was made before the petition was amended. The amendment was material to the action. The answer of the defendant Tomberlin admitted various allegations in the plaintiffs' petition, but denied others, and his cross-bill alleged a cause of action against his codefendants, W. F. and J. T. Brown, and prayed a verdict and judgment against them in his favor for $2,000; but the cross-bill was never served on either of the codefendants. This makes an unusual case. In the brief of counsel for defendants in error it is stated that "an acknowledgment of service was duly entered and acknowledged by their attorney, Jos. A. Morris, who represented said defendants at the time," etc.; but, if such be the case, the record fails to disclose it. This case is contrary to the general rule and custom where only the plaintiff has judgment against the defendants. But here one of the defendants, Tomberlin, sets up an entirely new cause of action in the same suit in which he is sued, against his codefendants W. F. and J. T. Brown. Admitting partially his liability in favor of the plaintiffs, he prays judgment against his codefendants for $2,000. When the case was called in court, counsel for plaintiffs announced that he desired to take a verdict and decree in an uncontested case; and on the statement of counsel the court directed a verdict and signed a decree for the plaintiff against all the defendants for the full relief prayed for, and also in favor of the defendant Tomberlin, on his cross-bill against the defendants W. F. and J. T. Brown, for all the relief prayed for in the cross-bill. Under the facts disclosed by the record, we do not see how this verdict and decree can stand. But one of the defendants against whom the cross-bill was directed has been served with a copy of the original petition and process, and he was not served with the amended petition. Neither of these defendants was served with the cross-bill, nor does it appear that either of the defendants in the cross-bill has made such appearance in person or by counsel as to amount to a waiver of petition and process. If service was not perfected before the first term of the superior court, then, under the rulings of this court, an order should have been taken at that term to perfect service on those upon whom it had not been perfected. The mere service of the original process on the defendant J. T. Brown, made after the appearance term of the case, had no legal effect whatever. A codefendant is not bound to answer until he is served with a copy of the cross-bill, unless he waives that right by appearance and answer, or in some other way. A valid judgment or decree cannot be rendered against a defendant unless he has been duly served and put on notice of the complaint made against him, or he has waived that right in some manner pointed out by the law. He is entitled to due process of law—to his day in court; and if he has not had this, and a verdict and judgment be rendered against him, then, on a proper motion made, it should be set aside. As these defendants have not had their day in court, and been put on notice of the case made against them, nor waived that right, we must hold that the verdict against them was erroneously directed. Hudson v. Hudson, 119 Ga. 637 (3, 4), 46 S. E. 874; Brown v. Railroad Co., 131 Ga. 259, 62 S. E. 186; Allen v. Mutual Loan, etc., Co., 86 Ga. 74, 76, 12 S. E. 265; Peck v. La Roche, 86 Ga. 314, 12 S. E. 638; Civil Code 1910, §§ 5563, 5561, 5559.

The plaintiffs have no right to a judgment in this case except by default, and only one defendant was in default, and he was not so as to the amended petition; for he was neither in court, nor had waived his right, nor was served with a copy of the proceedings filed against him. The rule as to taking judgment by default does not apply to a case where an amendment is filed which is material to the judgment rendered and the defendant is not served with a copy of the amendment. See Hudson v. Hudson, 119 Ga. 637, 46 S. E. 874. Nor would it apply to the defendant J. T. Brown, who was alleged to be in Florida, and who was served by petition and process before the amendment to the petition was allowed. Nor is a codefendant bound to answer unless he is served. One codefendant cannot file an answer and set up therein a cross-action against codefendants and take judgment by default against them, with no proof whatever, when no service has been perfected upon the codefendants, and there is no waiver by them. J. T. Brown, alleged to be in Florida, and not served with a copy of the amendment or defendant's cross-bill, was not called to come into court under penalty of a judgment by default. Neither of the codefendants, W. F.

and J. T. Brown, was called on to answer the cross-bill of the defendant Tomberlin, and were in no such default as to him as to render them liable to a judgment by default. In 1 Black on Judgments, § 211, it is said: "When we inquire as to the proper disposition to be made of a joint judgment against several defendants, which is void as to one of them, when it is brought before a court of review by writ of error or appeal, we find the authorities more nearly harmonious. In general, they agree that it cannot be affirmed as to one defendant and reversed as to another, but must be reversed as an entirety." In Harralson v. McArthur, 87 Ga. 478, 13 S. E. 594, 13 L. R. A. 689, it was held: "A joint verdict and judgment against several defendants, some of whom were never served, and had not waived service by appearance, should be set aside on motion made at the same term." And in Tedlie v. Dill, 3 Ga. 104, 105, it was said: "A judgment, as being an entire thing, cannot be reversed in part and stand good as to the other part, or be reversed as to one party and remain good against the rest. Hob. 90; Carth. 235. If judgment is entered against joint defendants, when one of them is dead, the judgment shall be reversed for error as to all of them; for in such case, if the plaintiff proceed, it is at his peril. He ought to make a special entry of the death of the party, namely, to suggest it on the record, with 'nihil ulterius versus eum fiat,' and then take judgment only against the others. Id. 149." The question at last resolves itself to this (in view of the tangled web of the petition, amended petition, answer and cross-bill, of service on some and not on other parties to the case, of failure to perfect service, etc.): Can the court untangle the web, and separate the legal from the illegal, and uphold the verdict and decree as to some, and set it aside as to the other defendants? The whole case is so confused and interwoven, the legal with the illegal, that the only course open, in order for all parties to have their day in court and their rights, whatever they are, adjudicated, is to reverse the judgment of the court below and order a new trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

REDFEARN v. THOMPSON. (No. 3,241.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 101*)—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

In an action for slander, where the language alleged to have been used imputes to the plaintiff guilt of an indictable offense, he establishes a prima facie case upon proof that the slanderous language, substantially as alleged in the petition, was used by the defendant; and, without more, the plaintiff is presumed to be innocent of the crime charged. This is true, whether the defendant pleads justification or not. Therefore it is proper, where the alleged slanderous words charged a crime, to instruct the jury that "the plaintiff is presumed to be innocent of the charges imputed to her by the alleged slanderous words of the defendant, set out in the plaintiff's petition, and, until or unless it is overcome by satisfactory proof, this presumption of innocence in the plaintiff's favor remains with her through every stage of the trial."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 273-280; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§§ 56, 61*)—ACTIONS—EFFECT OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence that the plaintiff's general character or reputation was bad at the time the defendant used the alleged slanderous words, or before that time, presents no defense to an action for slander, based upon words charging a specific crime. The fact that the character of the plaintiff in an action for slander is bad may serve to mitigate the damages, but cannot prevent recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 153-156; Dec. Dig. §§ 56, 61.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—NECESSITY.

The court having properly instructed the jury that evidence of the bad character of the plaintiff, who sought to recover damages for an alleged slander, might be considered by the jury in assessing the damages, it was not error, in the absence of an appropriate timely request, to omit any further instruction upon the subject. The language thus used in referring to the evidence upon the subject of the plaintiff's character was favorable to the defendant, and the jury could not have been misled thereby into increasing such damages as might be awarded; and if fuller instructions were desired they should have been requested.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 628-641; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 968*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—COMPETENCY OF JURORS.

The finding of the court, when sitting in lieu of the common-law triors, as to the competency of jurors, is not subject to review. A challenge for principal cause being considered as a matter of law, a judgment of the trial court thereon may be reviewed; but, in case of a challenge to the favor, the decision of the judge as trior, being essentially the determination of a question of fact, is final and conclusive. Therefore the judge's finding as to the jurors who were attacked for prejudice and bias cannot be made a ground of error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 968.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 344*)—VERDICT—IMPEACHMENT BY JURORS.

An affidavit, given by a juror after the verdict was rendered, to the effect that he did not voluntarily assent to the verdict, cannot be received. A juror will not be heard to impeach the verdict after its record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 813; Dec. Dig. § 344.*]

6. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL REFUSED.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

Error from City Court of Thomasville; W. H. Hammond, Judge.

Action by Mrs. F. B. Thompson against R. L. Redfearn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Fondren Mitchell and Branch & Snow, for plaintiff in error. Roscoe Luke and Theo. Titus, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. Mrs. Thompson brought suit for an alleged slander. The jury returned a verdict in her favor for $500. Exception is taken to the judgment overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial. Inasmuch as it cannot be said that the verdict is without evidence to support it, we shall not discuss the general grounds of the motion for new trial; for, unless the verdict was induced by some of the errors assigned in the other grounds of the motion, there would be no theory upon which this court could order another trial.

The slanderous words alleged in the plaintiff's petition imputed to her guilt of the offense of adultery, and adultery and fornication. In the twelfth paragraph of the petition the defendant was alleged to have used certain slanderous words, which imputed to the petitioner, not only the crime of adultery, but also the crime of murder. By an amendment to his original answer the defendant pleaded justification, in so far as he was alleged to have charged the plaintiff with adultery. We purposely omit any reference to the loathsome details of the very voluminous testimony in the case. The defendant introduced a mass of testimony in support of his defense that the statements made by him were true; and, on the other hand, there was testimony which would have authorized the jury to believe that the statements made in regard to the plaintiff were wholly false. Testimony tending to impeach some of the witnesses was introduced. The court also permitted testimony to the effect that the general character of the plaintiff for chastity was bad, and in rebuttal testimony from other witnesses that the plaintiff's character was good. If, in spite of the evidence against her, the jury saw fit to award the plaintiff a verdict, the amount of the verdict, $500, cannot be said to be immoderate. And as the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff (which the result shows was believed by the jury) would have justified even a much larger finding in her favor, there was no error in refusing a new trial, unless some of the errors alleged in the motion for new trial prejudiced the defendant's case and contributed to induce the verdict reached.

[1] 1. The court charged the jury as follows: "At the outset of this trial, gentlemen of the jury, the plaintiff, Mrs. Thompson, is presumed to be innocent of the charges imputed to her by the alleged slanderous words of the defendant, set out in the plaintiff's petition; and until or unless it is overcome by satisfactory proof, this presumption of innocence in the plaintiff's favor remains with her through every stage of the trial." Error is assigned upon this instruction, upon the ground that it gave to the plaintiff the benefit of a presumption applicable to criminal cases alone; there being no presumption of innocence in civil cases. We do not think that the exception is meritorious, and certainly the charge is not subject to the complaint made against it, as requiring the defendant to establish his plea of justification to the satisfaction of the jury beyond a reasonable doubt, as would be true in a criminal case. In fact, when the judge told the jury in this charge that the plaintiff—who was alleged to have been slandered by being charged with the commission of a criminal offense—was presumed to be innocent of the charge, it was tantamount to saying that if she proved the use of the alleged slanderous words, or if the defendant admitted them, it cast upon him the burden of proving the truth of his statements. The statement of the judge dealt with the burden of proof in the case, and not with the degree of mental conviction necessary to enable either the one party or the other to successfully carry that burden. This is plain when he says that the presumption is to be "overcome by satisfactory proof." He did not tell the jury that the defendant had to establish the guilt of the plaintiff by proof satisfying their minds to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt. The case being a civil cause, the jury would naturally infer that by "satisfactory proof" was meant the preponderance of the evidence; but the judge not only instructed the jury very fully as to the meaning and effect of the phrase "preponderance of evidence," but also defined the term "satisfactory proof" as being that degree of reasonable and moral certainty produced by a preponderance of the evidence.

On principle it would seem, where one is slanderously charged with a crime, and he who makes the charge pleads justification, that the same burden of proof in establishing the truth of the alleged slander should be placed upon the defendant who pleads justification as would devolve upon the state were the plaintiff on trial for the crime itself; that is to say, that the defendant in an action of slander or libel, who has pleaded justification, should be required to prove the crime which he has imputed to the plaintiff by evidence which satisfies the jury of the plaintiff's guilt of the crime charged beyond any reasonable doubt. This rule (which is sustained in 2 Starkle on Slander, 98, 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 426, and 2 Addison on Torts, 386) was for some time considered the rule in this state, as will be seen from the decisions in Ransome v. Christian, 56 Ga. 352, and Williams v. Gunnels, 66 Ga. 521; but in Atlanta Journal v. Mayson, 92 Ga. 640, 18 S. E. 1010, 44 Am. St.

Rep. 104, these rulings were reviewed, criticised, and disapproved, with the statement that the question was not directly presented in either of them. Inasmuch, however, as the decision in the case of Atlanta Journal v. Mayson, supra, was rendered by only two justices, and the decision in Williams v. Gunnels, supra, was rendered by a full bench, if the question were now squarely before us, it might well be said to be doubtful which precedent is controlling. However, as we pointed out above, the charge of the judge is not in conflict with the ruling in the Mayson Case, supra, because, with his explanation of the term "satisfactory proof" as contained in the latter portion of his charge it was very plain to the jury that the defendant was only required to establish his plea of justification by a preponderance of the evidence; the court not having charged the jury that the defendant was required to adduce a degree of proof which would satisfy the minds of the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the plaintiff's guilt of the charge made against her by the defendant.

Neither did the court err in charging the jury that the plaintiff was presumed to be innocent of the crime imputed to her by the defendant. The instruction on this point was in reference to who carried the burden of proof, and not to the degree of proof necessary to enable one to carry it successfully. Every person is presumed to have a good character until the contrary is shown, and to be innocent of crime until there is evidence of some kind to establish its existence. The presumption to which the judge referred exists, regardless of the degree of proof which in any particular case may be necessary to rebut it. "There are many authorities which hold that the law presumes that a defendant has a good character. This was held in the case of Stephens v. State, 20 Tex. App. 269; and in the case of Cluck v. State, 40 Ind. 263, the Supreme Court of Indiana held that the law presumes that every man has a good character, and that it would have been competent for counsel to have commented on such presumption. This rule is also laid down in Sackett on Instructions to Juries, p. 651." Bennett v. State, 86 Ga. 404, 12 S. E. 806, 12 L. R. A. 449, 22 Am. St. Rep. 465. In Goggans v. Monroe, 31 Ga. 301, the judgment of the lower court was reversed because it was held to have been error that the court refused to charge a request to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to the legal presumption, in the absence of evidence proving to the contrary, that his character was good. In an action for slander, where the language alleged to have been used imputes to the plaintiff guilt of an indictable offense, he establishes a prima facie case upon proof that the slanderous language, substantially as alleged in the petition, was used by the defendant; and, without more, the plaintiff is presumed to be innocent of the crime charged. This is true, whether the defendant pleads justification or not. Therefore it is proper, where the alleged slanderous words impute a crime, to charge the jury that the plaintiff is presumed to be innocent of the charges imputed by the alleged slanderous words of the defendant, set out in the plaintiff's petition, and that until or unless it is overcome by satisfactory proof this presumption of innocence in the plaintiff's favor remains through every stage of the trial.

[2] 2, 3. Exception is taken to the following instruction in the judge's charge: "If you find the plaintiff to be entitled to recover, and if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff's general character or reputation, at and before the speaking by defendant of the slanderous words in question, was bad, you would have the right to take that fact into account in assessing the plaintiff's damages." Two assignments of error are predicated upon this instruction. Both of them are without merit. In the first it is insisted that if the jury should have believed, from the evidence, that the plaintiff's general character or reputation was bad, and if they should have believed that the defendant did not use the words charging the crime of murder, the plaintiff could not recover at all. In the second it is urged that the charge gave the jury no intimation as to how they could take the fact of the plaintiff's bad character into account, either by way of diminution or increase in the amount of damages. Evidence that the plaintiff's general character or reputation was bad at the time the defendant used the alleged slanderous words, or before that time, presents no defense in an action of slander predicated upon words charging a specific crime. The fact that the character of the plaintiff in an action for slander is bad may serve to mitigate the damages, but cannot prevent recovery.

[3] The court having properly instructed the jury that evidence of the bad character of the plaintiff, who sought to recover damages for an alleged slander, might be considered by the jury in assessing the plaintiff's damages, it was not error, in the absence of an appropriate timely request, to omit any further instruction upon the subject. The language used in reference to the evidence upon the subject of the plaintiff's character was favorable to the defendant, and the jury could not have been misled thereby into increasing such damages as might be awarded, and if fuller instructions were desired they should have been requested.

[4] 4. Numerous affidavits were presented attacking B. C. Johnson, the foreman of the jury, and S. M. Chastain, a member of the jury, upon the ground that they were incompetent through prejudice and bias, and disqualified to serve as jurors, because they had formed and expressed a fixed opinion in favor of the plaintiff before they were impaneled to try the case. A countershowing was made in behalf of these jurors, and the court held them to be competent by overruling these grounds of the motion for new trial. Among the affidavits in support of the jurors are those of a number of witnesses testifying to the good character of each of the jurors. It is insisted that the judge should not have considered the affidavits presented in support of the good character and standing of the jurors, but should have repelled the evidence upon the subject of the character of the jurors who were attacked. The judge was sitting as a trier, and we see no reason why he could not take into consideration the evidence as to the integrity and general good character of the jurors in connection with the other testimony before him. Granting that testimony to the effect that the jurors were men of high character and good standing would, in some instances, be irrelevant, there was, in the present instance, direct conflict between the witnesses as to material statements which were related as having been made by each juror. The jurors were each witnesses, and it is likely that the effect was to impeach these witnesses by proving contradictory statements, and in any case proof of good character may tend to sustain a witness whose impeachment is sought by proof of contradictory statements.

But this is unimportant, for the finding of the judge upon the subject of a juror's prejudice or bias, or the absence of disqualifying prejudice or bias, is not subject to review. Those decisions of the Supreme Court holding to the contrary were rendered prior to the passage of the act of 1856, which substituted the trial judge for the triers known to the common law. The cases of Wade v. State, 12 Ga. 25, and Anderson v. State, 14 Ga. 709, which are cited by counsel for plaintiff in error, are rulings made prior to the act of 1856. In the case of Bishop v. State, 9 Ga. 129, 130, in which Judge Lumpkin well said: "It is the pride of the Constitution of this country that all cases should be tried by jurors from whose breasts are excluded all bias and prejudice. To break down any of these safeguards, so wisely erected, and to suffer jurors to decide upon the life and liberty of the citizen whose minds are poisoned by passion or prejudice, would be to stab the upright administration of justice in its most vital parts." And the decisions reversing the judgment of the court below refusing a motion for new trial in such cases were of a still earlier date. The question is fully discussed in the opinion in Turner v. State, 114 Ga. 421, 40 S. E. 308. The distinction between a challenge for principal cause and challenges to the favor is there pointed out, and it is held that as to a principal challenge it must be principally a question of law, submitted to the court as a court, and that in such a challenge the decision of the court is subject to review. However, as to a challenge to the favor, it was held in that case (citing numerous authorities) that "under our system, where the court is substituted for the triers to decide challenges to the favor (Reid v. State, 20 Ga. 688), the court's decision as to such a challenge is on a footing with that of the triers, and is final and conclusive. Thomp. & Mer. Jur. §§ 238, 249, et seq.; Thomp. Trials, § 100; 12 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 470. 'The decision of the judge, as trier, can no more be made a ground of error before this court than the verdict of triers could have been.' Galloway v. State, 25 Ga. 596." Consequently the judge's findings as to the jurors who were attacked for prejudice and bias in this case cannot be made a ground of error.

[§] 5. One of the jurors who tried the instant case made an affidavit that the verdict returned was not his verdict; that it did not speak his opinion of the law or of the evidence, and he did not concur in it; that he became ill during the deliberation of the jury, and needed a doctor, and so informed the other members of the jury, and insisted that he be given the services of a doctor, but that some of the members of the jury, including the foreman, told him that before he could get the services of a doctor he must allow them to return a verdict for the plaintiff; and that, while the juror had been in favor of a verdict for the defendant, he agreed that the verdict should be returned into court only in order to get a doctor and be relieved of his illness, but the verdict did not speak the truth of the case, according to his opinion, and was not his verdict. The judge declined to consider the juror's affidavit impeaching the verdict; and he could not have done otherwise, under the repeated rulings in this state. A juror cannot be heard to impeach the verdict returned into court, after its record. The principle succinctly stated in Bishop v. State, 9 Ga. 121 (4), that "the affidavit of a juror will not be received to impeach his verdict," has been reiterated too often to permit of space for citations.

[§] 6. It appears that the trial was free from error, and the evidence, as we have heretofore said, being sufficient to authorize a finding for the plaintiff, there was no error in refusing a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

JOS. ROSENHEIM SHOE CO. v. HORNE et al.HORNE et al. v. JOS. ROSENHEIM SHOE CO.

(Nos. 3,249, 3,250.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 27, 1912.)(Syllabus by the Court.)1. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 20)—DISMISSAL— —GROUNDS.

The motion to dismiss the bill of exceptions, on the ground that it does not disclose with sufficient certainty who are the parties to it, is not well taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 8*)—GROUNDS——PENDENCY OF FORMER SUIT.

The liability which, under Civil Code 1910, § 2220, attaches to the organizers of a corporation for beginning to do business before the minimum capital stock is subscribed for, attaches in favor of creditors, and not in favor of the corporation itself. It is a liability which a trustee in bankruptcy of the corporation cannot legally enforce; hence the pendency of a suit by a trustee in bankruptcy on this alleged cause of action does not afford ground of abatement as to a suit filed by a creditor in his own behalf.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Cent. Dig. § 3972; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

PARTNERSHIP (§ 42*)—ORGANIZATION—LIA-BILITY OF PROMOTERS.

Prior to the formal and complete organization of a corporation, the organizers of it may make provisional contracts in behalf of the corporation, which may become binding on the corporation after it begins business; but in the meantime, and until the corporation is legally organized, the promoters are liable as partners. The law does not require that the minimum capital stock, as stated in the charter, shall be fully subscribed for until formal organization, and till the corporation, as such, begins to do business. Hence one dealing with the persons who have obtained a charter for a corporation, but who have not formally completed organization thereunder, may, though he has knowledge, at the time he contracts, that the capital stock has not been subscribed for, hold the organizers liable as partners, when they afterwards go forward and commence business as a corporation without requiring the capital stock to be subscribed; it not appearing that he knew that the persons with whom he dealt did not intend to obey the law in this respect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 57; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

4. PARTNERSHIP (§ 42*)—ORGANIZATION—LIA-BILITY OF PROMOTERS—"MINIMUM CAPITAL STOCK."

Where the application for charter and the charter of the corporation name only one sum as the proposed capital of the corporation, that sum is the "minimum capital stock," which Civil Code 1910, § 2220, requires to be subscribed for in order to relieve the organizers of the corporation from individual liability to creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 57; Dec. Dig. § 42.*]

Error from City Court of Eastman; C. W. Griffin, Judge.

Action by S. E. Horne and others against the Jos. Rosenheim Shoe Company. To a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant brings error, and plaintiffs file a cross-bill of exceptions. Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed, and on cross-bill affirmed.

The plaintiffs sold goods to the manager of a corporation in process of organization. The capital stock of the corporation was stated in the application for charter and in the charter itself as $20,000. The full capital stock was never subscribed or paid in; indeed, only 10 per cent.—that is, $2,000—was ever subscribed or paid in. Before the plaintiffs' bill was fully paid for, the corporation became bankrupt. The trustee in bankruptcy and the plaintiff each separately sued the promoters of the corporation to enforce that liability declared by Civil Code 1910, § 2220, as follows: "Persons who organize a company and transact business in its name, before the minimum capital stock has been subscribed for, are liable to creditors to make good the minimum capital stock with interest." The suit by the trustee in bankruptcy is involved in the present case only to the extent that its pendency was set up by the defendants as a plea in abatement to the present action.

The facts of the transaction are practically undisputed. The principal reason asserted by the defendants as to why the plaintiffs should not hold them liable is that they knew, at the time they extended the credit, that the full capital stock had not been subscribed. The proof as to this element of the case comes from the plaintiffs' credit man. He testified, in substance, that when he passed on the order for the goods he had before him reports from the commercial agencies stating that the corporation was in process of organization, and that only $2,000 had been subscribed for and paid in at that time. He further stated in his testimony that he did not understand or believe that only this sum was to be subscribed for and paid in; nor did the commercial reports so state. His understanding was that the organization was not complete, that it would be completed by the full capital stock being subscribed, and that it would be paid in as needed. The court granted nonsuit on the ground that this knowledge as to the capital stock not being subscribed for prevented the plaintiffs from recovering.

To this judgment, as well as to a number of other rulings, the plaintiff brings error. The defendants have filed a cross-bill of exceptions.

Hardeman, Jones, Callaway & Johnston, R. S. Wimberly, and Jno. R. L. Smith, for plaintiff in error. W. M. Clements, W. L. & Warren Grice, and Akerman & Akerman, for defendants in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The defendants in error have moved to dismiss the bill of exceptions because it does not definitely disclose who are parties to it. It recites that it is filed in a case of Joseph Rosenheim Shoe Company against certain persons and a corporation, naming them, and that to the final judgment the plaintiff excepts and tenders the bill of exceptions. These recitals are consistent with the record. The motion to dismiss is overruled. Joiner v. Singletary, 106 Ga. 257, 32 S. E. 90.

[2] 2. As to whether the present suit was subject to abatement because of the pendency of the prior suit instituted by the trustee in bankruptcy of the corporation on the same alleged cause of action: The right of action declared by Civil Code 1910, § 2220, is given to the creditors, and not to the corporation, or to any one standing as its representative or successor in title. In Walters v. Porter, 3 Ga. App. 73, 59 S. E. 452, this court allowed the receiver appointed in an equitable action against the corporation to maintain a similar action with the consent and under the direction of the court of his appointment. That decision was based on the theory that the receiver, under all the circumstances of the case, not only was clothed with such right to sue as formerly resided in the corporation, but also represented the creditors and was authorized to sue in their behalf. It was on this second fact, the fact that he had been vested with the right of action normally residing in the creditors, and not the fact that he was also the representative of the corporation, that this court recognized the receiver's right to bring suit to enforce the liability against the promoters of the corporation.

A trustee in bankruptcy, upon his appointment and qualification, succeeds (except in so far as it is otherwise specially provided) to the title to all property of the bankrupt, and becomes authorized to sue and recover in most cases where, but for the intervention of the bankruptcy proceedings, the bankrupt could have sued. Still such title and such authority to sue as the trustee in bankruptcy possesses is only that conferred by the act of Congress. He is, in a sense, a representative of the creditors and of the bankrupt, but is a special and not a general representative. The extent and limits of his title as to property and as to causes of action are prescribed in section 70 of the bankruptcy act (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 565 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3451]). Neither this nor any other portion of the act transfers to him causes of action accruing personally to the creditors. It is true that by the amendment of June 25, 1910 (Act June 25, 1910, c. 412, 36 Stat. 838), the trustee is vested with the same rights as if he were a judgment creditor; but this, as plainly appears from the context, is intended to apply only to cases in which the trustee is suing to recover assets belonging, in law or in equity, to the bankrupt estate, or is defending against the claims of others seeking to take property from his possession. For unpaid stock subscriptions the corporation would, but for the bankruptcy, have a cause of action. King v. Sullivan, 93 Ga. 621, 20 S. E. 76. And to enforce that liability the trustee in bankruptcy may sue. Commercial Bank v. Warthen, 119 Ga. 990, 47 S. E. 536. If, instead of paying the subscriptions in cash, or in property at fair valuation, the stockholders go through the form of satisfying their obligations on their contracts of subscription by paying in property fraudulently overvalued, the law looks upon the subscriptions as still unpaid, and the trustee of the bankrupt corporation may sue to compel the delinquent stockholders to make good that of which the corporation has been deprived through the fraud. Allen v. Grant, 122 Ga. 552, 50 S. E. 494.

But the liability of the stockholders in each of the cases just mentioned is essentially different from the liability imposed by law upon the persons who undertake to organize a corporation and proceed to do business before the minimum capital stock is subscribed. When persons in this state apply for a charter for a corporation, and state what the capital stock of the corporation is to be, the expression "capital stock" means something. It means that the new creature of the law is to start out on its business career with assets of the amount stated. It means that those organizing the corporation, while desiring to exempt themselves from general individual liability for the liabilities that the corporation may incur, will see that it starts off in life endowed with this amount of money (or the equivalent of money) which is hazarded upon the enterprise. Those who are to deal with the corporation are publicly informed that this impersonal trader starts off with this much capital pledged to its success. Ten per cent. of the amount of the capital stock designated in the charter must be actually paid in before the corporation begins business. Civil Code 1910, § 2823 (3). The other 90 per cent. need not be paid in, provided the corporation holds unpaid stock subscriptions, bona fide taken, for that amount. Bing v. Bank of Kingston, 5 Ga. App. 578, 63 S. E. 652.

But the subscribers for the stock may be compelled to pay it in, and are individually liable for it, whenever the interests of the corporation or of its creditors so require. Civil Code 1910, § 2823 (3). Thus the amount paid in, or the amount paid in plus the individual liability of bona fide subscribers for the corporate stock, must always amount to as much as the capital which, according to representations made in the application for the charter, is to be employed; else the persons who, in violation of this promise and duty, organize the company and proceed to transact business in its name, do not relieve themselves of personal liability for the debts of the organization. In such cases the liability attaches to the promoters of the enterprise, not in their capacity as stockholders of the corporation, nor by reason of any contract between them and the corporation, but because they have violated the law and have broken a duty to persons dealing with the corporation as if it had been legally organized. The cause of action on this account does not arise in favor of the corporation, but arises in favor of those who have dealt with the organizers; that is, usually in favor of persons who have extended credit to the corporation on faith of the organizers' promise and duty to see that it was endowed with the amount of capital stated in the charter. This cause of action does not pass to the trustee in the event the corporation is declared bankrupt. The plea in abatement setting up the pendency of the suit by the trustee in bankruptcy was properly stricken on demurrer.

[3] 3. The next question is whether the trial judge correctly held that the plaintiffs could not recover because their credit man knew at the time the goods were sold that only about 10 per cent. of the stated capital had been subscribed for and paid in. From the testimony of this credit man as a witness, it is not altogether plain that he knew that only this amount had been subscribed, but it is plain that he knew that only this amount had been paid in. His testimony does show, however, that organization was not complete at this time, and that he did not know that the remainder was not to be subscribed or paid in. Now "one extending credit to a corporation cannot complain of acts of mismanagement on the part of officers and agents of the corporation prior to the time when the credit was extended." Commercial Bank v. Warthen, 119 Ga. 990, 47 S. E. 536. How far does this principle apply here? This transaction took place before the corporation formally began business, but was ratified by the corporation afterwards; for it took the goods and made payments on the account. The law does not require any part of the capital stock to be paid in before the corporation begins business; but prior to formal organization, while the necessary stock subscriptions are being obtained and other preliminaries are being attended to, many things of a provisional nature must often be done, and the law contemplates that they may be done. Bing v. Bank of Kingston, 5 Ga. App. 578, 63 S. E. 652.

As to debts incurred by the organizers of the corporation while the affair is in this provisional state, they are liable as partners until the corporation is duly organized and its corporate responsibility is substituted for their prior individual responsibility. In this case the responsibility was never shifted. There was no fraud and no wrong in the situation as it stood when these goods were sold. The time had not arrived when it became requisite that the full amount of the capital stock should be subscribed. These creditors had the right to act upon the assumption that these organizers would complete the organization as they had declared in the application for charter it would be completed, holding them individually liable in the meantime. What the credit man of the plaintiffs knew in this case charged the plaintiffs with knowledge that the corporation was not then legally organized, but not with notice that it would not be. The judge erred in granting nonsuit.

[4] 4. As to the point raised by the defendants that the liability against persons undertaking to organize the corporation is, by Civil Code 1910, § 2220, to make good "the minimum capital stock," and that the charter in the present case set no minimum, and that, therefore, no liability exists: Sometimes an application for charter recites that the capital to be employed shall not be less than so many dollars and not more than so many, or that it shall be so many dollars with a privilege of increase, and in such cases the lowest amount named is the minimum referred to in the Code section; but in other cases, as in the one at bar, only one amount is named, and that, as it seems perfectly clear to us, is both minimum and maximum.

The other points made in the record are controlled by the views already set forth, and we need not enlarge upon them.

Judgment on the main bill of exceptions reversed; on the cross-bill affirmed.

ACME BREWING CO. v. WM. RAHR SONS CO. (No. 3,333.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

SALES (§ 121*)—RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—ESTOPPEL.

The contract was entire. There was no offer or attempt to return any of the malt which was shipped, but, on the contrary, a deduction for deficiency in quality was accepted by the purchaser, and the malt put to his own use. Consequently the purchaser estopped himself from rescinding the contract. The facts in the present case, as stated by the pleadings, are practically and substantially identical with those in Henderson Elevator Co. v. North Georgia Milling Co., 126 Ga. 279, 55 S. E. 50, and the decision of the Supreme Court in that case is fully controlling, so that there was no error in striking the defendant's answer, nor in thereafter entering judgment for the plaintiff.

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by the Acme Brewing Company against the Wm. Rahr Sons Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Ellis & Jordan, for plaintiff in error. Hardeman, Jones, Callaway & Johnston, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. According to the allegations of the petition, the defendant entered into a contract by which it agreed to purchase 10,000 bushels of malt from the plaintiff, at $1.05 per bushel "f. o. b. Macon," which was to be ordered out by the defendant until all of it should be taken before October 1st, and each shipment was to be paid for by the defendant within 30 days from the date of the shipment. The defendant ordered out, and the plaintiff shipped, at various times, in four shipments, about 8,000 bushels of the malt, and the defendant paid for it. The petition alleged that the plaintiff was willing and offered to deliver to the defendant the balance—about 2,000 bushels—not theretofore ordered out, and requested the defendant to accept it and pay the agreed price therefor; but it was alleged that the defendant would not accept the balance of the malt, and that thereupon the plaintiff, after giving notice to the defendant, sold it at its market price on the defendant's account. This suit was brought to recover the difference between the amount received from the sale of the undelivered portion of the malt contracted for and the contract price at which it had been sold to the defendant. Various letters and telegrams constituting the contract were set out in the petition and attached thereto. The defendant in its answer admitted the correspondence constituting the contract, and that it had agreed to accept the malt as alleged by the plaintiff, and had refused, when requested, to order out the last shipment, or to accept or pay for it. The answer put the plaintiff upon proof of some of the allegations as to the sale of the malt on the defendant's account; but as the matters dealt with in these portions of the petition are largely matters of calculation, and as no point is made upon this in the brief, the only real question turns upon whether the defendant's plea sets up any valid reason why the defendant should be relieved from the obligation of the contract admitted by it. The affirmative defense which the brewing company sought to interpose set up that out of an order of 10,000 bushels of malt, to be delivered between May and October, 7,979 bushels had been ordered out in several shipments, for which the defendant paid the plaintiff the contract price. Each of the shipments contained malt inferior in kind and quality to that contemplated by the contract, due to the presence of unreasonable quantities of trash and screenings in every shipment. Upon notification of this fact the plaintiff made allowances to the defendant on each of the several shipments, to cover the trash and screenings, which are fully set forth in an exhibit attached to the answer. The defendant notified the plaintiff several times prior to the time when the last shipment should have been ordered out that it refused to order forward any further shipments for the reason that the plaintiff had failed to comply with its contract, in that the several shipments already made by it failed to contain first-class screened malt, free from trash and screenings. The defendant pleaded that by reason of the several breaches of the contract by the plaintiff the contract was abrogated. On demurrer the court struck the answer, and thereafter entered judgment against the defendant. Exception is taken to both of these rulings.

It will be seen, from the above statement, that there was no rejection of any of the malt actually shipped, nor any complaint of the quality of the malt, though the defendant claims deductions for a certain number of pounds of trash and screenings on each shipment, which were allowed by the plaintiff. As the finding for the plaintiff, after the striking of the defendant's answer, was inevitable, and the exception to the action of the court in "rendering final judgment on pleadings from which the material defense of defendant, now and here plaintiff in error, had been stricken on demurrer," is only necessary in order to comply with the ruling in Lyndon v. Georgia Railway & Electric Co., 129 Ga. 353, 58 S. E. 1047, the only question presented to this court is the one presented by the exception to the ruling upon the demurrer. In view of the admission of the defendant that the contract was made, and that four shipments were made under it, for which it paid the purchase price, the only main question was whether under the facts stated the defendant had rescinded or could rescind the contract. The facts in the present case are practically and substantially identical with those in Henderson Elevator Co. v. North Georgia Milling Co., 126 Ga. 279, 55 S. E. 50, and the decision of the Supreme Court in that case properly controlled the judgment of the trial judge. Practically the only difference between the two cases is that the case cited concerned a shipment of corn, and not of malt, and the period within which the shipments were to be made was different from that in the case at bar. "Where there was a contract of sale of corn, and a portion was delivered, paid for, and used by the purchaser, he cannot rescind the contract upon the ground that the quantity received and accepted by him was inferior in quality to that stipulated in the contract." Henderson Elevator Co. v. North Georgia Milling Co., supra. See, also, Miller v. Moore, 83 Ga. 684, 10 S. E. 360, 6 L. R. A. 374, 20 Am. St. Rep. 329; Cahen v. Platt, 69 N. Y. 348, 25 Am. Rep. 203.

The learned counsel for the plaintiff in error, in support of his contention that the delivery of inferior malt was a breach of the contract, and that the Acme Brewing Company was entitled to treat the breach as a discharge from further performance of the terms of the contract upon every particular, cites the case of Harden v. Lang, 110 Ga. 304, 36 S. E. 100. It will readily be observed, however, that in the Harden Case the principle is distinctly announced that when a breach is occasioned, and the purchaser desires to rescind the contract, he must not only notify the opposite party, but he must return the articles he has received, and Judge Little in delivering the opinion says: "When, after such breach, he not only retains the articles received, but puts them to his own use, and notifies the seller he has purchased elsewhere the part of the machinery contracted for, but not delivered, this is equivalent to an election to abide by the terms of the contract, and he thereafter holds under those terms the articles received." This principle is adverted to in the Henderson Elevator Company Case, supra. In that case the defendant had used the corn. The defendant in the present case used the malt. It could not return it. It did not offer to do so, and, as was said by Judge Bleckley in Summerall v. Graham, 62 Ga. 729, "Restitution before absolution is as sound in law as in theology." The plaintiff in error also relied upon the decisions of this court in Gude & Walker v. Bailey Co., 4 Ga. App. 230, 61 S. E. 135, and Cincinnati Glass Co. v. Stephens, 3 Ga. App. 766-768, 60 S. E. 360. Neither of these cases is in point. The facts in each case clearly distinguish them from the case at bar, and in each case the ruling turns largely upon the fact that the facts were such as to authorize the inference that there was a novation.

There was no error in sustaining the demurrer and striking the defendant's plea. Judgment affirmed.

FLINT RIVER & N. E. R. CO. v. MAPLES et al. (No. 3,418.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 24, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PLEADING (§§ 18, 192*) — RAILROADS (§ 478*)—ALLEGATIONS IN GENERAL—ACTIONS FOR FIRES.

Reasonable certainty as to essential statements is sufficient to enable pleadings to withstand a special demurrer. Complete particularity of statement is not required, where a reasonable inference, from the statements made, readily suggests the facts.

(a) In an action brought against a railroad company for damages due to negligently setting out fire, the manner in which the fire was set out must be alleged; but from the very nature of the case it is not always within the power of the plaintiff to state the particular agent, servant, or employé who actually started the fire, and the omission on the part of the plaintiff to specify the particular employé to whose negligence the injury was traceable will not subject the petition to special demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 409; Dec. Dig. §§ 18, 192;* Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1690, 1698-1705; Dec. Dig. § 478.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 204*)—EVIDENCE (§ 157*)—TRIAL (§ 55*)—OBJECTIONS IN LOWER COURT—BEST EVIDENCE—EXCLUSION OF IMPROPER EVIDENCE.

While the best method of proving that no administration was ever had upon a particular estate is to introduce the evidence of the ordinary, or of another who has examined the record in the proper court of ordinary, that no letters of administration upon the estate are shown by those records, still where a witness testifies to the effect that no administration has ever been granted upon the estate of a named person, and no objection is interposed at the time the testimony is offered, it will be assumed that the witness has made the requisite examination of the records, and testifies from knowledge derived therefrom; for, "unless it affirmatively appears that evidence is hearsay, it is not to be excluded as such, where it is of a nature which admits of its resting on the personal knowledge of the witness."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 204;* Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 157;* Trial, Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

3. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 75*) — RIGHTS OF HEIRS—REAL PROPERTY.

When there is no administration, nor any necessity for administration, realty descends to the heirs at law. The evidence in the present case was sufficient to show that the intestate died before the time of the fire which was alleged to be the cause of the injury and damage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 243-251; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—CHARGE OF COURT.

The verdict was authorized by the evidence. There was no error in the ruling upon the testimony complained of, nor in the charge of the court to which exception is taken.

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. DEATH (§ 4*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by heirs of land against a railroad for negligently setting out fire, uncontroverted testimony that the ancestor of plaintiffs went into possession of the land about 12 years before the trial, and that she had been in possession between 12 and 13 years up to the time of her death, was sufficient to show that she died before the time of the fire, 16 months before the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1135*)—AFFIRMANCE—ERROR NOT SHOWN.

In an action by heirs of land against a railroad company for negligently setting out a fire, a judgment for plaintiffs will not be reversed on the ground that it included the value of rails, which, being personalty, were not inherited by plaintiffs, where it does not affirmatively appear that the verdict included the value of the rails, the other items of damage alleged being greater in amount than the verdict, and no objection was made to the evidence as to the rails, and no motion was made to strike from the petition the items claiming damages for their destruction, and there was testimony sustaining the theory that the rails were cut after the death of the ancestor of plaintiffs, and were therefore the property of plaintiffs in their own right.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1135.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ERRORS—CURE BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a railroad company for negligently setting out fire, an instruction that the next question for the jury to decide was whether the railroad company exercised due diligence in piling cross-ties on the side of the track is not ground for reversal, as assuming that the railroad company piled the cross-ties on the side of the track, where the court subsequently stated that his attention had been called to the fact that he said that the cross-ties were piled in the manner alleged, that that is the allegation they make, but that the jury must look to the evidence to see whether the railroad company has exercised ordinary diligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 705-713; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

8. RAILROADS (§ 481*)—OPERATION—FIRES—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad company for a fire caused by the burning of certain cross-ties by the section foreman, it was not error to admit testimony that the engine had been there 15 or 20 minutes, and that the witness never saw a train set woods on fire.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 481.*]

Error from City Court of Camilla; M. O. Bennet, Judge pro hac.

Action by I. Maples and another against the Flint River & Northeastern Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. J. Hill and Shipp & Kline, for plaintiff in error. E. M. Davis, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. Maples and others brought suit against the railroad company for damages, alleging that the defendant had set out fire, as the result of which the plaintiffs had been damaged in the sum of $490, which was specified as follows: 200 timber trees burned, $220; 760 yards of rail fence, $70; 25 or 30 acres of canebrake, $200; and 2,000 rails burned, $20. The defendant demurred generally and specially to the petition. The court overruled the demurrer, and exceptions pendente lite were filed. On the trial a verdict for $429 was returned in favor of the plaintiffs. The case is brought to this court upon assignments of error on the exceptions pendente lite, and also upon the refusal of a motion for new trial. From evidence in behalf of the plaintiffs the jury were authorized to infer that the fire was caused by the burning of certain cross-ties by the section foreman, perhaps in pursuance of instructions from his superiors. The right of the plaintiffs to maintain the action, and the amount of the recovery, were fully sustained by the testimony.

[1] 1. The court was so clearly right in overruling the general demurrer as to preclude any necessity for discussion upon that subject. The petitioners alleged that they were the sole heirs of Mrs. Margarette J. Maples deceased, late of said (Mitchell) county, and as such were the owners and in possession of two described tracts of land, located in the county and adjoining the defendant's railroad; that the defendant permitted combustible material, such as wire grass and undergrowth, which had become seared and dry, to remain upon the right of way of the said railroad, contiguous to and adjoining the petitioners' land, and through its servants had piled old cross-ties along the right of way, and set fire to these piles of cross-ties at a time when a high wind was blowing in the direction of the petitioners' land and property, which spread to their land, and, in spite of every effort upon their part to check the flames, destroyed the property to which we have above referred. The amendment alleging possession, which was offered in response to the demurrer, cured the only material defect in the petition. The title to the land was only incidentally involved, for the city court of Camilla had no jurisdiction to determine the title to the land. "The bare possession of land authorizes the possessor to recover damages from any person who wrongfully, in any manner, interferes with such possession." Civil Code 1910, § 4472; Southern Ry. Co. v. Thompson, 129 Ga. 367 (9), 58 S. E. 1044; Downing v. Anderson, 126 Ga. 373, 55 S. E. 184.

From the brief of the plaintiff in error it appears that the ground of the special demurrer really insisted upon in this court is the one in which it is contended that the plaintiffs did not put the defendant on notice as to how the fire originated, whether from the defendant voluntarily putting out fire or whether the fire caught from defendant's locomotive; and it is insisted that the effect of overruling the demurrer to this particular part of the petition was, perhaps, to permit the plaintiffs to prove that the fire was put out by the defendant in either of these ways, or to prove that the defendant by any other means fired the plaintiffs' woods and canebrake. Complete particularity of statement is not required where, from the statements made, the facts sought to be alleged may easily be deduced. As was said by Judge Powell in Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Davis, 5 Ga. App. 214 (1), 62 S. E. 1022, "reasonable certainty is all that is required to render pleadings exempt from attack by special demurrer." The plaintiff in error, no doubt, formed the impression that the allegation of the declaration was susceptible of two interpretations, from the introduction of certain testimony in regard to the passage of other trains of the defendant, to which we will refer later in this opinion. The petition distinctly alleges in its seventh paragraph, that "On said date hereinafore mentioned the defendant, through its agents, servants, and employes, negligently set fire to said piles of cross-ties at a time when a high wind was blowing in the direction of petitioners' land and fence, * * * which said fire spread * * * to the lands of petitioners," etc. This sufficiently charges the manner in which the fire was set out by the defendant, and compelled the plaintiffs to prove that the fire originated in the manner specified.

Another ground of the demurrer raises the objection that the petition did not set out the names of the agents or employes of the company who set out the fire. Such a requirement as this would be so unreasonable as to debar most plaintiffs, damaged by fire set out by a railroad company, from any right of action at all; because, whether the fire originated from the employment of defective instrumentalities in the boiler, or from the act of section hands, the plaintiffs, in either event, might not be able to ascertain the name of the particular servant of the company whose negligence caused the damage. In an action brought against a railway company for damages due to negligently setting out fire, the manner in which the fire was set out must be alleged; but, from the very nature of the case, it is not always within the power of the plaintiff to state the particular agent, servant, or employe of the railroad company who actually started the fire, and the omission on the part of the plaintiff to specify the particular employe to whose negligence the injury was traceable will not subject the petition to special demurrer.

[2] 2. In the motion for a new trial it is insisted that there was no competent evidence going to show that there was not an administrator appointed on the estate of Mrs. Margarette J. Maples, for the reason that no one testified to having examined the records of the court of ordinary to ascertain whether there was an administrator on the estate or not. Counsel for the plaintiff in error cites the ruling in Compton v. Fender, 132 Ga. 483, 64 S. E. 475. In the present case it appears, from the petition and the proof, that the plaintiffs were all the heirs at law of Mrs. Maples. Her husband testified that there was no administration. No objection was offered to the testimony at the time. It was not sought to show, by means of a cross-examination, that the testimony was hearsay. No objection having been offered to the testimony at the time, it must be assumed that any objection to the testimony dependent upon the fact that it was not the best method of proof was waived. While it is true, as ruled in the Compton Case, supra, that the best method of proof that no administration was ever had upon a particular estate is to introduce the evidence of the ordinary, or of some other person who examined the record, and who will testify that no such letters of administration were ever granted, as shown by the record, still it was ruled in Atlanta Glass Co. v. Nolzet, 88 Ga. 43, 13 S. E. 833: "Unless it affirmatively appears that evidence is hearsay, it is not to be excluded as such, where it is of a nature which admits of its resting on the personal knowledge of the witness." There was no objection offered to the testimony of the witness in the present case, and, upon the reasoning in the Nolzet Case, supra, it must be assumed that the witness who stated that there was no administration had made an examination of the records in the court of ordinary of Mitchell county, and that his testimony was based upon knowledge derived by him from this examination.

[3, 5] 3. In the motion for a new trial it is insisted that there was no testimony to show whether Mrs. Margarette J. Maples died before or after the alleged fire. This exception is wholly without merit, because the undisputed testimony shows that Mrs. Maples had been dead about 4 or 5 years before the fire. Jurors can make calculations, as well as other people, and any juror of ordinary intelligence could as easily ascertain approximately when Mrs. Maples died, from the testimony in this case, as if a witness had stated that she died in some year named by him. The evidence of I. Maples was not controverted by any testimony in the case. He testified that she went into possession of the land "about 17 years ago," and she had been in possession, under the deeds exhibited by him, between 12 and 13 years up to the time of her death. If Mrs. Maples went into possession 17 years prior to the time the witness was testifying, and was in possession 13 years before she died, it is easy to see that she had been dead for 4 years at the time the witness was testifying in February, 1911, and therefore must have been dead approximately 2 years in October, 1909, the time of the fire. If the witness' wife had only been in possession 12 years at the time of her death, then the fire was approximately 3 years subsequent to her death. By any reasonable deduction from the testimony upon the subject of the wife's possession the conclusion is certain that Mrs. Maples died before the fire occurred; and it being sufficiently proved, as we have heretofore shown, that there was no administration upon her estate, her realty descended to her heirs at law.

[4] 4. In the remaining grounds of the motion for new trial the insistence is presented (a) that the heirs at law could not recover for the 2,000 rails alleged to have been damaged, because it is personal property; (b) that the judge erred in assuming, in his charge to the jury, that the railroad company did in fact pile cross-ties on the side of the track; and (c) that the court erred in permitting, over objection, the following testimony: "The engine had been there 15 or 20 minutes. I never saw a train set woods on fire." None of these assignments of error appear meritorious.

[6] (a) As to the rails: It does not affirmatively appear that the plaintiffs recovered the full value of the rails, or that the rails were included in the verdict in favor of the plaintiffs. The allegations as to the amount of each item of damage were sustained by proof, yet the verdict was only for $429.22, instead of for $490, the total amount alleged. If the jury merely found for the plaintiffs the value of the 200 trees and the canebrake, amounting to $400, and then included in their verdict 7 per cent. interest as a part of the damages, the amount would have been a little larger than the verdict. Such a finding would have excluded both the $20 worth of rails and the fencing around the pasture, as to the destruction and value of which there was no dispute. But no objection seems to have been offered to the evidence upon the subject of the rails. The judge in his charge did not refer to the rails, and no motion was made to strike from the plaintiffs' petition the items claiming damages upon that score. Furthermore, even if the verdict included the rails, the testimony in behalf of the plaintiffs is perfectly sustained upon the theory that the rails were cut subsequently to the death of Mrs. Maples, and therefore were the property of the plaintiffs in their own right, for the destruction of which they could recover.

[7] (b) The seventh ground of the motion for new trial assigns error upon the following language of the charge of the court: "The next question you will have to decide is whether or not the railroad company exercised due diligence in piling cross-ties on the side of the track." It was testified for the plaintiffs that there were cross-ties piled along the right of way at the time of the fire. It was not denied by the witness for the defendant that there had at some time and at various times been cross-ties piled along the right of way. He did say that they had been burned on a certain portion of the right of way before the fire. It might appear that this statement of the court, while it was obviously harmless, would afford ground for new trial if it was not apparent that the court immediately corrected the error and made it plain that there was no intention upon his part to express any opinion whatever as to the evidence, or even to intimate that cross-ties had been left piled upon the right of way. From what followed it is plain that the language employed was a mere lapsus linguae. The court had stated only one additional issue, and had uttered only a few words, when, his attention having been directed to the slip of the tongue, he charged the jury as follows: "My attention has been called to the fact by Mr. Davis that I said that the cross-ties were piled in the manner alleged. That is the allegation that they make. You look to the evidence to see in reference to that, gentlemen of the jury, whether or not the railroad company has exercised ordinary diligence."

[8] (c) Error is assigned because the court permitted a witness to testify that: "The engine had been there 15 or 20 minutes. I never saw a train set woods on fire." The objection made to this evidence was that the petition did not allege that the fire originated from an engine, and therefore the defendant had no notice at all that it would be claimed that the fire originated from an engine. If the objection had been made that this testimony was irrelevant, because the petition charged that the fire was set out by the burning of piles of cross-ties, the evidence would still have been admissible because it is apparent from the context of the witness' testimony that his statement in regard to the engine was elicited merely to fix the time when he saw the fire, and from his statement that he never saw a train set woods on fire we are unable to draw the conclusion that his testimony tended to show an effort on the part of the plaintiffs to establish the fact that the fire, in the present case, was caused by sparks or fire from the engine. So far as the proof is concerned, the only difficulty which presents itself is in determining whether the testimony is sufficient to have authorized the inference that the fire and consequent damage were caused by the setting of fire to piles of cross-ties by agents or servants of the defendant railroad company. After a careful review of the evidence (and especially in view of the testimony in behalf of the plaintiffs as to the statement of the section foreman that he was going to burn piles or cross-ties, which these witnesses say were on the right of way), we are of the opinion that the jury were authorized to find that the fire was set out by an employé of the defendant in the manner alleged in the petition.

Judgment affirmed.

GROSS v. GROSS.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 6, 1912. Rehearing Denied
March 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 574)—RECORD—CERTIFICATE OF EVIDENCE.

A vacation order of a judge certifies the presentation to him of bills of exception and a transcript of all the evidence, and certifies that for identification the bills were numbered as bills of exception by a number to each, and that the certificate of evidence was marked "Certificate of Evidence," and certifies that the bills were signed, and that the certificate of evidence was also signed by the judge, and the order says that bills and certificates were ordered to be made a part of the record. The bills refer to the "Certificate of Evidence" as part of them. The "Certificate of Evidence" is part of the record, and brings the evidence before this court.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 325*)—ACTION BY WIFE—ALIENATION OF HUSBAND'S AFFECTIONS.

A wife, though the husband be living, has the right of action in her sole name for wrongful alienation of her husband's affection, causing his separation from her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 1119; Dec. Dig. § 325.*]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§§ 325, 333*)—ALIENATION OF HUSBAND'S AFFECTION—LIABILITY OF FATHER.

A father is liable to his son's wife for alienating the affection of the son from his wife, and causing him to separate from her, if the father is moved by malice towards the wife and without good faith and honest purpose and good motive for the welfare of his son. If his action is without malice, and springs only from what he honestly believes to be necessary for the welfare of his son, he is not liable; and the presumption is that he acts without malice and with such good motive until the contrary appears, and the burden is on the wife to show malice and absence of such good motive.

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by Frances Dent Gross against Cecil Gross. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. B. Maxwell, D. H. Hill Arnold, and W. E. R. Byrne, for plaintiff in error. Fred O. Blue, Arthur D. Dayton, and W. E. Baker, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, P. Frances Dent Gross brought an action of trespass on the case in the circuit court of Randolph county against her father-in-law, Cecil Gross, charging him with having alienated the affection of her husband, Ivan Victor Gross, and inducing him to separate from her, and she recovered a verdict and judgment for $12,500, and Cecil Gross comes to this court for relief.

[1] It is contended that no bill of exceptions brings the evidence before us so that we can review the case. The order of the judge says that the defendant presented 15 bills of exception and also a transcript of all the evidence, and for their identification numbers the bills, and states that the transcript is marked "Certificate of Evidence," and orders that bills and said "Certificate of Evidence" be made part of the record. This certificate of evidence, so marked, is found in the record, and bills of exception, about which as parts of the record no question can be made, refer to it as "Certificate of Evidence." Thus this evidence has a distinct earmark of identification in the order of the judge and in bills of exception, so that there can be no difficulty in finding it. The point is technical and unsubstantial, too much so to shut a suitor out of court. State v. Legg, 59 W. Va. 315, 53 S. E. 545, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1152; Hughes v. Frum, 41 W. Va. 445, 23 S. E. 604; Kay v. Railroad, 47 W. Va. 467, 35 S. E. 973.

[2] Does the declaration show good cause of action? As one ground of demurrer, it is said that, the declaration showing the plaintiff to be a married woman, she cannot sue in her own name. Here we meet with a question somewhat difficult, more so than at first it appeared to me. The authorities differ somewhat. By the common law the suit for a tort to the wife could not be sued by her alone by preponderance of authority. This was on account of unity of husband and wife placing her under disability; but we have a statute saying that "a married woman may sue or be sued in any court of law or chancery." Is such a demand as this arising from tort, a mere claim for unliquidated damages, a property right, so as to be considered a separate estate of the wife? If so, there is no difficulty in saying that she may sue to enforce it under that statute giving her full capacity to sue. I think, with some hesitation, that it is a property right as held in Jaynes v. Jaynes, 39 Hun (N. Y.) 40. It has been held otherwise. Gibson v. Gibson, 43 Wis. 23, 28 Am. Rep. 532. It is true that it does not seem comprehended by sections 1, 2, and 3 of chapter 66 of Code 1906. It is not property acquired "by inheritance or by gift, grant, devise or bequest." It is a right to demand money. It must be in favor of some one. This tort was to the wife's injury. She is the meritorious cause of action. By the common law action for tort injurious to the wife must be by husband and wife. The right was in the wife, but, owing to disability, she could not sue alone. First Minor's Inst. 387. It is suggested that section 13 of chapter 66 specifies three cases where the married woman may be sued alone, one being where the action concerns her separate property, and it is said that this section 13 limits the right of action under 15, and must be read with it; but those two sections have different functions, one giving the right of action to the wife to sue in her own name, the other gives right to sue the wife without joining her husband—two different purposes. I do not see how section 13 has anything to do with a suit by the wife, since it touches only suits against a married woman, and does not give action in her favor. We think that section 15 should be given a liberal construction to enable a married woman to sue, and that section 3 should be liberally construed to make such a demand separate property. The old rules of the common law laid down centuries gone, making the wife the inferior, practically a slave, have become wholly distasteful to enlightened public sentiment, and from statute and refusal of many courts to follow them have "gone glimmering through the dream of things that were, the school boy's tale, the wonder of an hour." The rule saying that for a tort against the wife she could not sue during wedlock, but could do so after its close, arose from the old rule stated by Blackstone thus: "The inferior hath no kind of property in the company, care or assistance of the superior, as the superior is held to have in those of the inferior, and therefore the inferior can suffer no loss or injury." 3 Bl. 142. The old rule made the two persons a unit, and sunk the individuality of the woman in the individuality of the man. Her property rights were sunk largely. Therefore she could not alone sue to enforce her right. But in our day, when we look at not merely the letter, but the purpose, of acts giving the wife separate estate, and right to sue, and modern decisions, we conclude that old rules have perished, that a wife is not the legal inferior, but the equal, of the husband. Reflect that in sustaining the wife's capacity to sue we only say that her incapacity to sue for a tort affecting her was only a disability to sue during wedlock, and that is removed by a broad statute giving her absolute right to sue. We do not go far. We do not legislate. The Legislature has plainly legislated this result by fair construction of the letter and spirit of its acts. There are older cases denying the right of married woman to sue for alienation of the affection of her husband. Duffies v. Duffies, 76 Wis. 374, 45 N. W. 522, 8 L. R. A. 420, 20 Am. St. Rep. 79, and Doe v. Roe, 82 Me. 503, 20 Atl. 83, 8 L. R. A. 833, 17 Am. St. Rep. 499. But in later days since the separate estate acts protecting the property of the wife many cases assert this right of action in the wife. Cooley on Torts, 475, says that 20 states concede this right of action to the wife in her own name. For the proposition that such action lies, I cite Tiffany on Domestic Relations, 78; note in 94 Am. Dec. 593; note 20 Am. St. Rep. 88; Williams v. Williams, 20 Colo. 57, 37 Pac. 614; 15 Amer. & Eng. Ency. L. 864; Westlake v. Westlake, 34 Ohio St. 621, 32 Am. Rep. 397; Jaynes v. Jaynes, 39 Hun

(N. Y.) 40; Gerner v. Gerner, 185 Pa. 233, 39 Atl. 884, 40 L. R. A. 549, 64 Am. St. Rep. 646, and note. I refer particularly to the well-considered case of Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 23 N. E. 553, 6 L. R. A. 553. It holds that whilst, before the late statute of New York providing that "in an action or special proceeding a married woman appears, prosecutes, or defends alone or joined with other parties, as if she were single," the action had to be in the name of the husband and wife, yet that statute would entitle the wife to an action in her own name for the alienation of the affection of her husband. Our statute is to the same effect as the New York statute. As said above, if this demand is separate property, there can be no question that the wife can sue alone; but, even if we cannot regard it as separate property, then I would say that section 15 giving her right to sue, even if this demand be not property, it is an actionable right springing from a wrong to her, and she has a right to sue. That section alone vests in her power to sue, and thus abolishes former laws disabling her to sue alone because of the unity of husband and wife. This was so held in Beach v. Brown, 20 Wash. 266, 55 Pac. 46, 43 L. R. A. 114, 72 Am. St. Rep. 93, and Seaver v. Adams, 66 N. H. 142, 19 Atl. 776, 49 Am. St. Rep. 597, and cases in note. Some cases hold that without an enabling statute the wife may sue alone. Foot v. Card, 58 Conn. 1, 18 Atl. 1027, 6 L. R. A. 829, 18 Am. St. Rep. 258; Williams v. Williams, 20 Colo. 57, 37 Pac. 614. There is reason why we should not expect the husband to unite in a suit against his father. And generally why should not a wife sue alone for such a wrong? Should the old unjust rule of the common law still prevail, allowing a husband to sue and pocket the proceeds? It is undoubted that a husband may sue for the seduction of his wife, and there is no reason why the wife should not have equal right to sue for seduction of her husband. The ground of action is the loss of consortium.

[3] A second ground presented to sustain the demurrer is that the declaration should state that Cecil Gross is father of Ivan Gross, and allege that the defendant's act was not actuated by parental solicitude for the welfare of the son, and that it is not enough to charge malice, as in the case of a stranger, but the declaration must also negative good motive on the part of the father. We do not see that these points are tenable. It is enough to charge malice. This contention is rested on the law universally stated, that a parent is not liable for causing his child to separate from husband or wife, if the counsel given the child is such as he fairly and honestly considered to be called for by the life or health or welfare of his child. This is a favor shown to a parent, the law realizing the impulse of a father for an unfortunate child. To justify recovery, the plaintiff carries the burden of showing malice and of overcoming the presumption that he acted under the influence of natural affection, and for what he believed to be for the real good of the child. He may lawfully do so, if he honestly believes that the continuance of the marriage relation will injure health or mind or destroy peace of mind, even though it turn out that he acted on mistaken premises or false information, and that the result of his intervention has been unfortunate. The rule is more liberal to the parent than to a stranger. Multer v. Knibbs, 193 Mass. 556, 79 N. E. 762, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322, 9 Ann. Cas. 958. "In every suit of this kind the prime inquiry is, From what motive did the father act? Was it malicious, or was it inspired by proper parental regard for the welfare and happiness of the child?" Tucker v. Tucker, 74 Miss. 93, 19 South. 955, 32 L. R. A. 623. The act must be shown to be malicious, "as all legal presumptions, in such cases, are that the parent will act only for the best interests of the child." Reed v. Reed, 6 Ind. App. 317, 33 N. E. 638, 51 Am. St. Rep. 310; Brown v. Brown, 124 N. C. 19, 32 S. E. 320, 70 Am. St. Rep. 574. In an early leading case on this subject (Hutcheson v. Peck, 5 Johns. [N. Y.] 196), the great Chancellor Kent said: "If the defendant did not stand in the relation of father to the plaintiff's wife, I should not, perhaps, be inclined to interfere with the verdict. But the relationship gives rise to a new and peculiar interest. * * * A father's house is always open to his children, and, whether they be married or unmarried, it is still to them a refuge from want, and a consolation in distress. Natural affection establishes and consecrates this asylum, and, according to Lord Coke, it is nature's provision to assist, maintain, and console the child. I should require, therefore, more proof to sustain the action against a father than against a stranger. It ought to appear, either that he detains the wife against her will, or that he entices her away from her husband from improper motives. Bad or unworthy motives cannot be presumed. They ought to be positively shown, or necessarily deduced from the facts and circumstances detailed. * * * The quo animo ought, then, in this case to have been made the test of inquiry and the rule of decision." Whilst such is the law, I think it sufficient to charge, as the declaration in this case does, that the defendant, "contriving willfully, knowingly, wrongfully, unjustly, and maliciously intending to injure, prejudice, and aggrieve the plaintiff" in her enjoyment of the companionship, aid, society, comfort, protection, and happiness derived from her husband, did the acts.

There are a great many bills of exceptions and assignments of error. We have considerably gone over them. We have not found reversible error in evidence admitted or rejected. It is useless to detail it. Nor have we found error in instructions. As we have sought in this opinion to state the law applicable in such a case, we shall not incorporate the mass of instructions, as they do but reflect the law above stated. We think the court fairly and clearly presented the law suited to the case, leaving it to the jury to pass on the evidence. The court refused a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the defendant, and overruled a motion for a new trial, and overruled a motion to render judgment for defendant non obstante veredicto. Thus we are called upon to say whether the verdict is warranted by the evidence. Here we state that this depends on a large volume of oral evidence, consisting of the conduct and action of the parties, letters, conversation, a great array of circumstances, and conflicting oral evidence. A verdict in such circumstance is well nigh conclusive. A verdict on evidence, not violating law, approved by a judge, is virtually above the touch of an appellate tribunal. On this principle, spoken by so many precedents, this court acts in the present case. The jury found the action of the father malicious and without good motive. We are asked also to set aside the verdict for excessive damages. Here, again, we are confronted with that verdict. The law gives a jury in the matter of amount of damages in tort cases, where the damages are indeterminate, measured by no fixed measure or rule, almost unlimited discretion. Unless we can clearly find that bias, prejudice, passion, or corruption animated a jury, its estimate must stand. It is hard to fix such an imputation. So, in favor of the plaintiff stands that bulwark, the verdict, sometimes the bulwark of justice, sometimes of error and oppression. Speaking only for myself, I doubt whether the jury accorded to the defendant the favor allowed him by law as a parent in the distressing circumstances surrounding him. His son had been in a hospital from a three months period of typhoid fever. He came from it weak in body, weak in mind, suffering from post typhoid insanity. He suffered from acute Bright's disease, and from orchitis, an ailment of the testicle. He had been nursed while in the hospital by the plaintiff, a young girl. A few days after leaving the hospital they were married, without knowledge of Ivan's family. Continuing ailing, he went for a few weeks rest to visit a brother in Indiana. When he returned, he resumed work, clerking at his father's lumber plant, but unable to do the work. Leaving his wife at his father's home in Randolph county, he went to Pennsylvania to visit sisters of a former wife, who kept his three children by that wife, and while there was visited by his father, and while there he wrote his wife that the marriage was void, that she had taken advantage of him while weak in body and mind, and allured him into marriage, and notified her of cessation of marriage relations. The father was in far off Oregon when this letter was written. No doubt the jury had the right to say that the father assented to this absence, or advised it. He knew of the son's condition. Two physicians, the hospital physician and one in Pennsylvania, as well as other persons, had told the father that continuance of married relations would either retard the son's recovery, or permanently ruin body and mind. I doubt whether the jury gave Gross the right of a father. I doubt whether the proof does overcome the presumption of law that a parent acts under such conditions honestly, with good faith, moved by parental love. I doubt whether the evidence comes up to the standard fixed by law. "The measure of proof must be exceedingly high." Beisel v. Gerlach, 221 Pa. 232, 70 Atl. 721, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 516. Speaking again for myself, it seems to me that the damages found are heavy, almost confiscatory. If the defendant had murderously slain the plaintiff, her father could not have recovered beyond $10,000. Under the circumstances, and there are those mitigating, I would say that the verdict is heavy. If on the jury, I would not have found it; but there it is.

We are led to affirm the judgment.

STATE v. GEBHART.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 30, 1912. Rehearing Denied March 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. ARSON (§ 37*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

A case involving circumstantial evidence discussed, and the evidence held to be sufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-73; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1162*)—WRIT OF ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR.

Error which works no prejudice to the party complaining is not cause for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3085; Dec. Dig. § 1162.*]

3. FORMER DECISIONS FOLLOWED.

Insufficiency of affidavits in support of a motion for a new trial discussed. Points of syllabi in Jacobs v. Williams, 67 W. Va. 377, 67 S. E. 1113, State v. Stowers, 66 W. Va. 198, 66 S. E. 323, and State v. Huffman, 73 S. E. 292, on this subject, approved and applied.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 783½*)—TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—STRIKING OUT EVIDENCE.

If the court is asked to strike out certain improper evidence that has gotten before the jury, and does so, and states, in the presence of the jury, that it is stricken out, specifying the part stricken out, it is not indispensable that he should expressly tell the jury not to consider it as evidence. This court will presume that the jury understood that they were not to regard such evidence in arriving at their verdict, and that they did not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1879, 1986; Dec. Dig. § 783½.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

5. ARSON (§ 31*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for burning the building occupied by defendant's store to defraud insurance companies, evidence that the fire insurance rate in defendant's town was higher than in most towns in the state was admissible, as bearing on the defendant's motive for carrying a large amount of insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. §§ 65-68; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 670*)—TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—OFFER OF PROOF.

In a prosecution for burning the building occupied by defendant's store to defraud insurance companies, the exclusion of evidence of what defendant said at the time the alarm of fire was given, no showing being made as to what the statement would have been, was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1593-1596; Dec. Dig. § 670.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 683*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for setting fire to the building occupied by defendant's store, where defendant claimed that the fire had been started by a certain woman, evidence in rebuttal as to the value of property which her sister owned in the same block with defendant's building, and the amount of insurance thereon, was admissible in relation to her motive to set fire to defendant's building.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1615-1617; Dec. Dig. § 683.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—WRIT OF ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for setting fire to the building occupied by defendant's store, where a son of defendant was asked, on cross-examination, if he had not told a certain boy in the hearing of another witness that his father's store had been broken into, and that the thief had packed up some goods in sheets, and if his sister did not then come up to him and ask why he had told that, and if the defendant's son did not shake his head at her and beckon her across the street and have a whispered conversation with her, any error in admission of the testimony of a witness to such conversation was harmless, where the answers of defendant's son on the cross-examination amounted practically to admissions of the conversation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 958*)—NEW TRIAL—PROCEEDINGS TO PROCURE—SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVITS.

In a criminal prosecution, affidavits for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence that absent witnesses are not in the state, no affidavits of the absent witnesses themselves being produced, and no showing being made as to what they would swear to, and a counter affidavit being presented to show that the most important one of these witnesses was present in the courthouse on several days during the trial of the case, and was not called as a witness or consulted to ascertain what she could prove, were insufficient to require the grant of a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2396-2403; Dec. Dig. § 958.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Nicholas County. Charles Gebhart was convicted of arson, and brings error. Affirmed.

John B. Morrison, Linn & Byrne, and Edward A. Brannon, for plaintiff in error. William G. Conley, Atty. Gen., and J. O. Henson, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

WILLIAMS, J. Charles Gebhart was convicted of arson in the circuit court of Nicholas county, October 29, 1910, and sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for an indeterminate period of time, ranging from one to ten years. On his petition, a writ of error was granted at the June term, 1911.

[1] He was charged with having set fire to the building in which he conducted a mercantile business in the town of Richwood, for the purpose of injuring and defrauding certain fire insurance companies that had insured his stock of merchandise and household furniture against loss by fire. The evidence is voluminous and circumstantial in character. The building was a frame structure, 28x100 feet, and one story in height. It rested on posts, and a storage room was formed underneath by weatherboarding being nailed to the posts on which the building stood. Small rooms were partitioned off at the back end, and were occupied by defendant and his family as a dwelling place, and the front part of it was used as a storeroom. The family consisted of defendant, his wife, and four children; the oldest being 15 and the youngest 4 years old.

The fire originated in the basement, and was discovered about 4 o'clock on Monday morning, August 8th. The alarm was given and the fire extinguished before the building or any of the goods were consumed, but not until it had burned through the floor in one or two places, and had very much charred the joists underneath the floor.

On Sunday, the day before the fire, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad ran an excursion train from Richwood to Clarksburg and return, and defendant and his wife had planned to go on this excursion. For some reason, however, defendant did not go, but remained at home with his children, and Mrs. Gebhart went in company with Mr. and Mrs. Andrews, friends who lived just across the street from the Gebharts. The train was due to return at 12 o'clock midnight, but did not arrive until something near 1:30 Monday morning. Defendant and his two daughters, Lillie and Thelma, did not retire, but remained up to meet the folks returning from the excursion. Defendant had prepared a lunch for them, and on their arrival they all went into the Gebhart dwelling by way of the front door of the storeroom, which was the main entrance to the dwelling apartments, as well as to the storeroom, and partook of the lunch. After this, Mr. and Mrs. Andrews went to their home across the street, and defendant and his family retired. Jerome Gebhart did not remain up, but went to bed early in the night with his little brother, and was asleep until after the train came in. Defendant slept by himself, on a cot or lounge, near the door which opened out and near to a little back porch, from which a stairway led down to the basement door. About 4 o'clock Mrs. Gebhart was awakened by the presence of dense smoke in her bedroom, and immediately aroused the family, and they all came out by way of the front door; Jerome being the first one to get to the door and unlock it. There is much testimony to prove that defendant was dressed and had his shoes on, while the other members of the family were in their nightdresses, or had something loosely thrown around them.

In order to sustain the charge of arson, two essential facts must be proven: (1) That the fire was of incendiary origin; and (2) the identity of the incendiary. In the present case, it is admitted that the fire was not an accident. Every material circumstance in the case points to the fact that the fire was of incendiary origin. Indeed, the theory of the state, borne out by the facts and circumstances testified to by numerous witnesses, is that defendant deliberately planned to make it appear as if some one had broken into the basement and set fire to the house with the intention, not only to burn his store, but himself and family as well, and then set fire to it himself. And the theory of the defense is that the fire was started by one Sadie Bennett, whom defendant was instrumental in having arrested a week, or such time, before the fire on the charge of keeping a bawdyhouse. There is no evidence to connect Sadie Bennett with the crime, although suspicion for a while rested on her, because of defendant's declarations to several persons before the fire that he feared she would do him harm. She lived in an adjoining building.

The evidence of defendant's guilt is wholly circumstantial. No one saw him set the fire. But the following facts are strongly supported by testimony of many witnesses for the state, and some of them by witnesses for defendant as well, and from them the jury could very properly find defendant guilty:

At the time of the fire, defendant had his stock of goods insured to the amount of $6,000 and his household effects to the amount of $500. There was also insurance on the building, which belonged to defendant's brother, Joel Gebhart, to the amount of $2,000. About four weeks before the fire, defendant advertised a "Special Clearance Sale," and conducted this sale up to the very day before the fire. Defendant himself says that this sale was very successful, and that his sales during this time ranged from $200 to $300 a day. An inventory of the stock of goods, taken by the state shortly after the fire, showed the value of the stock, at the date of the fire, to be much less than the amount of the insurance.

The basement extends the full length of the building, and boxes were ricked up under the storeroom, not under the dwelling rooms, and the fire appears to have originated in these boxes, but did not entirely consume them. An empty oil can or two were found in the basement, which were shown to have contained kerosene oil, and a couple of Hayner's whisky bottles, containing kerosene oil, were also found in an old cabinet in the basement. Defendant admits that he had Hayner's whisky bottles, and that some of them may have been in the basement. The door to the basement was at the back end of the building, and was kept locked with a padlock. Defendant's son Jerome testifies that he was in the basement, preparing kindling wood, on the Saturday evening before the fire, and that when he came out he locked the door. There is no evidence that any one was in the basement after that time until the night of the fire. After the fire, the door to the basement presented the appearance of having been broken open. The bow, or shackle, of the padlock was twisted, so that the loose end of it would not go in place in the lock. Defendant turned the lock and key over to the fire marshal, who had the lock opened and examined by a silversmith in the town of Richwood. This silversmith was a witness, and testified that the inside mechanism of the lock had not been broken or disturbed. The lock itself was also in evidence. The jury must have concluded from this evidence that the basement was entered by means of a key to the lock, and that the shackle was afterwards twisted, to create the impression that the cellar had been broken into.

The rope connecting with the bell on the hosehouse was cut off so high up from the floor that a man of ordinary height, standing on the floor, could not reach it. The fire plug wrenches, which were in a box on the hose cart in the hosehouse, could not be found at the time of the fire, and were found a short time afterwards hidden on the outside of the hosehouse underneath a hole in the wall, where they had apparently been dropped through from the inside. There was an empty box in the hosehouse, about two or three feet high, which could have been used by some one to stand on, in order to reach the point where the rope was cut. This box was, in fact, used by the man who rang the bell to give the alarm of fire. From the following facts and circumstances, and other evidence in the case, the jury were justified in believing that defendant himself cut the bell rope. One John Milam had been arrested for disorderly conduct on Sunday, and placed in the lockup. The lockup stood just back of the hosehouse. Milam was anxiously looking for the sergeant to release him from prison that night. He was examined as a witness, and testified that late in the night, about 11 or 12 o'clock, he heard some one in the hosehouse, and heard something drop that sounded like a piece of iron, and that he thought it was the officer coming to release him. But when he, a little later, heard footsteps which indicated that the person who had been in the hosehouse was going away without releasing him he shook the door of the lockup and holloed to be let out of that place. A few moments after that defendant informed the sergeant, standing on the street corner, that some one was trying to break out of the lockup. Defendant admits giving this information; but he denies that he was in the hosehouse, and says that he heard the noise in the lockup as he was passing by, going from the central telephone station to his house; that he had gone to the telephone station to see his two daughters, Lillie and Thelma, who were there with Miss Clara Wentzell. This evidence places the defendant at or near to the hosehouse at a late hour on the night of the fire, and proves that he had an opportunity to cut the bell cord.

The town is lighted by electricity, and some of the lights are turned out at midnight. Clara Wentzell testifies that she and defendant's daughter Thelma went to the store just after the lights went off to inform him that Lillie, his other daughter, intended to stay at the telephone station until the train came in, and that defendant himself came to the store door. This fact is not denied, and it proves that defendant was in his store alone, after midnight, and before the train arrived. He therefore had opportunity to rick the boxes in the basement, and to pour the oil at the front door, both on the inside and outside. Defendant's son Jerome, it will be remembered, had retired early in the night with his little brother, and was then asleep in his room at the back part of the building. He says he did not wake up until "just a few minutes" before the train came. He also says that some time in the night, after he had gone to bed, he heard a noise in the cellar, and a little later heard some one at the back of the house, hammering on something. He does not testify that he then knew where his father was, and the jury may have believed that it was his father whom he heard, and that he was then ricking the boxes in the cellar, and twisting the shackle of the padlock, to create the impression that the cellar door had been broken open.

Some excelsior, which smelled strongly of kerosene, was found on the back steps, and kerosene was also found on the floor at the front entrance to the store, both on the inside and outside of the door. But it is proven that the floor on the inside slopes towards the door, and that liquid poured on the floor of the recess to the front door, on the outside, would not run through to the inside. This proves that the oil on the inside must have been put there by some one from the inside of the storeroom, and the jury may well have believed that person was defendant. When defendant's wife and her friends returned from Clarksburg, and the company, including defendant, were going in at the front door of the store Mrs. Gebhart remarked that she smelled oil. Defendant did not investigate to ascertain where the odor originated, nor did he express surprise, notwithstanding he had previously expressed fear of Sadie Bennett, but replied immediately, and said that he had spilled some milk on the stove, and in order to kill the smell he had burned some sugar. The explanation, so readily forthcoming from defendant, adds much to the significance of the fact that oil was found at the door. The jury may have concluded that defendant put the oil on the floor, and that he burned the sugar, not, however, to kill the smell of milk, but to kill the smell of the oil. From this, and other facts and circumstances in the case, the jury must have thought the defendant had manufactured evidence, by creating certain appearances, for the purpose of inducing the belief in the minds of others that some person had planned to burn, not only his store, but himself and family also, and had arranged to cut off their escape, both at the front and the back entrance to the building, by the use of oil at those places. Defendant stated to the sergeant on the street the night of the fire that he was afraid that Sadie Bennett meant to do him harm. He made a similar statement to Mr. Eskridge in the afternoon of the same day. But does it not seem passing strange that, when his wife said she smelled oil, when they were entering the store door, he did not make investigation? No doubt, if he had done so, the oil would have been found, as it was found to be there after the fire was extinguished. One witness who was present at the fire testified that he struck a match at the front door to look for something, and dropped it while it was yet ablaze, and that there was so much oil that it ignited and flamed up.

It was proven that defendant used electric lights in his building; that he also had two large brass lamps suspended from the ceiling of the storeroom, to be used in case the electric light failed; that he had one small lamp for use in the dwelling rooms, in case of necessity. Notwithstanding defendant had little use for kerosene oil, especially in the summer time, it was proven by a number of witnesses that about a month before the fire he purchased two five-gallon cans of oil from two different dealers in Richwood. But he denies this, as he does also the testimony of all the other witnesses for the state who testify in relation to any fact or circumstance that points to his guilt.

Certain it is that the fire was of incendiary origin, and it is almost as certain, too, that, to insure the destruction of the building, if not of a large portion of the town as well, the bell cord was cut and the fire plug wrenches were hidden. It was undoubtedly a deep-laid scheme. But "the best-laid schemes 'o mice an' men gang aft agley."

So it turned out in this case; for the dry goods box in the hosehouse made it possible to ring the bell without much delay, and the fact that some members of the fire company had wrenches at their homes, and took them with them when the alarm was sounded, caused no delay in turning on the water. The building and its contents were saved.

In view of these facts that Jerome and the baby were sleeping in the building, that the town was lighted with electricity, that a number of people were on the street that night, passing back and forth, waiting for the return of the excursion train, that defendant's store was on one of the principal streets of the town, that defendant himself passed by his store several times late that night, and was in it at a very late hour, after some of the lights had been turned off, that defendant had the opportunity to do all these things which point so unmistakably to incendiarism, the jury evidently concluded that it was hardly possible for Sadie Bennett, or any other person without the guilty knowledge of defendant, to have committed the crime. In view of so strong a chain of connected circumstances, tending to connect defendant with the crime, and at the same time tending to exclude the hypothesis that another person could have committed it, the jury must have believed, without any reasonable doubt, that defendant was guilty. It is the case of a man's falling into the pit which he has dugged for another.

Counsel for defendant insist that it is unnatural, unreasonable, and therefore unbelievable, that defendant would have set fire to the building, and thus have risked his own life and the lives of his entire family. This is plausible, and strong argument, when we consider that no reason existed for defendant's wishing to destroy his family. But the jury may have believed, as they evidently had the right to do, that defendant was awake, and was only feigning sleep; that he would have given the alarm himself, if necessary, in order to rescue the family from the building, but that he thought he would be less likely to be suspected if some one else should give the alarm. The fire originated under the storeroom, not under the dwelling. The back door and windows in the sides of the building furnished means of escape, if necessary. He slept on a lounge near to the back entrance, by himself, and after the alarm of fire was given he appeared on the street dressed, according to some of the state's witnesses, while other members of the family were in their nightclothes. The state does not claim that any other member of the family knew of the scheme; nor does the evidence indicate that they did. Their conduct seems to be both natural and reasonable, in view of so exciting a time as to awake and find the house in which one is sleeping on fire. They were all very much excited. Jerome was the first to open the store door and run out into the street. He was in his nightdress, but ran towards the hosehouse, holloing, "Fire!" A witness for the state testifies that he heard his father call to him to come back and put on his clothes, saying that he had plenty of time. Defendant denies this; but the jury judged between the witnesses. If it be true, it tends to prove that defendant was not anxious to have the fire extinguished. Jerome was the first to reach the hosehouse, and he says the bell rope had been cut off, and he could not reach it. Another man, dressed and sitting on the porch of a hotel nearby, arrived at the hosehouse a moment later, and he got on a box and rang the bell, and Jerome started, with the hose cart, for the fire, and others who had then gathered on the scene came to his assistance.

There is another circumstance which the jury must have believed was manufactured for defendant's purpose. It is this: Defendant testified that after the fire, and before the inventory of the stock of goods was taken, his store was broken into from the back door, and that some of the goods were stolen. This evidence was for the purpose of proving that he had more goods in the store at the time of the fire than were shown by the inventory. In rebuttal of this testimony, the state proved that the marks on the door and the door facing were made with a chisel, or some similar instrument; that the impressions in the wood showed that the door could not have been pried open in the manner indicated by the marks, because they had been made by prying the door shut, rather than open. Pieces of wood, bearing the impressions, were sawed out, and were exhibited to the jury at the trial. An old chisel was also found in a basket on the inside of the door shortly after the alleged breaking, which fitted into the marks on the pieces of wood. True defendant and every member of his family who testified on the subject disclaimed the chisel, and denied having any knowledge of it.

There are many other little facts and circumstances which point to defendant's guilt; but it is unnecessary to detail them further, nor would we have discussed the evidence to the extent which we have already done, except for its peculiar character, so apparently manufactured by the defendant for the purpose of diverting suspicion from himself, and yet so conclusively proving his own guilt. The trial of the case occupied nearly two weeks. There was an array of able counsel on both sides, and the case is briefed, elaborately and well, in this court on both sides. It was tried by a careful and able circuit judge, and he again reviewed the evidence and his rulings after the evidence had been transcribed, in passing on a motion to set aside the verdict. It is our opinion, as it was his, that the verdict is supported by the evidence.

[5] It is insisted that the court erred in admitting testimony concerning the rate of fire insurance prevailing in Richwood, which seems to be higher than in most other towns in the state, because of the greater hazard on account of the character of the buildings in Richwood. Such evidence was admissible, as bearing upon the question of defendant's motive for carrying so large an amount of insurance. Whether defendant was paying a high rate of premium for legitimate protection, or for the purpose of injuring the insurer by burning his property, were questions to be considered by the jury. He would more likely be willing to pay a high rate if his purpose was to defraud.

[4] Fire Marshal Ellison, a witness for the state, was asked to state what his duties as fire marshal were, and replied as follows: "Well, the duties of the state fire marshal are rather numerous. My duty as fire marshal is to keep a record of all the fires that occur in the state of West Virginia, as reported to me by justices of the peace and chiefs of fire departments and mayors of towns, to establish, if possible, the causes of these fires and origin of the fires. Also my duty to take up properties where there is reports made on them of any hazards there, and endeavor to remove these hazards, and in that way keep down fire waste; and in connection with fires of unknown origin, if it develops in any circumstances that it is of incendiary origin, it is the duty of the fire marshal to take a note of that fire and establish who the guilty party is, and if they decide that there is evidence enough to warrant it it becomes their duty to go further and cause that party to be arrested, and follow the case then on through the courts. (Defendant, by counsel, objects to the foregoing answer and moves to exclude same.) Statement by the Court: I will strike out from that testimony that part of it in which he states his duty as to investigating and determining whether the evidence is sufficient to warrant prosecution, and follow it up. (To which ruling of the court in not sustaining all of said objection the defendant excepted.)"

It is insisted by counsel for defendant that this evidence was highly prejudicial, as constituting, in effect, an expression of opinion by the fire marshal that defendant was guilty; that simply striking it out was not sufficient to disabuse the minds of the jurors of the impressions which it had created. They say the court should have gone further, and have expressly told the jurors not to consider it as evidence in the case. But how could the jury have understood the court's language otherwise than to mean that it was not to be regarded by them as evidence? It does not seem to us that it could have had any other meaning to the jury. Juries must be given credit for a reasonable degree of intelligence, and certainly a reasonably intelligent man could not have misunderstood the court. It is not necessary to decide, and we do not decide, that the evidence was, in fact, prejudicial. But, assuming that it was, we are clearly of opinion that the jury fully understood that they were not to consider it. We admit that it is the usual practice for the trial courts, when striking out improper evidence that has gotten before the jury, to tell them that the part stricken out is not to be considered as evidence. But must we be so technical as to say that the omission to do so constitutes reversible error? One or two of the courts of this country have apparently gone so far as to so hold. We do not think that the administration of justice is promoted by so technical a requirement, and we decline to establish such a rule in this state. We are not disposed to incur the trial of causes with any more purely technical rules than are essential in enabling courts and juries to arrive at just results. Such a rule as we are asked to declare could not promote the ends of justice. It would not only be a useless refinement, but an insult to the intelligence of the citizenship that supplies our jurors. The judge's statement that he struck out the evidence was intended as much for the jury as it was for counsel, and we mean no reflection on counsel when we say that both must have had equal understanding of its meaning. The court could have said nothing to remove it from the memories of the jurors.

[6] The court sustained the state's objection to a statement which Jerome Gebhart was about to make concerning what his father said at the time his mother gave the alarm of fire, and this is assigned as error. It may have been admissible, as constituting a part of the res gestæ. But it does not appear what the statement would have been, and we cannot see that it was important. Under the rule so well established by former decisions, we cannot say this was error. State v. Clifford, 59 W. Va. 1, 52 S. E. 981; Walker v. Strosnider, 67 W. Va. 39, 67 S. E. 1087.

[7] It was not error to admit the testimony of Edith Bacon, a sister of Sadie Bennett, in rebuttal, as to the value of certain property, and the amount of insurance thereon, which she owned, situated in the same block with defendant's store and the property occupied by Sadie Bennett. It was proper evidence to be considered by the jury in relation to any motive Sadie Bennett might have had to set fire to defendant's store. Defendant had offered evidence tending to prove malice on the part of Sadie Bennett toward him, and consequently a motive to do him injury. The testimony of Edith Bacon tends to prove that Sadie Bennett must have known that setting fire to defendant's property would have endangered her sister's property.

[8] For the purpose of laying a foundation to impeach the testimony of Jerome Gebhart, he and Thelma were both asked, on cross-examination, if Jerome had not told a certain Haley boy, on the street, fixing the time and place, in the hearing of Gordon Umbarger, that his father's store had been broken into a few nights before that time, and that the thief had packed up some goods in sheets, but that he supposed he was frightened away before he had time to take them, and if Thelma did not then come up to Jerome and ask him why he had told the Haley boy that their father's store had been broken into, and if Jerome did not shake his head at her and beckon her across the street, and then have a whispered conversation with her. Jerome's answers amount practically to admissions of the conversation as comprehended in the question. Thelma did not admit or deny it, but claimed to have no recollection concerning it. Umbarger was then put on the witness stand in rebuttal, and permitted, over objection of defendant, to prove the conversation and conduct of the two children on that occasion. In their testimony in chief, the children had not been examined concerning the attempted robbery. But defendant himself had previously testified that his store had been broken into, and that he had missed some goods, and that some were piled up in sheets and left in the store. The robbery occurred, if at all, after the fire, and before defendant's arrest, and the purpose of defendant's testimony concerning it was to prove that defendant had more goods in the store at the time of the fire than were shown by the state's inventory. The state submitted evidence tending to prove that defendant's statement was not true; that it was a manufactured story for the occasion. Such evidence was proper, as bearing upon the question of motive for burning the store. The truth or falsity of the story was properly an issue before the jury; it was not a purely collateral matter. But the question presented to us is, Was it permissible to impeach the children in that manner? It is strenuously urged by defendant's counsel that it constitutes cause for reversal; that it is prejudicial to defendant. It has given us more concern than any other point assigned as error in the case. Speaking for myself alone, I am clearly of the opinion that, if Jerome had expressly denied what the question assumes to have taken place between him and his sister and the Haley boy, it would have been proper to admit the testimony of Umbarger to prove it, not as evidence of the breaking, because as to that fact it would be hearsay, but it was proper as tending to show the interest and bias of Jerome as a witness. It tended to show that he was biased in favor of his father to such extent as to engage, either in the manufacture of evidence, or the concealment of the truth. Otherwise why should he call his sister to one side and have a private conversation with her, after she had expressed surprise at the story of the burglary? It was likely the first time she had heard of it, and Jerome may have called her to one side to tell her what to say; in other words, to bribe her, so that when they should be examined there would be no conflict in their stories. In weighing the testimony of Jerome, I think his conversation and conduct on that occasion were proper to be considered by the jury. It is analogous to, indeed almost identical with, the case of a witness who has attempted to bribe another witness to testify falsely in a case. There can be no doubt of the cross-examiner's right to ask a witness, for the purpose of showing his bias, if he did not offer to bribe a certain other witness in the case, fixing the time and place, and, if he should deny it, to prove that he did in fact attempt to bribe such witness. From the conduct of Jerome on that occasion, the jury could well have inferred that he was helping his father to manufacture evidence to prove that the store had been robbed, and that his little sister was ignorant of it, and that he called her to one side for the purpose of explaining it to her. But it is not necessary for us to decide whether it was proper or improper to admit the testimony of Umbarger, for the reason that we unanimously agree that, inasmuch as Jerome Gebhart practically admitted what Umbarger was permitted to testify to, defendant was not prejudiced, and the error, if such it be, is no ground for reversal.

[2] Defendant offered evidence tending to prove that at the time of the fire some trunks and goods were carried into the street, and were left unguarded. This evidence was for the same purpose as the evidence of the burglary after the fire, and was therefore admissible. Defendant's own witness, R. L. Marshal, testified that the goods were not guarded, and was asked, on cross-examination, if he knew the trunks and goods were not guarded, and replied as follows: "I don't believe they were; and it was the talk there of a great many people." Defendant's motion to strike this answer out was overruled, and this is one of the errors assigned. But, notwithstanding the answer is hearsay, and therefore inadmissible evidence, still it was favorable to defendant; for it tends to establish the very fact that defendant sought to prove by the witness in chief. This court will not reverse the lower court for error committed on the trial, when it can be clearly seen that the error did not prejudice the party complaining.

A number of assignments of error relate to the refusal to give certain instructions on behalf of defendant, and to the giving of certain other instructions on behalf of the state. These instructions involve well-settled principles of law. Some of the state's instructions are verbatim copies of instructions recently reviewed and sustained by this court in State v. Huffman, 73 S. E. 292. It is hardly necessary to again review them in this opinion.

We think that a number of defendant's instructions which were refused correctly state the law, and are applicable to the case, and might properly have been given. But the jury were fully and fairly instructed in regard to the questions embraced in them by others which were given. Indeed, the reason assigned by the court for refusing them was that they were repetitions of other instructions—a reason which our investigation has led us to believe was a good one. Defendant offered 27 in number, and the state 23, and the court refused defendant's Nos. 5, 11, 12, 14, 16, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, and 27, and gave, at the instance of the state, its Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 17, 19, 22, and 23. We have carefully considered both those given and those refused, and we are clearly of the opinion that those given covered the whole subject of the law bearing upon any material facts supported in the case, and that they fairly presented both the theory of the state and the theory of the defense. We are impressed with the judge's absolute fairness and impartiality in his rulings upon these instructions, and no useful purpose could be accomplished by an extended discussion of the various instructions. We have already extended this opinion to a much greater length than we thought would be necessary when we entered upon its preparation; but the size of the record, the unusual character of the case, the number and peculiarity of the circumstances, constituting an unbroken chain of evidence which the jury must have believed was sufficient to establish defendant's guilt, furnish some palliation for its length.

[3] Affidavits were filed in support of a motion for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence. We have recently had occasion to pass upon affidavits filed for a like purpose, in Jacobs v. Williams, 67 W. Va. 377, 67 S. E. 1113, State v. Stowers, 66 W. Va. 198, 66 S. E. 323, and State v. Huffman, 73 S. E. 292. We think the law on this question is well settled. The affidavits show that the absent witnesses are not in the state; that one of them, presumably the most important one, Maud Bennett, a daughter of Sadie Bennett, was in Pittsburgh at the time the affiants last saw her. Affidavits of the absent witnesses themselves are not produced; it does not appear what these absent witnesses would swear to; and, of course, it does not appear that their testimony would likely produce a different result, if a new trial were granted. They do not measure up to the rule laid down in the cases cited. Moreover, a counter affidavit proves that Maud Bennett was present in the courthouse on several days during the trial of the case, and that she was not called as a witness, or consulted by defendant or his counsel, to ascertain what she could prove. Some of these affidavits were made by expert detectives, who state that they had been employed by defendant to discover evidence, if any they could, relative to his defense. Two of them swear that they located Maud Bennett in Pittsburgh; that she stated that some man who had been living with her in Pittsburgh set fire to defendant's store, but that, at another interview had with her, she declined to make any further statement. Such affidavits are entirely too flimsy and uncertain to justify the setting aside of a verdict otherwise apparently just.

The judgment will be affirmed.

NEAL v. HAMILTON CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Jan. 30, 1912. Rehearing Denied
March 12, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. WILLS (§§ 450, 462*)—CONSTRUCTION—GENERAL RULES—INTENTION OF TESTATOR.

In construing wills, words will not be interpolated, except when necessary to effectuate the manifest intention of the testator. Inference or conjecture is no justification; nor is the probability that if testator's attention had been called to a particular event he would have provided against it, justification for interpreting words to give the will that effect. The intent must be gathered from the will taken in all its parts, giving every word and expression its due weight and effect, if not inconsistent with the whole will when taken together.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 966, 981; Dec. Dig. §§ 450, 462.*]

2. WILLS (§ 462*)—CONSTRUCTION—SUPPLYING TECHNICAL WORDS.

Supplying technical words is only permissible when the intention to be aided thereby is apparent beyond reasonable doubt, the purpose being to develop a defectively expressed intent. If from the words employed the testator's intent can not be gathered, words can not be supplied to disclose that intent, for it may not have been his intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 462.*]

3. WILLS (§ 440*)—CONSTRUCTION—GENERAL RULES—INTENTION OF TESTATOR.

It is only where the will affords no satisfactory clue to the real intention of the testator, that resort may be had to legal presumptions and rules of construction, and then such rules must yield to the apparent intention of the testator, expressed in his will, for the true inquiry is not what the testator meant to express, but what the words he used do express.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 956; Dec. Dig. § 440.*]

4. WILLS (§ 466*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE CONVEYED—"IN CASE OF."

After the death of his wife, the life tenant, testator devised to his two sons, James and John, his farm to be equally divided between them; but in a subsequent paragraph provided that, "in case of the death of either of my sons above named I will and bequeath that the remaining son living shall have and hold in his own right the whole of the above named bounded two tracts of land."

According to the plain intent, the words "in case of" should be construed to mean "at" or "upon"; and the whole phrase "in case of the death of" as referring to an event to occur subsequently to the death of the testator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 466.*]

5. WILLS (§§ 601, 627*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATE CONVEYED—FEE SIMPLE—JOINT TENANCY.

The will expressly limiting the estate devised to James and John, to the survivor, they did not, on the death of the testator, by virtue of section 8, chapter 71, Code 1906, severally take fee simple estates in the land devised; nor by virtue of section 18 of said chapter, as tenants in common; but a joint remainder in fee simple, subject to the right of survivorship, with only the rights and subject to all the limitations attaching to estates in joint tenancy, as at common law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. §§ 601, 627.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Roane County.

Bill in equity by Oscar L. Neal against the Hamilton Company and others. From the decree, the Hamilton Company and another appeal. Reversed, and bill and cross-bill dismissed.

Van Winkle & Ambler, Payne & Payne, Berkeley Minor, Jr., and Benjamin Trapnell, for appellant Hamilton Co. Pendleton & Pendleton, for appellant Neal. Linn & Byrne, for appellees. S. P. Bell, Geo. F. Cunningham, and Linn & Byrne, for appellee Neal. Harper & Baker, for appellees Goff and Heck.

MILLER, J. Oscar L. Neal, infant son of James L. Neal, and grandson of E. N. Neal, both deceased, plaintiff, and Lee Goff and A. S. Heck, defendants, and cross bill plaintiffs, and alleged purchasers of a part of the alleged one half interest of said infant in all the oil, and all the interest of said infant in all the gas in and under a tract of one hundred and thirty acres of land, in Roane County, have sued the Hamilton Company, the owners of a lease of said land for oil and gas, and the lessors Adaline Neal, widow, and John Z. Neal, son, and devisees under the will of said E. N. Neal, deceased, seeking to set aside and cancel said lease, and to remove the same as a cloud upon their titles; and an accounting of the oil and gas produced; and praying also for a receiver pending the suit, and for general relief.

The rights of the parties, it is conceded, depend wholly upon the proper construction to be given the will of said E. N. Neal, deceased.

The will, every part of which is important in arriving at the real intent of the testator, is as follows:

"In the name of God Amen. I, E. N. Neal, of the County of Roane and State of West Virginia and District of Walton being of sound and disposing mind but weak in bodily strength and knowing the uncertainty of life do make and establish this my last will and testament revoking all other wills heretofore made by me and want my property after my decease to be distributed as follows to-wit:

"First. I will and bequeath to my beloved wife Adaline the sole use and occupation of my farm on which I now live together with all the horses, cattle, sheep, farming utensils, household and kitchen furniture and all other personal estate not herein enumerated during her natural life time after the payment of all my just debts.

"Second. Except the bay filly which I bought of J. T. Ward I will to my oldest son James Neal.

"Third. I will unto my daughter Sarah A. C. Daugherty the black colt bought of James Harper by her paying her mother, Adaline Neal the sum of three dollars.

"Fourth. After the death of my wife Adaline I will and bequeath unto my two sons James L. Neal and John Neal the Farm I now live on to be equally divided between the two above named sons. The above bequest includes both tracts of land I now own adjoining the lands of William Harmon, J. H. Dougherty, Mathew Hively, D. T. Fleshman, Zaddock Canterbury, H. F. Gibson, heirs of J. R. Ryan and Henry Summers.

"Fifth. I will and bequeath that my wife Adaline, or in case of her death, my two sons, James L. Neal and John Z. Neal shall pay unto the following named children of Adaline and E. N. Neal, to-wit: M. J. Neal, M. E. Neal, Martha Ellen Neal, Emma J. Neal, Rebecca A. Neal, the sum of twenty five dollars or the value of twenty five dollars at marriage and in case they remain single they shall have a home on my farm during their natural life.

"Sixth. In case of the death of either of my sons above named I will and bequeath that the remaining son living shall have and hold in his own right the whole of the above named bounded two tracts of land."

The facts and circumstances surrounding a testator when making his will are often important in interpreting the language employed, perhaps never more than in this case. Counsel, therefore, have stipulated, substantially, as follows:

First, that Neal, the testator, was a farmer, and died, testate, November 18, 1881, leaving surviving him, Adaline Neal, his widow, a married daughter, Sarah A. C. Daugherty, five unmarried daughters, and two unmarried sons, James L. and John Z. Neal. Second, that the testator, his wife, his unmarried daughters and his two sons, were at the time of the execution of the will, at the time of the testator's death, and for a long time prior thereto, had been living together on the farm. Third, that James L. Neal was born August 20, 1866, and John Z. Neal, August 19, 1880; that at the time of the execution of the will, and the date of the death of the testator, he owned no other lands, and that there had been no prospecting or drilling for oil or gas, and none had been discovered on or near his farm, and none known to exist within at least twenty five miles thereof. Fourth, that the testator had been sick for some time prior to the execution of his will, and was then dangerously ill, and fully informed by attending physicians that he could not get well; that his death was only a question of a few days at best, and that he then fully understood and realized that fact. Fifth, that after the death of the testator his son James L. married Chloe F. Daugherty, by whom he had one child, the plaintiff Oscar L. Neal, born October —, 1894, and that he died intestate, in 1899, leaving his widow and his said son, his only heir, surviving him; and that he had in no way attempted to dispose of any supposed interest in the land involved in this suit. Sixth, that the widow, Adaline Neal, and the said John Z. Neal, both of whom survived said James L. Neal, are still living.

On the pleadings and these facts, the court below in the decree appealed from, was of opinion and so decreed, that upon the death of the testator his sons James L. and John Z. Neal took by the will a defeasible estate in fee simple in said farm, subject to the life estate of the widow; and that the defendant John Z. Neal could have become the owner of the whole farm described, "only upon the contingency of the said James L. Neal dying before him without issue." And that the plaintiff Oscar L. Neal, as the heir of his father, James L. Neal, is entitled to the undivided one half interest and estate in said land, and to a like undivided interest in and to all the oil, gas and other minerals thereunder, subject to the life estate of his grandmother, Adaline Neal.

It is conceded, that to give the will this construction, it is necessary, as the court did, to interpolate in the sixth paragraph, after the words, "in case of the death of either of my sons above named," the words "without issue." In the light of the language of the testator in the several paragraphs of his will, and of the stipulated facts, was the court justified in so interpolating these words? Both sides agree that if these words were necessary to effectuate the manifest purpose and intent of the testator, the court was justified in reading them into the will. We emphasize the words "manifest purpose and intent of the testator."

Able and elaborate briefs have been submitted by the numerous counsel engaged on both sides of this controversy. If the old farmer, who made and executed this will could have survived the present controversy, he would certainly have been greatly surprised that so much could be said and written concerning his testamentary instrument.

We cannot within the limits of this opinion undertake to review, criticize or differentiate all the many decisions cited by counsel in support of the many propositions advanced. As many times said by courts and text writers precedents are of little value in interpreting wills; each case must necessarily depend on its own facts and circumstances.

es, and the particular language employed by the testator to manifest his intention.

[1] A comprehensive statement of a few general rules will be sufficient for our present purposes: First, that in construing and interpreting wills, courts are justified in interpolating words not used by the testator, only when it is necessary to do so in order to effectuate the manifest intention of the testator. Bare inference or conjecture will not do; nor will the fact that it is probable if the testator's attention had been called to a particular event he would have provided against it, warrant the interpolation of words to give the will such effect; intent must be gathered from the will itself taken in all its parts, giving to every word or expression its due weight and effect, if not inconsistent with the general intent of the whole will when taken together. Liston v. Jenkins, 2 W. Va. 62; Graham v. Graham, 23 W. Va. 36, 48 Am. Rep. 364; Augustus v. Seabolt, 3 Metc. (Ky.) 156, 159; Butterfield v. Hamant, 105 Mass. 338; Hamilton v. Boyles, 1 Brev. (S. C.) 414; Selden v. King, 2 Call, 72. [2] A second or co-ordinate proposition, supported by the authorities cited, and by many others, applicable here, is, that supplying technical words is only permissible when the intention to be aided is apparent beyond a reasonable doubt, the purpose being to develop a defectively expressed intent; for if from the words employed by the testator his intent cannot be gathered, words cannot be supplied to disclose his intent, for it may not have been the intent of the testator. Courts are not at liberty to guess or conjecture. Besides the authorities cited, see McKeehan v. Wilson, 53 Pa. 74; Lynch v. Hill, 6 Munf. 114; Abbott v. Middleton, 21 Beav. 143.

A proposition laid down by this court in Graham v. Graham, supra, and re-enforcing the above rules, and pertinent here, is: "When a testator in the disposal of his property overlooks a particular event or matter, which, had it occurred to him, he would probably have guarded against, the court will not employ or insert the necessary clause for the purpose of supplying the omission." And "though the inference of intention be more or less strong, yet if not necessary or indubitable, the court will not aid the supposed intention by adding or supplying words. All the parts of a will are to be construed in relation to each other so as, if possible, to form a consistent whole."

[3] It is only where the will affords no satisfactory clue to the real intention of the testator, say the decisions, that courts may from necessity, resort to legal presumptions and rules of construction, and then such rules must yield to the apparent intention of the testator, expressed in his will, for the true enquiry is not what the testator meant to express, but what the words he used do express. Couch v. Eastham, 29 W. Va. 793,

3 S. E. 23; Cresap v. Cresap, 34 W. Va. 815, 12 S. E. 527; Tebbs v. Duval, 17 Grat. 349; Moon v. Stone, 19 Grat. 130; Pack v. Shanklin, 43 W. Va. 304, 27 S. E. 389.

Limited by these rules, let us endeavor to place ourselves in the situation of the testator, and with due regard to the simple language of his will, try to interpret his meaning.

We observe that he was fully advised and understood that death was imminent, and that he had but a few days left of his earthly existence. Besides his widow, whose welfare was naturally uppermost in his mind, and for whom he would naturally make ample provision, he had five dependent, unmarried daughters, and two infant sons, the eldest, James, being then but fifteen years of age, the youngest, an infant of only fifteen months. The family was large and the farm on which he lived quite small, in comparison, on which to charge, as the testator did, the burden of family support. It was manifestly in his thought that his widow would live to enjoy her life estate for many years, and with their help to bring up, maintain and educate her children. His unmarried daughters, of whom he had five, and for whom he could and did make but small pecuniary provision, were also manifestly the special subjects of his concern. The pecuniary provision made for them was, that as they should marry, his widow during her life should pay them the sums stipulated in his will; after her death that burden was to be borne by his sons. But this was not all, these daughters were to have a home upon the farm so long as they should remain single. It could not have been in the mind of the testator, however, that his infant sons would soon come into possession of the estate devised to them, nor that when they did do so, they should take and hold the land devised, or divide the same between them in any way inconsistent with the expressed intention of the testator that the daughters should be paid by them or the survivor of them, the stipulated sums on their marriage, and that they should have a home there, so long as they remained single. True we must say the testator contemplated a division of the land, between the sons, for the language of the fourth paragraph is, "to be equally divided between the two above named sons." But the plain, manifest intent of the testator was that that division should be consistent with his expressed intention that his daughters should enjoy the home provided for them during their maidenhood, and subject also to the rights of the survivor.

Such having been the manifest plan, scope and purpose of his will, it seems to us, the testator could not better have expressed his intent than by the plain language employed by him, and that it is wholly unnecessary to interpolate words to effectuate that intent. Evidently grandchildren were not in his thought. The words "heir" or "heirs" are words of very common use, and their meaning well understood by people in the country; yet the testator nowhere makes use of these words. The testator thought first of his widow, then of his dependent unmarried daughters, and of his two infant sons. In disposing of his farm, he also contemplated the burden, first cast upon the widow, then upon the sons, or the survivor of them, to pay the daughters as they should marry the sums he provided, and the maintenance of a home for them during maidenhood, however long continued. Our knowledge of human nature satisfies us that the purposes of the testator, after the death of his widow, and one of the sons, would be best accomplished through the agency of the surviving son, than through grandchildren. The probable inharmony that would follow a division of his land and of its use and occupation, between a surviving son and immediate or remote issue of the one dying, if he thought on the subject, would naturally occur to him and justify him in disposing of his farm according to the plain language of the will. If by giving effect to the plain words employed by the testator we can best effectuate his manifest intention, we are not permitted by rules of construction to interpolate words and thereby defeat his purpose, though we might think it right, or equitable, in order to provide against a contingency which the testator might have provided against if it had occurred to him, for this the authorities say would be to make a new will for the testator.

How can we say then that the testator by the sixth paragraph of his will, intended that the surviving son "should have and hold in his own right the whole" on the death of the other, only on condition that the one dying should leave no issue? We can guess, and imagine and speculate and theorize on the subject, but we are not justified we think in saying that such an intent manifestly appears, or that it is necessary to interpolate any words of a technical character to effectuate a plain intent.

[4] On what principle or theory then can the decree below be sustained? for it must not be forgotten that we must interpolate the words "without issue," or the decree is manifestly wrong. It is sought to support the decree by reference to decided and analogous cases; by referring the words of the sixth paragraph, "in case of the death of," to the death of the devisee occurring in the life time of the testator; and lastly, appellees rely on the provisions of sections 8, 18 and 19 of chapter 71 of the Code, as converting a joint estate into a tenancy in common, and devolving the estate of the son first dying on his surviving issue.

The case of Liston v. Jenkins, supra, is regarded by counsel for appellees decisive of their contention. This case not only recognizes, but affirms the general rule, that words will only be supplied in order to effectuate the manifest intention of the testator, "and for this purpose only." While in that case a divided court thought, the words "without issue" were necessary to express the true intent of the testator, it was because the grandson affected, then in being, a namesake of the testator, had been first preferred, and a special object of the testator's bounty, and that the testator manifestly had not intended, by omitting the technical words, to cut him off with a bare life estate; for in that event the estate given him would have gone to his brothers and sisters, less preferred, contrary to the manifest intention of the testator. No such considerations are presented here.

In Abbott v. Middleton, supra, another case relied on, the bequest was to the widow for life, at her death to testator's son for life, and on his demise to any children he might have. Then there was a gift over in case the son died before his mother. The master of the rolls in that case, justifying the interpolation of the words "without leaving any child," said, that the testator manifested a great and solicitous anxiety to provide for his grandchildren. The father and mother both survived the son. Without interpolation of the words "without leaving any child" the gift over would have wholly cut out the grandchildren, manifestly in the mind of the testator, for whom it was evident he entertained anxious solicitude.

The case of Selden v. King, supra, cited in Liston v. Jenkins, is also relied on. The court in that case having held, that as an estate tail had been devised to the daughter, a gift over upon her death, simply, was repugnant, and that the testator evidently meant to add the words "without heirs of her body."

Dulaney v. Dulaney (Ky.) 79 S. W. 195, is another case cited. There was a devise in trust for W. to receive the income until he was twenty five years old; then to him absolutely if he was capable of managing the estate; otherwise to trustees for his sole benefit. Should he die before he reached the age stated, there was a devise over to other persons. The court thought the words "without issue" should be interpolated, as there was no reason for supposing that the testatrix ever had the absurd purpose of disinheritting W.'s children if he should die before he was twenty five years old, but if he managed to live until he was twenty five, they were to have his property upon his dying intestate.

In the cases of Spalding v. Spalding, Cro. Car. 185, and Strong v. Cummins, 2 Burr. 767, relied on, the devise was to the testator's son and his heirs, with devise over in case of the son's death. In each of these cases the intention of the testator, with respect to the heirs, was manifest, and he clearly meant a devise over in default of issue.

Among other cases relied on are Nelson v. Combs, 18 N. J. Law, 27, and Baker v. McLeod, 79 Wis. 534, 48 N. W. 657. It will be found that these and other cases, as those we have just been considering, are clearly distinguishable from the case we have here. It should also be noted in this connection that not all the cases in which a remainder is limited upon the death of a devisee, after the devise of land to him, and to his issue or heirs, justify the interpolation of the phrase "without issue," as a qualification, making the remainder contingent instead of certain to vest. See Butterfield v. Hamant, Augustus v. Seabolt, and Hamilton v. Boyles, supra. It is wholly unnecessary to further continue this review of the decisions.

But appellees seek to support the decree below by referring the words "in case of death" in the sixth paragraph, to the death of the testator. Thus construed the effect would be to make the paragraph read, "In case of the death of either of my sons (before my death and without issue) the surviving son shall have the whole of above land." We cannot accept this interpretation. The testator upon his death bed was not contemplating the death of his infant sons, or either of them, as an event to happen before his death. Much time and space are devoted to this proposition in the briefs of counsel; but it is wholly unnecessary to elaborate the subject here. By the use of the words "in case of" the testator evidently meant at or upon "the death of either of my sons," and as an event to occur subsequently to his death. Ewing v. Winters, 34 W. Va. 24, 11 S. E. 718. The old rule of referring survivorship to the death of the testator, though another period be intended, is not the rule in this state. The more modern rule obtains here, that survivorship will be referred to the event plainly intended by the testator, whether that event be before, at the time of, or after the death of the testator. Schaeffer v. Schaeffer, 54 W. Va. 681, 46 S. E. 150; Dent v. Pickens, 61 W. Va. 488, 58 S. E. 1029.

[5] Lastly, are the plain provisions of the will, and the estate or estates created thereby, materially controlled or affected, or prejudiced, by the provisions of sections 8, 18 and 19 of chapter 71, Code 1906? The pertinent provisions of these sections are: "8. Where any real estate is * * * devised * * * to any person without any words of limitation, such devise * * * shall be construed to pass the fee simple * * * unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will." "18. When any joint tenant shall die * * * his part (of real estate) shall descend to his heirs or pass by devise, * * * subject to debts, curtesy, dower, * * * as if he had been a tenant in common." "19. The preceding section shall not apply * * * to an estate conveyed or devised to persons in their own right, when it manifestly appears from the tenor of the instrument that it was intended that the part of the one dying should then belong to the others."

Though the devise of the fourth paragraph of the will is to the two sons without words of limitation, it is insisted, that the provisions of said section 8 carried the fee simple to the sons, subject to the life estate, and though a joint tenancy at common law was thereby created, the estate of the deceased son, upon his death, by virtue of said section 18, passed to the plaintiff, his heir, "as if he had been a tenant in common." But section 8 says, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will; and section 19 says, "the preceding section shall not apply * * * to an estate conveyed or devised to persons in their own right, when it manifestly appears from the tenor of the instrument that it was intended that the part of the one dying should then belong to the others." Does not a contrary intention appear in the sixth paragraph of the will? And though survivorship at common law be abolished by said section 18, converting a joint tenancy into a tenancy in common, it is only by virtue of that section; and section 19 dissolves that effect, "when it manifestly appears from the tenor of the instrument that it was intended that the part of the one dying should then belong to the others." How could a testator have more clearly manifested his intention that the "part of the one dying should then belong to the others," than by saying as he did in the sixth paragraph of his will, that "the remaining son living shall have and hold in his own right the whole of the above named bounded two tracts of land"? The words of the devise in the fourth paragraph must be placed in juxtaposition to these plain and positive words of the sixth paragraph. The provisions of the statute cannot be applied or otherwise enforced, except by due regard to both provisions of the will.

Is there anything then in the nature, character or quality of the estate which the two sons took on the death of the testator, to let in the plaintiff by inheritance, to succeed to the share which his father might have taken, and intercepting the operation of the sixth paragraph, in favor of the surviving son? We think not. True in this State as in Virginia the right of survivorship, at common law, is abolished by statute, but this is not so, if the deed, or as here, the will, expressly limits the estate granted or devised to the survivor. When so limited the grantees or devisees take joint estates only, subject to all the limitations attaching to such estates as at common law. 2 Minor's Inst. 410. Thus dower would not attach in favor of the widow of the one dying, for at common law to give dower the husband must not be seized as a joint tenant, in consequence of survivorship. 2 Minor Inst. 121. And of course nothing would at his death go by inheritance to his heirs.

These conclusions call for reversal of the decree below, and a decree here that the bills and cross bill be dismissed.

PLEASANTS et al. v. LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS' MUT. LIFE & ACCIDENT INS. ASS'N et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 20, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 771*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—BENEFICIARIES.

The mere declaration in a by-law of a fraternal life insurance association of the object of the organization, without more, constitutes no restriction on the rights of a member in naming a beneficiary in his policy or certificate of membership.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1935; Dec. Dig. § 771.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 726*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

In construing contracts of life insurance made by a fraternal life insurance association, that construction must be put upon the laws of the order, taken as a whole, which is most favorable to the insured, and will most protect the beneficiary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1870-1872; Dec. Dig. § 726.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 724*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—BENEFICIARIES—WAIVER OF PROVISIONS IN POLICY.

Unless some statute or rule of public policy forbids, restrictions in a by-law or contract of a fraternal life insurance association, as to the beneficiaries, to be named, are to be regarded for the benefit of the insurer alone, which it may waive, and the association is the only one that can object that the beneficiary designated does not come within the class of persons who by the by-law or contract are entitled to be so designated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1866-1868; Dec. Dig. § 724.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 724*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—BENEFICIARIES—WAIVER OF PROVISIONS IN POLICY.

Where in an action on such a contract, by the beneficiary named, defendant appears, admits its liability, and pays the money into court, such act constitutes a waiver of objection to the beneficiary, and an intervening claimant is not entitled to object, defend or claim the benefit accrued under the contract on that ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1866-1868; Dec. Dig. § 724.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Mercer County.

Action by Norman Compton Pleasants and another, infants, etc., against the Locomotive Engineers' Mutual Life & Accident Insurance Association and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants William Compton and others bring error. Affirmed.

Ritz & Ritz and James H. Gollehon, for plaintiffs in error. Ross & Kahle and Sanders & Crockett, for defendants in error.

MILLER, J. Norman Compton Pleasants and Ira Compton Pleasants, otherwise known as Norman Compton and Irb Compton, infants, by Lillie A. Pleasants, their mother and next friend, claiming as beneficiaries named, sued the defendant company, upon two certificates of membership, or policies of life insurance, on the life of Shannon Compton, deceased, calling for $1,500.00 each.

The defendant appeared, and not desiring to defend the action, acknowledged its liability, in the net sum of $2,851.50, and which sum, on filing its two affidavits, pursuant to section 1, chapter 107, Code 1906, it was permitted to pay into court, and was relieved from all further liability on account of the policies sued on. By the first affidavit defendant alleged that James H. Gollehon, administrator of the estate of Shannon Compton, deceased, claimed the fund; by the second, that one William Compton, father and sole heir of decedent, claimed the money.

Issues were joined on the two interpleaders filed by these claimants, the plaintiffs in the action being made plaintiffs therein, and the claimants, defendants thereto. On the trial of these issues, the court below, in lieu of a jury, found for the plaintiffs, and pronounced the judgment complained of, that they were entitled to the fund in controversy, and ordered payment and distribution of said money accordingly.

The policies themselves each provide as follows: "All payments or benefits, that may accrue or become due by virtue of this policy, will be payable to Norman and Irb Compton, cousins, or his lawful heirs." It is fully proven and now practically conceded that plaintiffs in the action, though described in the policies as Norman and Irb Compton, and by which names they are also sometimes called, are the sons of Mrs. Lillie A. Pleasants, and are usually known as Norman Compton Pleasants and Ira Compton Pleasants, the nickname "Irb," having been given the latter by the deceased; and though erroneously designated in the policies, as cousins, that they are in fact the persons designated and intended as the beneficiaries named in the policies.

To defeat the plaintiffs, the intervening claimants rely on section one of the by-laws of the association, by the terms of the policies made a part thereof, stating the object and purposes for which the organization was formed, to be the "mutual protection and relief of its members, and for the payment to the family, heirs, relatives by blood, marriage or legal adoption, affianced wife, or to a person or persons dependent upon the members of said association, stipulated amounts from $1,500 to $4,500 by the issue of policies of $1,500 each as provided for in sections 42 and 45."

Though other questions are argued, the controlling points presented on behalf of Gol-lehon, administrator, and of William Compton, as sole heir, plaintiffs in error, are, first, that plaintiffs below, though specifically named as beneficiaries in the policies, having proven themselves to be the illegitimate children of their mother by the deceased, Shannon Compton, are, under the by-laws, ineligible as such; second, that the beneficiaries named being so ineligible, the benefits either go to the administrator of the insured; or, third, if not to him, to William Compton, his sole heir, whom they contend is by the terms of the policies the alternative beneficiary named, and as such a party to the contract. If the first proposition be sustained, and plaintiffs have not been otherwise rendered secure in their judgment, it is plainly immaterial whether the administrator or the heir prevails, for in either event the heir would finally get the fund.

In reply to these propositions it is said on behalf of the infant plaintiffs, first, that notwithstanding they are not designated in the policies by their full names, and are erroneously described as bearing the relationship of "cousins" to the insured, and whether or not they come within either of the classes of persons particularly enumerated in said section one of the by-laws, nevertheless, their identity as the persons named, and as the persons intended by the insured, being fully established, and there being nothing in the contract or by-laws specifically restricting the insured in naming his beneficiaries, they were lawfully designated as such beneficiaries, and are lawfully entitled to the money; second, that whether the first proposition be true or not, no statute or rule of public policy inhibiting it, even had the policy otherwise provided, the defendant having waived the question of their eligibility as beneficiaries, and its rights, if any, to defend on that ground, and having paid the money into court, no one else can lawfully contest their rights as beneficiaries named in the policies.

[1] As is apparent, the basis of the several propositions of plaintiffs in error is that section one of the by-laws, properly construed, is a restriction or a limitation on the insurance association, and on its members, in naming beneficiaries. Is this true? In terms the by-law is merely a statement of the object of the organization. Neither this nor any other section of the by-laws, so far as the record shows, imposes in positive terms any restriction on a member in naming his beneficiaries, and no statute is pleaded or pointed out that does so.

The proposition that the mere declaration in a by-law of the object of the organization constitutes no restriction on the rights of a member of a mutual benefit insurance association, in naming his beneficiary, seems well supported by authority. 1 Cooley's Briefs on the Law of Ins. 797, and numerous cases cited. In Sulz v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, 145 N. Y. 563, 40 N.

E. 242, 28 L. R. A. 379, Mr. Justice Peckham says: "Attention is then called to the by-laws of the defendant, which states its object to be to promote the well-being of all its members, and to furnish substantial aid to their families or assigns in the event of a member's death." And commenting on this provision he says: "As the members are not in any way restricted in the naming of a beneficiary by any by-law of the company, or by its constitution, if there is any beneficiary named in the certificate or policy itself, that person is the one to whom the money shall be distributed."

[2] The general rule applicable to insurance contracts is that that construction must be put upon the laws of the order, taken as a whole, which is most favorable to the insured, and most protects the beneficiaries; and the court is not bound by the construction adopted by the society. 29 Cyc. 17, and cases cited. This rule is especially applicable where there is doubt as to who is intended to be designated as beneficiary. 1 Cooley's Briefs, 820; Cleavenger v. Franklin Fire Ins. Co., 47 W. Va. 595, 35 S. E. 908; May on Ins. 182; Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Kinnier, 28 Grat. 88, 104. In a note to Lake v. Minnesota, etc., Ass'n, 52 Am. St. Rep. at page 559, it is said, that if the by-laws of a mutual benefit society imposes no limit as to the persons to whom certificates shall be payable, the person insured in such an association has the right to direct the amount of his certificate to be paid to a stranger, having no insurable interest in his life. Sabin v. Phinney, 134 N. Y. 423, 31 N. E. 1087, 30 Am. St. Rep. 681; Milner v. Bowman, 119 Ind. 448, 21 N. E. 1094, 5 L. R. A. 95; Ingersoll v. Knights of Golden Rule (C. C.) 47 Fed. 272.

[3] But assuming that the by-laws do impose restrictions on the naming of beneficiaries, in whose favor or benefit does such restrictions operate? The authorities seem uniform, that unless some statute or rule of public policy controls, such restrictions are to be regarded for the benefit of the insurer alone, which it may waive, and that the association is the only one that can raise the objection, that the beneficiary designated does not come within the class of persons who may be so designated. 2 Cooley's Briefs, 3722; 1 Cooley's Briefs, 815; 29 Cyc. 105; Taylor v. Hair (C. C.) 112 Fed. 913; Order Golden Chain v. Terrell (C. C.) 99 Fed. 330; Johnson v. Supreme Lodge, Knights of Honor, 53 Ark. 255, 15 S. W. 794, 8 L. R. A. 732; Tepper v. Supreme Council of Royal Arcanum, 61 N. J. Eq. 638, 47 Atl. 460, 88 Am. St. Rep. 449; Mechanics' National Bank v. Comins, 72 N. H. 12, 55 Atl. 191, 101 Am. St. Rep. 650; Cowin v. Hurst, 124 Mich. 545, 83 N. W. 274, 83 Am. St. Rep. 344; 29 Cyc. 105, 106, and cases cited in notes.

In Taylor v. Hair, supra, the court says: "While the order is under no obligation to pay a benefit to a beneficiary named who does not sustain to the holder of the certificate such a relationship as is mentioned in section 119, the law imposes no limitations upon it in this respect. The order decides for itself who may become beneficiaries in the membership certificates which it issues, and it decides for itself whether in the particular case it will take advantage of a misrepresentation in an application of the relation which the beneficiary sustains to the applicant, and refuse to pay the insurance. The injury arising out of such misrepresentation is to the order, and it confers no right upon strangers to the transaction."

[4] As we are disposed to hold that the by-laws imposed no restriction on the insured in naming his beneficiaries, and that Compton violated no provision of his contract in naming the infant plaintiffs as beneficiaries in his certificates, it seems useless to discuss the question whether the defendant waived any supposed right to defend the action by paying the money into court. But we are disposed to hold, assuming such restrictions to be in the contract, such provision being solely for the benefit of the insurer, that the admission of liability by defendant and payment of the money into court did constitute a waiver of any objection to the beneficiary, and that neither of the intervening claimants are entitled to object or defend on that ground. This proposition is abundantly supported by authority. 1 Cooley's Briefs, 815, and cases above cited.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the judgment below should be affirmed.

BOAL et al. v. WOOD et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 20, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 92*)—ACTION AGAINST HEIRS—STATUTES.

When an intestate leaves living heirs and an unborn heir of the same class, and the estate is thereby vested in the living heirs subject to the contingency that the unborn heir will come into life and inherit with them, the living owners of the estate, for all purposes of any litigation in reference thereto and affecting the jurisdiction of courts to deal with the same, represent the whole estate and stand not only for themselves but also for the person unborn.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 382-388; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

2. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 92*)—ACTIONS AGAINST HEIRS—JURISDICTION.

Where the court once legally acquires jurisdiction of an unborn heir by representation through living heirs of the same class, its subsequent birth without thereafter being made a direct party to the cause does not divest the court of jurisdiction to decree against it, though to do so is error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. §§ 382-388; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 335*)

—SALES UNDER ORDER OF COURT—PARTIES.

Decrees supporting a judicial sale, in a suit brought by an administrator to subject the decedent's lands to the payment of his debts, to which suit the widow and living heirs were parties, are not void for want of jurisdiction as to one who, when the administrator's suit was instituted, was an unborn heir of the decedent, of the same class as the living heirs who were parties to the suit, notwithstanding he was never made a direct party to the suit after coming into life.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1379-1384; Dec. Dig. § 335.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Logan County.

Suit by Ella M. Boal and another against Stuart Wood and others. From an order dismissing the bill on demurrer, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Lilly & Shrewsbury, Chafin & Bland, and Cox & Baker, for appellants. Campbell, Brown & Davis, for appellees.

ROBINSON, J. The suit is one for partition. Plaintiff claims a one-tenth interest in the lands of which her father, Levi Vance, died seized and possessed. These lands were sold in a suit brought by the administrator of Vance to subject them to the payment of his debts. Defendants hold under purchasers at judicial sales made in that cause.

Vance died intestate in the year 1887. He left a widow, nine living children, and an unborn child. That unborn child is now the plaintiff here. She was born within ten months after her father's death. Prior to her birth, the suit to sell the lands had been instituted by the administrator. It had proceeded to a decree of sale as to a part of the lands. As is usual in such cases, that suit had been instituted within six months after the qualification of the administrator. The widow and the nine living children were parties defendant thereto. But plaintiff not being yet in life, was not named as a party. Nor was she ever brought in by process after she was born. The suit, after her birth, proceeded to a sale under the decree which had theretofore been entered and to a confirmation of that sale. A subsequent decree of sale, as to the lands not embraced in the former one, was entered, and a sale made under that subsequent decree was confirmed.

[3] Plaintiff contends that the judicial sales are void as to her—that the suit in which they were made did not divest her of title to the lands. She says the court had no jurisdiction in the premises since she was never made a formal party to the suit. Her bill asserting this claim was dismissed on demurrer, and she has appealed.

If, as plaintiff submits, the court had no jurisdiction as to her in the administrator's suit, then it is true that she did not lose title by the proceedings therein. Her suit is a collateral attack. She does not come within six months after reaching twenty-one years of age to show error in the proceedings. She comes, after that opportunity has passed, alleging absolute want of jurisdiction.

There is no allegation in the bill that plaintiff's rights were not fairly defended by those present as parties—her mother, brother and sisters—having interests identical with hers. Indeed, it appears there was full opportunity for defense against the subjection of the lands to the decedent's debts by those who had motives of interest for themselves and affection for the plaintiff to make that defense. The administrator prosecuting the suit was plaintiff's brother—himself an owner of the lands and a defendant in his own right. It is not to be assumed, nor is anything alleged to make it appear, that the lands were needlessly or injudiciously subjected to sale. Though plaintiff had an interest in the lands, she took that interest subject to the debts of the ancestor from whom she inherited. Those debts were a paramount charge on the lands. It must be presumed that those interested with plaintiff were careful to preserve the joint estate as far as could be done under the circumstances surrounding that estate. The case presents merely the question whether plaintiff's interest was illegally sold—whether it was sold without jurisdiction in the court to order a sale and to consummate one when made.

[1] We have noticed that plaintiff, though legally in being as an unborn child, was not in life at the time the suit was instituted. It was impossible to make her a formal party thereto. It was not then known that plaintiff would be born alive and take the inheritance which she should have in the event that she came into life. Conditions of the estate demanded that the suit proceed. The necessity of the case demanded that it proceed without her as a formal party. The law provided a way for the court to take jurisdiction notwithstanding the situation. The law provided a way for the court to take hold of the interest of this unborn child and to deal therewith in judicial proceedings affecting it. Though that child might thereafter come into life and an interest in the lands devolve on it as of the time of the death of its father, still the court could take jurisdiction in relation to it even before its birth. The court's power to do so, arose out of the very necessity of things. "The rule in regard to parties is a rule of convenience, and the court will never allow it to be so applied as to do an injury, to obstruct the administration of justice." Faulkner v. Davis, 18 Grat. 693, 98 Am. Dec. 698. The living owners of the estate were the only ones that could be made actual parties to the suit. But this unborn child was so virtually made a party through them that jurisdiction attached as to it also. It was a party by representation. "Where an estate is vested in persons living, subject only to the contingency that persons may be born who will have an interest therein, the living owners of the estate, for all purposes of any litigation in reference thereto, and affecting the jurisdiction of courts to deal with the same, represent the whole estate, and stand not only for themselves, but also for the persons unborn. This is a rule of convenience and almost of necessity." Kent v. Church of St. Michael, 136 N. Y. 10, 32 N. E. 704, 18 L. R. A. 331, 32 Am. St. Rep. 693. "Where the legal title to an estate is vested in a class subject merely to open and let in after-born children, the members of the class in being at any given time represent not only themselves but also the persons not born, in any litigation with reference to the estate." 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 650. "Whenever the court of chancery has power to decree the conversion of real estate into personal, it may do so notwithstanding the contingent interests of some of the parties who are not yet in being, or not ascertained, provided all the parties are brought before the court that can be brought before it, and especially where the rights of the non-existent, or as yet unascertained, parties will be represented and sufficiently defended by the persons who are made parties, and who have motives of self-interest and affection to make such defense. And this is styled the doctrine of representation of parties." 2 Minor's Inst. (4th Ed.) 238. "Under the laws of Virginia parties in being, possessing an estate of inheritance in property, are regarded as so far representing all persons, who, being afterwards born, may have interests therein, that a decree for the sale thereof binding them will also bind the latter party." Knotts v. Stearns, 91 U. S. 638, 23 L. Ed. 252.

[2] The court acquired jurisdiction to hear and to determine the rights of this unborn infant. It acquired that jurisdiction by making the living owners of the same class with the unborn owner parties to the suit. Having thus acquired jurisdiction of the party, the court possessed the power to proceed to the final disposition of the suit. Black on Judgments, § 243. True, when the infant came into life, it should have been made a party in person. Not to do so was error, just as it is error not to revive a suit against the heirs or legal representatives when a party dies. But the failure to do so could not divest the court of the jurisdiction it had lawfully acquired. "The test of jurisdiction is whether the tribunal has power to enter upon the inquiry, and not whether its conclusions in the course of it were right or wrong." Van Fleet on Collateral Attack, § 61. "When once the jurisdiction of the court has attached, no subsequent error or irregularity in the exercise of that jurisdiction can make its judgment void." 1 Black on Judgments, § 204. The jurisdiction by representation continued for a longer time than necessity demanded, but it continued nevertheless. To allow it so to continue was error which would call for a reversal. But mere error cannot avail plaintiff in this suit. The court legally acquired jurisdiction over her which it later erroneously employed; but it never lost the jurisdiction which it lawfully acquired before she was born. It had the power to proceed to final judgment though it proceeded thereto erroneously by a failure to make her a personal party to the suit when she came into life. This principle is well illustrated in a Virginia case, from which we quote: "The authority to decide being once shown, it can never be divested by being improperly or erroneously employed. Freeman on Judgments, § 135; Cox v. Thomas' Adm'r, 9 Grat. 312. If, for example, a suit be commenced against a feme sole, it does not abate by her subsequent marriage, but it may proceed against husband and wife jointly. If the plaintiffs, however, without noticing the marriage take judgment against the feme, the judgment is not thereby rendered void, but is regarded as valid and binding until and unless reversed by some direct proceeding in that court. In a number of cases this doctrine has been carried to the extent of holding that when process is served in the lifetime of the defendant and he afterwards dies, a judgment against him subsequent to his death is not absolutely void, but simply voidable. The court having obtained jurisdiction over the defendant whilst living, is thereby empowered to proceed with the case to judgment; and although the court ought to cease to exercise jurisdiction over the party when he dies, its failure to do so is an error to be corrected on appeal, or writ of error coram nobis, as the case may be." Neale v. Utz, 75 Va. 480. See, also, King v. Burdett, 28 W. Va. 601, 57 Am. Rep. 637; Watt v. Brookover, 35 W. Va. 323, 13 S. E. 1007, 29 Am. St. Rep. 811; Black on Judgments, § 200.

In the case under consideration, necessity made the court to take jurisdiction of the unborn infant by representation; the court then had power to go on by representation to the end, though to do so was erroneous. Just as the court may erroneously go on after the death of a party as to whom jurisdiction has attached while living, so it may proceed after the birth of a party as to whom jurisdiction theretofore attached while unborn. The court having legally acquired jurisdiction over the infant whilst unborn, that court was empowered to proceed to judgment. The change from an unborn child to one in the arms of the mother could not divest the court of jurisdiction over it. It was the same person. It had already been constructively brought before the court by the bringing in of those of the same class who in law represented it. A change in the status of a party does not call for a new summons to enable a court to keep the jurisdiction it has once acquired. If it were so, jurisdiction would readily be lost; a party could voluntarily divest the court of jurisdiction. Surely constructive service by publication as to a non-resident continues to give the court jurisdiction notwithstanding the party afterwards becomes a resident of the state and is not personally served. So constructive service by representation as to one an unborn infant continues to give the court jurisdiction though the infant is afterwards born alive. "The jurisdiction of a court depends upon the state of affairs existing at the time it is invoked, and if the jurisdiction once attaches to the person and subject-matter of the litigation, the subsequent happening of events, though they are of such a character as would have prevented jurisdiction from attaching in the first instance, will not operate to oust the jurisdiction already attached. This is the statement of the rule that subsequent events will never defeat jurisdiction already acquired." 12 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 171.

Plaintiff was before the court in the suit of which she complains. She was there by representation which the law deems sufficient to give the court jurisdiction as to her. She cannot collaterally attack the decrees. If the suit had been brought after her birth, the case would be entirely different. The demurrer was rightly sustained. We must affirm the order.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. McMENAMIN et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, Jan. 18, 1912. Rehearing Denied March 14, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1041*) — REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—PLEADING.

The allowance of an amendment before defendant had pleaded which did not change the cause of action could not have prejudiced defendant, where the trial was then postponed for two months.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4106-4109; Dec. Dig. § 1041.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 222*)—OPERATION—NUISANCE—ACTION—PLEADING.

In selecting a place for its yards and coal chutes and power house, a railroad is acting in its private capacity, such acts being mere incidents to the operation of the road, in which the public has no concern, and so, if the yards and coal chutes constitute a nuisance, it is unnecessary to allege or prove negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 222.*]

3. NUISANCE (§ 53*)—ACTIONS—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

In an action for maintaining a smoke nuisance near plaintiff's residence, where the jury viewed the premises and the evidence fully showed the character of the injury complained of, the question of damages was properly submitted to the jury, despite the absence of evidence of the pecuniary loss.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 222*)—OPERATION—NUISANCE.

That the operation of trains casts some smoke upon the property of plaintiff will not warrant a railroad company in maintaining yards and coal shutes so near the property of plaintiff as to depreciate its value by reason of smoke.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 222.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action against a railroad company for maintaining a smoke nuisance near plaintiff's residence, error in an instruction which eliminated from the consideration of the jury any question as to injury of plaintiff's personal property was not prejudicial to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

6. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 55*)—PRIVATE NUISANCE—PERMANENT NUISANCE.

A railroad is a permanent structure, and, where it is a nuisance, there is only one right of action therefor, which will be barred within the statutory period, and the entire damage suffered both past and future must be recovered in one action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 299-306; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

7. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 55*)—ACTION FOR NUISANCE—RAILROAD COMPANY—INCREASE OF BUSINESS.

Where a railroad company's yards were a nuisance when constructed, there was a single cause of action which accrued when the nuisance began, though the business of the road increased and the nuisance became greater from year to year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 299-306; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

8. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 197*)—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION—NUISANCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad company for a nuisance arising from its establishment of its yards and coal chute near plaintiff's residence, where it appeared that the yards and chute had been there more than the statutory time, plaintiff's evidence that the damage was not appreciable until within recent times was not contradicted by proof that the railroad company had ceased to have some of its engines coaled at that yard, for the use of inferior coal or other causes might have operated to cause the increase of the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 197.*]

Error to Circuit Court of City of Alexandria.

Action by Alice McMenemy and another against the Southern Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Robert B. Tunstall and Francis L. Smith, for plaintiffs in error. J. K. M. Norton and Edmund Burke, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action of trespass on the case was brought by Alice McMenemy and her husband, Richard McMenemy, to recover of the Southern Railway Company damages for injuries resulting, as alleged, from the maintenance by the defendant company of a nuisance on its property.

The declaration alleges that the plaintiff, Alice McMenemy, is the owner of a large brick dwelling house in the city of Alexandria, which she has occupied with her family as a home during the time of the grievances complained of, and is still occupying; that the defendant company, has, for a number of years, owned property and operated railroad yards in the city of Alexandria in close proximity to the property of the plaintiff, and has, since she bought and improved her property, erected in its yards, and established in connection therewith, a large plant for the generation of electricity, and has also erected in its yards a large structure known as a coal chute, from which the tenders of the defendant's engines are filled with coal, and has established in connection with each of these structures large stationary engines. The plaintiffs further aver that the defendant, for five years past immediately preceding the institution of this suit has so operated its electric plant, coal chute, and stationary engines in connection therewith, and in filling its engines with coal from said chute, and in firing such engines, as to cause great injury to the property of the plaintiff, Alice McMenemy, as a dwelling place, and to her personal property of every description situated therein. It is further averred that the defendant, its agents and employees, have within the five years last past caused to be emitted from its electric plant, coal chute, and stationary engines, and from its train engines, while the same are being filled with coal and fired at such coal chute, great clouds of dense, black smoke, cinders, and soot, impregnated with acid, and has emitted also therefrom poisonous and disagreeable gases, as well as much noise, and that these dense clouds of greasy and acid impregnated smoke, soot, cinders, and poisonous gases have filled the air and settled over, in, and upon the property of the plaintiff, and through the windows of her house upon the person and clothes of the occupants, to such an extent as to be almost unbearable; that her fruit trees, plants, and flowers situated upon her said premises have been greatly injured, the fruit trees being either dead or dying. It is further averred that this serious injury comes, not continuously, but whenever the wind blows in the direction of such property; that these acts of the defendant have caused a great nuisance, and in the past three years have become almost unbearable when the wind blows in the direction to bring the smoke, soot, cinders, etc., over the property and into the house of the plaintiff, thereby preventing its full, proper, and useful enjoyment, and rendering the same almost uninhabitable, and also thereby greatly depreciating the value of her said lot and dwelling house.

The declaration contains no averment of negligence; the theory of plaintiffs' case being that the structures and operations maintained by the defendant constituted a nuisance, which caused the injuries complained of.

The defendant railroad company filed pleas of the general issue and the statute of limitations. The trial resulted in a verdict and judgment thereon in favor of the plaintiffs, which this writ of error brings under review.

[1] The objection to the action of the court in allowing the plaintiffs to amend their declaration by striking out the words, "and also thereby depreciating the value of her said lot and dwelling house," is not well taken. The record does not show, as contended, that at the time the amendment was allowed the defendant had filed its pleas of the general issue and the statute of limitations. On the contrary, it appears that the amendment was first allowed, and thereupon the defendant pleaded. Nor is it tenable that the effect of the amendment was to make a new and different case. The whole proceeding was on the same day, and the trial then postponed for two months, so that the defendant could not have been prejudiced.

Instructions "A" and "B," as modified by the court, fairly submitted the plaintiffs' theory of the case to the jury, without prejudice to the rights of the defendant.

[2] Two objections are suggested to these instructions. The first is that the defendant's engines were engaged in transportation service; that the acts complained of constituted a legalized nuisance, for which the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, because there was no averment or proof of negligence.

In selecting the site for its yards and the location therein for its coal chute and power house, and in the operation of those plants as well as in firing its engines on the yards and otherwise preparing them for use in the transportation of persons and property, the defendant company was acting in its private capacity, such acts being incidents to the operation of the road with which the public had no concern. Townsend v. Norfolk Ry. & L. Co., 105 Va. 22, 52 S. E. 970, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 87, 115 Am. St. Rep. 842; Terrell v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 110 Va. 340, 66 S. E. 55, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 371.

It is not necessary to allege or prove negligence where the acts complained of result from a nuisance committed by a railroad company in its private capacity, for, as a rule, it is liable under such circumstances, even though the nuisance is not negligently caused. Terrell v. C. & O. Ry. Co., supra.

[3] The second objection to these instructions is that there was no evidence of the amount or value of the injury to guide the jury in arriving at their verdict.

The jury viewed the premises and saw the conditions. The evidence abundantly shows the character of the injury complained of, the conditions under which plaintiffs suffered, and the inconvenience to them in the enjoyment of their property.

Where the injury is discomfort and inconvenience, the amount of damages must be left to the jury in view of all the facts. Absolute certainty in such cases is not attainable, and is not required. The injured party cannot be denied the right to recover because he cannot show the exact amount with certainty, although he is ready to show to the satisfaction of the jury that he has suffered large damage. Where from the nature of the case the amount of damage cannot be ascertained with certainty, there is no objection to placing before the jury all the facts and circumstances of the case having any tendency to show damages, or their probable amount, so as to enable them to make the most intelligible and probable estimate which the nature of the case will admit. 1 Sedgwick on Damages, § 170.

[4] There was no error in the refusal of the court to grant instruction No. 4 asked for by the defendant. There was evidence tending to show that some smoke was thrown upon the plaintiffs' premises from the engines of passing trains on the tracks of the defendant, which lay between its yards and the plaintiffs' house. The effect of instruction No. 4 was to tell the jury that if any smoke, gas, etc., was cast upon the plaintiffs' premises from any of the operations of the defendant, or from any other railroad, no matter how slight the cause, this was a license for the defendant to make the home of the plaintiffs uninhabitable by deluging it with smoke, soot, cinders, and poisonous gases from the operations in its yards of the coal chute and power house, and the coaling and firing of engines therein, upon the theory that when the smoke, etc., from the causes imposing liability upon the defendant is mingled with the smoke for which there is no liability, the plaintiffs cannot recover, no matter how great they may have shown their damage to be from the causes which made the defendant responsible.

In no aspect of the present case could such an instruction be proper. The plaintiffs alleged and proved that serious damage was done them by the smoke, gases, etc., from the operations on the defendant's yards, and this responsibility cannot be escaped by showing that a modicum of smoke was thrown upon the plaintiffs from a lawful source.

[5] Instruction No. 5 as asked tells the jury that they must find for the defendant, because there was no evidence of depreciation in the value of the property or as to the amount of damages sustained.

This was error, as shown in commenting upon the second objection to instructions A and B, asked for by the plaintiffs. It was certainly not prejudicial to the defendant for the amendment complained of to eliminate from the consideration of the jury any question of injury to the plaintiffs' personal property.

The real question in this case and the one to which the argument has been chiefly directed involves the right of the defendant to the defense of the statute of limitations, and the propriety of the court's action in modifying instruction No. 3 asked for by the defendant, which reads as follows:

"If the jury believe from the evidence that the structures designated as the 'coal chute' and 'power plant' were put in operation prior to five years before the institution of this action, and that the firing and coaling of defendant's engines at said coal chute commenced more than five years before the institution of this action, that said structures are of a permanent character, that they have been operated since first used, and its engines fired and coaled at said coal chute since it was first used in the same manner to the time of the institution of the suit, and that the operation of said coal chute and power plant, and firing and coaling of said engines have injured the property of the plaintiffs, and that the nuisance caused by said operations is of such a character that its continuance necessarily constituted a permanent injury to plaintiffs' property, then the jury are instructed that the plaintiffs' cause of action accrued when said power house and chute were first operated, and said engines were first coaled, or their draught increased by the use of blowers at said chute; that the claim of the plaintiffs is barred by the statute of limitations, and their verdict shall be for the defendant."

The substantial difference between the foregoing instruction, asked for by the defendant, and its modification as given by the court, is the addition of the words, "and to substantially the same extent," making the instruction where the addition occurs read as follows: "That said structures are of a permanent character, that they have been operated since first used, and its engines fired and coaled at said coal chute since it was first used in the same manner and to substantially the same extent, during the whole period from the construction of said coal chute," etc.

The evidence of the defendant tends to show a continuous damage to the property of the plaintiffs from the time the structures complained of were erected and the operations there begun down to the date of the institution of this suit—a period of more than five years. Instruction No. 3 involves a consideration of the questions arising upon the plea of the statute of limitations; it being contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the statute of limitations cannot be invoked in this case, and that an instruction recognizing its application should not have been given in any form.

[6] The general rule with respect to nuisances undoubtedly is that repeated actions may be brought as long as the nuisance continues, but an exception to the general rule, as well established as the rule itself, is that where a permanent nuisance, the consequences of which in the normal course of things will continue indefinitely, there is but a single action therefor, and the entire damage suffered, both past and future, must be recovered in that action, and the right to recover will be barred unless it is brought within the prescribed number of years from the time the cause of action accrued. Va. Hot Springs Co. v. McCray, 106 Va. 461, 56 S. E. 216, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 465.

The principles enunciated in the case cited are sustained by the great weight of authority, and in no class of cases is the doctrine more frequently invoked and applied than in cases involving the construction and operation of railroads, which are presumed to be permanent structures. Highland, etc., Co. v. Matthews, 99 Ala. 24, 10 South. 267, 14 L. R. A. 462; Frankle v. Jackson, Receiver (C. C.) 30 Fed. 598; Stodghill v. Railroad Co., 53 Iowa, 341, 5 N. W. 495; Chicago, etc., v. Loeb, 118 Ill. 203, 8 N. E. 460, 59 Am. Rep. 341; Fowle v. New Haven, etc., Co., 107 Mass. 352; Id., 112 Mass. 334, 17 Am. Rep. 106; Louisville, etc., Co. v. Orr, 91 Ky. 109, 15 S. W. 8; Illinois, etc., Co. v. Hodge (Ky.) 55 S. W. 688; Porter v. Midland, etc., Co., 125 Ind. 476, 25 N. E. 556; De Geofroy v. Merchants', etc., Co., 179 Mo. 698, 79 S. W. 386, 64 L. R. A. 959, 101 Am. St. Rep. 524; Chicago, etc., Co. v. O'Connor, 42 Neb. 90, 60 N. W. 326; Williams v. Southern, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 624, 89 Pac. 599; Jacksonville, etc., Co. v. Lockwood, 83 Fla. 573, 15 South. 327.

[7] The effect of the modification by the court of instruction No. 3 was to require the jury to believe, before applying the bar of the statute of limitations, that the injuries to the property of the plaintiffs had been "continuous in the same manner and substantially to the same extent during the whole period from the construction of the coal chute and power house." Under the instruction as modified if it appeared that the business of the defendant had increased during the five-year period, thereby causing an increased damage to the plaintiffs, the jury would not have been authorized to sustain the defense of the statute of limitations.

We are of opinion that it was not essential to the defense of the statute of limitations that the damage complained of should exist to the same extent during the period of five years. Louisville, etc., Co. v. Orr, supra; Kilcoyn v. Chicago, etc., Co., 141 Ky. 237, 132 S. W. 438.

In the case last cited it is said: "There is nothing in this case to take it out of the rule laid down in the cases cited. In those cases, as here, traffic over the road had been begun more than five years before the suit was brought. It had increased within five years before the suit was brought and greater damage had been done, but this does not affect the question. The railroad is a permanent structure, and the property owner must know that, as the business of the road increases, the trains will increase. He has five years in which to bring his action, and the time cannot be extended by reason of the fact that the business of the road has greatly increased. To so hold would be to ignore the rule; for the reason that, as the country builds up, the business of all railroads increases. The railroad has the right to use its tracks for its business as it increases, and its lawful use of its own property cannot give rise to a fresh cause of action."

In the light of the authorities cited, we are of opinion that instruction No. 3 embodied a correct statement of the law, and should have been given in the form in which it was asked by the defendant.

[8] In connection with this last-mentioned assignment of error, the defendant contended that, with respect to the time when the damage complained of began, the plaintiffs' evidence could not be considered because in conflict with physical facts which made it impossible for such evidence to be true. The physical facts relied on in support of this contention consisted of the defendant's evidence that the use of its yard and the structures therein was less extensive at the end of the five-year period than in the beginning, for the reason that during that period the passenger operations of the defendant were transferred entirely from the yard to the Union Station, some distance from the plaintiffs' property; and that the freight operations, other than those involving freight destined locally to Alexandria, were transferred to the Potomac yards, several miles from Alexandria. It is insisted that these changes necessarily resulted in diminishing the damage accruing to the plaintiffs' property, but that, notwithstanding these facts, both plaintiffs testified that their damage was insignificant in the beginning of the five-year period, and very great in the latter part thereof; indeed, the plaintiffs' evidence tended to limit the damage sustained by them to the three years immediately preceding the institution of their suit.

The evidence of the defendant, tending to show that it had transferred a large part of its business from the yard in question to other places, did not establish such physical facts as to render the evidence of the plaintiffs untrue. Many causes, such as inferior coal, increase in the number of engines fired and coaled at the chute and power house, etc., may have operated to make the damage greater after the business mentioned had been transferred to other places. It was for the jury to say, upon all the evidence, when the damage began which gave the plaintiffs a cause of action.

For the error of the circuit court in refusing instruction No. 3, as asked for by the defendant, and in modifying the same, its judgment must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded for a new trial to be had, not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

WALTER v. WHITACRE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912. Rehearing Denied March 14, 1912.)

1. WILLS (§ 706*)—ACTION TO CONSTRUCT—RIGHT TO APPEAL—ESTOPPEL.

By suing to sell testamentary property and have the proceeds distributed according to a construction placed on the will by a decree, testator's widow waived her right to appeal from that decree, and a decree directing distribution of proceeds according to such construction.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 146*)—"NEW PROMISE IN WRITING"—SUFFICIENCY—PLEADING.

That an inventory filed with a bill brought by testator's brother and others to construe the will listed a debt as due the estate from the brother did not constitute a "new promise in writing," removing the bar of limitations, under Code 1904, § 2922, where the inventory was not signed by him or his agent, and the bill was not signed by him, but by counsel.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 146*)—NEW PROMISE IN WRITING—SUFFICIENCY—DEPOSITIONS.

Where an inventory of testator's estate scheduled a debt due from a brother, the brother's deposition cannot be regarded as a new promise in writing, removing the bar of limitations, within Code 1904, § 2922, where it contained a denial that the debt stated in the inventory was a correct statement of his debt to testator.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Frederick County.

Bill by W. C. Whitacre and others against Merrie Walter. From certain decrees, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. T. Barton, for appellant. Ward & Larrick, M. M. Lynch, and Sipe & Harris, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. [1] The first question to be determined is the motion of the appellees to dismiss this appeal. The ground of the motion to dismiss is that the appellant has waived her right of appeal, or is estopped from asserting it.

The facts and circumstances relied on to establish such waiver or estoppel, briefly stated, are as follows: James P. Whitacre died in the year 1909, leaving valuable real and personal estate, which he disposed of by his last will to his widow and his six brothers, who were his next of kin. The widow and one of the brothers qualified as executors of the decedent's estate. During the same year the six brothers, five in their own right and one in his own right and as one of the executors of Jas. P. Whitacre, instituted their suit for the purpose of having the will construed, as to which construction they alleged that they and their deceased brother's widow differed, the interest of the parties in his estate ascertained and determined, the creditors convened, and the estate administered under the direction of the court, and for general relief.

The appellant, the decedent's widow, answered the bill, admitting that she and the other parties in interest differed as to the construction of her husband's will, praying for a construction thereof, and for substantially the same relief sought by the bill.

In March, 1910, a decree was entered, construing the will and ordering accounts necessary to enable the court to carry out the purposes for which the suit was brought. By that decree the circuit court held that the appellant took under her husband's will a life estate in a house and lot, described as No. 215 North Washington street, in the city of Winchester, an absolute estate in all the tangible personal property in and upon the said premises, and, after the payment of the testator's debts, etc., a one-third interest in fee in his other real estate and a one-third interest absolutely in his other personal estate, and that the six brothers were entitled to the residue of the testator's property after the payment of his debts, etc., and the payment or setting apart of the several devises and bequests made the appellant.

In May, 1910, the appellant filed her bill in the same court against the six brothers, who were the complainants in the above-described suit in which her husband's will was construed, and the rights of the parties ascertained and determined, in which she set out the proceedings had in that suit, the construction placed upon the will and what the rights of the parties were under that construction, and made the bill, answer, and decree in that case a part of her bill. It was further alleged in her bill that the Washington street property was not susceptible of partition in kind, and that it would be to the interest of all parties to sell that property and divide the proceeds among them. After giving reasons why it was best that the property should be sold and the proceeds divided, and that she was willing to accept a gross sum in lieu of her life estate therein, she prayed "that the interest of your complainant in said premises as adjudged and determined by said decree of March 2, 1910, be commuted and determined and paid to her in a gross sum in cash out of the proceeds of said sale; that the balance of said proceeds of sale be distributed and paid to the parties entitled thereto, as adjudged and determined by said decree. * * *

The relief prayed for was granted, except as to commutation of the value of the appellant's life estate in the property sold. Her one-third interest in fee in the proceeds of the sale was paid to her, and the other two-thirds of the proceeds of the sale in which she had a life estate was placed in the hands of a receiver, who was directed to pay the appellant during her life the income, interest, and profits thereof, and the cause placed upon the "deferred docket," with the right to any party in interest to ask for such further order as might be necessary.

After that suit was brought, such proceedings were had in the suit for the construction of the will and the administration of the decedent's estate as resulted in a sale of all his other real estate, consisting of several tracts, and a division of the proceeds thereof, and a distribution of the other personal estate of the decedent ordered to be made, and made to a very large extent, between the appellant and the other devisees and legatees of the testator, in accordance with the will as construed by the court in that case, without objection or exception by the appellant as to the manner of division and distribution.

By these appeals the appellant seeks to have this court review and reverse three decrees of the circuit court. One of them is the decree which construed her husband's will, and ascertained and determined the rights of herself and the other legatees and devisees therein, and another is the decree which directed that the division and distribution of the proceeds of the real estate of her husband other than the Washington street property should be made in accordance with the construction which the court had placed upon the will. If this court were to take cognizance of these appeals, and place the construction upon the will which the appellant claims is the proper construction, she would take a much larger interest in her husband's estate than the circuit court decided that she had, and it would result in reversing the decree in which the will was construed, and in reversing or modifying the decrees based upon that construction, under which the proceeds of sale made in that case were distributed, by compelling other legatees to pay back money which had been paid them under decrees carrying out the provisions of the will as construed by the circuit court—a construction which the appellant has not only acquiesced in, by not objecting or excepting to the manner of distributing the testator's estate, but a construction upon which she based her right to the relief sought and obtained in the suit for the sale of the Washington street property.

This is a very different case from Southern Ry. Co. v. Glenn, 98 Va. 309, 319, 36 S. E. 395, and cases therein cited and relied on by the appellant to show that she has not by her conduct lost her right of appeal from the two decrees mentioned. In that case it was held that, where a decree is entered for less than a party claims, the mere receiving payment of the sum so decreed did not estop him from appealing from the decree as to the sums not allowed. But in this case the provisions of the decree construing the will were inseparable, and the appellant did not merely receive what under the decree construing it she was entitled to, but she brought a suit based upon that construction of the will, and asked to have sold and divided the proceeds of the Washington street property among the parties as ascertained and determined by the decree construing the will. The right to do this and the right of appeal from the decree were not concurrent, but, on the contrary, were totally inconsistent rights. Her election to bring the suit for the sale of the Washington street property and to have the proceeds divided between her and the other parties in interest, in accordance with the construction placed upon the will by that decree, was a renunciation of her right to appeal from that decree, which she was seeking to and did enforce in the other suit. See Carpenter v. Camp Mfg. Co., 112 Va. —, 70 S. E. 496, and Bennett v. Van Syckel, 18 N. Y. 481, 483, 484, cited with approval in that case. See, also, McKinnon v. Wolfenden, 78 Wis. 237, 47 N. W. 436.

We are of opinion that the appellant is estopped from appealing from the decrees of March 2, 1910, and of August 25, 1910, and that the motion to dismiss her appeal from those decrees must be sustained.

[2] The other decree appealed from was entered on the 7th of April, 1911, and has no such connection with the construction of the will, or the distribution and division of the testator's estate under that construction, as estops the appellant from appealing from that decree, so far as it involves the question whether or not a debt alleged to be due from W. C. Whitacre to the estate of the testator was barred by the statute of limitations.

The appellant insists that the court erred in holding that the debt in question was barred by the statute of limitations, because the bill in the case, filed by W. C. Whitacre and others, contains an acknowledgment of the debt due from him, which amounts to a new promise, under section 2922 of the Code, and thus removes the bar of the statute of limitations; (2) because the deposition of W. C. Whitacre taken in the cause contains such an acknowledgment of the debt as amounts to a promise to pay, and removes the bar of the statute, under the provisions of section 2922 of the Code; (3) because W. C. Whitacre is estopped by his bill from pleading the statute of limitations; (4) because the commissioner's report of May, 1910, and the decree of June, 1910, are a binding adjudication of the validity of the said debt.

The court is of opinion that this assignment of error cannot be sustained upon either of the grounds relied on. While the inventory filed with the bill does list the debt in question as due from W. C. Whitacre, it was not signed by him or his agent; neither was the bill with which it was filed signed by him, but by his counsel, who brought the suit for him and others for a construction of his brother's will, and a settlement, division, and distribution of his estate under the direction of the court. Taking into consideration the purpose for which the suit was brought, and that the bill was only signed by counsel employed to bring the suit, and without any evidence to show that he was authorized to make any admission that would amount to a new promise to pay the debt, we are of opinion that it was not such an acknowledgment of indebtedness by the debtor or his agent that a promise to pay would naturally and irresistibly be implied, as is required by section 2922 of the Code. Dinguid v. Schoolfield, 73 Va. 803, 807, 808, and authorities cited.

[3] Neither is there any such acknowledgment in the deposition of W. C. Whitacre. In that he denies that the debt stated in the inventory is a correct statement of what he owes his brother's estate, and it cannot be considered as containing an unqualified and direct acknowledgment of a subsisting indebtedness, from which a promise to pay could be inferred. Dinguid v. Schoolfield, supra, 73 Va. 807, 808, and authorities cited.

Neither of the other grounds upon which this assignment of error is based can be considered, since no such objections were made to the commissioner's report. A party cannot except to a commissioner's report on one ground in the trial court, and rely upon a wholly different ground in the appellate court, unless the objection made in the appellate court is apparent upon the face of the report.

We are of opinion that the decree of the April term, 1911, appealed from, should be affirmed.

MOORMAN et al. v. CITY OF LYNCHBURG.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 18, 1912. Rehearing Denied March 14, 1912.)

1. JURY (§ 14*)—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY—EQUITABLE ISSUES.

Where a defendant, in a suit by a city to compel the removal of obstructions placed by him in a street, establishes a bona fide claim of title to the land in the street, he is entitled to a jury trial to determine the ownership of the land; but where he shows no such bona fide claim he cannot demand a jury, nor deprive equity of jurisdiction to compel the removal of the obstruction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-83; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. JURY (§ 14*)—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL.

An owner platted land into lots and blocks, and sold lots described by calls for street lines. For many years the street was marked by a well-defined, traveled way, and was used by the public at will. The owner in his lifetime, and his heirs after his death, did not question the right of the city to the street. The street was never obstructed until the city began the construction of sewers. Held, that a grantee of the owner of property described by the street lines had no such bona fide claim of title to the street as entitled him to a trial by jury of a suit by the city to compel him to remove obstructions placed in the street, or to deprive equity of its jurisdiction to compel removal of the obstructions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-83; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

Appeal from Corporation Court of Lynchburg.

Suit by the City of Lynchburg against Winington L. Moorman and another for a mandatory injunction. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Coleman, Easley & Coleman, for appellants. Wilson & Manson, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. The appellee, the city of Lynchburg, filed its bill against the appellants, Winington L. Moorman and William Hurt, praying for a mandatory injunction to compel the defendants to remove certain obstructions alleged to have been placed by them in Miller and Knight streets, and also to establish those streets as indicated on the "Miller map" exhibited with the bill.

The defendants, by demurrer and answer, denied the jurisdiction of a court of equity to take cognizance of the controversy, and controverted the proposition that the streets in question were ever dedicated by Mrs. Miller (the former owner), or accepted by the city. They insisted that they were the owners of the land included in the streets, that the litigation involved a bona fide claim of title to land, and that the determination of that issue ought to have been submitted to a jury. Manchester Cotton Mills v. Manchester, 66 Va. 825; Collins v. Sutton, 94 Va. 127, 26 S. E. 415; Miller v. Wills, 95 Va. 337, 28 S. E. 837; Calloway v. Webster, 98 Va. 790, 37 S. E. 276.

From decrees granting the city the relief prayed for, this appeal was allowed.

[1] The crucial question for our determination is whether the appellants have made good the pretension that they have a bona fide claim of title to the land embraced in these streets. If they have, then their right to a trial by jury is clear under the authorities cited. But if they have shown no such bona fide claim, they are neither in position to demand such trial, nor to question the right of the city to proceed with its work. In the latter case, they would be bare trespassers, who had precipitated a controversy which did not concern them.

[2] We are of opinion that the city has, at least, made out a prima facie title to the streets in question by plat dedication from Mrs. Miller in 1886, accompanied by sale of lots and user and subsequent recognition of and acquiescence in the city's claim to and improvement of these streets by the heirs of Mrs. Miller and their alienees. City of Richmond v. Stokes, 72 Va. 713; Elliott on Streets and Roads (3d Ed.) § 129; Campbell v. City of Elkins, 58 W. Va. 308, 52 S. E. 220, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 159.

The lots on the "Miller map" contiguous to Miller and Knight streets, both in the deeds from Mrs. Miller and her children and their grantees, have always been described by calls for the street lines, and Knight street had for years been marked by a well-defined, traveled way, and used by the public at will. The city's right to these streets, as thus acquired, was never drawn in question by Mrs. Miller in her lifetime or by her heirs since her death.

The case of Manchester Cotton Mills v. Manchester, supra, is chiefly relied on by the appellants to maintain their contention. A comparison of the facts of that case with those of the instant case will show that in essentials they are wholly dissimilar. In the former case the city of Manchester undertook to remove three brick tenements held by the Cotton Mills, which the city claimed encroached upon a public street. The Cotton Mills and those under whom they claimed had been in possession of the houses for more than 20 years, and had title to the land much longer. The city contended that the ground in controversy had been dedicated as a street by a former owner; and it was conceded that, unless there was a dedication, the plaintiffs had a clear legal title to the premises. In these circumstances the court enjoined the city from removing the buildings until the rights of the parties could be settled by a trial at law.

In the present case the appellants claim title to their holdings mediately through Mrs. Miller, and it affirmatively appears that they have never bought or paid for, or obtained title to or possession of, the land included in the streets, and have no interest therein, save in common with the general public. The conveyances by which Moorman acquired his property all describe the lots conveyed by the street lines, and thus exclude the streets from the grants to him; and Moorman conveyed a one-half interest in his holdings to Hurt. Moreover, the streets were never obstructed until the city began the construction of sewers, and only a short time before the institution of this suit. It plainly appears, therefore, that there is no such bona fide assertion of title to the streets on the part of the appellants as should entitle them to a trial by jury, or deprive a court of equity of its undoubted jurisdiction to compel the removal of the obstructions complained of by mandatory injunction. Sanderlin v. Baxter, 76 Va. 305, 44 Am. Rep. 165; Spilling v. Hutcheson, 111 Va. 179, 68 S. E. 250; Williams v. Green, 111 Va. 205, 68 S. E. 253; Chambers v. Roanoke, etc., Ass'n, 111 Va. 254, 257, 68 S. E. 980; Buffalo v. Harling, 50 Minn. 551, 52 N. W. 931; Eau Claire v. Matzke, 86 Wis. 291, 58 N. W. 874, 39 Am. St. Rep. 900; Burlington v. Schwarzman, 52 Conn. 181, 52 Am. Rep. 573; Madison v. Mayers, 97 Wis. 399, 73 N. W. 43, 40 L. R. A. 635, 65 Am. St. Rep. 127; Pewaukee v. Savoy, 103 Wis. 271, 79 N. W. 436, 50 L. R. A. 836, 74 Am. St. Rep. 864.

Of course, this litigation in no wise affects the ultimate right of an abutting owner on a street to one-half of the land occupied by such street, in the event of its discontinuance. Schwalm v. Beardsley, 106 Va. 407, 56 S. E. 135; Durbin v. Roanoke Building Co., 107 Va. 753, 60 S. E. 86.

Upon these considerations, the decrees appealed from are affirmed.

SALES (§ 420*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—SPECIAL DAMAGES—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for special damages for the breach of a contract for the shipment of glass for mirrors in a restaurant, evidence held to present question for jury whether defendant had notice of the purpose for which plaintiff desired the glass and of the damages claimed, and hence the direction of a verdict for nominal damages was improper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; E. B. Cline, Judge.

Action by J. D. O'Neal against Henry Seim & Co. From a judgment on a directed verdict for insufficient damages, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

This is an action to recover special damages for breach of contract in the shipment of certain plate glass. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to prove a breach of the contract, and that he was damaged thereby, but at the conclusion of the evidence his honor held that there was no evidence of notice to the defendant of the purpose for which the glass was ordered, or of the damages claimed, and directed the jury to answer the issue as to damages, "five cents," and the plaintiff excepted.

Rodman & Rodman, for appellant. Ward & Grimes, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. Upon an examination of the record we are of opinion that there is evidence which entitles the plaintiff to have his case considered by a jury.

It is in evidence that W. G. O'Neal, on April 18, 1908, ordered for the plaintiff from the defendant 33 plate glass mirrors 20x36, A plate, 30 division bars, 1 A plate glass, 66x78, to be shipped at once, and notified the defendant in the order that the mirrors were for the side walls of a restaurant; that the plaintiff was a contractor in Washington, N. C., and was fitting up the restaurant under contract; and that, by reason of the breach of the contract by the defendant, he and at least one employé, to whom he paid wages, remained idle 15 or 20 days. W. G. O'Neal was a brother of the plaintiff, and there is evidence that he knew of the facts recited, and that he represented the defendant at Washington.

There must be a new trial.

BODDIE v. BOND.

1. WILLS (§ 561*)—DEVISE—DESCRIPTION.

2. ESTOPPEL (§ 87*)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—GROUNDS.

A devisee took, under her devise, two adjoining lots, one of which was wrongfully held by defendant, who had purchased it previously from one who had no title, the devisee having no knowledge that she owned the same. She sold the lot of which she was in possession, and her grantee and defendant agreed to straighten the line between the two lots, which line was surveyed in the presence of the devisee, and her deed referred to it as an agreed line. Held, that she was not thereby equitably estopped from claiming the lot in defendant's possession, as defendant did not rely on and was not misled to his damage by the devisee's acts or conduct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Warren County; Justice, Judge.

Action by Viola Boddie against V. N. Bond. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 154 N. C. 359, 70 S. E. 824.

T. T. Hicks and J. M. Picot, for appellant. T. M. Pittman, S. G. Daniel, and J. H. Kerr, for appellee.

HOKE, J. This case was before the court on a former appeal from a ruling of the superior court judge that plaintiff was barred of recovery by reason of an equitable estoppel arising on the facts then presented. The court held there was error (see 154 N. C. 359, 70 S. E. 824), and, this opinion having been certified down, there was recovery by plaintiff and the case is now here on appeal of defendants.

[1] On the present trial, it was agreed that both parties claimed under Jno. W. Heptinstall, deceased, and plaintiff's legal title was made to rest on a devise in his last will and testament to his wife, Cornelia, and by devise of Cornelia to plaintiff. The descriptive words of the devise to Cornelia are as follows: "I give my wife, Cornelia, the house where we now live, with all the outhouses and premises embracing the peach and apple orchard," etc. Under our authorities this description is sufficiently definite to pass title to the property, and permit the reception of parol evidence to fit the description to the land intended. Ward v. Gay, 137 N. C. 397, 49 S. E. 884; Blow v. Vaughan, 105 N. C. 198, 10 S. E. 891. And, the jury having found that the locus in quo is included within the terms of the devise to plaintiff, the question is again presented as to the existence of an equitable estoppel.

[2] On that position we find nothing in the present record which materially differs from the case as formerly presented, and for the reasons so clearly stated in the opinion by Associate Justice Walker the judgment in favor of plaintiff must be sustained. On the present trial, as heretofore, it was made to appear that plaintiff, the devisee under the will of Jno. W. Heptinstall and subsequently of Cornelia, his wife, on the 24th day of March, 1911, sold and conveyed to a Mrs. Miles, wife of T. J. Miles, a portion of the land, being under the impression that it was all she owned in that locality or under the devise, and in the deed described the same on one side as bordering on the "line of V. N. Bond, defendant." The plaintiff, who resided in Greensboro, N. C., having come to Littleton on the day her deed bears date for the purpose of attending a sale of her aunt's personal property, the witness T. J. Miles, husband of the purchaser of plaintiff's lot, determined to have the dividing line between the two lots determined upon, defendant contending that the true dividing line ran straight back from the Presbyterian church lot, and T. J. Miles, the husband of the purchaser, contending that a slight deflection should be made; and a dividing line was agreed upon between T. J. Miles, the witness, and the defendant. The only difference in the evidence as shown on the two appeals is that it did not appear in the former case that plaintiff was at any time present or knew anything whatever of the occurrence; while there is evidence now appearing that she was present at the time or cognizant of what was being done, but this fact does not at all affect the result as applied to the issue.

It is well understood in this state that boundary lines as contained in written deeds dividing or other may not be changed by parol evidence except in the one case where, contemporaneously with the execution of a deed, the physical boundaries are actually run and marked for the purpose of making the deed, and are thereby given a different placing. And that as to deeds already executed and under ordinary circumstances parties are not estopped by their parol agreements fixing boundaries at a place different from that shown in the deeds. Buckner v. Anderson, 111 N. C. 575, 16 S. E. 424; Shaffer v. Hahn, 111 N. C. 1, 15 S. E. 1033; Caraway v. Chancy, 51 N. C. 361; Davidson v. Arledge, 97 N. C. 185, 2 S. E. 378. The case of Hanstein v. Ferrall, 49 N. C. 240, 62 S. E. 1070, in no way conflicts with these authorities. In Hanstein's Case long acquiescence in a certain drain as the dividing line between two lots and recognition of it as such by the adjoining proprietors was held competent and material as evidence to properly fix the correct dividing line between them, but not to change or vary it from the boundaries as contained in their deeds; and on the title to this adjoining lot, this lot in dispute held and claimed by defendant, it appears in the record, as we understand it, that defendant had bought and paid for this lot and taken a deed from one of the other devisees or heirs at law of Jno. Heptinstall, nearly three years before this, to wit, on the 10th day of December, 1907. As to the title, therefore, there is no evidence which shows or tends to show that what plaintiff did or said on this or any other occasion had any effect whatever in inducing defendant to buy and pay for the lot in controversy. He simply bought the lot from some one who did not own it, and he must surrender it to plaintiff, who has the true title. As it was well said on the former appeal: "A party claiming title to lands only by reason of an equitable estoppel of the other party to the action, arising from his alleged acts and conduct respecting a line between adjoining lands, must show that the acts and conduct relied on have misled and caused him loss or damage." There is nothing to withdraw defendants' claim from the effect and operation of the principle, and the judgment for plaintiff, therefore, must be affirmed.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r indexes

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Vance County; Cooke, Judge.

Action by the Columbian Conservatory of Music against J. H. Dickenson. From a judgment for insufficient damages, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

This was a civil action, commenced before a justice of the peace, and tried on appeal in the superior court of Vance county, October term, 1911; his honor Judge Cooke presiding. The action was brought to recover on an unpaid and protested check for $12, and on a note for $33, dated March 22, 1910, given by defendant to plaintiff, and payable December 1, 1910, with interest after maturity.

T. T. Hicks, for appellant. J. C. Kittrell and Thomas M. Pittman, for appellee.

BROWN, J. The pleas of defendant in answer interposed two defenses: (1) Fraud in procuring the execution of the note and check; (2) a failure of consideration. His honor instructed the jury that there was no evidence of fraud, which is patent from an examination of the evidence. Plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury upon all the evidence, if believed, to render a verdict for the amount of both note and check. This instruction was refused. All the evidence shows that the note and check were given for a course of musical instruction to be given by mail by plaintiff to defendant's daughter. She made the application in due form, and received a certificate of enrollment or scholarship, which defendant produced on the trial, on notice. Defendant testified that he thought it was a note for $12 and not a check that he had signed, payable April 12th, and that "when he found out, April 18th, that it was a check, he refused to have anything more to do with the instructions or to allow his daughter to take the course." He admitted that the plaintiff tendered the instructions called for by the contract, and that he refused to allow his daughter to receive them.

[1] We fail to see a partial, much less a total, failure of consideration. Although notes as simple contracts require a consideration to support them, it has been long settled that they import a consideration prima facie, so as to throw on the maker the burden to show a want of consideration. McArthur v. McLeod, 51 N. C. 475; Campbell v. McCormac, 90 N. C. 492. In the latter case, Mr. Justice Ashe, quoting from Story & Daniel, says: "That it is wholly unnecessary to establish that a promissory note was given upon a consideration; and the burden of proof rests upon the other party to establish the contrary, and to rebut the presumption of validity, and value which the law raises." The note sued on was given in consideration of an agreement in writing upon the part of the plaintiff to give to defendant's daughter musical instruction by mail. The contract was duly entered into and acted upon for three weeks; the plaintiff furnishing all the contract called for—music, instructions, lessons, grading, etc.

[2] The feasibility of teaching music in a "correspondence school" is beyond our ken, and it is not a question within our domain, but the evidence shows that the plaintiff entered upon the performance of the contract, and its services accepted for three weeks, and then abruptly terminated by defendant because he thought he had signed a note for $12 instead of a check. The excuse is utterly insufficient. Sapona Co. v. Holt, 64 N. C. 335.

[3] As to the amount the plaintiff is entitled to recover under the evidence in this case, that is to be measured by the face of the note, for there is no evidence whatever which warrants the court in permitting a diminution from the face of the paper. The basis of the action is a special contract to pay so much money, founded, as we have shown, upon valuable consideration, and it must regulate the plaintiff's right to recover, as well as the amount. Engine Company v. Paschal, 151 N. C. 30, 65 S. E. 523. It seems to be generally held that in action on a written contract, or a stipulated amount, the contract itself furnishes the measure of damages. 8 A. & E. 636. We find nothing whatever in the case of Horner School v. Westcott, 124 N. C. 518, 32 S. E. 885, which militates against anything which we have here said, as the facts in that case were entirely different.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r indexes

The plaintiff is entitled to the prayer, as requested.

ROBERTS v. BULLOCK.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. REPLEVIN (§ 70*) — INTERVENTION — BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where, in claim and delivery, defendant B. intervened and claimed the property under a sale from H., to whom it was claimed plaintiff had sold the same, the burden was on B. to show that the title had passed to H.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Replevin, Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

2. SALES (§ 454*) — EXECUTORY CONTRACT — TRANSFER OF TITLE.

Plaintiff permitted H. to cut certain cross-ties from plaintiff's land, haul them to a station, and deposit them on the railroad right of way under an agreement to pay plaintiff 12½ cents each and that they were not to be moved from the railroad right of way until paid for. H. was indebted to intervenor, and consented to furnish ties in payment, and, as intervenor was about to ship the ties without paying plaintiff, he sought to recover them in replevin. Held, that the contract between plaintiff and H. was not a conditional sale, but an executory contract, under which the title did not vest in H. until plaintiff was paid the contract price, so that prior to such payment intervenor could acquire no title from H.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 454.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Franklin County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by R. B. Roberts against W. T. Hudson, in which John Bullock intervened. Judgment for plaintiff, and Bullock appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Yarborough, Jr., for plaintiff. T. T. Hicks, for defendant.

CLARK, C. J. The defendant W. T. Hudson, by permission of plaintiff, cut 516 cross-ties on the latter's land and hauled them to Youngsville, where he deposited them on the right of way of the defendant railroad under an agreement that they were not to be moved thence till paid for. Hudson owed to the defendant Bullock money on a mortgage and consented to furnish ties in payment thereon. These ties were about being loaded on the cars for the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, to whom Bullock had sold them, when the plaintiff took out claim and delivery for recovery of the ties. Bullock was not served with process, but on his own application was made a party as interpleader (Rev. § 800), gave bond, and claimed the ties. The plaintiff testified that he allowed Hudson to cut the ties and haul them to Youngsville under an agreement that the title was to remain in himself until the ties were paid for; that Hudson afterwards told him that he expected to sell the ties to Bullock, who would send plaintiff a check direct for the money, but that in the meantime the title to the ties would remain in plaintiff till they were paid for; that he never saw Bullock and did not receive the check. Hudson agreed to pay the plaintiff 12½ cents each for the ties without grading. Hudson was to receive from Bullock 30, 35, and 50 cents for the ties according to grade. There was no conflicting testimony, and the court charged the jury that if they believed the evidence of the plaintiff to return a verdict for the amount of the cross-ties at 12½ cents each, $64.50. This presents the question whether the contract between the plaintiff and Hudson was a conditional sale or an executory contract. If it was the former, the plaintiff could not recover because the contract was not reduced to writing and recorded.

[1, 2] The defendant Bullock being an interpleader, the burden was upon him to show that the title of the property had passed to Hudson. Mfg. Co. v. Tierney, 133 N. C. 630, 45 S. E. 1026, and cases cited. This he did not do, because the undisputed evidence is that the contract between the plaintiff and Hudson was that the title to the ties was to remain in the plaintiff till paid for. The plaintiff did not part with the right of possession, but merely permitted the ties, as a matter of convenience, to be hauled to the station, there to remain, without being loaded on the cars, till the sale should be consummated by payment of the purchase money upon which, and not till then, the title was to pass. Upon the attempt being made to load the ties upon the cars, the plaintiff promptly asserted his right of possession by claim and delivery.

The line between an executory contract and a conditional sale is sometimes difficult to draw, but here it is clear that there was no sale to Hudson by plaintiff. Hudson was to do two things. He was to cut the ties and pay for them, and when these things were both done, and not till then, the sale was to be consummated and Hudson was to be vested with the title and possession. The ties were not sold to Hudson and delivered to him upon condition that if not paid for the plaintiff could retake them. Bullock could acquire no title when Hudson himself had not acquired any, and could not do so under his agreement, until the ties were paid for.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is probably more than a coincidence that deducting the cash payment, $95, which Bullock made to Hudson, the balance due by Bullock on the ties is $65, almost the exact amount due plaintiff for the ties.

No error.

STATE v. WILKINS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 169*)—MURDER—PRIOR RELATIONS OF PARTIES—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a prosecution for murder, there was no direct proof of guilt apart from defendant's admission, but there was strong circumstantial evidence to show that defendant with premeditation murdered his wife, evidence of the relations previously existing between them, that they had quarreled, that he appeared to be the aggressor, had threatened her life, and had attempted to use his knife and to draw a pistol, was admissible.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 342*)—MOTIVE—IDENTITY—EVIDENCE.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Ferguson, Judge.

G. G. Wilkins was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

The prisoner was indicted in the court below for the murder of his wife, and was convicted of murder in the first degree. The evidence tended to show the following facts: The prisoner and deceased, who was his wife, lived about one mile from the town of Spring Hope in Nash county. For some time prior to the homicide there had been misunderstandings and quarrels between defendant and his wife, and about two weeks before the homicide the defendant drove his wife from their home, to the house of her mother, about 25 or 30 yards away. He then tried to drive her back, and upon her refusal to go defendant struck the deceased and she returned the blow. On the same day, defendant had a knife out and threatened to cut the clothes off the woman. He also made an attempt to draw a pistol, when a bystander caught him and took the pistol from him. About two days before the homicide, the defendant said to a witness, Bunn, that his (defendant's) wife thought she was fooling him, dealing with other men, but, God damn her, he would kill her and be hung for it. It further appears that the deceased and the defendant quarreled about another woman by the name of Lewis, and the defendant told deceased that she could get out, that he was going to bring another lady in there. On the morning of the homicide, defendant said to a witness, one Bettie Wiggins, that he had something to tell her, that he was not going to tell it then, but when he told it it would be in red letters. On the same morning the defendant stated to another witness, Nellie Wiggins, that the deceased would not be with him but two days more; that she had other men, and he was going to kill her; that he would rather kill her than to have her live with other men. On the morning of the homicide, deceased and defendant were both seen at their home about 11 o'clock. The woman was doing some washing, and the man was cleaning his gun. About 11 o'clock his gun was heard to fire, and shortly thereafter the defendant remarked to a witness, Sessoms, who lived near, that his gun shot all right—right to the spot. An hour or two later, this same witness heard the gun fire again, but paid no special attention to it. During the same morning, a witness, Mamie Wiggins, saw the defendant and deceased at their home together. In the presence of the defendant, deceased said she was going to the cotton patch, but that it would be 12 o'clock before she could go, as she had to iron a shirt. About 3 o'clock p. m. the witness came back from the cotton patch, and defendant met her at his front gate, and asked her if she had seen Ida, his wife. Witness answered that she had not, and defendant said, "Yes, you have, because she put on some more clothes and went to the cotton patch." About 4 o'clock in the afternoon defendant left his home and went to the town of Spring Hope. About night the mother of the deceased came home from the cotton patch, and neither the defendant nor the deceased could be found at their home. The mother made inquiry for her daughter, but nobody knew anything about her. The next morning search for the missing woman was renewed. A pile of "strips," presumably tobacco strips, was seen in the yard, which had not been there before. Under these strips was some fresh dirt with blood on it. Inside the house was found an empty shell, on the floor, a shotgun with the barrel full of dirt, and the overalls of the defendant with spots on them that looked like blood. Fresh dirt was noticed under the crib. The floor of the crib was torn up by the searchers, and there, about 10 inches under the ground, was the dead body of Ida Wilkins. There was an ugly gunshot wound in her neck, made by small shot at close range. The prisoner was arrested in Spring Hope on the day after the homicide, and, after he was put in jail, he said that his wife had gone down to her father's. Thereafter, upon being told that he had killed his wife, he said that he was cleaning his gun and did not know his finger was on the trigger, when the gun went off and killed her. He said that she had laid out in the yard for about an hour, and then he buried her; that he started up town to tell about it, but he was so frightened that he could not. The defendant offered no evidence. There is a single exception to the testimony. The solicitor asked Rhoda Ann Westray, mother of the deceased, how her daughter and her husband got along together. She answered, "Well, they did not live good together." Q. State what you have seen transpiring between them in the way of quarreling." The prisoner objected to the question; the objection was overruled, and he excepted. The witness then proceeded to state that they quarreled, and related the quarrel that took place two Sundays before the homicide, when defendant drove deceased from his home, threatened to use the knife, and attempted to draw a pistol. The prisoner asked the court to give instructions to the jury upon the different degrees of homicide, calling their attention to the essential elements of each offense and with special reference to the bearing of the evidence upon them; but it is not necessary to set them out. The jury convicted of murder in the first degree, and from judgment entered upon the verdict, the prisoner appealed, after having duly excepted to the rulings of the court.

Attorney General Bickett and T. H. Calvert, for the State. F. S. Spruill, for appellee.

WALKER, J. [1, 2] There is but one exception in this case that calls for any discussion, as we will presently show. The prisoner objected to the testimony of the witness Rhoda Ann Westray, the mother of the deceased, as to whether the prisoner and his wife had lived together peaceably and as to any quarrels between them that she had seen. She answered that they did not live "good together," and that they had quarreled two Sundays before the homicide was committed, when the prisoner drove his wife from his home, threatening to cut her with his knife and attempting to draw his pistol. Except the admission of the defendant, which was made in contradiction of a previous statement by him as to the manner of the killing, there was no direct or positive proof of his guilt; but the evidence was circumstantial, there being no eyewitness to the tragedy. The circumstances tending to show that the prisoner had killed his wife were very strong, apart from his admission of the fact, and the state was compelled to rely upon the circumstances to show that he had murdered her deliberately and with premeditation. In this state of the proof, we fail to see why it was not competent and relevant to prove the relations between the parties, and especially that they had quarreled, the husband appearing to be the aggressor, and that he had even gone so far as to threaten her life, and had attempted to use his knife and draw his pistol. These facts, especially in connection with proof of the other circumstances, tended to show his malice towards her, and to assign a motive for the killing. But we think it has been expressly decided by this court that such evidence is competent and is also relevant to the issue. In State v. Rash, 34 N. C. 382, 55 Am. Dec. 420, similar evidence was offered against the defendant in that case; that is, to show ill treatment of his wife by him—the charge being that he had murdered her. It was held that the evidence was competent, not only to identify the husband as the slayer of his wife, but to show his malice towards her. Judge Nash, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The first inquiry would be: Who could be the perpetrator? And the mind would naturally turn upon the person who, either from interest or malice, might desire her death. Interest, in this case, could not exist, and malice alone could lead to the deed. Ordinarily, the eye of suspicion cannot turn upon the husband, as the murderer of his wife, and when charged upon him, in the absence of positive proof, strong and convincing evidence—evidence that leaves no doubt in the mind that he had toward her that mala mens which alone could lead him to perpetrate the crime—is always material. How else could this be done than by showing his acts toward her, the manner in which he treated her, and the declarations of his malignity?" He then proceeds to show that no stronger proof of malice could be offered than the husband's brutal treatment of his wife and his suspicion that she had been unfaithful to him; his conduct evincing "a settled state of feeling inimical to her." Underhill on Cr. Evidence, §§ 323, 327; Siberry v. State, 133 Ind. 677, 33 N. E. 681. In the case last cited, it was held that, where an indictment charges the defendant with the murder of his wife, testimony as to relations existing between them, previous to the homicide, and as to his treatment of her, is competent. It is not necessary to show a motive for committing the crime, when motive is not of its essence, but it is relevant to prove a motive as a circumstance to identify the prisoner as the perpetrator of the crime, and to establish malice, deliberation and premeditation. State v. Adams, 138 N. C. 688, 50 S. E. 765. This exception cannot be sustained.

The other exception taken to the refusal of the court to give the instructions requested by the prisoner are equally untenable. A perusal of the charge of the court will disclose that the learned judge, who presided at the trial, gave full, clear, and accurate instructions with reference to every question contained in the prayers of the prisoner, and not only responded to them directly, but he presented the case to the jury in every possible phase, and was exceedingly fair and favorable to the prisoner in what he said. He might have charged more strongly against him, and yet have been well within the law.

We find no error in the record.

STATE BOARD OF EDUCATION v. ROANOKE R. & LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 472*)—OPINIONS OR STATEMENT OF FACTS.

A witness who is familiar with land may testify that it is swamp land, although that is the precise question to be determined by the jury; this being a statement of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2186-2195; Dec. Dig. § 472.*]

2. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 164*)—GRANTS—VALIDITY.

A charge that, if the land which the state board of education sought to recover was in a swamp of over 2,000 acres at the time the grants under which defendant claimed were taken out, the grants were void, was proper under Revisal 1905, § 1693, subd. 3, providing that swamp land, where the quantity in any one swamp exceeds 2,000 acres, is not subject to entry and grant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

3. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 164*)—GRANTS—AVOIDING—EVIDENCE REQUIRED.

In an action by the state board of education to avoid grants of land claimed to be swamp land, a failure to charge that the grants could be avoided only by clear, strong, and convincing evidence is not error, especially in the absence of a request for such instruction, where the court charges that the burden is on plaintiff to establish by the greater weight of the evidence that the lands covered by the grants were part of a swamp of more than 2,000 acres, since under Revisal 1905, § 4047, lands within such a swamp are presumed to be the property of the board of education.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFORMITY TO PRAYERS.

Where prayers are charged in substance, a failure to charge their exact words is not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Washington County; E. B. Cline, Judge.

Action by the State Board of Education against the Roanoke Railroad & Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. O. Gaylord and Small, MacLean & McMullan, for appellant. W. M. Bond, W. M. Bond, Jr., and Ward & Grimes, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. Rev. 1693 (3) withdraws from being granted by the state all "marsh or swamp land, where the quantity of land in any one marsh or swamp exceeds two thousand acres, or where, if of less quantity, the same has been surveyed by the state, or by the state board of education, with a view to draining and reclaiming the same." This is an action to declare void certain grants embracing land which it is claimed came within the terms of the above section, and also to recover damages for timber cut by defendants on said land. The plaintiff did not ask to recover damages for timber cut more than three years before suit brought, and, as to the action for the land, the plaintiff is not barred by the statute of limitations which does not run in such cases (Rev. 4048), unless the state would have been barred by adverse possession which is not the case here.

[1] The first five exceptions are because the witnesses, who stated that they were familiar with the land, upon being asked what kind of land it was, answered that it was "swamp land." This being a matter of personal observation, as to a fact within the knowledge of the witness, the answer was competent, subject to cross-examination by the defendant. It is true the jury must find the issue, but the answer of the witness was competent to be submitted to them. Britt v. Railroad, 148 N. C. 40, 61 S. E. 601.

[2] The court charged the jury: "If this was swamp land and in a swamp of over 2,000 acres prior to and at the time the grants under which the defendant's claims were taken out, then the lands were not subject to entry and grant, and the defendant's said grants would be void and of no effect, for in such case there was no power and authority to grant same." The exception to this charge cannot be sustained. It complies with Rev. 1693 (3). The court charged the jury: "Was the land in question swamp land as is generally called and known? Some authorities have defined 'swamp land' as wet, spongy ground, soft, low ground, saturated with water, but not usually covered with it, marshy ground away from the seashore; another, as land the greater part of which is wet and unfit for cultivation, land which requires draining in order to make it fit for successful or useful cultivation." Exception 7 was to this charge, and cannot be sustained. The court went on to quote the statutory definition of swamp land enacted March 4, 1891, now Rev. 1695, and told the jury that this statutory definition would not apply against the defendant who held under a grant issued prior to that date, and further added that, as to the definition given above, the court did not mean to lay down any hard or fast rule by which the jury were to determine whether the lands in question were swamp land, but merely to give it as assistance to them in ascertaining what was the common and generally accepted definition of the words "swamp land." The court charged the jury: "It is not necessary that every bit of the land in controversy should be swamp land in order to enable the plaintiff to recover; that is to say, if there be some knolls or higher and dryer places in this piece of land that taken by themselves might not be deemed swamp, yet if they had swamp land around them in sufficient quantity so that the latter largely prevailed, and taking the whole body, by and large, the general effect was to make and call the land swamp land, then the knolls or higher ground could be taken in as a part of the whole." The eighth exception was to this charge, and cannot be sustained.

[3] The ninth exception is because the court did not instruct the jury that the grants could be vacated only by "clear, strong, and convincing evidence." There was no prayer to this effect, and it could not have been given if asked. The charge put the burden on the plaintiff to make out his case by the preponderance and the greater weight of the evidence, and this is the correct rule in this case. Board of Education v. Makeley, 139 N. C. 34, 51 S. E. 784. The court properly charged the jury to answer the issues "no," unless by the greater weight of the evidence the plaintiff had shown that the lands covered by the grants were swamp lands, and part of a swamp of more than 2,000 acres. The statute provides that, when it is shown that the land is swamp land and within a swamp of more than 2,000 acres, the law presumes that the board of education is the owner thereof, because grants of such land are void and unauthorized. Rev. 4047; Board of Education v. Makeley, supra.

[4] The prayers of the defendant so far as they were correct were given in substance in the charge. It was not necessary that they should have been given in the exact language asked for, if given in substance. Horton v. Railroad, 145 N. C. 132, 58 S. E. 993.

STATE v. BAGLEY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 203*)—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATIONS.

It is not necessary to the admission of a dying declaration of deceased that he should have himself declared that he believed he was about to die, if all the circumstances and surroundings in which he was placed indicate that he was fully under the influence of the solemnity of such belief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 430-437; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 203*)—DYING DECLARATIONS—FEAR OF DEATH.

Prior to the making of an alleged dying declaration by deceased, the physician who was present when deceased expired told him that he was in a critical condition, was likely to die, and if there was any message he wanted to leave he had better do so; whereupon deceased stated that it was the prisoner who shot him, and that he saw the prisoner's outline very distinctly as he ran down the street, and was certain it was he. Held, sufficient to justify the admission of decedent's statement as a dying declaration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 430-437; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 889*)—VERDICT—CORRECTION.

Under Revisal 1905, § 8271, providing that in a prosecution for homicide the jury shall determine by their verdict whether the crime is murder in the first or second degree, where the jury, in a prosecution for murder, returned with their verdict and, in response to the clerk, replied, "Guilty," the court properly directed them to reconsider their response and specify the crime of which they found defendant guilty; whereupon they stated they found him "guilty of murder in the first degree."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2110; Dec. Dig. § 889.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Martin County; C. M. Cooke, Judge.

Brad Bagley was convicted of murder in the first degree, sentenced to death, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Winston & Matthews, for appellant. Attorney General Bickett and Assistant Attorney General Calvert, for the State.

BROWN, J. The prisoner was convicted of the murder of one William R. White, who died on the night of August 15, 1911. The evidence tends to prove that while passing a gate on one of the public streets of the town of Williamston, about 9 o'clock p. m., the deceased was shot from behind, and died the same night.

[1] There is evidence of circumstances tending to prove that the prisoner waylaid and shot the deceased. But it is contended by the learned counsel for the prisoner that the evidence is insufficient to convict, if the dying declarations of the deceased are excluded. Many exceptions of the prisoner relate to the competency of these declarations. Dying declarations are admissible in cases of homicide when they appear to have been made by the deceased in present anticipation of death. It is not always necessary that the deceased should declare himself that he believes he is about to pass away; but all the circumstances and surroundings in which he is placed should indicate that he is fully under the influence of the solemnity of such a belief.

[2] The evidence in this case shows that the doctor who was present with the deceased when he expired told him that he was in a critical condition, and was likely to die, and that if there was any message he wanted to leave he had better do so. The doctor informed him distinctly that he could not live, and it was then that he said that it was the prisoner who shot him; that he saw his outline very distinctly as he ran down the street, and he was certain it was the prisoner. The witness says that the deceased's mind was perfectly clear as long as he had sense to talk; that he made the same statement to different persons as they would come in the room; and that he repeated it only 15 minutes before he died. Other testimony corroborates this evidence. We think the evidence indicates clearly that the deceased fully realized, not only that his death was sure, but that it was also near, and that the court properly admitted his declaration. State v. Quick, 150 N. C. 820, 64 S. E. 168; Wigmore on Evidence, § 1430 et seq.

[3] We have examined carefully all the exceptions in the case, and are unable to find anything whatever that will warrant a new trial. The last exception which was taken to the manner of receiving the verdict is untenable. When the jury came in with their verdict, in reply to the clerk, they responded, "Guilty." His honor told the jury to reconsider their response and specify the crime of which they found the prisoner guilty. The jurors stated they found the prisoner guilty of murder in the first degree. This was in accordance with the statute (Revisal 1905, § 3271), which requires the jury to determine in their verdict whether the crime is murder in the first or second degree. In State v. Godwin, 138 N. C. 583, 50 S. E. 277, the principle is recognized and enunciated that, before a verdict returned into open court by a jury is complete, it must be accepted by the court for record. It is the duty of the judge to look after the form and substance of a verdict, so as to prevent a doubtful or insufficient finding from passing into the records of the court, and to accomplish such ends it is the duty of the court to see that the jury may amend their verdict in form, so as to meet the requirement of the law. State v. McKay, 150 N. C. 813, 63 S. E. 1059.

BLOUNT v. BLOUNT.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 105*)—JUDGMENTS APPEALABLE—VOLUNTARY NONSUITS.

Appeal does not lie from a voluntary nonsuit, taken on the trial judge overruling a motion for judgment on the pleadings and for a reference, as such refusal did not affect a substantial right of plaintiff or terminate his case; the proper remedy being to reserve exception and proceed with the trial, leaving the ruling for review, if judgment was finally rendered against plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 722; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Whidbee, Judge.

Action by H. L. Blount against Agnes Blount. Plaintiff submitted to nonsuit and appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Guion & Guion, F. C. Harding, and Harry Skinner, for appellant. Jarvis & Blow and Albion Dunn, for appellee.

BROWN, J. We are unable to pass upon the question so earnestly pressed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff. The appeal of the plaintiff is fragmentary and premature, and the motion of the defendant to dismiss the appeal for that reason must be granted.

In the first place, the plaintiff voluntarily submitted to a nonsuit, and thus put himself out of court. It is not a case of involuntary nonsuit submitted to for the purpose of testing the correctness of a ruling which is vital to the plaintiff's cause. The refusal of the trial judge to grant a judgment upon the pleadings and order a reference did not affect a substantial right of the plaintiff, or terminate his case. Instead of voluntarily going out of court, he should have noted his exception and proceeded with the trial of the cause, and if judgment was finally rendered against the plaintiff he could then have reviewed the ruling of the judge. Hayes v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 131, 52 S. E. 416; Midgett v. Manufacturing Company, 140 N. C. 362, 53 S. E. 178. In this last case, it is stated that an intimation of an opinion by the judge adverse to the plaintiff upon some proposition of law which does not take the case from the jury, and which leaves open essential matters of fact still to be determined, will not justify the plaintiff in suffering a nonsuit and appeal. Such nonsuits are premature, and the appeals will be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

POCOMOKE GUANO CO. v. BIDDLE, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. TAXATION (§ 194*)—EXEMPTIONS—STATUTES.

Whatever was intended by Revisal, § 3955, providing that when a manufacturer of fertilizer has paid the inspection tax required thereby his goods shall not be liable to any further tax, it will not be supposed violation of Const. art. 5, § 3, expressly requiring a uniform ad valorem tax of all property, was intended.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Carter, Judge.

Action by the Pocomoke Guano Company against J. W. Biddle, Sheriff of Craven County, to restrain collection of taxes levied on property of plaintiff, and to have them declared illegal and void and stricken from the tax books, submitted on an agreed statement of facts. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Moore & Dunn and Peatross & Savage, for appellant. E. M. Green and R. A. Nunn, for appellee.

BROWN, J. An analysis of the facts agreed shows: (1) That plaintiff, a Virginia corporation, doing a fertilizer business in this state and paying taxes on its property in Virginia, owned personal property, valued at some $25,000, stored on June 1, 1910, in a warehouse in Craven county. The property consisted of fertilizer and fertilizer materials. (2) That said property was not listed for taxation, and plaintiff has paid no tax thereon, but has paid the tonnage tax, collected for the purpose of defraying expenses connected with the inspection of fertilizers, as provided for in section 3955, Revisal of 1905. (3) That said property was held by plaintiff until it had thereafter sold the same to various and sundry customers. (4) That the board of county commissioners for the county of Craven placed the said property on the delinquent tax list of said county, and by virtue of said tax list the sheriff of said county has demanded payment of the regular taxes thereon.

The plaintiff contends: (1) That section 3955 of the Revisal of 1905 exempts said property from said tax. (2) That the said tax is illegal and void, and is an interference with interstate commerce, "and plaintiff especially pleads the federal statute applying to such interstate commerce and the Constitution of the United States regulating the same as a defense to the collection of the tax levied and assessed against it." (3) That said property is not liable for taxation both within the state of Virginia and the state of North Carolina. (4) That said tax is a double tax.

The plaintiff does not in this proceeding attack the constitutionality of the inspection tax levied under said section, and which has been collected regularly for many years. The right to levy such taxes has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in Patapasco Guano Company v. North Carolina Board of Agriculture, 171 U. S. 345, 18 Sup. Ct. 862, 43 L. Ed. 191, and reaffirmed in the recent case of the Red O. Oil Company v.

Same, 222 U. S. 380, 32 Sup. Ct. 152, 56 L. Ed. —.

[1] The plaintiff claims exemption from an ad valorem tax upon its property by reason of the following language contained in the statute, "Whenever any manufacturer of fertilizers or fertilizing materials shall have paid the charges required by this section, his goods shall not be liable to any further tax, whether by city, town or county," and it is a part of section 3955 of the Revisal of 1905. Whatever may have been the intention of the General Assembly in employing language so broad and comprehensive, we are forced to the conclusion that, under the Constitution of North Carolina, all real and personal property owned and located within the borders of the state is subject to an ad valorem tax, and it is not to be supposed that the Legislature intended to violate the fundamental law of the state (article 5, § 3), which requires in express terms that all real and personal property be taxed by a uniform rule according to its true value in money. In this respect, the Constitution "shows no favor and allows no discretion." Wiley v. Commissioners, 111 N. C. 397, 16 S. E. 542; Puitt v. Commissioners, 94 N. C. 709, 55 Am. Rep. 638; Vaughan v. Murfreesboro, 96 N. C. 319, 2 S. E. 676, 60 Am. Rep. 413. The imperative demand to levy the property tax upon its assessed value is in no way connected with the right to levy an inspection tax, or a tax on trades, professions, etc. These principles of taxation have been discussed and enforced in many cases, and a further elaboration of them is now unnecessary.

[2] We are of the opinion that the personal property of the plaintiff stored in North Carolina, and owned and located within its borders, is liable to the ad valorem tax imposed upon the property of the citizens of the state. It is undoubtedly true that personal property actually in transit is not subject to state taxation. Kelley v. Rhoads, 188 U. S. 1, 23 Sup. Ct. 259, 47 L. Ed. 359. In this case it is said: "The law upon this subject, so far as it concerns interference with interstate commerce, is settled by several cases in this court, which hold that property actually in transit is exempt from local taxation, although, if it be stored for an indefinite time during such transit, at least for other than natural causes or lack of facilities for immediate transportation, it may be lawfully assessed by the local authorities." After citing several cases, viz., Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 5 Sup. Ct. 1091, 29 L. Ed. 257, Pittsburg & S. Canal Co. v. Bates, 156 U. S. 577, 15 Sup. Ct. 415, 39 L. Ed. 538, Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 6 Sup. Ct. 475, 29 L. Ed. 715, and discussing them, Mr. Justice Brown continues: "The substance of these cases is that, while the property is at rest for an indefinite time awaiting transportation, or awaiting a sale at its place of destination, or at an intermediate point, it is subject to taxation. But if it be actually in transit to another state it becomes the subject of interstate commerce, and is exempt from local assessment." The facts agreed show that the fertilizer sought to be taxed was not in transit, but had reached its destination, and was stored in Craven county for purposes of sale or distribution. We think it unnecessary to discuss the matter more at length, as the authorities cited seem to dispose of plaintiff's contentions.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Affirmed.

Intention that husband and wife should not take an estate by the entireties, but that they should take as tenants in common, is shown by a deed, which, though by its first clause purporting to be to P. and E., his wife, recites that half the consideration was paid by P. and half by E., out of the sale of her own land, and then makes the conveyance to P. and his heirs and to E. and her heirs, and to their heirs jointly, and in the habendum and the warranty specifies that it is made to P. and his heirs and to E. and her heirs and their heirs and assigns.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Frank Carter, Judge.

Action by S. G. Highsmith and wife and others against M. R. Page and others to reform a deed by reason of mistake, to remove cloud from title, and to restrain cutting of timber. From a judgment of nonsuit, granted on motion of defendants at close of the testimony, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Julius Brown and Moore & Long, for appellants. Col. Harry Skinner, for appellees.

HOKE, J. On the trial it was made to appear that on November 8, 1875, S. R. Ross and wife conveyed M. R. Page and his wife, Elizabeth, a tract of land lying in Pitt county, containing about 235 acres, more or less. The portions of the deed more directly relevant being in terms as follows: "This deed made by S. R. Ross and wife, Margaret, of the county of Pitt and state of North Carolina, of the first part, to M. R. Page and Elizabeth Page, his wife, of the county and state aforesaid, witnesseth: That the said S. R. Ross and wife, for and in consideration of twelve hundred dollars ($1,200.00) to them in hand paid, one-half by M. R. Page and one-half by Elizabeth Page, out of the sale of her own land, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, hath bargained and sold, and by this deed doth bargain sell and convey to the said M. R. Page, his heirs and to Elizabeth Page, her heirs, and to their heirs and assigns jointly, the following described piece or parcel of land: Situate in the county of Pitt, adjoining the lands of John H. Raules, J. M. Rollins, John Page and others, and containing 235 acres, more or less, together with all the privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging or in any wise appertaining. To have and to hold the said piece or parcel of land, to them the said M. R. Page, his heirs, and the said Elizabeth Page, her heirs, and to their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, and the said S. R. Ross and wife, for themselves, their heirs and executors and administrators, doth covenant and agree with the said M. R. Page, his heirs, and Elizabeth Page, his wife, and her heirs, and their heirs and assigns," etc. That 125 acres of the land, including the dwelling house and improvements, were situate on the east side of a canal or large ditch, and the remainder on the west side; that M. R. Page and wife entered into possession, under the deed, and some time thereafter Elizabeth, the wife, died, leaving her surviving one child by a former husband and three surviving children of another such child, and two children by the marriage with M. R. Page, to wit, Nana Highsmith, all of plaintiffs, and S. C. Page. It further appeared that M. R. Page also had a son, John, by a former wife; but the record does not disclose whether this son is now living. During the marriage, M. R. Page and Elizabeth, by mortgage, and afterwards by deed, conveyed away the portion of the land lying west of the canal, and after the death of said Elizabeth, to wit, in 1903, M. R. Page sold and conveyed the timber, of specified dimensions, on the 125 acres lying east of the canal to the Eureka Lumber Company, one of the defendants, and later, in February, 1907, he sold to S. C. Page, his son by Elizabeth, the remainder in the 125 acres, subject to his own life estate therein, and subject to the conveyance of the timber to the lumber company. There was also allegation, with evidence, on the part of plaintiffs tending to show that at or before the time of buying the Ross land in 1875 Elizabeth Page, holding a tract of land as devisee of her former husband, had sold the same and paid the money received therefor as part of the purchase price for the land in controversy; and, further, that this was done with the understanding and agreement that the purchase of the Ross land, lying east of the canal, the part now in controversy, should belong and be conveyed to Elizabeth Page as her part. The present suit was instituted by the children and heirs at law of Elizabeth Page, other than S. C. Page, against M. R. Page, S. C. Page, his son, and the Eureka Lumber Company to reform and correct the deed, to restrain the cutting of timber by the lumber company, and to remove the cloud from the title created by the deeds of M. R. Page to his codefendants.

[1] Numerous and repeated decisions of our court recognize and apply the principle that, where land is conveyed to "husband and wife jointly, they will take and hold an estate by entireties, and that, on the death of one, the whole belongs to the survivor." Morton v. Blades Lumber Co., 154 N. C. 278, 70 S. E. 487; Hood v. Mercer, 150 N. C. 699, 64 S. E. 897; Jones v. Smith & Co., 149 N. C. 318, 62 S. E. 1092, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1037, 128 Am. St. Rep. 661; West v. Railroad, 140 N. C. 620, 53 S. E. 477, 6 Ann. Cas. 360. It is also well established with us that where, in a conveyance to a husband and wife, it appears that no such estate was intended, but the parties were to take and hold their interests as tenants in common, the intent as expressed in the deed must be allowed to prevail (Isley v. Sellars, 153 N. C. 374, 69 S. E. 279; Stalcup v. Stalcup, 137 N. C. 305, 49 S. E. 210; Miner v. Brown et al., 133 N. Y. 308, 31 N. E. 24); and that this intent must be arrived at from a perusal of the entire instrument. Hendricks v. Furniture Co., 156 N. C. 569, 72 S. E. 592; Triplett v. Williams, 149 N. C. 394, 63 S. E. 79, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 514. In Hendrick's Case, the correct rule was stated as follows: "The court, in construing a contract, will examine the whole instrument, with reference to its separate parts, to ascertain the intention of the parties, and will not construe as meaningless any part or phrase thereof, when a meaning may thus be found by any reasonable construction." Applying this wholesome rule of interpretation, a perusal of the entire instrument will disclose that, while the deed, in its first clause, purports to be made to M. R. Page and Elizabeth Page, his wife, the parties, throughout the remaining portions of the deed, make it clear that an estate by entireties was not intended. It recites that one-half of the consideration was paid by M. R. Page and one-half by Elizabeth Page, out of the sale of her own land, and the conveyance is then made to M. R. Page and his heirs and to Elizabeth Page and her heirs, and to their heirs jointly, and in the habendum and the warranty the parties are careful to specify that the same is made to M. R. and his heirs and to Elizabeth and her heirs and their heirs and assigns; the intent evidently being that the parties should take and hold as tenants in common, in equal interests, and that of Elizabeth should descend to her children as her heirs at law, subject to curtesy of her surviving husband, M. R. Page. There was error, therefore, in the judgment of nonsuit; for on the face of the deed we are of opinion that the instrument, as now expressed, creates a tenancy in common between the husband and wife and the plaintiffs, the heirs at law of Elizabeth, have an interest in the land which entitles them to maintain the action.

[2] We are of opinion, also, as stated, that there is evidence in the record requiring that an issue be submitted as to the alleged mistake in the original deed from S. R. Ross and wife. This, under our authorities, must be established by clear, strong, and convincing evidence; but, where there is testimony sufficient to carry the case to the jury on such an issue, it is with them to determine whether the proof meets the required standard. The rule prevailing in such cases is very well stated in Gray v. Jenkins, 151 N. C. 80, 65 S. E. 644, as follows: "The evidence to reform a written deed must be clear, strong, and convincing; but when the testimony is sufficient to carry the case to the jury, as on an ordinary issue, the judge can only lay this down as a proper rule to guide the jury in their deliberations, and it is for them to determine whether, in a given case, the testimony meets the requirements of this rule as to the degree of proof."

This opinion will be certified, to the end that the order of nonsuit be set aside, and the issues properly arising on the pleadings be referred to a jury.

Reversed.

MAKELY v. MONTGOMERY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 7, 1912.)

REFERENCE (§ 105*) — REPORT — DETERMINATION BY JURY.

Confining the trial of the issues by the jury on the coming in of the report on a compulsory reference to the evidence taken before the referee is in accordance with Pub. Laws 1897, c. 237, and proper; no additional matters entering into the controversy on the amendment to the pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. § 205; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Beaufort County; E. B. Cline, Judge.

Action by Metrah Makely against W. O. Montgomery. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Upon the report of referee there were submitted to the jury issues as follows:

"Does M. Makely hold the land conveyed by the deed dated May 14, 1897, from Calhoun Tooley to M. Makely in trust for the firm of Montgomery & Makely?" Answer: "No."

"What amount, if any, does the defendant owe the firm of Montgomery & Makely for cash sales of oysters from 1893 to 1909?" Answer: "$1,500 (fifteen hundred dollars)."

Rodman & Rodman and E. F. Aydtlett, for appellant. Small, MacLean & McMullan, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. This is an action brought for the settlement of a copartnership. A compulsory reference is had, exceptions filed to the report of the referee, and the cause tried on issues submitted to the jury.

1. The defendant excepts because his honor confined the trial upon the issues to the evidence taken before the referee. This was in accordance with the Act of 1897, c. 237. So far as the record discloses, there are no additional matters entering into the controversy upon the amendment to the pleadings, and we think the case falls within the principle laid down in Moore v. Westbrook, 156 N. C. 482, 72 S. E. 842.

2. As to the quantum of proof required to establish a trust under the first issue, we think the charge of his honor was substantially correct, and practically followed the principle laid down in Ely v. Early, 94 N. C. 1, and Harding v. Long, 103 N. C. 1, 9 S. E. 445, 14 Am. St. Rep. 775, and many subsequent decisions of this court.

3. One of the claims of the defendant in the settlement of the copartnership account was that under the terms of the copartnership he was entitled to be credited with his living expenses as a part of the current expenses of the firm. This claim was allowed him by the referee, but the defendant excepts to this finding with reference to the amount allowed, and demanded a jury trial as to this.

We agree with his honor that there was no sufficient evidence that the defendant was entitled to have credited to him his living and family expenses as a part of the expenditures of the firm. The language employed in the conversation between plaintiff and defendant in respect to this matter is entirely too indefinite and uncertain to warrant any such conclusion.

We have examined the several assignments of error and the record, and are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed.

STATE v. WILLIAMS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

LICENSES (§ 7*) — OCCUPATION TAX — UNIFORMITY.

A license tax imposed by ordinance merely on every agency for sale of merchandise not manufactured in the town, being aimed only at nonresidents, is discriminatory and unreasonable, and violative of Const. art. 5, § 3, requiring such tax to be uniform.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Carteret County; Carter, Judge.

Norman Williams, prosecuted for violation of an ordinance imposing a license tax, was discharged on the ground of invalidity of the ordinance, and the State appeals. No error.

Attorney General Bickett and T. H. Calvert, for the State.

WALKER, J. The defendant was convicted in the mayor's court of Morehead City for the violation of an ordinance of the town which required "every person, firm or corporation in the state, soliciting or taking orders for goods at retail, to be delivered in the town by nonresident merchants, firms or corporations resident in the state, to pay a tax of ten dollars per day or thirty dollars per year." Defendant appealed to the superior court, in which a special verdict was returned by the jury finding that the defendant represented one A. A. Joseph, a merchant tailor or clothier of Goldsboro, N. C., and solicited and received orders in said town of Morehead City for tailor-made clothes, to be delivered to customers there, without having paid the tax imposed by the ordinance. Upon this finding, the court held the ordinance to be invalid, directed a verdict to be entered accordingly, and discharged defendant, and the state appealed. The Constitution (article 5, § 3) authorizes the Legislature to tax trades, professions, franchises, and incomes, provided that no income shall be taxed when the property from which it is derived is taxed. In accordance with this article, the Legislature, by Private Laws of 1905, c. 254, § 12, provided that the commissioners of Morehead City should have the power to levy and collect a fair and reasonable special or license tax, and, among others, on the following subjects: "Itinerant merchants, peddlers and transient dealers, drummers or commercial travelers, and every agency for the sale of merchandise not manufactured in the town, and all other subjects taxed by the state." The ordinance in question was enacted under authority supposed to have been given in the passage we have taken from the amended charter of the town, and we are to say whether it is valid or not. The Constitution (article 5, § 3) provides that "laws shall be passed taxing, by a uniform rule, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies or otherwise, and also all real and personal property, according to its true value in money;" and there is conferred in the same section the power to tax trades, professions, and so forth, as above set out.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

This court has held that the rule of uniformity applies to the latter provision as much as to the former, although there are no express words to that effect in the section; it being considered that a tax not uniform, as properly understood, though levied on trades, professions, or privileges, would be so inconsistent with natural justice and with the intent so apparent in the section we have quoted that its collection would be restrained as unconstitutional. Gatlin v. Tarboro, 78 N. C. 119; Worth v. Railroad, 89 N. C. 291, 45 Am. Rep. 679. And this may be taken as the settled construction of the section. It may also be considered as settled that in laying the tax the different subjects may be reasonably, though not arbitrarily, classified, and a different rule of taxation prescribed for each class, provided the rule is uniform in its application to the class for which it was made. Railroad Tax Cases, 92 U. S. 575, 23 L. Ed. 663; Railroad v. Worth, supra. As stated in those cases, the result must be to prevent discrimination among the individuals or subjects of any one class, based upon special privileges, immunities, or exemptions allowed to one and not to the others. If an ordinance, therefore, is not founded upon this fair and just basis, it will be deemed unreasonable and violative of the fundamental principle of taxation. Constitutional and legislative authority conferred upon a municipality to tax does not enable it to create a privilege for the purpose of taxing it, or to discriminate between persons exercising the same privilege, by imposing a tax upon one of a class at a higher rate in a different mode or upon other principles than one applied to the exercise of the same privilege by others of the same class. The power to tax extends no further than is permitted by its charter, and any attempt to impose burdens upon some of a class from which others are exempted would be void, as being beyond the granted powers of the municipality, and as an exercise of partial legislation. Nashville v. Althorp, 45 Tenn. 554; Cooley's Const. Lim. 390. The defendant can be held liable to taxation as a merchant, under the general laws of the state or of the municipality, in the same manner and to the same extent as all other merchants of the same class exercising these privileges within the corporation, but not otherwise, or further than they. When the by-law of a municipal corporation, enacted under a general grant of power, or by virtue of its incidental authority, is partial, unreasonable or oppressive, it will be declared void, as an unwarranted exercise of its taxing power. Simrall v. Covington, 90 Ky. 444, 14 S. W. 369, 12 Ky. Law Rep. 404, 9 L. R. A. 556, 29 Am. St. Rep. 398.

"Municipal by-laws must also be reasonable. Whenever they appear not to be so, the court must, as a matter of law, declare them void. * * * So a by-law, to be reasonable, should be in harmony with the general principles of the common law." Cooley on Const. Lim. 200, 202. "As it would be unreasonable and unjust to make, under the same circumstances, an act done by one person penal, and, if done by another, not so, ordinances which have this effect cannot be sustained. Special and unwarranted discrimination, or unjust or oppressive interference in particular cases, is not to be allowed. The powers vested in municipal corporations should, as far as practicable, be exercised by ordinances general in their nature and impartial in their operation." 1 Dillon's Mun. Corp. § 322. As said in Simrall v. Covington, supra: "The above views are enforced in the cases of Mayor of Mobile v. Yuille, 3 Ala. 137 [36 Am. Dec. 441], Robinson v. Mayor of Franklin, 1 Humph. (Tenn.) 156 [34 Am. Dec. 625], Anderson v. City of Wellington, 40 Kan. 173 [19 Pac. 712, 2 L. R. A. 110, 10 Am. St. Rep. 175], and many other cases that might be cited. All recognize the rule, which is fundamental, that the by-laws of a municipality, whether they purport to regulate callings or otherwise, must, as indeed must every law, preserve equality of right. Those exercising the same privilege must be treated alike. The door must be closed to none by discrimination, if we would avoid monopoly and wrong. This principle is as necessary to sound legislation as the circulation of the blood is to the human system, or the flow of tide water to the ocean. It has produced a line of decisions which are universally regarded as sound by the courts of the country. Thus in Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642, an ordinance of a city, passed under a general charter power, exacting a license for selling goods, and fixing one rate for selling goods at the time within the city, and another and much larger for those without, was held invalid, as unjust, partial, and oppressive. In Mayor, etc., of Nashville v. Althorp, 5 Cold. (Tenn.) 554, an ordinance discriminating between merchant and other dealers residing within and those without the limits of the city, and prescribing a special rate of taxation for the latter, was declared to be beyond the limit of constitutional legislation. In this state we have no constitutional provision as to taxation so nomine, but it is the settled constitutional rule, declared by oft-repeated decisions of this court, that every tax must be certain, universal, and so far as practicable, equal, and uniform. Burdens cannot constitutionally be imposed upon particular individuals, while others of the same class or locality who have rendered no public service are exempt." The case of Simrall v. Covington, supra, is directly in point, as will appear from this extract: "The ordinance now in question not only discriminates between residents of the city of Covington and those residing outside of it, whether within or without the state, but it places a burden upon some within the city, while others of its residents engaged in a like business are exempt. It is, therefore, unreasonable partial legislation. To be reasonable, a municipal by-law should be equal in its operation. Tugman v. Chicago, 78 Ill. 405; Barling v. West, 29 Wis. 307, 9 Am. Rep. 576. This one being clearly an infringement of individual right, partial and unreasonable in its character, cannot be sustained."

This doctrine appears to have been adopted by practically all the courts, and is clearly founded in reason and justice. Some courts hold that such an ordinance is invalid because it authorizes the taking of one citizen's property for the benefit of the public, and, worse still, for private use or advantage, without just compensation. St. Charles v. Nolle, 51 Mo. 122, 11 Am. Rep. 440. But a sufficient reason under our Constitution is that the discrimination in favor of the resident of the town and against the nonresident violates the rule of uniformity. It has been held that such distinctions between the inhabitants of the state, based upon no other ground than the place of actual residence, are in restraint of trade, invidious, unjust, and illegal. Muhlenbrinck v. Long Branch, 13 N. J. Law, 364, 36 Am. Rep. 518. Ordinances passed in the exercise of the police power or for the purpose of revenue, and intended to regulate or control the sale of articles in a town or city, or in other matters, must, of course, be reasonable, and it belongs to the courts to determine what are reasonable regulations within the power granted by charter. Kip v. Paterson, 26 N. J. Law, 298; Morgan v. Orange, 50 N. J. Law, 389, 13 Atl. 240. In the case last cited it was held that an ordinance imposing a larger license fee on a nonresident than on a resident was illegal, as being discriminating, and therefore unreasonable. Other decisions to be examined, and which seem to be directly in point, are Atlanta v. Jacobs, 125 Ga. 523, 154 S. E. 534; Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 606, 28 Am. Rep. 642; Saginaw v. Circuit Judge, 106 Mich. 32, 63 N. W. 985; Clements v. Casper, 4 Wyo. 494, 35 Pac. 472; Pacific Junction v. Dyer, 64 Iowa, 38, 19 N. W. 862; Shamokin v. Flannigan, 156 Pa. 43, 26 Atl. 780; Indianapolis v. Bieler, 138 Ind. 30, 36 N. E. 857; Grafty v. Rushville, 107 Ind. 502, 8 N. E. 609, 57 Am. Rep. 128; Fechelmer v. Louisville, 84 Ky. 306, 2 S. W. 65. "The corporation is not endowed with power to pass ordinances in restraint of trade. Kip v. Paterson, supra; Dunham v. Rochester, 5 Cow. (N. Y.) 462. The control it may exercise over business and trade is such only as belongs to the necessities and demands of local government, such as have relation to the general prosperity of the citizen, the public health, order, and morals of the community. It cannot, outside of these considerations, enter into the arena of business competition to advance a favored class and retard others. All citizens in pursuit of legitimate, honest occupations, stand equal before the law, and a police power intrusted to a corporation is unreasonably exercised in making invidious distinctions between citizens endowed with equal rights. It is incompetent for this board of commissioners, intrusted as it is with the rule in local municipal affairs, to erect walls of exclusion against citizens without its limits, or obstruct free commerce and trade between them and its own inhabitants." Muhlenbrinck v. Commissioners, 42 N. J. Law, 364, 36 Am. Rep. 518. It seems to us that the ordinance in question is aimed at nonresidents, and there is room for the reasonable suspicion that it was designed principally for the benefit of residents in erecting a barrier against the introduction of foreign trade for their protection. It is therefore open to the just criticism that it is discriminative, in restraint of trade, and not authorized by the terms of the Constitution which were intended to secure equality in such matters. Saginaw v. Circuit Judge, supra. "Municipalities are not in any sense close corporations. They are not vested with rights of local legislation, in order that they may arrogate to their own inhabitants additional rights and privileges to those enjoyed by other citizens of the state or nation. Neither may rights be denied to its citizens and still allowed to be exercised by nonresidents who may come within the corporate limits. Discrimination against residents is equally odious as discrimination in their favor." Horr & Bemis on Mun. Police Ordinances, § 137.

We conclude, therefore, that the ordinance of Morehead City under which the defendant was charged criminally before the justice is invalid, in that "it spends its whole force on nonresidents and spares residents entirely." The superior court properly directed that a verdict of not guilty be entered upon the findings of the jury. The defendant was entitled to his discharge.

No error.

MOORE v. GENERAL ACCIDENT, FIRE & LIGHT INS. CORPORATION.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 530*)—ACCIDENT INSURANCE—CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY.

Where an accident policy provided for an indemnity at the rate of $100 a month for a period not exceeding 24 months for injuries sustained while riding within a passenger car, a further provision, limiting to 4 weeks in any one year the liability for disability due to either accident or illness caused by or resulting, wholly or in part, directly or indirectly, in paralysis, etc., the limitation of 4 weeks is only applicable when accident or illness is the ultimate cause of paralysis, etc., coming at a time more or less remote after the injury, so that liability for injuries received while riding on a railroad train will extend to the entire 24 months, though, as the direct result of the accident, the injured person was paralyzed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 530.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF FACT.

The court on appeal will not review findings of the jury on disputed questions of fact under correct instructions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nash County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by W. B. Moore against the General Accident, Fire & Light Insurance Corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. No error.

Brooks & Taylor, for appellant. F. S. Spruill, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. [1] The plaintiff, an illiterate man, took out an accident policy of insurance in the defendant company. On the first page thereof, in large type, defendant insured the plaintiff "at the rate of $50 per month for a period not exceeding 24 consecutive months, against total loss of time resulting directly and independently of all other causes from bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means and which wholly and continuously, from the date of the accident disable and prevent the assured from performing every duty pertaining to any business or occupation." And further on the same page the policy undertook to pay double indemnity "if such injuries are sustained by the assured while riding as a passenger within the enclosed part of any R. R. passenger car provided for the exclusive use of passengers and propelled by steam."

In December, 1908, the plaintiff was seriously injured while a passenger on a railroad. The first issue was in the exact language of the first quotation from the policy above set out, to which the jury responded, "Yes."

The defendant claimed that the plaintiff had received $20 in full compromise and settlement of said injuries, to which the jury responded, "No."

The defendant further relied upon a provision inside the policy, as follows: "In the event of disability due to either accident or illness caused by or resulting wholly or in part, directly or indirectly, in tuberculosis, rheumatism, paralysis, apoplexy, orchitis, neuritis, locomotor ataxia, lumbago, lame back, strains, sciatica, vaccination, Bright's disease, dementia, insanity, hernia * * * the limit of the company's liability shall be an indemnity for the period disabled, not exceeding four weeks in any one year, at the rate which would otherwise be payable under this policy, anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding." The defendant pleads that the plaintiff suffered with paralysis which was produced by his injury; and therefore it is liable to the plaintiff only in a sum not exceeding that which would otherwise be due for a disability not exceeding four weeks in any one year. This paragraph, if construed as the defendant claims, is in direct contradiction of the terms and purpose of the insurance as stated in the first quotation above given from the front page of the policy.

We do not think that this would be a just construction. Here the paralysis is a direct incident and a part of the "bodily injury effected through external, violent, or accidental means," and to hold that in such case the insurance is reduced to a very small part of the sum stipulated for would be in effect to destroy the insurance. To say that such was the intent of the defendant company in executing the policy would be to charge it with fraud. The only reasonable and just construction is that, when an accident or illness is the ultimate cause of paralysis, or of one of the other diseases named, which diseases accrue at a more or less remote period of time after the injury, then the liability of the insurance company is reduced to compensation for disability not exceeding four weeks in any one year, and the same reduction could be claimed when one of those excepted diseases cause the injury.

The jury found that the plaintiff had complied with every condition in his policy; that the statements made in his application for insurance were true, and that, though the plaintiff had received $20 from the defendant, there had not been a valid and full compromise for the injuries sustained; that the plaintiff's cause of action accrued prior to the institution of this action; and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover $2,380, with interest—that is, indemnity at the rate of $100 per month for 24 months, less $20 received.

[2] We have examined all the exceptions in the record carefully, but, excepting the propositions of law above discussed, the case was almost entirely dependent upon the disputed matters of fact, which the jury have found in favor of the plaintiff, under a correct charge as to the law.

No error.

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 10*)—CONTRACTS TO CONVEY—PARTIAL INTERESTS.

Under a contract to convey land, in which the vendor has a limited interest only, the purchaser is not entitled to specific performance to convey as much of the property as the vendor can, if, when the contract was made, the purchaser knew of the defect in the vendor's title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 20-25, 50; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by A. L. Joyner and another against S. M. Crisp. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs to have set aside and canceled upon the ground of fraud a certain paper writing, or contract, in reference to the selling of land entered into on the 15th day of September, 1910, between Alice Lee Joyner and her husband, Andrew Joyner, and S. M. Crisp. The defendant, among other things in his answer, set up a counterclaim in the nature of a cross-action, and asked for a decree compelling the specific performance of the said contract upon the part of the plaintiffs.

The following is the contract between the parties:

"State of North Carolina, County of Guilford.

"This indenture, made this the 15th day of September, 1910, by and between Alice Lee Joyner and husband, Andrew Joyner, of the county of Guilford and state of North Carolina, parties of the first part, and S. M. Crisp, of the county of Pitt and state of North Carolina, party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That the said parties of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of two hundred dollars ($200.00) to them paid by the party of the second part, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, hereby agree to sell and convey by good and sufficient deed in fee simple to the party of the second part, at his option, the following described land, to wit: Situate and being in the county of Pitt, in Falkland township, known as the John Peebles farm, and bounded as follows: On the north by Tar river, on the east by the lands known as the Hearne lands, now owned by O. L. Joyner and Mrs. Corbett, continuing east and southeast along the line of the John Randolph lands; thence west, adjoining the lands of Walter Corbett, until the line of what is known as the old William Peebles eastern boundary is reached; thence north along this line and that part of the William Peebles line known as the Windom land; thence along this line north to its northwestern corner; thence west along the Windom line to a small branch at the western corner of the Windom line; thence to the line of the R. R. Cotten land; from thence north along said Cotten's line, known as the Southwood farm, to the main road leading from Falkland to Greenville; thence across said road north along said Cotten's line to Tar river; containing by estimation seven hundred and twenty (720) acres.

"This option is to remain in force for ninety days or until such time as the parties of the first part can obtain by special proceedings in the superior court of Pitt county a judicial decree confirming to the party of the second part a fee-simple title. Should the said party of the second part fail to avail himself of said option, upon the securing of this judicial decree at or near the time specified, then this agreement shall be void, but in case the said party of the second part shall tender to the parties of the first part, or to the trustee appointed by the court in the judicial decree heretofore mentioned, the sum of eight hundred dollars ($800.00) in cash and eight notes of two thousand dollars ($2,000.00) each, with interest, payable annually, on each note, at six per cent., the said notes, with interest each year on the unmatured notes to be due and payable as follows, respectively: January first of the years 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918, and 1919, said notes to be secured by a proper and sufficient lien upon the said land for the purchase money, as the law provides, or as may be agreed upon by the parties hereto, or provided in the judicial decree above referred to.

"Upon the performance of the above stipulations by the party of the second part, the parties of the first part will agree to execute in their own proper persons and by the decree of the superior court a deed in fee simple to the said tract of land as described above, together with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging.

"The said parties of the first part covenant with the said party of the second part that the said lands are free from all encumbrances, except such as will be removed by the judicial decree above referred to, and that they, in addition to said judicial decree, will provide to warrant and defend the title to the same against the claims of all persons whatsoever.

"In testimony whereof, the parties of the first part have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written."

BROWN, J. In the view we take of this case, it is unnecessary to consider the first exception of the defendant in respect to the refusal of the court to make one O. L. Joyner and others parties to the action. If the contract is one which a court of equity will not require to be specifically performed, then a defect of parties is of no material matter.

[1] His honor ruled that the contract is one upon its face with which the plaintiffs cannot comply, and therefore a court of equity will not attempt to enforce it, and consequently in respect to a decree compelling partial performance, as asked by the defendant, his honor was of opinion that the contract was intended as an entirety, and must stand or fall as such, and that the court will not under the circumstances compel partial performance of the contract, and require abatement of the price.

The facts are, as appears by the pleadings: That the property in question, known as the "Peebles Place," belonged to the feme plaintiff for her life, and after her death to her children, some of whom are minors. At the time the contract referred to was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the defendant admits he knew the status of the title, and there is nothing in the pleadings themselves which indicate, or even allege, that any imposition was practiced upon the defendant, or that he entered into this contract except with his eyes open. The contract upon its face indicates plainly that it does not lie within the power of the plaintiffs of their own will to comply with it. It appears upon its face that the plaintiffs own practically nothing but a life estate, and that the only method to carry out the contract was by appealing to the judicial tribunal to decree a sale of the infants' estate. The following excerpts from the contract are plainly indicative that resort to a judicial tribunal was absolutely essential to its performance, viz.: "This option is to remain in force for ninety days, or until such time as the parties of the first part can obtain by special proceedings in the superior court of Pitt county a judicial decree confirming to the party of the second part a fee-simple title." Again: "Upon the performance of the above stipulations by the party of the second part, the parties of the first part will agree to execute in their own proper persons and by the decree of the superior court a deed in fee simple," etc.

The plaintiffs in this case had no power to enter into a contract to sell their children's land, and a mere promise to resort to a court for the purpose of decreeing a sale of it cannot possibly be enforced, for it is beyond the power of the plaintiffs to predicate what the judgment of the court may be. Upon this principle it is held that a party cannot recover upon a contract wherein a guardian who owned certain interest in land of which his ward was part owner agreed to institute and to carry through court proceedings necessary to the consummation of a sale or exchange of such property. Zander v. Feeley, 47 Ill. App. 660; Le Roy v. Jacobosky, 136 N. C. 444, 48 S. E. 798, 87 L. R. A. 470. There have been cases where guardians have entered into such contracts, and, upon failure to perform them, have been held liable in damages personally. Mason v. Waitt, 4 Scam. (Ill.) 127, and Mason v. Caldwell, 5 Gilman, 198, 48 Am. Dec. 330. But we find no instance where such contract has been specifically performed by decree of court, unless it was to the ward's interest.

[2] In regard to the contention that the defendant is entitled to the partial performance and conveyance of the life estate, and damages in the way of abatement of the price, it may be said that we recognize the general rule that, where the vendor has not substantially the whole interest he has contracted to sell, yet the purchaser can insist on having all that the vendor can convey with compensation for the difference. But in this case it is apparent on the face of the contract that it was to be performed as a whole, stand or fall as an entirety; and therefore it cannot be specifically enforced as to part.

[3] It is admitted by the defendant in his answer that he knew that the land in fee belonged to the plaintiffs' children. It seems to be well settled that the rule that when a person makes a contract for the sale of real estate, in which he has only limited interest, he may be compelled in equity to convey as much of the property as lies in his power to convey, with a deduction from the agreed price, does not apply where the purchaser at the time of the sale had notice of the defect in the vendor's title. Knox v. Spratt, 23 Fla. 64, 8 South. 924; 26 Am. & E. Ency. p. 84.

For the reasons given, we think the contract is one which cannot be specifically performed, nor can the defendant recover damages for a failure on the part of the plaintiffs to perform it.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

—SALE OF LAND TO PAY DEBTS—PRESUMPTION OF REGULARITY.

Where the original papers in a proceeding to sell land to pay the debts of an intestate have been lost, but there is enough in the record to indicate that the proceeding was conducted with regularity, and to show that the infant parties were represented by a guardian ad litem, the validity of the proceeding will be presumed, in an action involving the title to the land sold.

A deed from the administrator of an intestate, of a specified number of acres of land, without further describing it, is sufficient, in an action involving the title to the land, where it does not appear that the intestate owned more than one tract of land, especially where the deed recites that it is subject to an allotment of dower to the intestate's widow, and the record of this allotment describes both the entire tract and the dower tract by metes and bounds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Franklin County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by W. K. Phillips and others against Sherrod Denton and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs on a directed verdict, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This action was brought to recover a tract of land which was originally owned by Sherrod Denton, and was sold by John Chamblee, his administrator, under an order of court, to pay debts of the intestate. Plaintiffs, having proved that the papers in the proceeding for the sale of the land, entitled "John Chamblee, Adm'r, v. Heirs of Sherrod Denton," had been lost, introduced in evidence the entries in the case on the minutes of the court, as follows: December term, 1859: "John Chamblee is appointed administrator of Sherrod Denton, and he enters into bond in the sum of $500, with James Baker and Henry Baker as sureties, which is accepted by the court, and he qualifies accordingly." March term, 1860: "John Chamblee makes his return of account of sale of Sherrod Denton, which is received by the court and ordered to be recorded." In his final account, he charged himself with $131.25, proceeds of sale of land, May 16, 1860. March term, 1860: "Petition to sell land to pay debts. Service admitted. Prayer granted and decree filed." June term, 1860: "Petition to sell land to pay debts. Prayer granted. Decree filed. Report of sale returned and confirmed." They then introduced a deed from John Chamblee, administrator of Sherrod Denton, to T. H. Mann, reciting a consideration of $131.25, paid by Mann, and conveying to him a tract of land in said county containing, by estimate, 87½ acres, 30 of which had been allotted to Mary Denton, the widow of Sherrod Denton, as her dower. They next offered a deed from T. H. Mann to John Chamblee, executed six years after the first deed. The land in controversy is the part of the entire tract which was allotted as dower to Mary Denton; she having died before this suit was commenced. Plaintiffs then introduced the record of the dower proceedings, which showed that the petition was filed, copy of petition issued, N. S. Patterson appointed guardian ad litem for infants, service admitted, prayer granted, writ of dower ordered to be issued, jury ordered, and report returned and confirmed. The acceptance of service for the infant defendants by N. S. Patterson, their guardian, was also indorsed on the petition for the assignment of dower. A survey of the land was ordered in the dower proceedings, and the report of the surveyors showed that the tract contained 87 acres, which was described by metes and bounds, and the dower land, taken therefrom, contained 29 acres, also described by metes and bounds. The defendants agreed that if parol evidence was admissible to aid the description in the administrator's deed and locate the land, and the records sufficient to authorize a sale of the land to pay debts, the judge should charge the jury to answer the issue in favor of the plaintiffs; it being admitted that the deed to Mann covered the locus in quo. The judge, being of opinion with the plaintiffs upon the points reserved, instructed the jury to answer the issue accordingly, and, judgment having been entered for the plaintiffs upon the verdict, the defendants appealed.

Thos. B. Wilder and T. T. Hicks, for appellants. W. M. Person and W. H. Yarbrough, Jr., for appellees.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] There is no suggestion of any fraud in this case; nor is it alleged that John Chamblee bought the land at his own sale through T. H. Mann, who acted for him. It appears that the proceeding to sell the land was brought against the widow, who is now dead, and the children of Sherrod Denton, who were then minors and represented by their guardian ad litem. There is enough in the fragments of the record that remain to indicate that the proceeding was conducted with regularity. The original papers have been lost, and we will not presume, in their absence, that the court disregarded the rules of procedure and gave its decree without properly guarding the rights of the defendants. It affirmatively appears that they were represented by a guardian, and the presumption is that the court proceeded in the case according to its usual course and practice. We cannot, in this suit, permit a collateral attack upon the judgment in that case. The subject was fully considered by us in Rackley v. Roberts, 147 N. C. 201, 60 S. E. 975, and we do not see any substantial difference in the facts of the two cases. If there is any, it is in favor of the validity of the proceedings in Chamblee v. Denton, which the defendants now assail; for there is no allegation of fraud or collusion in the sale of the land, as there was in the case cited.

In Rackley v. Roberts, supra, we relied much upon the authority of Sumner v. Sessions, 94 N. C. 376, in which Chief Justice Smith thus stated the law governing such cases: "A guardian ad litem was appointed for the infant defendant, whose acceptance and presence in court must be assumed, in the absence of any indication in the record to the contrary, from the fact that the court took jurisdiction of the cause and rendered judgment. It is true the record produced does not show that notice was served on the infant or upon her guardian ad litem; nor does the contrary appear in the record, which, so far as we have it, is silent on the point. The jurisdiction is presumed to have been acquired by the exercise of it, and, if not, the judgment must stand, and cannot be treated as a nullity until so declared in some impeaching proceeding instituted and directed to that end. The irregularity, if such there be, may in this mode be such as to warrant a judgment declaring it null; but it remains in force until this is done. The voluntary appearance of counsel in a cause dispenses with the service of process upon his adult client. The presence of a next friend or guardian ad litem to represent an infant party, as the case may be, and his recognition by the court in proceeding with the cause, preclude an inquiry into his authority in a collateral proceeding, and require remedial relief to be sought in the manner suggested, wherein the true facts may be ascertained. This method of procedure, so essential to the security of titles dependent upon a trust in the integrity and force of judicial action, taken within the sphere of its jurisdiction, is recognized in White v. Alberson, 14 N. C. 241 [22 Am. Dec. 719], Skinner v. Moore, 19 N. C. 138 [30 Am. Dec. 155], Keaton v. Banks, 32 N. C. 384 [51 Am. Dec. 393], and numerous other cases, some of which are referred to in Hare v. Holomon [94 N. C. 14], supra, and all of which recognize the imputed errors and imperfec-tions as affecting the regularity and not the efficacy of the judicial action taken." The proceeding alleged in that case to have been irregular was commenced in 1870, after the adoption of the new procedure. Carter v. Rountree, 109 N. C. 29, 13 S. E. 716. We further said in Rackley v. Roberts: "While it may not be necessary to the decision of this appeal, as we view it, to consider what may be the rights of Mrs. Roberts as an innocent purchaser, for all the facts in regard to that question are not now before us, it may be well to refer again to the general doctrine settled by this court, to the effect that, when there is a purchase under a judgment, the purchaser need only inquire if, upon the face of the record, the court apparently has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, in order to be protected, provided he buys in good faith and without notice of any actual defect"—citing numerous cases. See Glisson v. Glisson, 153 N. C. 185, 69 S. E. 55, which was a motion to set aside the judgment attacked in Rackley v. Roberts. The question is there fully discussed by Justice Brown. His honor was correct in holding that the proceeding in Chamblee v. Denton supported the judgment in that case and the sale and deed made by the administrator. Coffin v. Cook, 106 N. C. 376, 11 S. E. 371.

[2] The description in the deed from Chamblee to Mann was sufficient. In the first place, so far as appears, the intestate of John Chamblee owned but one tract of land, and it was his land which was sold to pay his debts. In order to make a valid sale of the whole of it, the allotment of the widow's dower was first made, and then the entire tract sold, subject to this dower. This appears from the language of the deed. The description is of the land from which the dower tract was taken, and this is sufficient reference to the allotment of the dower to permit an examination of it for the purpose of ascertaining what land was intended to be conveyed. When we look into the record of this allotment, we find that the entire tract is described by its metes and bounds, and also the dower tract, and this makes clear and definite the description in the deed. In other words, it appears on the face of the deed that it was the purpose of the parties to convey all the land of Sherrod Denton, except the dower interest, or the life estate of the widow, in the land set off to her in the larger tract; both being described in the proceedings by metes and bounds. The tract conveyed by the deed necessarily adjoined the dower land; the latter having been a part of it. It would not be difficult to locate the land of Sherrod Denton adjoining the dower tract, as he had only one tract of land, even if we disregarded the additional description, "adjoining the land of Rebecca Denton's old tract, and others," which increases the certainty of a true location. In the latter view of the description, the ruling of the court is sustained by Perry v. Scott, 109 N. C. 374, 14 S. E. 294.

[3] The defendants further contend that the deed of Chamblee, administrator, to Mann does not convey the land, because it fails to recite the power under and by virtue of which it was executed, or to refer to the order of the court directing a conveyance of the land to the purchaser. The same objection was made to the executor's deed in Cook v. Coffin, supra, and held to be untenable. It was there said that, where the executor actually exercised the power given by an order of the court in the execution of the deed, but failed to recite the order, the implication of the law is that he was acting under authority conferred by the order. This disposes of all the exceptions which require any special attention.

No error.

HERRICK v. NORFOLK-SOUTHERN R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

REMOVAL OF CAUSES (§ 89*)—PROCEEDINGS TO REMOVE—PETITION—TRIAL OF ISSUES.

While a state court is not bound to surrender its jurisdiction on a petition for removal to a United States court until it has determined that the petition shows a proper case for transfer, and that the petitioner has a prima facie right to removal, the determination extends only to matters apparent, and, where such a showing was made and the necessary security furnished, issues of fact raised, even though the allegations of the petition of removal were denied, were to be determined only in the federal court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Removal of Causes, Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Martin County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by Howard Herrick, Jr., by his next friend, John C. Lamb, against the Norfolk-Southern Railroad Company. From an order of removal to the Circuit Court of the United States, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Stubbs, for appellant. W. B. Rodman, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff, Howard Herrick, who sues by his next friend, John C. Lamb, to recover damages for injuries to the infant plaintiff, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant on its electric railway in Virginia Beach, state of Virginia. The damages are laid at $25,000. Before the plea or answer was due, or the time allowed by law for filing the same had expired, the defendant presented its verified petition to the court, alleging that it is a corporation chartered under the laws of the state of Virginia, and a citizen and resident of that state, the plaintiff and his next friend being citizens of this state, and in other respects containing all the essential averments required by the removal act of Congress. It tendered a bond with sufficient surety for entering the case in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of this state, and upon the papers thus filed in the state court it prayed that the cause be removed to the said Circuit Court for trial. Judge Ferguson, then presiding in the state court, ordered the case to be removed according to the prayer of the petition, and the plaintiff excepted and appealed.

The contention of the plaintiff is that the defendant is not a corporation and resident of the state of Virginia, but a corporation of North Carolina and Virginia, and he so alleges in his complaint. He also files certain papers, duly certified by the Secretary of State, for the purpose of sustaining his allegation. Even if the certificates do tend to establish the fact, which we gravely doubt, this issue cannot be tried in the state court. The law upon this question is well settled. It is true that a state court is not bound to surrender its jurisdiction of a suit on a petition for removal until a case has been made which on its face shows that the petitioner has a right to the transfer. The mere filing of a petition for the removal of a suit which is not removable does not work a transfer, and in order to accomplish this the suit must be one that may be removed, and the petition must show a right in the petitioner to demand the removal, which being made to appear in the record, and the necessary security having been given, the power of the state court in the case ends, and that of the federal court begins. The state court, of course, may decide, on the face of the record, whether the case is a removable one. The law upon this subject has been so fully and conclusively stated by the court having the jurisdiction under the Constitution to declare finally what it shall be that we will content ourselves by referring to one of its latest decisions dealing with the question.

In B. & N. Railway Co. v. Dunn, 122 U. S. 513, 7 Sup. Ct. 1262, 30 L. Ed. 1159, it has stated the true rule explicitly, as follows: "The assignment of errors presents but a single question, and that is whether, as after the petition for removal had been filed the record showed on its face that the state court ought to proceed no further, it was competent for that court to allow an issue of fact to be made upon the statements in the petition, and to retain the suit, because on that issue the railway company had not shown by testimony that the plaintiff was actually a citizen of Minnesota. It must be confessed that previous to the cases of Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 432 [6 Sup. Ct. 799, 29 L. Ed. 962], and Carson v. Hyatt, 118 U. S. 279 [6 Sup. Ct. 1050, 30 L. Ed. 167], decided at the last term, the utterances of this court on that question had not always been as clear and distinct as they might have been. Thus, in Gordon v. Longest, 16 Pet. 97, 10 L. Ed. 900, in speaking of removals under section 12 of the judiciary act of 1789 [Act Sept. 24, 1789, c. 20, 1 Stat. 79], it was said [16 Pet. 104, 10 L. Ed. 902], 'It must be made to appear to the satisfaction of the state court that the defendant is an alien, or a citizen of some other state than that in which the suit was brought;' and in Railway Co. v. Ramsey, 22 Wall. 328, 22 L. Ed. 824, that, 'If, upon the hearing of the petition, it is sustained by the proof, the state court can proceed no further.' In other cases, expressions of a similar character are found, which seem to imply that the state courts were at liberty to consider the actual facts, as well as the law arising on the face of the record, after the presentation of the petition for removal. At the last term, it was found that this question had become a practical one, about which there was a difference of opinion in the state courts, and to some extent in the Circuit Courts; and so, in deciding Stone v. South Carolina, we took occasion to say: 'All issues of fact made upon the petition for removal must be tried in the Circuit Court; but the state court is at liberty to determine for itself whether, on the face of the record, a removal has been effected.' It is true, as was remarked by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in Amy v. Manning, 144 Mass. 153 [10 N. E. 737], that this was not necessary to the decision in that case; but it was said on full consideration, and with the view of announcing the opinion of the court on that subject. Only two weeks after that case was decided Carson v. Hyatt came up for determination, in which the precise question was directly presented, as the allegation of citizenship in the petition for removal was contradicted by a statement in the answer, and it became necessary to determine what the fact really was. We there affirmed what had been said in Stone v. South Carolina, and decided that it was error in the state court to proceed further with the suit after the petition for removal was filed, because the Circuit Court alone had jurisdiction to try the question of fact which was involved. This rule was again recognized at this term in Carson v. Dunham, 121 U. S. 421 [7 Sup. Ct. 1080, 30 L. Ed. 992], and is in entire harmony with all that had been previously decided, though not with all that had been said in the opinions in some of the cases. To our minds, it is the true rule, and calculated to produce less inconvenience than any other. The theory on which it rests is that the record closes, so far as the question of removal is concerned, when the petition for removal is filed and the necessary security furnished. It presents, then, to the state court a pure question of law, and that is whether, admitting the facts stated in the petition for removal to be true, it appears on the face of the record, which includes the petition and the pleadings and proceedings down to that time, the petitioner is entitled to a removal of the suit. That question the state court has the right to decide for itself; and if it errs in keeping the case, and the highest court of the state affirms its decision, this court has jurisdiction to correct the error, considering for that purpose only the part of the record which ends with the petition for removal. Stone v. South Carolina, 117 U. S. 482 [6 Sup. Ct. 799, 29 L. Ed. 962], supra and cases there cited." Crehore v. O. & M. Railway Co., 131 U. S. 240, 9 Sup. Ct. 692, 33 L. Ed. 144; Railroad v. Daughtry, 138 U. S. 298, 11 Sup. Ct. 306, 34 L. Ed. 963.

The rule, as thus formulated, has been recognized by this court as the authoritative and controlling one in Springs v. Railroad, 130 N. C. 186. The cases to the same effect are collected in 5 Digest U. S. Supreme Court Reports (L. Ed. 1908) pp. 5100 and 5101. In the case of Railroad v. Daughtry, supra, the very question now before us was involved, and the court held it to be "thoroughly settled" by the decisions that issues of fact raised upon petitions for removal must be tried in the federal court. The issue in that case was one of diverse citizenship. The matter was fully discussed at the last term by Justice Hoke in Rea v. Mirror Co., 73 S. E. 116, and we then reached the same conclusion as herein stated.

It therefore follows that the superior court, to which the petition for removal was presented, did not have the power to pass upon the issue of fact as to the diverse citizenship of the parties, and properly left that issue, if it has been sufficiently raised in the record, to the determination of the United States court. The ruling of the court was correct.

part is valid, but not essential to exercise of a power of sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1019; Dec. Dig. § 335.*]

3. MORTGAGES (§ 335*)—POWER OF SALE—PREREQUISITES.

Conditions specified in a mortgage precedent to the mortgagee's right to exercise power of sale must be strictly followed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1022; Dec. Dig. § 335.*]

4. MORTGAGES (§ 356*)—POWER OF SALE—PRECEDENT CONDITIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLIANCE.

Under a provision in a mortgage requiring notice of sale by the mortgagee to be posted at the courthouse door and four other public places, sale under notice posted at the courthouse door and three other public places is invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1067; Dec. Dig. § 356.*]

5. MORTGAGES (§ 372*)—SALES—REGULARITY—NOTICE TO PURCHASER.

The grantee in a deed executed by a mortgagee under a power of sale, reciting that notice of the sale was posted at four public places, is chargeable with knowledge of insufficiency of such posting, based on a requirement in the mortgage, which is a necessary link in his title, for posting in five public places.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1106; Dec. Dig. § 372.*]

6. MORTGAGES (§ 597*)—SALES—REGULARITY—ESTOPPEL.

While a mortgagor may, by acquiescence in the conduct of a sale under the mortgage, estop himself to assert its irregularity, there can be no acquiescence without knowledge; and hence a mortgagor, by renting from the purchaser at a mortgagee's sale, is not estopped to deny validity of the sale for want of sufficient posting of the notice, where he did not know of such irregularity when he rented.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1744; Dec. Dig. § 597.*]

7. MORTGAGES (§ 597*)—REDEMPTION—ESTOPPEL.

A mortgagor is not estopped to exercise his right to redeem through having rented the land from the purchaser at the mortgagee's sale, where, when he procured the lease, he did not know that he could redeem.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1744; Dec. Dig. § 597.*]

8. MORTGAGES (§ 193*)—MORTGAGOR IN POSSESSION—RIGHTS—NATURE.

The rights of a mortgagor in possession are almost identical with those of the purchaser under a bond for title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Jones County; Carter, Judge.

Action by E. E. Eubanks against A. F. Becton and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This is an action by the plaintiff as mortgagor for an accounting and to redeem. The issues raised by the pleadings were by consent referred to Hon. F. A. Daniels, and the following facts are found by him, to which no exception is taken: On the 3d day of April, 1900, the defendant Amos F. Becton, conveyed to the plaintiff, E. E. Eubanks, the tract of land described in the complaint for the consideration of $1,000. On the same day, the plaintiff and his wife executed and delivered to said Becton their 10 bonds for the purchase money, in different amounts, and payable the 1st day of January, 1901, and annually thereafter up to and including January 1, 1910, and to secure the payment of the same they also executed and delivered to said defendant a mortgage upon the said land, which was duly proven and registered in said county, and in which it is provided "that if default should be made in the payment of either of said sums of money, or any part thereof, the said parties of the first part in such case do hereby authorize and fully empower the said party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, to sell the said hereby granted premises at public outcry at the courthouse door in Trenton, Jones county, after first advertising the same for thirty days at the courthouse door and four other public places in Jones county, and convey the same to the purchaser in fee simple, and out of the moneys arising from said sale to retain the principal and interest which shall then be due on the said bonds." On the 30th day of December, 1901, the first note not being paid, the defendant, purporting to act under the power of sale contained in the mortgage, offered for sale at the courthouse door in Trenton, N. C., the lands described in the said mortgages, after advertising the said sale by posting notices for 30 days at the courthouse door and three other public places in Jones county, when and where one J. A. Smith, being the highest bidder, was declared the purchaser at the price of $1,000; that the said Smith transferred his bid to the defendant Heath, who rented said land to the plaintiff, Eubanks, for the years 1902, 1903, and 1904, and received the rent therefor; that at the time of such renting the plaintiff did not know of any irregularity in the sale; that on November 7, 1902, the said Becton executed a deed to said Heath, purporting to convey said lands in consideration of $1,000, in which deed there is no reference to the said mortgage or the power contained therein; that about February, 1904, the said Becton executed another deed to the said Heath, purporting to convey said land, in which it is recited that the sale was made after advertisement at the courthouse door and three other public places; and that the deed is made pursuant to the execution of the power in said mortgage. The referee stated the account between the parties, to which there is no exception. The report of the referee was confirmed. and from a judgment in accordance therewith the defendants appeal.

T. D. Warren, Loftin & Dawson, and A. D. Ward, for appellants. Rouse & Land and Shaw & Powers, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The right of the plaintiff to redeem depends upon the validity of the sale made under the power contained in the mortgage, executed by him. If the sale can be upheld, the defendant Heath is the owner of the land, and, if not, the deed to him is operative only as an equitable assignment of the notes and mortgage, and the plaintiff, nothing else appearing, is entitled to an accounting.

[1, 2] The sale is attacked by the plaintiff upon two grounds: (1) That the mortgage, although containing a provision that the land may be sold upon failure to pay either note, does not provide that upon such failure the whole indebtedness shall become due, and that therefore no sale could be made until the maturity of the last note; (2) that the mortgage requires the notice of sale to be posted at the courthouse door and four other public places, and it was in fact posted at the courthouse door and three other public places.

(1) The mortgage contains the express stipulation that the land may be sold upon failure to pay either note, and requires the proceeds of sale to be applied to "the principal and interest which shall be then due on the said bonds." The language is clear, and the intention of the parties easily ascertained, and we must give effect to it. It is permissible to provide that the whole debt shall become due upon failure to pay any part, but not essential to the exercise of the power of sale. Gore v. Davis, 124 N. C. 234, 32 S. E. 554.

[3, 4] (2) The second question is more serious. Powers of sale in a mortgage are contractual, and as there are many opportunities for oppression in their enforcement courts of equity are disposed to scrutinize them, and to hold the mortgagee to the letter of the contract. If a different view should prevail, and we could dispense with some stipulation in the power because we could not see that injury had ensued from failure to observe it, we could practically destroy the contract of the parties.

The view taken by the courts of such powers is illustrated by what is said in Kornegay v. Spicer, 76 N. C. 97: "The idea of allowing the mortgagee to foreclose the equity of redemption by a sale made by himself, instead of a decree for foreclosure and a sale made under the order of the court, was yielded to, after great hesitation, on the ground that, in a plain case, when the mortgage debt was agreed on and nothing else was to be done, except to sell the land, it would be a useless expense to force the parties to come into equity, when there were no equities to be adjusted, and the mortgagor might be reasonably assumed to have agreed to let a sale be made after he should be in default. But this power of sale has always been watched with great jealousy." And in Shew v. Call, 119 N. C. 453, 26 S. E. 34, 56 Am. St. Rep. 678: "Mortgages with power of sale are not looked upon with disfavor as they once were. But courts of equity, or of equitable jurisdiction, will still guard the rights of the mortgagor with jealous care." And in Fleming v. Barden, 127 N. C. 217, 37 S. E. 220, 53 L. R. A. 316: "The practice of inserting powers of sale in mortgages was recognized by this court with great reluctance, and has always been regarded with extreme jealousy, but not now with the same disfavor."

In the case of Brett v. Davenport, 151 N. C. 59, 65 S. E. 612, the effect of failure to advertise according to the terms of the mortgage was directly involved, and Justice Hoke, speaking to that question, says: "Again, it appears that at the time of the first sale, or attempted sale, the property had not been advertised 'according to law or as required by the terms of the deed of trust under which he had sold,' and on such facts it is very generally held, uniformly, so far as we have examined, that a sale would have been invalid. In an instrument of this kind, the law is that a statutory requirement or contract stipulation in regard to notice is of the substance, and, unless complied with, a sale is ineffective as a foreclosure, and even when consummated by deed the conveyance only operates to pass the legal title, subject to certain equitable rights in the purchaser, as of subrogation, etc., in case he has paid the purchase money in good faith."

The decisions in other states seem, also, to be practically uniform that there must be a strict compliance with the terms of the mortgage before the power can be exercised.

In 27 Cyc. 1466, the rule is stated that "a power of sale contained in a mortgage or deed of trust must be strictly pursued, and all its terms and conditions complied with, in order to render the sale valid." And, again, on page 1466: "It is essential to the validity of a sale under a power in a mortgage or deed of trust to comply fully with its requirements as to giving notice of the sale." And on page 1472: "Directions of the statute or of the mortgage as to the length of time the notice must be published, or the number of times it must appear, are imperative, and a sale made without strict compliance therewith is invalid and passes no title," and the text is supported by the cases cited in the notes. Thornton v. Boyden, 31 Ill. 210; Bigler v. Waller, 81 U. S. 304, 20 L. Ed. 891; Hall v. Towne, 45 Ill. 495; Shillaber v. Robinson, 97 U. S. 77, 24 L. Ed. 967; Sears v. Livermore, 17 Iowa, 297, 85 Am. Dec. 564; Preston v. Johnson, 105 Va. 240, 53 S. E. 1.

In Sears v. Livermore, supra, it was held that a sale under the power in a mortgage was invalid, when the mortgage required the notice to be posted on the door of a hotel, and it was posted near by, because of the refusal of the proprietor of the hotel to permit it to be placed on the door; and this was approved in Preston v. Johnson, supra, in which the court quotes with approval what is said by Mr. Freeman in a note to Tyler v. Herring, 19 Am. St. Rep. 263, as follows: "Where the instrument creating the trust has given directions concerning the mode of sale, they must be substantially pursued. Any direction regarding the notice of sale is material, and the trustee is not at liberty to disobey it. His sale, made without complying with it, will, in most jurisdictions, be regarded as either absolutely void, or as liable to be vacated upon complaint of any person interested in the execution of the trust."

In Moore v. Dick, 187 Mass. 208, 72 N. E. 967, a sale was declared void when the notice of sale, instead of being published in a certain weekly newspaper named in the power of sale, was published in a daily newspaper of another name, printed by the same proprietor and issued from the same office; and the court says: "It is familiar law that one who sues under a power must follow strictly its terms. If he fails to do so, there is no valid execution of the power, and the sale is void."

This case was approved in Chace v. Morse, 189 Mass. 581, 76 N. E. 142, and the court there distinguishes between irregularities which avoid the sale and those that do not. The court says: "The distinction between the two classes of cases has not been very clearly defined, and the decisions in the different jurisdictions do not entirely agree. It has repeatedly been said that, in order to make a valid sale under a power in a mortgage, the terms of the power must be strictly complied with. Roarty v. Mitchell, 7 Gray (Mass.) 243; Smith v. Provin, 4 Allen (Mass.) 516; Bigler v. Waller, 14 Wall. 297, 20 L. Ed. 891; Shillaber v. Robinson, 97 U. S. 68, 24 L. Ed. 967. Where the sale is to foreclose a mortgage for a breach of the condition, there is no authority to sell, unless there is a breach, and an attempted sale would be without effect upon the right of redemption. So, where a certain notice is prescribed, a sale without any notice, or upon a notice lacking the essential requirements of the written power, would be void as a proceeding for foreclosure. Moore v. Dick, 187 Mass. 207, 72 N. E. 967. But if everything is done upon which jurisdiction and authority to make a sale depend, irregularities in the manner of doing it, or in the subsequent proceedings, which may affect injuriously the rights of the mortgagor do not necessarily render the sale a nullity."

Perry on Trusts (sections 602p and 602q) declares the same principle. It says: "It must be constantly borne in mind that the power of sale given in the deed or mortgage must be strictly followed in all its details. The power of transferring the property of one man to another must be followed strictly, literally, and precisely. Such a power admits of no substitution and of no equivalent, even in unimportant details. If the power contains the details, the parties have made them important; and no change can be made, even if the mortgagor would be benefited thereby, nor if a statute provides a different manner. If the power is not executed as it is given in all particulars, it is not executed at all, and the mortgagor still has his equity of redemption." "If the form of notice, and the manner of giving it, whether by posting in public places or by advertising in a newspaper, are prescribed in the power, they must be strictly followed, and if the particular place of notice is named notice must be posted in that place; if the newspaper is named, publication of notice must be made in that paper. It is not necessary to give other notice of the sale than that prescribed in the power; but it is necessary to follow the power in good faith. If the notice named in power cannot be given, as if the newspaper named has ceased to be published, the mortgagees cannot sell without recourse to a court of equity."

It will be noted that the mortgage before us and the sale thereunder antedate the act of 1905, which is now a part of section 641 of the Revisal, providing that no sale shall be made under a mortgage, etc., thereafter executed until notice of such sale shall be posted at the courthouse door and three other public places, and the effect of that statute is not before us. We conclude, therefore, that we cannot disregard the requirements of the mortgage, and that the sale is invalid, because notice thereof was not given in accordance with its terms.

[5] If the sale is invalid, the purchaser, Heath, had notice thereof, because it is recited in his deed that notice of sale was posted at the courthouse door and three other public places, and, as the mortgage is a necessary link in his chain of title, he is charged with notice that it required a publication at four other public places. Thompson v. Blair, 7 N. C. 591; Holmes v. Holmes, 86 N. C. 209.

[6] The defendants contend, however, that if it is held that it was necessary to publish the notice of sale at four other public places the failure to do so is an irregularity; that the sale was not absolutely void; and that the plaintiff, by acquiescence, has ratified the sale, or by renting from the purchaser is estopped to deny its validity. It is true that the mortgagor may, by acquiescence in the conduct of the sale, be precluded from questioning its irregularity (Lunsford v. Spears, 112 N. C. 612, 17 S. E. 430); but there can be no acquiescence without knowledge, and it is a fact established in this case that the plaintiff did not know of the irregularity in the sale at the time he rented from the purchaser, nor until a short time before this action was commenced. In Pence v. Langdon, 99 U. S. 578, 25 L. Ed. 420, it is said: "Acquiescence and waiver are always questions of fact. There can be neither without knowledge. The terms import this foundation for such action. One cannot waive or acquiesce in a wrong while ignorant that it has been committed. Current suspicion and rumor are not enough. There must be knowledge of facts which will enable the party to take effectual action. Nothing short of this will do." And the plaintiff cannot be held to be negligent in assuming the sale to be regular, when the presumption is that it was advertised according to law. Lunsford v. Spears, 112 N. C. 612, 17 S. E. 430; Cawfield v. Owens, 129 N. C. 288, 40 S. E. 62.

[7] Nor does the rental of the land estop the plaintiff from asserting his equity to redeem. At the time he rented, he thought the sale was regular, and he entered into the contract of rental in ignorance of the fact that he had the right to redeem; but, aside from this, the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee being established, a court of equity would give effect to such an agreement only so far as is necessary to protect the rights of the mortgagee.

[8] The rights of the mortgagor in possession are almost identical with those of a vendee in a bond for title; and it has been held repeatedly that, while the vendee may, under some circumstances, rent from the vendor, and thereby confer the right to enforce payment of the rent under the landlord and tenant act, this alone does not impair the equity in the vendee, and that the rents collected must be applied to the debt. Taylor v. Taylor, 112 N. C. 27, 16 S. E. 924; Crinkley v. Edgerton, 113 N. C. 444, 18 S. E. 609; Jones v. Jones, 117 N. C. 257, 23 S. E. 214.

We conclude, therefore, that there is no error, and the judgment must be affirmed. This result does not seem to be unjust to the purchaser, as he has received more from the plaintiff and the land than he agreed to pay the mortgagee.

Affirmed.

JEFFRESS v. NORFOLK-SOUTHERN R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 460*) — FIRES — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

It is not contributory negligence, precluding recovery for a fire set by negligence of a railroad, that the owner of premises permitted grass to remain on his premises near the road.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1681; Dec. Dig. § 460.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 117*) — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—NECESSITY OF PLEADING.

That contributory negligence may be availed of, the pleadings must tender an issue thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 195-197; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 453*) — FIRES—LIABILITY—PRIOR RECOVERY OF DAMAGES FROM CONSTRUCTION.

Recovery of damages to a lot, including the hazard from fire, from construction of a railroad in a street, includes only ordinary risks where there is no negligence, and so does not prevent recovery for a fire from negligent operation of an engine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1657-1667; Dec. Dig. § 453.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 295*) — INSTRUCTIONS—CONSIDERATION AS A WHOLE.

A charge is to be considered as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 485*) — FIRES — SPARK ARRESTERS—INSTRUCTIONS—"MODERN."

A charge in an action for fire set by a locomotive, stating that it was defendant's duty to have its engines properly equipped with such appliances for arresting sparks as are in general and approved use, not, however, such as will prevent any spark from escaping, but such as are in general and common use, and that if the fire was caused by its failure to properly equip its engine with a spark arrester that was modern and in common use, or by failure to properly operate it, it was negligent, does not, by use of the word "modern," necessarily require the latest and best appliances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1747-1756; Dec. Dig. § 485.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 284*) — INSTRUCTIONS—DUTY TO CALL ATTENTION TO MISTAKES.

If the charge states a certain condition of affairs as being contended for by a party, when there is no evidence to support the contention, it is the duty of counsel to call the court's attention thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 688-685; Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

7. RAILROADS (§ 484*) — FIRES—EVIDENCE.

Evidence in an action for fire set by a locomotive held sufficient to submit to the jury the question of the quantity of sparks from the engine having been unusual.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 484.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*) — HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge in an action for fire set by a locomotive, in effect, requiring the issue of whether plaintiff's property was injured by defendant's negligence to be answered in the negative, though sparks fell on the premises from the engine, because of its not being equipped with a proper spark arrester or not being properly operated, if the premises were in a foul condition, in so far as it made defendant's liability to depend on such foul condition, was merely more favorable to it than it was entitled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4056, 4057; Dec. Dig. § 1033.*]

9. DAMAGES (§ 111*) — FIRES — BURNING HOUSE—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

The measure of damages for the burning of a house by sparks from a locomotive is the depreciation in value of the land from the fire; that is, the difference in its value before and after the fire.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 274-278; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

10. EVIDENCE (§ 155*) — ADMISSIBILITY—SIMILAR EVIDENCE OF ADVERSE PARTY.

While prior negligence of the owner of premises in not removing trash from his sidewalk would not prevent his recovery of a railroad for fire set by its locomotive through its failure to provide a proper spark arrester, or to operate its train prudently, yet defendant having been allowed to introduce an ordinance, requiring such owner to remove such trash, it was not improper to allow plaintiff to prove that the notice to remove required by the ordinance to be given under certain conditions was not given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 445-458; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pitt County; Whedbee, Judge.

Action by R. O. Jeffress against the Norfolk-Southern Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action for the recovery of damages in the sum of $4,315.95 for the alleged negligent burning by the defendant of plaintiff's prize house, or tobacco stemmery, in Greenville, N. C., on January 31, 1910. The fire is alleged to have been caused by sparks from one of the defendant's engines while being operated on Pitt street. The defendants deny liability. It was admitted, for the purposes of the trial, that the Norfolk-Southern Railroad was liable to the plaintiff if the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company and its receiver were liable.

The plaintiff owns a lot in Greenville, on Pitt and Tenth streets, fronting 333 feet on Pitt street and 110 on Tenth street. Pitt street runs north and south. The lot is about two blocks from the Norfolk-Southern Depot, and 100 to 150 feet from the cotton platform. The Norfolk-Southern Railroad track runs down the middle of Pitt street, which is 49 feet wide. It is 20 feet from the railroad to the Jeffress property line, but this distance includes the sidewalk. The prize house of plaintiff was built in 1901. It is approximately 60 feet wide and 108.6 feet long, with an ell added, which is 40 feet by 40 feet. The nearest point of the building is about 45 feet from the railroad. The boiler room is 25 feet. The railroad, including track and cross-ties, is 8 feet wide. The building caught fire about 12 o'clock noon, and was totally destroyed. The building had been leased for several years to Skinner & House. The rest of the lot had been rented out the year before. At the time of the fire, the vacant part of the lot was covered with cornstalks and grass. The fire was first discovered burning in the grass on the lot, and in this way reached the building. There was a city ordinance in force at the time, and had been in force for several years, providing that "every occupant of a lot on any street shall keep the sidewalk clean and clear of weeds, grass and other rank vegetation as far as such lot extends. If any rubbish, dirt, ashes or other thing be placed or left without lawful authority upon such sidewalk or in the gutters or streets adjacent thereto, the occupant of such lot shall remove same. If, after written notice by the chief of police, or street commissioners, requiring him to remove the things prohibited by this ordinance, he shall fail for twenty-four hours to remove the same, he shall be fined five dollars for each day thereafter it may so remain."

In August, 1907, the plaintiff instituted another action against the Norfolk & Southern Railroad Company for recovery of damages in the sum of $3,000 to this same lot, alleged to have been caused by the construction of this same railroad track down Pitt street, alleging, among other elements of damage, "by reason of the frequent passing of the defendant's trains in such close proximity to plaintiff's property, plaintiff's property has become endangered from loss by fire arising from the constant issuing of smoke and sparks from defendant's engines, and has become annoying to the plaintiff and materially interferes with the operation of plaintiff's factory." This action was tried at March term, 1911, resulting in a judgment of $50 for the plaintiff, and this judgment was affirmed on appeal by plaintiff to Supreme Court at fall term, 1911.

There was evidence for the plaintiff tending to show that the defendant's freight train was passing along Pitt street about 11:30 o'clock, and did some shifting on this street, that the engine was emitting sparks, and that some of the sparks fell upon the vacant part of the Jeffress lot, or sidewalk, and that shortly thereafter the grass was burning in two places. The grass burned up near to the boiler room, which was the nearest point to the street, when it was discovered by Archie Lockland, who had charge of the building, and had the key to the same. He testified that he put the fire out and went home. In about 20 minutes the building was on fire. The building burned about 12 o'clock noon. There was also evidence for the plaintiff that the grass caught again from a spark from the engine, after Lockland had put it out, and that this was the fire that eventually burned the factory. The plaintiff's evidence showed that the grass caught on the plaintiff's lot or sidewalk, and that the fire was communicated to the building by burning grass; the plaintiff himself testifying that the nearest burnt grass to the railroad track was within 20 or 15 feet of the track. All of the evidence tended to show that the fire was communicated to the building by the burning grass, and there was no evidence that it caught directly from a spark. The plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the building and its contents were worth between $8,500 and $9,000. He collected $4,225 insurance on the building and contents.

The evidence of the defendant was that the freight train No. 30, pulled by engine No.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes.

115, came into Greenville about 11 o'clock a. m., and left about 11:40; that the engine was properly equipped with a spark arrester in general and approved use, and that the netting of the spark arrester was in fact smaller and finer than the standard, it being 3 holes to 1 inch of space instead of 2¾ holes to the inch; that this rendered the danger of sparks escaping much less, on account of the fact that the netting would stop smaller sparks; that it stopped practically all sparks, and would choke with sparks, and cause the engineer to stop at stations and knock them out; that the spark arrester was in good condition on that date. There was evidence of the good condition of the spark arrester for a number of days both prior and subsequent to the fire, and that the engine was being run carefully and properly by a competent engineer. There was evidence for the defendant that the building and personal property was worth less than the amounts claimed by the plaintiff. There was other evidence for the plaintiff.

The defendant does not plead contributory negligence, and the issues and the responses thereto are as follows:

"(1) Was the property of the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint?" Answer: "Yes."

"(2) If so, what damage, if any, in excess of the $4,225 fire insurance collected by the plaintiff, is plaintiff entitled to recover of defendant?" Answer: "$3,275."

There was a judgment in accordance with the verdict, and the defendant appealed.

Rouse & Land, for appellant. F. G. James & Son and Harry Skinner, for appellee.

ALLEN, J. The exceptions appearing in the record present for our consideration the following contentions made by the defendant:

(1) That the plaintiff was negligent in permitting combustible matter to remain on his lot near the track of the defendant, and that this was the proximate cause of the injury to his property.

(2) That, if ordinarily it would not be negligence in the plaintiff to permit combustible matter to remain on his lot, a higher duty should be imposed on him in this case, because he had recovered judgment against the defendant in another action on account of hazard to this property by the operation of defendant's trains, and had been thereby compensated for ordinary risks.

(3) That it being in evidence that the fire, after its origin, was under the control of an employé of the plaintiff, the defendant, although negligent in setting out the fire, would not be liable for the consequences which followed.

(4) That his honor erroneously imposed the duty on the defendant of equipping its engine with a modern spark arrester.

(5) That his honor stated as a contention of the plaintiff that the engine emitted an unusual quantity of sparks, when there was no evidence to support the contention.

(6) That his honor in a part of his charge made the liability of the defendant depend upon whether the plaintiff was negligent in permitting his lot to become and remain in a foul condition.

(7) That his honor erroneously charged the jury that the measure of damage for burning the building was the difference in the value of the land before and after the fire.

(8) That his honor erroneously permitted the tenant of the plaintiff to testify that he had received no notice, under the ordinance in evidence, to remove trash, etc., from the sidewalk.

[1, 2] 1. This contention of the defendant seems to be fully met by the decision in Wyatt v. Railroad, 156 N. C. 314, 72 S. E. 383, in which it was held that "an owner of land has a right to use it in the ordinary and usual way, and is not bound to remove dry grass, weeds, leaves, or other combustible material from his land adjoining a railroad right of way, in anticipation of probable negligence on the part of the railroad company, and a failure to perform such acts will not make him guilty of contributory negligence so as to preclude a recovery for damages caused by a fire originating through the railroad company's negligence." If the rule was otherwise, the defendant has not pleaded contributory negligence, and no issue was tendered presenting this question, and this objection would also be applicable to the next contention of the defendant.

[3] 2. The second proposition insisted upon may be admitted, and the liability of the defendant would not be affected, because negligence is not an ordinary risk, and his honor told the jury in clear and direct terms that the plaintiff could not recover if the engine was properly equipped with a spark arrester, and was prudently operated by a competent engineer. He imposed the burden on the plaintiff of proving negligence, and instructed the jury that they were confined to the consideration of the two acts of negligence alleged—the defective spark arrester and the negligent operation of the train—and, if the defendant was negligent in these respects, as the jury has found, the prior negligent conduct of the plaintiff, if any, would not prevent a recovery. The question is analogous to one considered in Arthur v. Henry, 157 N. C. —, 73 S. E. 206, where it was held that consent given by the plaintiff to the defendant to blast for rock near his home would not prevent a recovery for injuries resulting from negligence in the operations.

3. This position finds support in Doggett v. Railroad, 78 N. C. 311, but it is not necessary for us to consider the facts and the reasoning in that case, because it appears from the evidence in this that two fires were set out by the engine of the defendant, and that it was the first fire which was under the control of an employé of the plaintiff, and that, after he extinguished it and left the premises, the property of the plaintiff was destroyed by the second fire.

[4, 5] 4. When the charge of his honor is considered as a whole which it is our duty to do, the criticism of it, as presented by the fourth, fifth, and sixth contentions of the defendant, is not in our opinion sustained by the record. It is true that the word "modern" is used in connection with the appliances which the defendant was required to furnish, but "modern appliances" do not necessarily mean "the latest and best appliances," which the defendant insists was the effect of the charge, and could not have been so understood by the jury. The Century Dictionary defines "modern" as "pertaining to the present era, or to a period extending from a not very remote past to the passing time; not ancient or remote in time; not antiquated or obsolete"—and says by way of illustration that modern history comprises the history of the world since the fall of the Roman Empire or the close of the Middle Ages, and that modern fashions, tastes, inventions, and science generally refer to the comparatively brief period of from one to three or four generations. His honor told the jury that it was the duty of the defendant "to have its engines properly equipped with such appliances for the arresting of sparks as are in general and approved use, not such as will prevent any spark from escaping, but such appliances as are in general and common use, and that will subserve the purpose intended." And again: "If you find by the greater weight of the evidence the spark which set fire to the grass, and which fire was communicated to and destroyed the building, was caused by the failure of the defendant to properly equip its engine with a spark arrester that was modern and in common use, or they failed to properly operate or manage it, it would be negligence on the part of the defendant company."

[6, 7] If his honor stated a contention of the parties not supported by evidence, it was the duty of counsel to call it to his attention, but one of the witnesses testified that a shirt hanging in her garden was set on fire from the train; that, as she approached the railroad crossing, she had to put her apron over her head to keep the cinders from burning her; and that about that time sparks from the train set fire to the grass on the plaintiff's lot, which is, we think, some evidence that the quantity of sparks was unusual, and particularly so when considered in connection with the evidence of the conductor of the defendant that the spark arrester was in good condition, and that the engine did not throw any sparks.

[8] The part of the charge which the defendant thinks made the liability of the defendant depend upon the negligence of the plaintiff in permitting his lot to remain in a foul condition is where his honor says: "There is another aspect to this case which you will take into consideration. It is for you to say what the proximate cause was. If you find as a fact that the engine was properly equipped, properly managed and operated, and sparks were emitted that set fire to property off the right of way—that is to say, if sparks were emitted from the engine that was properly equipped, managed and operated, and fell upon the land of the plaintiff off the right of way—there would not be any breach of duty on the part of the defendant because his property was burned, and the defendant would not be responsible. If you should also find that the plaintiff allowed his premises to become so foul with combustible matter that no reasonably prudent man would allow it to stay in that condition near a railroad, and that the cause of the injury was not the negligence of the defendant, but the proximate cause was the negligent act of the plaintiff in allowing his lot to remain in a foul condition, and if you shall find from all the facts and circumstances and by the greater weight of the evidence that it was not the act of a reasonably prudent man having regard to the rights of others to permit the condition in his lot, and that it was a case of negligence on his part, then that would be a bar to recovery, and you would answer the first issue, 'No.' If, however, you find that the engine was not equipped with modern proper spark arrester, and that it was not properly managed and operated, and that the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff's property was the negligence of the defendant to provide proper appliances and equipment to the engine, then it is your duty to answer that first issue, 'Yes.'" This was, in effect, instructing the jury to answer the first issue "No" if the spark arrester was in good condition and the train prudently operated, or if the foul condition of the lot of the plaintiff was the proximate cause of his loss, and that the issue could not be answered in favor of the plaintiff unless the jury found that the engine was not properly equipped with a spark arrester and was not properly managed and operated, and that this was the proximate cause, which was more favorable to the defendant than it was entitled to.

[9] 7. The measure of damage was stated correctly in the charge. Williams v. L. Co., 154 N. C. 310, 70 S. E. 631. The house destroyed by the fire was a part of the land, and the injury was to the freehold. The inquiry, therefore, for the jury was, "How much has the land been depreciated in value by the fire?" which is but another way of ascertaining the difference in the value of the land before and after the fire. It was, of course, competent to introduce evidence as to the size of the house, the quality and cost of the material used in its construction, the workmanship and other relevant facts, as bearing on the question of the decrease in value of the land.

[10] 8. As the liability of the defendant was made to depend solely upon failure to provide a proper spark arrester, or to operate its train prudently, if these facts were found to exist, the prior negligence of the plaintiff, if any, would not have prevented a recovery, and, in this view, the ordinance introduced by the defendant, and the evidence of the tenant of the plaintiff that he had not been notified to remove trash from the sidewalk, would be irrelevant and harmless, but, as the ordinance was admitted requiring notice to be given under certain conditions, it was not improper to permit the plaintiff to prove that the notice had not been given.

Upon a review of the whole record, we find no error.

No error.

FISHER v. CHAMPION FIBRE CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 20, 1911.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Frank Carter, Judge.

Action by A. N. Fisher against the Champion Fibre Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

These issues were submitted: "(1) Was the plaintiff injured by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged in the complaint? (2) Was the plaintiff guilty of negligence which contributed to his said injury? (3) Did the plaintiff assume the risks of being injured at the time mentioned, as alleged in the answer? (4) What damages, if any, has the plaintiff sustained?" The jury answered the first issue "Yes," the second issue "No," the third issue "No," and the fourth issue "$1,150."

Martin & Wright, for appellant. Craig, Martin & Thomason, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. We have examined the 20 assignments of error set out in the record, all of which, except the motion to nonsuit, relate to the charge of the court. The majority of the court are of opinion that the motion to nonsuit was properly overruled, and that the charge follows the well-settled decisions of this court. No error.

STATE v. POWELL.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 12, 1912.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1179*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A finding of fact by a magistrate in a misdemeanor prosecution, affirmed by the circuit judge, cannot be reviewed by the Supreme Court, if supported by any evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3001; Dec. Dig. § 1179.*]

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Clarendon County; J. W. De Vore, Judge.

S. D. Powell was convicted before a magistrate of failing to perform road duty, and he appeals from a judgment of the general sessions circuit court affirming the conviction. Affirmed and remanded.

Charlton Du Rant, for appellant. P. H. Stoll, Sol., for the State.

WATTS, J. This case was heard before Magistrate Bradham on a warrant charging the defendant with failure to perform road duty, under section 460 of Criminal Code. The defendant was found guilty and sentenced. An appeal was taken to the court of general sessions, and was heard by his honor, Judge De Vore. The judgment of magistrate's court was affirmed. From this order an appeal was taken to this court.

All of the exceptions relate to the testimony, and are to the effect that the state failed to make out its case, and that there was not sufficient testimony on which to base a verdict of guilty. This court has repeatedly held that a finding of fact by the magistrate, affirmed by the circuit judge, cannot be reviewed by this court, if there is any evidence to support it. Seegers Bros. v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 73 S. C. 83, 52 S. E. 797, 121 Am. St. Rep. 921; Lewis v. Railroad Co., 78 S. C. 35, 58 S. E. 989. There is such evidence here.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed, and case remanded for the purpose of executing sentence.

GARY, C. J., and WOODS, HYDRICK, and FRASER, JJ., concur in the result.

HUNTER v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 262*)—CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS—DUTIES OF TICKET AGENT.

It is the duty of a carrier, through its ticket agents, to give its passengers such information as may be necessary for them to travel in comfort and safety, including information whether they can make a through trip on a certain train, and a passenger may rely on the information given by such agents acting within the scope, or apparent scope, of their authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 262.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 277*)—CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS—ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Evidence, in an action against a carrier for alleged breach of its contract of transportation, held insufficient to show willful or wanton acts so as to warrant a verdict for punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1083; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 276*)—CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS—ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—PRESUMPTION AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

The law will not presume willful violations of duty, and one alleging that his rights have been willfully invaded has the burden of proving it, and to sustain such a charge something more is required than mere surmise or conjecture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1078; Dec. Dig. § 276.*]

4. DAMAGES (§ 62*)—REDUCTION OF DAMAGES—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

One injured by the breach of a contract is bound to reasonably exert himself to avoid and lessen the damages therefrom, the effort to be made being governed by the rules of common sense and including a reasonable expenditure of money, and such damages as may be so avoided are not the proximate result of the other's breach, and cannot be recovered; but the rule does not apply when a person bound to make such effort shows reasonable grounds for his failure to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 277*)—CONTRACT OF TRANSPORTATION—BREACH—DAMAGES.

A passenger, who purchased a through ticket, but who, through inadvertence of the ticket agent, was not informed as to a necessary change, or that the train for a part of the route was a train carrying only sleeping cars for which there would be an extra fare, but whose damages and inconveniences in waiting overnight in a station might have been averted by the payment of $5 for sleeping car accommodation, and who shows no reason why he did not do so, is entitled to recover no more than $5.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1082-1084; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Ernest Moore, Special Judge.

Action by John P. Hunter against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, unless plaintiff remit all of the verdict above a certain amount.

B. L. Abney and McDonald & McDonald, for appellant. J. Harry Foster, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The plaintiff, who is sheriff of Lancaster county, went to Chester, Pa., to get a prisoner and bring him to this state. He carried a guard with him. On arriving at Chester, he went to the office of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and told the ticket agent who he was, where he was from, and what his business was, and that he wanted to go back on the first train that would carry him through to Charlotte; that he felt satisfied that (in getting back to Lancaster) he would have to change at Charlotte, and knew he would have to change at Rock Hill; but that he wanted tickets through to Lancaster, if possible; that he did not want to lay over anywhere; that, if he had to lay over, he would rather stay in Chester, until he could get a through train. The agent looked over his time-tables, and told plaintiff he could sell him tickets to Lancaster, and that he could take a train at 6.03 that afternoon, and go right through. Plaintiff bought the tickets, and the agent said to him: "Be on time. The train flies. Come here and I will tell you how to go out to the train." And he did so. By mistake, plaintiff took a train that stopped at Wilmington, Del. The train which he should have taken was following, and he got on it at Wilmington and was carried to Washington without further trouble. He arrived at Washington at 9:25 p. m., and was informed that that train did not go further south, and that he would have to change and take a train on the Southern Railway for Charlotte. The Southern train was then standing in the station, and was due to leave for Charlotte at 10:45 p. m.; but this train was composed entirely of Pullman cars. Plaintiff went into the station for some purpose, and, on attempting to pass through the gates to go to the train, the gatekeeper, on examining his tickets, informed him that he would have to get Pullman reservations. Plaintiff informed him that the agent at Chester had told him that his tickets would carry him straight through, and that he was entitled to be carried on that train. The gatekeeper, however, refused him admittance, without Pullman tickets, telling him that he could get tickets for two berths at a cost of $5, which would entitle the whole party, consisting of plaintiff, his assistant, and prisoner, to be carried on the Pullman train. Plaintiff refused to pay the extra charge, and returned to the waiting room, where he sat up all night, and until 9 o'clock the next morning, when he took the next train for Charlotte. Plaintiff actually lost no time in his arrival at Lancaster on account of the delay in Washington. In other words, he arrived at Lancaster on the same train he would have gotten there on, if he had been allowed to get aboard the Pullman train in Washington. Therefore the damage and inconvenience of which he complains consisted in his having to sit up all night in the waiting room at Washington. He brought this action to recover damages—actual and punitive—for the alleged negligent and willful conduct of defendant, through its agents and servants, in failing to give him correct information as to his journey and in refusing to allow him to enter the Pullman train and be carried thereon, without the payment of extra fare. Under the rulings and charge, plaintiff recovered judgment for $500, actual and punitive damages.

[1] The exceptions questioning the rulings of the court below in admitting evidence of the conduct and statements of the agent at Chester, Pa., who sold plaintiff the tickets, cannot be sustained. It was admitted by defendant that the agent at Chester was its agent for the purpose of selling the tickets; but it denied that he had any authority to do more, and contended that any statements or declarations made by him to plaintiff as to his making a through trip were incompetent, because he had no authority to make them.

It is the duty of a carrier, through those whom it has authorized to sell tickets over its lines, to give its passengers such instructions and information as may be necessary for them to pursue their journey in comfort and safety and with dispatch, and the passenger has the right to rely upon the instructions and information given by such agents, acting within the scope or apparent scope of their authority. Smith v. Railway, 88 S. C. 421, 70 S. E. 1057, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 708; Gillman v. Railroad, 53 S. C. 210, 31 S. E. 224.

[2] The exceptions which impute error in submitting the issue of punitive damages to the jury must be sustained. We have examined the record with care, and we find no testimony which warrants a verdict for punitive damages. No reasonable inference can be drawn from the testimony that the agent at Chester acted recklessly, willfully, or wantonly. On the contrary, he was courteous and polite to plaintiff, and volunteered to give him information and to show him how to get out to his train. From what took place between them, as detailed by plaintiff, it might be inferred that the agent inadvertently failed to find out that plaintiff would have to change cars at Washington, and also that he inadvertently neglected to inform plaintiff that the train from Washington to Charlotte was composed entirely of Pullman cars, and that he would have to pay extra fare thereon for Pullman accommodations. But the failure to give this information warrants no more than an inference of negligence; and, even as to that, there is room for serious difference of opinion, because plaintiff himself said that nothing was said about Pullman cars or Pullman reservations. The agent might very naturally have supposed that plaintiff knew, as every one who has had any experience in travel does, and as plaintiff admitted he did know, that the accommodations and conveniences of Pullman cars cannot be had without the payment of extra fare. Nothing was more natural than for him to have supposed that plaintiff, occupying the position which he did, not only knew this, but that he would also want such accommodations on such a long journey—especially as he had expressed the desire to go straight through. So that it is not surprising that the agent did not mention to plaintiff the fact that the train from Washington to Charlotte was made up entirely of Pullman cars. In fact, the agent testified that, if plaintiff had asked him, he would have told him that the train from Washington to Charlotte was a solid Pullman train, and that he would have to pay extra or Pullman fare thereon; but that he took it for granted that, traveling at night, plaintiff wanted to use the Pullman cars. The tickets were—what the agent represented them to be—good for through railroad fare from Chester to Lancaster, and they were good for his railroad fare on the Pullman train which plaintiff wanted to take. There was nothing in the conduct of the gatekeeper at Washington which indicates indifference to plaintiff's rights. On the contrary, the gatekeeper, in order to save him the trouble and inconvenience of having to wait for another train, suggested the very course which reasonable prudence would have dictated to avoid the same, to wit, to pay the extra fare and proceed on his journey. In refusing plaintiff admittance to the train, he did no more than his duty in carrying out a reasonable rule of the company.

[3] This court has frequently said that the law will not presume willful violations of duty. The rule of conduct between men, in their dealings, is that of courtesy and due consideration for the rights of each other. Therefore, when one alleges that his rights have been willfully invaded, the burden is upon him to prove it. To sustain such a charge, reason and justice demand something more than mere surmise, conjecture, or caprice. Taylor v. Railroad Co., 78 S. C. 552, 59 S. E. 641; Crosby v. Railroad Co., 81 S. C. 24, 61 S. E. 1064; Baker v. Tel. Co., 84 S. C. 477, 66 S. E. 182, 137 Am. St. Rep. 848.

[4] We next consider what damages the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The rule is well settled, and it is supported by reason and the great weight of authority, that the duty rests upon one who is injured by the breach of a contract or the mere negligence of another to reasonably exert himself to avoid and to lessen the damages resulting therefrom; and such damages as may be avoided by the exercise of reasonable efforts, care, and prudence on his part cannot be said to be the proximate result of the other's delict. Therefore there can be no recovery for damages which might have been so avoided. The efforts required of the injured party must be determined by the rules of common sense and fair dealing, and they include a reasonable expenditure of money. Of course, if the person whose duty it is to make such effort shows reasonable grounds for his failure to do so, the rule must not apply. 8 A. & E. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 605; Willis v. Tel. Co., 69 S. C. 539, 48 S. E. 538, 104 Am. St. Rep. 828, 2 Ann. Cas. 52; Carter v. Railway, 75 S. C. 355, 55 S. E. 771; Campbell v. Railway, 83 S. C. 451, 65 S. E. 628, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1056, 137 Am. St. Rep. 824, and cases cited.

[5] It appears from the undisputed evidence that plaintiff could have averted all the damages and inconvenience which he alleges that he sustained by the payment of $5 for the Pullman accommodations, and the fact that he could do so was called to his attention by the gatekeeper at Washington. He presents no reason whatever why he did not do so, except that he preferred to stand upon his rights under the law. Therefore the plaintiff was entitled to recover no more than the sum of $5.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, unless the plaintiff remit all of the verdict in excess of $5 within 20 days after notice of the filing of the remittitur herein in the circuit court.

HARDAWAY v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 2, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 35*)—INTERSTATE REGULATIONS—FREIGHT—RATES.

Where a railroad company files and publishes a schedule of rates pursuant to the interstate commerce act, it is bound under penalty to collect as freight the rate applicable according to the classification of that act without regard to any agreement between the shipper and carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 94; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 200*)—FREIGHT—OVERCHARGE—RECOVERY.

A shipper could recover a freight charge which was in excess of the rate fixed by the schedule filed and of the rate agreed upon in the bill of lading.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 901-905; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 193*)—FREIGHT—RATES—AGREEMENT WITH INITIAL CARRIER—EFFECT ON CONNECTING CARRIER.

Unless a connecting carrier gave the initial carrier authority to fix the rate at which it would carry, it would not be bound by a rate quoted to a shipper by the initial carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 868; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

4. COURTS (§ 489*)—EXCLUSIVE AND CONCURRENT JURISDICTION—ACTIONS FOR OVERCHARGE BY CARRIER.

The complaint, in an action against a connecting carrier, alleged that plaintiff delivered lumber to the initial carrier, which was accepted by it as lumber, subject to tariff rates applicable to lumber, and that it issued a through bill of lading and agreed therein to transport the freight as lumber; that the rate and classification were expressly agreed upon before issuance of the bill of lading and delivery; that the regular rate on lumber was a certain sum, but that defendant refused to deliver the freight unless plaintiff paid a certain sum in excess of the rate and classification expressed in the bill of lading, and compelled plaintiff to pay such sum before delivering, though the classification and rate fixed were in conformity with the classification and rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. Held, that the action was at common law to recover an overcharge, and not under the interstate commerce act, so that, under Interstate Commerce Act Feb. 4, 1887, c. 104, § 22, 24 Stat. 387 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3170), providing that the act shall not abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law, or by statute, but shall be in addition thereto, the federal courts did not have exclusive jurisdiction of the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 1324; Dec. Dig. § 489.*]

5. COURTS (§ 489*)—STATE AND FEDERAL COURTS—JURISDICTION—INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The federal courts and Interstate Commerce Commission have exclusive jurisdiction of actions based upon the interstate commerce act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 489.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTIONS—PERFORMANCE ON OFFICIAL DUTY.

The Interstate Commerce Commission will be presumed to have directed the time, place, and manner of publication of rates as required by law; the burden being upon a carrier to show the contrary in an action involving an interstate shipment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against the terminal carrier to recover overcharges paid to obtain the goods, any error in admitting in evidence letters written to the shipper by the initial carrier quoting rates, and also a letter written after the controversy between plaintiff and defendant concerning the alleged overcharge, was harmless, where the same facts were conclusively shown by the schedule of rates, bill of lading, etc., especially where the court charged that the parties could not by agreement depart from the schedule of rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that, if plaintiff by fraud or mistake shipped a contractor's outfit as lumber, defendant properly collected the rate on the contractor's outfit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4161-4170; Dec. Dig. § 1051.*]

8. CARRIERS (§ 202*)—FREIGHT—RECOVERY OF OVERCHARGE—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action to recover the difference between the rate charged on a contractor's outfit and ordinary lumber, on the ground that the freight was really of the latter class, defendant's witnesses testified that the shipment should have been classified as a contractor's outfit, evidence was properly admitted that defendant had for a number of years carried similar timbers as lumber, especially where the jury were instructed that no agreement between the parties could make the shipment other than what it was.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 912; Dec. Dig. § 202.*]

9. CARRIERS (§ 189*)—FREIGHT—RATES—"STRUCTURE."

Raw material used to construct a machine or other structure, if resolved into its original elements as lumber, etc., could be shipped as such; but the machine or structure would be classified as a "structure."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6700-6702; vol. 8, p. 7806.]

10. PAYMENT (§ 82*)—RECOVERY—VOLUNTARY PAYMENT.

An action will not lie to recover money voluntarily paid with full knowledge of all the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 254-266; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

11. CARRIERS (§ 202*)—ACTION FOR OVERCHARGE—VARIANCE.

Where, in an action against a carrier to recover an overcharge, made by placing the freight in a higher classification than it properly took, the complaint alleged that defendant coerced payment of the higher rate by refusing to deliver the goods until it was paid, plaintiff cannot recover upon showing that the payment was made after delivery of the freight, but under a mistake as to the rate, or that the proper rate was intentionally concealed from him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 910; Dec. Dig. § 202.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Cherokee County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by B. H. Hardaway against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The complaint alleged that plaintiff delivered a lot of lumber to an initial carrier, which was accepted by it as lumber subject to the tariff rates applicable to lumber; that it issued a through bill of lading consigned to plaintiff, and thereby undertook to transport the freight as lumber; that, before the issuance of the bill of lading, the rate and classification of the freight were expressly agreed upon between the shipper, consignee, and carrier; that the regular rate for which plaintiff was liable was a certain sum; but that defendant compelled plaintiff to pay a greater sum before it would deliver the consignment to plaintiff, notwithstanding that the classification and rate were in conformity with the classification and rates filed by the Interstate Commerce Commission with the Railroad Commission of the state.

Sanders & De Pass, for appellant. Butler & Hall, for respondent.

HYDRICK, J. The facts out of which this action arose, briefly stated, are as follows: On December 5, 1908, plaintiff delivered to the Chattahoochee Valley Railway Company, at Langdale, Ala., two car loads of extra large and long timbers for transportation to Kings Creek, S. C. The shipment passed over the line of an intermediate carrier, and was delivered to defendant at Atlanta, Ga., and was carried by defendant to destination. The initial carrier issued a through bill of lading, in which the shipment was classed as lumber, and, according to plaintiff's testimony, the general manager of that road quoted plaintiff the rate on lumber from Langdale to Kings Creek before the shipment was delivered to it. For the service, defendant demanded at destination, and plaintiff paid, the rate on a contractor's outfit, which amounted to $143.92 more than the rate on lumber, and this action was brought to recover that amount. The defendant demurred to the jurisdiction of the court on the ground that the interstate commerce act vests in the Interstate Commerce Commission and the federal courts exclusive jurisdiction of actions to recover overcharges on interstate shipments. The court overruled the demurrer. The exceptions assigning error in doing so will be disposed of first.

There was no contention as to the reasonableness of the rate either on lumber or on a contractor's outfit. Nor did the plaintiff contend that defendant was bound by the classification of the shipment made in the bill of lading. But his contention was that he was made to pay the rate on a contractor's outfit, when the shipment actually consisted of lumber. The timbers had been parts of a derrick which plaintiff had used in his business, and holes had been bored in them for the insertion of iron pins and bolts in the construction of the derrick, and the ends of some of them had been rounded and banded with iron. But, according to plaintiff's testimony, he had been shipping such timbers for years as lumber, by agreement with the railroad companies—the defendant among them—the only condition being that all irons should be removed from them, which his testimony tended to show had been done in this instance, though it was contradicted by some of defendant's witnesses. Plaintiff's testimony also tended to show that when the irons were removed from the timbers, they were worth no more than so much new timber or raw material; that, whenever they were used again, they were reworked, and the old holes were not utilized; and that he would not have shipped them at the rate on a contractor's outfit, because it would have been cheaper for him to buy new timbers.

[1] There can be no doubt that, if the shipment was properly classed as a contractor's outfit, defendant was not only entitled to charge and collect the established rate on that class of freight, if it had proved the filing and publication of the schedule of rates in compliance with the interstate commerce act, but it was bound, under heavy penalty, to do so, and that without regard to any agreement between the shipper and the carrier as to the rate or classification whether stipulated in the bill of lading or not. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Hefley, 158 U. S. 98, 15 Sup. Ct. 802, 89 L. Ed. 910; Texas, etc., R. Co. v. Mugg, 202 U. S. 242, 26 Sup. Ct. 628, 50 L. Ed. 1011.

[2] On the contrary, if it was lumber, the defendant had no right to demand more than the schedule rate on lumber, and anything which plaintiff was required to pay in excess of that rate was an illegal and unwarranted exaction, which plaintiff had the right to recover, because such exaction was not only in violation of the law, but also of the contract alleged to have been made with plaintiff.

[3] There was testimony tending to show that the rate quoted plaintiff on lumber was the rate agreed upon between defendant and its connecting carriers in a joint schedule of rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and therefore that the initial carrier had authority under the common law to bind defendant in quoting the rate. Without proof of some authority given the initial carrier, the defendant would not have been bound even under the common law by the rate quoted the plaintiff by the initial carrier. Smith v. Southern Ry. Co., 89 S. C. 415, 71 S. E. 989. But there was no contention as to the correctness of the rate quoted on lumber or the rate collected on a contractor's outfit. The issue was: To which class did the shipment belong?

[4] Upon these facts and circumstances alleged in the complaint, and established prima facie, at least, by the testimony, it cannot be denied that plaintiff had a cause of action against defendant at common law; and the action is, in fact, brought under the common law, and not under the interstate commerce act, either for damages for violation of that act, or upon any right or cause of action created thereby. Therefore, by the express terms of that act, the jurisdiction therein conferred upon the commission and the federal courts is cumulative and not exclusive, for in section 22 we read: "Nothing in this act contained shall in any way abridge or alter the remedies now existing at common law or by statute, but the provisions of this act are in addition to such remedies." In M., K. & T. Ry. Co. v. New Era Milling Co., 79 Kan. 435, 100 Pac. 273, the Supreme Court of Kansas held that the state court had jurisdiction of an action to recover excessive charges on an interstate shipment when the plaintiff did not rely upon the interstate commerce act, but based his claims upon the principles of the common law. The same principle is held in Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Moore, 98 Tex. 302, 83 S. W. 362, 4 Ann. Cas. 770. In Judson on Interstate Commerce, § 44, the author says: "In suits brought for the enforcement of rights in interstate commerce, and not for the specific enforcement of the provisions of the interstate commerce act, or the anti-trust act, the state courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the federal courts. * * * The fact that interstate commerce is beyond state legislative control does not ipso facto prevent the courts of the state from exercising jurisdiction over cases growing out of that commerce." Again, at section 248, he says: "The exclusiveness of the jurisdiction over suits brought under these remedial sections of the act to enforce its provisions must be distinguished from the concurrent jurisdiction of the state court over the questions in interstate commerce not arising or based upon the act."

The allegation in the complaint in this action that the classification and rate agreed upon and stipulated in the bill of lading were in conformity with the classification and rate filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission was not made to bring the action under the interstate commerce act, but to lay the foundation to recover the penalty provided by the statute of this state against carriers for failing to settle their freight charges according to the rate stipulated in the bill of lading, provided the rate therein stipulated is in conformity with the classification and rate filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission (24 Stat. 81); and therein lies the difference between our statute and the statute of Texas, which was held in the Hefley Case, supra, to be in conflict with the state commerce act, because it undertook to compel the carrier to settle according to the rate stipulated in the bill of lading, regardless of whether it was the rate filed with the commission or not.

In Texas & Pac. Ry. Co. v. Abilene Cotton Oil Co., 204 U. S. 426, 27 Sup. Ct. 350, 51 L. Ed. 553, 9 Ann. Cas. 1075, the oil company sued the railroad company in the state court to recover an amount alleged to have been charged and collected on interstate shipments in excess of a reasonable rate. The rate collected by the carrier was that stated in the schedule of rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and published according to the requirements of the interstate commerce act. The question was whether the state had jurisdiction to grant relief upon the finding that the rate charged was unreasonable. The Supreme Court of the United States held that it did not, and rested its conclusion upon the ground that, if jurisdiction were conceded to the state courts in such cases, it might prove destructive of the act, the main object of which was to establish just and reasonable rates and to prevent unjust preferences and discriminations, because, said the court, the diversity of decision in the courts as to what rates are reasonable might result in establishing the very preferences and discriminations which the act was designed to prevent. Therefore the only reasonable and logical conclusion was, as is clearly and cogently pointed out in the opinion, that the courts had no jurisdiction to determine the reasonableness of a rate, in anticipation of the action of the commission. We see nothing in the Abilene Case which is inconsistent with the jurisdiction of the state court in this case, for clearly there is not in this case any question as to the reasonableness of any rate. On the contrary, we find in that case a clear intimation in support of the jurisdiction of the state court in a case like this. In discussing the provisions of section 22 of the interstate commerce act, hereinbefore quoted, after having pointed out that the concessions of jurisdiction in the courts to determine the reasonableness of a rate would be destructive of the act, the court said: "This clause (i. e., section 22), however, cannot in reason be construed as continuing in shippers a common-law right, the continued existence of which would be absolutely inconsistent with the provisions of the act. In other words, the act cannot be held to destroy itself. The clause is concerned alone with rights recognized in or duties imposed by the act, and the manifest purpose of the provision in question was to make plain the intention that any specific remedy given by the act should be regarded as cumulative, when other appropriate common-law or statutory remedies existed for the redress of the particular grievance or wrong dealt with in the act. Having concluded that the commission alone had power originally to entertain proceedings to alter an established rate, the court said: "It is unnecessary for us to consider whether the court below would have had jurisdiction to afford relief, if the right asserted had not been repugnant to the provisions of the act to regulate commerce." So the question involved in this case was neither involved nor decided in that case.

In the Hefley Case the facts were these: The rate fixed by the carrier in the bill of lading for an interstate shipment was less than the rate established, filed with the Interstate Commission, and published, as required by the act of Congress. The carrier demanded and collected the established rate. The shipper sued in the state court and recovered judgment against the carrier for a penalty provided by the statute of the state of Texas against the carrier for charging more than the rate fixed in the bill of lading. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment of the state court, holding that the state statute was in conflict with the interstate commerce law, which penalized the carrier if it failed to collect the schedule rate, and, as the two statutes were in conflict, the state law must yield. In the Mugg Case, the carrier quoted the shipper, at the point of shipment, a rate on an interstate shipment, which was less than the schedule rate. At destination, the carrier exacted the schedule rate. The shipper sued in the state court and recovered judgment against the carrier for the excess of the schedule rate over the rate quoted. Following the Hefley Case, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment of the state court, holding that the carrier was bound, under the interstate law, to collect the schedule rate, which was binding on both carrier and shipper. We fail to see wherein the principle decided in either of these cases militates against our position, because the rate alleged to have been agreed upon in this case was the schedule rate for lumber, and the rate collected was the schedule rate for a contractor's outfit. There was therefore no issue about the rates, but only as to the classification. In neither the Hefley Case nor the Mugg Case was there any intimation that the state court had no jurisdiction of an action to recover a charge in excess of the schedule rate; but in each it was held that the state court erred in its decision of the question involved on the merits. While it does not appear that the question of jurisdiction was raised in either of those cases, yet it can hardly be supposed that both the state court and the Supreme Court of the United States would have overlooked so important a question and have decided the cases on the merits, unless it had been supposed that the state courts had jurisdiction. A case involving a right similar to the one involved in this case was decided on the merits by the Supreme Court of Alabama (Sou. Ry. Co. v. Harrison, 119 Ala. 539, 24 South. 552, 43 L. R. A. 385, 72 Am. St. Rep. 936), and the opinion of the Alabama court was adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Mugg Case. Jurisdiction of similar cases has been assumed by the courts of Texas. Railway Co. v. Lumber Co., 1 Tex. Civ. App. 553, 21 S. W. 290; Railway Co. v. Stoner, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 50, 23 S. W. 1020. These cases afford an argument by implication at least in favor of our conclusion.

[5] Numerous cases hold, we think correctly, that the federal courts and the Interstate Commerce Commission have exclusive jurisdiction of actions based upon the interstate commerce act, or brought to enforce a right created by that act. Van Patten v. Chicago, etc., R. Co. (C. C.) 74 Fed. 981; Edmunds v. Illinois Central R. Co. (C. C.) 80 Fed. 78; Carlisle v. Missouri, etc., R. Co., 168 Mo. 652, 68 S. W. 898; Copp v. L. & N. R. Co., 43 La. Ann. 511, 9 South. 441, 12 L. R. A. 725, 26 Am. St. Rep. 198. In some of the cases the broad statement is made that the state courts have no jurisdiction of actions to recover overcharges in the rates on interstate shipments; but an examination of these cases discloses the fact that the cause of action was created by or the action was based upon the interstate commerce act, or the word "overcharge" was used in the sense of an unreasonable charge. And whatever doubts may have existed as to the lack of jurisdiction in the state courts to determine whether an interstate rate is unreasonable, they were dispelled by the decision in the Abilene Cotton Oil Company's Case. But the word "overcharge" is also used in some of the cases to mean a charge in excess of "that which is established in the schedule rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and published as required by the interstate commerce act." We see no reason why the state court should not have jurisdiction of an action to recover such an overcharge, because the exaction of it is a violation not only of the interstate law, but of the contract of the carrier with the shipper, and it is a wrong for which the common law affords a remedy, and such remedy is, as we have seen, expressly preserved by the terms of the interstate commerce act. Moreover, the enforcement of the rights of the shipper and of the carrier in regard to such an overcharge does not in any manner conflict with the interstate law. In Banner v. Wabash R. Co., 131 Iowa, 405, 108 N. W. 759, the plaintiff was required to pay an arbitrary charge made by the carrier, because he shipped 16 head of cattle in an emigrant car, when the rules of the carrier fixing the rate limited the number to be shipped in such car to 10, and provided that the freight on animals in excess of that number should be at a certain rate, and established an arbitrary weight on which the computation should be made. There was nothing in the schedule of rates or classification filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission authorizing a charge for such arbitrary weight. The Supreme Court of Iowa held that the state court had jurisdiction of an action to recover the amount so paid by plaintiff; the suit not being one to recover an overcharge under the interstate commerce act, but to recover a wholly unjust and unauthorized exaction demanded and collected not only in violation of the act itself, but in violation of the contract made with the plaintiff, and therefore in violation of the common law.

In Wabash R. Co. v. Sloop, 200 Mo. 198, 98 S. W. 607, the Supreme Court of Missouri held that the state court had jurisdiction of an action by a shipper to recover an amount collected by a carrier on an interstate shipment in excess of the rate agreed upon between the carrier and the shipper, notwithstanding the carrier had filed its schedule of rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and notwithstanding the rate collected was the schedule rate. The ground upon which the court based its decision was that the carrier did not prove that it had published the schedule of rates as required by the interstate law. The court held that the carrier was bound to show that it had brought itself within the purview of the act by compliance therewith before it would be allowed to base any defense upon its provisions. The same ruling was made in Railroad v. Leatherwood, 29 Tex. Civ. App. 507, 69 S. W. 121, and in Railroad v. Horne, 108 Tenn. 73, 59 S. W. 134. The principle upon which these cases were decided, if applied in this case, would be decisive in favor of the jurisdiction of the state court, because the defendant failed to prove that its schedule of rates was published in accordance with the requirements of the interstate commerce act. This being a case of a joint schedule of rates between connecting carriers engaged in interstate transportation, the act required its publication at such time and place and in such manner as the commission might require. There was no evidence of any direction as to its publication by the commission, and of compliance therewith by the defendant.

[6] The commission will be presumed to have done its duty and directed the time and place and manner of publication, and the burden was on defendant to show compliance therewith. Wabash R. Co. v. Sloop, supra; Railroad v. Horne. While the reasoning in favor of the conclusion reached in those cases is not without force, we prefer to rest our conclusion that the circuit court had jurisdiction upon the ground that this action is not brought under or based upon the interstate commerce act, but upon the principles of the common law, and the remedies afforded thereby have been expressly preserved by the interstate commerce law; and because the enforcement of the rights of the parties in such cases by the state courts will in no way conflict with the interstate law, or tend to destroy the uniformity which it was designed to establish, any more than the decision of the same questions by the federal courts.

To hold that the state courts have no jurisdiction of actions like this will result in so much inconvenience and be so injurious in its consequences to the citizens of the states, and will place them so completely at the mercy of interstate carriers with regard to the settlement of such claims, that the argument in favor of that conclusion should be more cogent and convincing than it is to induce its adoption. The practical result of requiring shippers to go before the Interstate Commerce Commission or into the federal courts to collect these small claims will be to compel the abandonment of them altogether. We feel sure that Congress did not contemplate or intend any such result, and, in the absence of such intent, plainly expressed in or necessarily to be inferred from the provisions of the act, we are not inclined to adopt a construction which will lead to that result.

[7] The next assignment of error is in admitting in evidence two letters written to plaintiff by J. A. Avery, the general manager of the Chattahoochee Valley Railway Company, the initial carrier, and in allowing plaintiff's agent, Jamison, to testify as to the rates quoted him by Mr. Avery. The first letter is dated November 26, 1908, and was written before the shipment was delivered to the initial carrier. It quoted rates on lumber and a contractor's outfit from Langdale to Kings Creek. The other is dated September 2, 1909, and was written after the controversy had arisen between plaintiff and defendant about the alleged overcharge. In this letter Mr. Avery states that on November 26, 1909, he quoted plaintiff rates, and gives the rates quoted. He also states that the shipment was billed out by his road as lumber, and at the rate on lumber, and that the rate was raised beyond his line, and the rate on a contractor's outfit used. We deem it unnecessary to consider in detail the numerous grounds upon which the objection to this testimony was made, because it is apparent that there was no dispute about the facts which it tended to prove, and that they were conclusively proved by indisputably competent evidence—the rates by the schedule of rates, filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the billing of the initial carrier by its bill of lading and the waybill, all of which were in evidence. Moreover, the court clearly and correctly charged the jury that the parties could not, by any agreement or device, vary or depart from the schedule of rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission; and that, if plaintiff, by fraud or mistake, shipped a contractor's outfit as lumber, it was the right and duty of defendant to make the proper correction and collect the rate on a contractor's outfit, but, if the shipment was, in fact, lumber, defendant had no right to collect the higher rate; and hence an important inquiry for them was whether the shipment was lumber or a contractor's outfit. So that, even if we were to concede, which we do not, that the testimony was erroneously admitted, it is clear that the error was harmless.

[8] There was no error in admitting evidence that for some years defendant had been carrying the same and similar timbers as lumber. There was nothing in such testimony which tended to vary the schedule rate, but it merely tended to prove the opinion previously held by defendant's agents and experts as to the real nature of the shipment which was necessarily a subject for opinion; and therefore defendant's experts were allowed to testify that, in their opinion, the shipment should have been classed as a contractor's outfit. Therefore it was clearly competent to prove that for some years past defendant's agents and experts had entertained a different opinion, which was evidenced by the fact that the same and similar timbers had been carried by defendant as lumber; and hence that defendant's present contention was not well founded. There was therefore no error in the instruction that the jury might, in determining the real nature of the shipment, consider how similar shipments had been regarded and dealt with by the parties themselves—especially as the jury were cautioned that no device or agreement or custom of dealing between the parties could avail to make the shipment other than what it really was, and that they must determine its real character.

[9] The court charged, in substance, that if raw materials were used to construct a machine, or other structure, and if such machine or structure were shipped, it would be subject to its proper classification and rate; but, if it were resolved into its original elements, these might be shipped as such, each being subject to its original classification, notwithstanding it had once been a part of a machine or other structure. The idea was illustrated by telling the jury that if raw materials, lumber, etc., were used to construct a house, and if the house were afterwards torn down and resolved into its original elements, that which was lumber might be shipped as lumber. We see no error in this instruction. Certainly, the fact that materials have at one time been used for a certain purpose or in a particular way does not irrevocably devote them to that purpose or to be used in that way and no other. We see no reason why a cable which has been used in connection with and as part of a derrick, or other machine, should not be classed as a cable for transportation, when it has been disconnected from the derrick or machine.

[10] The defendant asked the court to direct the verdict in its favor on the ground, among others, that the money paid on account of the alleged overcharge could not be recovered, because the payment was voluntary. This request was refused. It is an elementary principle that no action will lie to recover money voluntarily paid with full knowledge of all the facts. Robinson v. City Council, 2 Rich. 317, 45 Am. Dec. 739; Kenneth & Gibson v. S. C. R. Co., 15 Rich. 234, 98 Am. Dec. 382. The grounds upon which this principle of law is based are so fully stated and clearly reasoned in the cases cited that we deem it unnecessary to prolong this opinion by any further discussion of them. The general rule is thus succinctly stated in 30 Cyc. 1298: "Except where otherwise provided by statute, a party cannot by direct action, or by way of set-off or counterclaim, recover money voluntarily paid with a full knowledge of all the facts, and without any fraud, duress, or extortion, although no obligation to make such payment existed."

It follows that, when one undertakes to recover money which he has paid to another, he must allege and prove some fact or facts which will take his case out of the general rule above stated; otherwise his complaint would be subject to demurrer for insufficiency. Plaintiff recognized this, because he alleges in his complaint that defendant coerced the payment of the alleged overcharge by refusing to deliver his goods until it was paid. We have searched the record diligently without being able to find any evidence tending to prove this allegation. On the contrary, it appears that the money was paid after the shipment was delivered to plaintiff. In their argument upon this point, respondent's attorneys make no attempt to point out any evidence tending to support the allegation of the complaint that the payment was made under compulsion. They do attempt to show some testimony from which it might be inferred that the money was paid under the mistaken assumption or belief that the amount charged by defendant was the rate on lumber; or, because it was difficult to figure the correct amount from the data at hand, that the payment was made under mistake or ignorance of all the facts. They also argue that it is inferable from the testimony that the change of the rate was concealed from plaintiff, and hence that there was a fraudulent concealment of facts.

[11] If we concede that such inferences might be drawn, we do not see how this can help the plaintiff, for unfortunately there is no allegation of any such facts or grounds of recovery in the complaint. The purpose of pleading is to advise the parties of the issues which they will be called upon to meet at the trial. It would violate one of the fundamental rules of law and pleading to allow the plaintiff to recover upon a different ground from that alleged. It is elementary that the allegata and probata must correspond. We are constrained to hold that on this ground the verdict should have been directed for defendant, and therefore the judgment below must be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

LIPMAN v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. COMMERCE (§ 85*)—COURTS (§ 489*)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—JURISDICTION ON STATE COURTS.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has jurisdiction to determine the number of miles between points in different states and the fare to be charged, and, where the commission makes a mistake in a schedule of rates adopted by it, a state court is without jurisdiction to change the schedule, though it is inconsistent with the statutes of the two states.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 138; Dec. Dig. § 85; Courts, Dec. Dig. § 489.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 382*)—EJECTION OF PASSENGERS—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

A passenger ejected by the conductor without unnecessary force because of the refusal to pay the proper fare demanded was not entitled to punitive damages.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Hampton County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by S. P. Lipman against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. De Loach and W. S. Tillinghast, for appellant. Simeon Hyde and James W. Moore, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an action for actual and punitive damages, alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, through the wrongful acts of the defendant, in ejecting him from its train of cars, on account of his refusal to pay the amount of the fare, demanded for his passage. The allegations of the complaint, material to the questions under consideration, are as follows: "That on the 13th day of September, 1906, the plaintiff above named, at Ridgeland, a station on defendant's road, in Hampton county, S. C., boarded one of defendant's passenger trains known as train No. 85, same going from Charleston, S. C., to Savannah, Ga., with the intention and purpose of becoming a passenger upon said train, having the money with which to pay his fare thereon, and plaintiff did become such passenger, and as such passenger he did offer and tender to the said defendant the fare in money, the sum of $1.05, being 3 cents per mile, the legal rate per mile as published by defendant for his passage and transportation (said tender and offer being made in Hampton county, S. C.) from the said station at Ridgeland to Savannah, Ga., but the said defendant, at the said time and place, not only refused and declined to accept the lawful fare so offered and tendered by plaintiff, but in a rude and threatening manner demanded of plaintiff an unlawful and excessive fare, to wit, the sum of $1.15, before it would transport him to his destination, which said unlawful fare this plaintiff refused to pay, and upon his refusal the defendant did willfully, unlawfully, and intentionally and with force eject the said plaintiff from the said train, at a place about two miles from Ridgeland, in Hampton county, S. C., and there and then the conductor of the said train by the rough, rude, and angry manner in which he ejected this plaintiff, greatly humiliated plaintiff, and offensively insulted him while forcibly ejecting plaintiff from defendant's said passenger train." The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and interposed the following defense: "That at the time named in the complaint, the plaintiff offered himself as a passenger on one of defendant's trains for interstate passage and transportation, that is to say, from Ridgeland, in Hampton county, S. C., to Savannah, Ga., and that the amount of fare or passage money, fixed according to law by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States for said carriage and transportation, is the sum of $1.15, and that this defendant was by law entitled to charge such plaintiff for such carriage and transportation the said sum of $1.15." At the close of the testimony the defendant's attorney made a motion for the direction of a verdict on the grounds stated in said defense, and upon the further ground that the testimony shows that the ejection was made by the conductor in the line of his duty, and without unnecessary force. The motion was granted, and the plaintiff appealed to this court.

The pivotal question is whether the rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission is applicable to this case.

The plaintiff testified as follows: "Q. Now, Mr. Lipman, do you know, of your own knowledge, what the legal rate charged in Georgia was? A. At that time, three cents a mile, same as in South Carolina. Q. Was there anything else that you know of that you desire to state? A. I would like to state, for the information of the judge and jury, that the milepost is a quarter of a mile north of Ridgeland, saying to Savannah 38 miles, where they charge for 40 miles. The milepost at Central Junction is 7 miles. From there we go to Union Station a distance of about 4 miles. Still the distance we travel is not 7 miles, as indicated by the milepost at Central Junction. That is the old milepost that was there, at the time when the Atlantic Coast Line ran into the old Bowling Street Station, but now they have changed from the old Bowling Street Station, to the Union Street Station, which is a distance of about $3\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile, 3 or 4 miles. After you leave the Central Junction, there is only one more milepost there. That is the old route that they used to travel. Q. When was it that they changed that route? A. They went into the Savannah Union Station on the 1st day of May, 1902. Q. Was that by what they call the short route? A. That is the short route now."

The defendant's attorney introduced in evidence the following certificate:

"Interstate Commerce Commission, Office of the Secretary, Washington. Edward A. Moseley, Secretary. I, Edward A. Moseley, secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, do hereby certify that the sheet hereto attached, contains a true and correct extract from Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company Local Passenger Fares 1 C. C. No. A-86, reading as effective July 1, 1904, in effect on September 13, 1906, filed with the said Interstate Commerce Commission on June 29, 1904. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said commission this 28th day of June, A. D. 1909. [Signed] Edw. A. Moseley, Secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"Extract from Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company Local Passenger Fares 1 C. C. No. A-86, page 71: Between Ridgeland, S. C. and Savannah, Ga., distance 39.0, 1st-class fare, $1.15."

[1] Prior to 1902, the distance between the stations at Ridgeland and Savannah was 39 miles; but at that time the station at Savannah was changed, thereby making the distance between Ridgeland and Savannah only 34 miles. Thereafter, to wit, on the 29th of June, 1904, the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission its rates for local passenger fares, which was approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and became effective on the 1st of July, 1904, and was of force at the time when the plaintiff was refused passage, to wit, the 13th day of September, 1906. In the said schedule of rates, the distance between Ridgeland, S. C., and Savannah, Ga., was stated to be 39 miles, and the fare to be $1.15. Since the approval of said schedule of rates by the Interstate Commerce Commission, there has been no change either in the distance between Ridgeland and Savannah, or in the amount of the fare. The commission had the right to determine the number of miles, as well as the fare that should be charged. The state courts are without jurisdiction to determine whether the fare charged for the number of miles traveled was unreasonable. Texas, etc., v. Abilene Oil Co., 204 U. S. 426, 27 Sup. Ct. 350, 51 L. Ed. 553, 9 Ann. Cas. 1075; Bilitch Co. v. Railroad, 87 S. C. 107, 69 S. E. 16; Hardaway v. Railroad, 73 S. E. 1020. If the commission made a mistake, the state court is without jurisdiction to change the schedule of rates adopted by the commission. The rate per mile prescribed by the statutes of South Carolina and Georgia is inconsistent with the rate approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and therefore is ineffectual in this case. In this respect the case now under consideration is different from Bilitch Co. v. Railroad, 87 S. C. 107, 69 S. E. 16, and Hardaway v. Railroad, 73 S. E. 1020. The exceptions raising this question are overruled.

[2] The exceptions assigning error on the part of his honor the presiding judge in ruling that there was no testimony tending to show that the plaintiff was entitled to punitive damages are also overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

JONES v. DEVEREAUX.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 231*)—EXCEPTIONS TO ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

An exception to the admission of evidence over a general objection will be overruled on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1299; Dec. Dig. § 231.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 233*)—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

Where the court admitted evidence over objection and stated that after the evidence was in the party could make an objection and the court would pass on it, and there was no further objection, the ruling on the evidence was not reviewable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—REVIEW—EXCEPTIONS NOT ARGUED.

An exception not argued will not be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 251*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

Where the attorney for defendant in his argument stated that the difference between the parties was the location of a corner, and plaintiff's attorney admitted in his argument that the sole issue was over the location of a dividing line, a charge that the question at issue was a question of location was not erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 587-595; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 44*)—CONTINUITY—ACTS CONSTITUTING.

One asserting title by adverse possession and maintaining open, notorious, and adverse possession for 10 years from the date of his entry into possession under his deed, acquires title by adverse possession, and he need not show that his possession was continuous against one and the same person during such period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 226-231; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by R. O. Jones against J. F. Devereaux. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Walter Green, for appellant. Frank G. Tompkins, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. The plaintiff alleges that he is the owner of the land described in the complaint, upon which the defendant has trespassed, for which he demands damages, and seeks equitable relief by way of injunction to prevent further trespasses. The defendant answered the complaint, setting forth his sources of title, and claiming title by adverse possession. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff with damages, and the defendant appealed upon exceptions, the first of which is as follows: "That his honor erred in admitting the testimony of G. McD. Hampton as to an alleged agreement between the defendant and one Mrs. Williams, the error being that the plaintiff was neither a party nor a privy to said agreement, said agreement not having been against the interest of defendant, and being an attempt to prove title by parol."

[1] When the plaintiff's attorney offered to introduce the agreement in evidence, the defendant's attorney merely said, "I object," but did not interpose the grounds of objection mentioned in the exception. This exception is therefore overruled.

[2] The second exception is as follows: "That his honor erred in admitting in evidence a plat of the lands of Mrs. Williams (Exhibit C), the same being no part of plaintiff's chain of title." The record contains this statement: "Mr. Tompkins: We offer in evidence plat of Chisolm dated June, 1892, marked 'Exhibit D.' Mr. Green: I object; nothing to do with his chain of title. The Court: I cannot tell what papers are relevant, and what are not. When you go to discuss the evidence, after all the papers are in, you can then make your objections, and I will pass on them." The record fails to show that his honor the presiding judge was thereafter requested to rule upon said objection.

[3] The third exception was not argued, and therefore will not be considered.

[4] The fourth exception is as follows: "That his honor erred in charging the jury that the question at issue 'is what we call in law a question of location,' the error being the issue between plaintiff and defendant was the title to the land in dispute." In his argument the appellant's attorney says: "The paper title of plaintiff to the tract described in his deed was admitted, as was the title of the defendant to the tract described in his deed. * * * The difference between plaintiff and defendant is the location of the Haskell corner." The respondent's attorney also admits in his argument that "the sole question in dispute was over the location of the dividing line." There was therefore no error in said ruling.

[5] The fifth exception is as follows: "That his honor erred in refusing defendant's fourth request to charge, being submitted to his honor as follows: 'If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant entered into possession of the land in dispute, at the date of his deed (1892), and maintained open, notorious, and adverse possession of the same up to the commencement of this suit (1907), they must find for the defendant.' The error being that the request as submitted was a correct proposition of law applicable to the case. And in charging the jury: 'As written here, it is technically correct, but I am explaining adverse possession; if the plaintiff in this action came into possession less than 10 years, that possession does not apply to him.'" His honor the presiding judge seems to have entertained the opinion that it was not only necessary for the party, asserting title by adverse possession, to show that the possession by him was continuous for 10 years, but that it was also continuous against one and the same person, during that period. We do not deem it necessary to cite authorities to show that the ruling of his honor the presiding judge was erroneous.

The sixth exception is as follows: "That his honor erred in refusing to charge defendant's fifth request to charge, which was submitted to him as follows: 'If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant was in possession of the land claiming them as his own for more than 10 years prior to the purchase by the plaintiff (1905) and maintained such possession up to the commencement of this suit (1907), they must find for the defendant.' The error being that the request as submitted was a correct proposition of law applicable to the case. And his honor erred in charging he must maintain adverse possession against the true owner for the whole period of 10 years, the same man." In refusing to charge the request herein, the circuit judge used language similar to that used by him in refusing the request embodied in the fifth exception, and what has just been said disposes of this exception.

Judgment reversed, and case remanded for a new trial

SURASKY et al. v. WEINTRAUB et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 6, 1912.)

1. TRUSTS (§ 72*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—PAYMENT OF CONSIDERATION FOR CONVEYANCE TO ANOTHER.

A resulting trust is not dependent upon the agreement of parties, but arises by operation of law when money of one person is used in the purchase of land and title is made to another, whereupon he who is vested with the legal title becomes a trustee and cannot hold the land against the person whose money was used in paying therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 102, 103; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

2. TRUSTS (§ 63½*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—NATURE.

The doctrine of resulting trusts has no application when there is an express agreement between the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 92; Dec. Dig. § 63½.*]

3. MORTGAGES (§ 37*)—ABSOLUTE DEED AS MORTGAGE—PAROL EVIDENCE.

Parol evidence is admissible to show that a deed absolute on its face was intended as security for a loan.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 98; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

4. TRUSTS (§ 63½*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—TIME OF CREATION.

A resulting trust must be coeval with the deed under which it arises, and cannot arise from subsequent transactions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 91, 92; Dec. Dig. § 63½.*]

5. TRUSTS (§ 80*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—LOAN OF PURCHASE MONEY.

Where one person lends money to another to be used in the purchase of land, no resulting trust arises in favor of the lender in the land purchased, title to which is taken in the borrower's name, though it was agreed that the interest in the land should vest in the lender to the extent of his loans, especially where the borrower and lender are both liable under a mortgage executed by them in favor of the vendor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

6. TRUSTS (§ 63½*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—PAROL EVIDENCE—EXPRESS AGREEMENT.

Though a resulting trust may be established by parol evidence, when the proposed testimony shows an agreement beyond what the law would imply it is inconsistent with a resulting trust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. § 63½.*]

7. TRUSTS (§ 86*)—RESULTING TRUSTS—PAYMENT OF CONSIDERATION FOR CONVEYANCE TO ANOTHER—PRESUMPTION.

Though a resulting trust arises in favor of one who pays the purchase money of an estate and takes title in the name of another because of the presumption that he who pays for a thing intends a beneficial interest therein for himself, this presumption cannot arise when a contrary intent appears.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

8. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 83*)—LAND—EQUITABLE MORTGAGE—CREATION.

Where plaintiffs and defendant agreed to purchase land, plaintiffs to advance defendant a portion of the purchase money, and defendant agreeing that, though he is to take legal title to his portion, the plaintiffs may hold it as security for their advance, no equitable mortgage on defendant's share is created in view of the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

9. SUBROGATION (§ 23*)—PAYMENT OF MORTGAGE.

Plaintiffs and defendant having executed a purchase-money mortgage to the vendors, plaintiffs are entitled to be subrogated to the interest of the grantors under the mortgage to the extent of defendant's share of the debt secured by such mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Subrogation, Cent. Dig. §§ 60-66; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

Gary, C. J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Aiken County; R. W. Memminger, Judge. "To be officially reported."

Action by Hyman Charles Surasky and others against Charles Weintraub and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Modified.

The complaint alleged for a first cause of action that the four plaintiffs and defendant Charles Weintraub entered into an agreement that they would jointly purchase a tract of land from defendants M. M. Coward and T. F. Coward; each party stipulating to pay one-fifth of the purchase price as his individual share of the indebtedness, and the deed to be taken in the names of all the parties to the agreement. In pursuance of the agreement, the parties purchased the tract for $5,000, payable $500 at the time of purchase, and $500 annually thereafter with interest at 7 per cent., payable annually. Thereupon a deed was executed conveying the land in fee simple. Previous to and at the time of sale, defendant Weintraub had informed his cotenants that he had no funds to pay his portion of the price, but agreed that if they would advance his portion he would pay the same whenever it became due according to the agreement with the grantors, and to secure his cotenants agreed that, while the legal title to the one-fifth part of the premises was to be taken in his name, it should be their property until he fully paid his part of the price, and he would hold it for their benefit and protection in consideration of their advancing his portion of the price. Plaintiffs, relying upon these representations and agreement, paid to the Cowards the entire portion of the purchase money due by defendant Weintraub, and the deed to the premises was delivered conveying the tract to all the parties as joint tenants, each owning one-fifth part thereof. The parties executed a bond secured by a mortgage of the premises on payment of $500 in cash for the balance of the purchase money, payable $500 cash on delivery of the deed and $500 annually thereafter on the 1st day of January of each year. Defendant Weintraub has paid no part of the debt to his cotenants, but the plaintiffs have from time to time paid the entire portion of the debt due by defendant Weintraub, and there is now due for moneys thus advanced, together with the principal of his debt, the sum of $298.11. The plaintiffs allege that by reason of these facts and circumstances a trust results in favor of plaintiffs for the full amount and should be so declared by the court, and the defendant directed to convey by deed in fee simple his one-fifth part to the plaintiffs. There appears on the record in the office of the clerk of court a mortgage by the plaintiffs and defendant Weintraub to M. M. and T. F. Coward, such mortgage constituting a lien on the tract referred to, and they are therefore necessary parties to the action.

For a second cause of action, the complaint alleges that the plaintiffs entered into an agreement with defendant Weintraub to employ him as general manager at a salary of $25 per month; his duties being to control in general the cultivation and harvesting of all crops on the tract mentioned and to keep the place in good order, the machinery in repair, and to oversee labor and perform all other duties to properly cultivate the land. The other parties were to advance all money needed for labor, material, etc., in raising, cultivating, and harvesting the crops; such expenses to be shared equally between the parties, that is, each to pay one-fifth part thereof, and all profits, if any, to be divided equally between them. Pursuant to such agreement, the plaintiffs advanced $1,130.82; a portion thereof being due by defendant Weintraub as his one-fifth part. The plaintiffs allege that no part of this indebtedness has been paid by defendant except $125 paid by direction of the defendant, that his salary of $25 per month be credited thereon, and that there is still due the sum of $101.15.

J. B. Salley, for appellants. Croft & Croft, for respondents.

GARY, C. J. The complaint sets forth five causes of action. The first seeks to have a resulting trust declared in certain lands, and the second is for an accounting. The others are not involved in this appeal. His honor the circuit judge who heard the case ruled that there was a resulting trust in favor of the plaintiffs, under the first cause of action, but that under the second cause of action nothing was due the plaintiffs, for the reason that they applied the salary of the defendant Weintraub for superintending the farming operations, in payment of his proportionate part of the expenses. The defendant Weintraub appealed upon exceptions, which will be reported, except the first, which was withdrawn.

The main question in the case is whether his honor the circuit judge erred in ruling that there was a resulting trust in favor of the plaintiffs. In the first place, the facts alleged in the first and second causes of action (which will be reported) show that the money advanced by the plaintiffs to Weintraub was a loan, and that there was error in declaring a resulting trust. In the second place, the testimony of the plaintiffs themselves is to the same effect.

The plaintiff Samuel Surasky testified as follows: "Q. When that day came and you purchased this land, and $500 was due, what was said about Mr. Charles Weintraub paying his part of the $500 on the day it was purchased? A. He agreed to give us his one-fifth interest in the place, for us to pay out the money until he could pay it back. * * * Q. Did you or did you not agree to let the title go in the name, in that same agreement? A. At first we agreed to do it, and we had to hold it for the debt, until he paid for it. * * * Q. At the time the place was purchased, when he agreed to let you have his one-fifth interest, until he paid you back, was any time agreed on, when he should pay you for the money advanced? A. Yes, sir; he agreed we shall pay his one-fifth, and he will pay back in January, 1909." On cross-examination he testified: "Q. As I understand you, that agreement was that the title should be made out to all five of you, but with the understanding that his share or one-fifth interest should stand good for whatever moneys you advanced to pay his part? A. It was no understanding; he agreed that we shall keep it, until he pays his one-fifth part. Q. It was to protect you from losing what money you advanced for his share? A. We agreed we should keep that, for the money we paid the Cowards, until he paid us back. Q. And the title was made to him and all of you? A. Yes, the five. * * * Q. You say he was to pay you back that first payment, on the following January, 1909? A. Yes, sir. Q. When was he to pay you back what you advanced for him? A. In January, 1909, his part of the interest then due. Q. In January, 1910? A. No, he said in 1909, when he came to the payment, he said he agreed for us to keep it, he didn't have any money, but we should carry it on. Q. When did he say he would pay you back what you advanced to the Cowards, his part of the interest then due? A. He said he would try to pay it, in January, 1910, but he did not. Q. In January, 1910, when you made this payment to the Cowards, did you talk with him then about advancing his share? A. We wrote to him to come at once. Q. Did he come? A. No, sir. Q. You advanced the installment in 1910, without his coming or without his writing about it? A. Yes, sir."

Hyman Surasky testified as follows: "Q. What agreement, if any, did you make with Mr. Weintraub about furnishing his money? A. Before we bought the place, we asked him if he had his money to pay his share. He said he had some debts owing him, and some stock of goods, but he had none then, but would have it by January 1st, but could not get it now, but he agreed to let us pay Mr. Coward his fifth, and let us hold his share until he paid." On cross-examination he testified: "Q. As I understand, Mr. Weintraub agreed that his one-fifth interest in the property should be as security for the money you advanced to pay his share? A. We said it should belong to us until he paid it. Q. Why was title made out to him, as well as to you all? A. Well, I believe that the agreement was, we knew that he had money owing to him, and we fully trusted him, that he would pay on January 1, 1909, his part. Q. How much money in goods did he say he had owing to him, with which he could pay you back, on January 1st his part? A. Between $200 and $300."

[1] A resulting trust is not dependent upon the agreement of parties, but arises by operation of law whenever the money of one person is used in the purchase of land, and the title is made to another. He who is vested with the legal title becomes a trustee, and cannot hold the land against the person whose money was used in paying for the land.

[2, 3] The doctrine of resulting trusts has no application, when there is an express agreement between the parties; and parol evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that a deed, though absolute on its face, was intended as security for a loan. Brownlee v. Martin, 21 S. C. 392.

[4] The trust must be coeval with the deed, and cannot arise from any subsequent transactions. Ex parte Trenholm, 19 S. C. 128.

Therefore, in determining whether there was a resulting trust in this case, we must look to the status of the parties at the time the deed was executed. Weintraub joined in executing the bond and mortgage to the Cowards, for the purchase money of the land, and thereby incurred an equal liability with the other mortgagors; and to declare that there was a resulting trust at that time would take from him his share of the land, but leave him liable to the Cowards for his proportion of the unpaid purchase money. It is true the Cowards in their answer state that "they are perfectly willing, and hereby waive all and any rights to any judgment, that they might be entitled to, against the defendant Charles Weintraub, by way of a deficiency"; but subsequent transactions cannot give rise to a resulting trust. The testimony of the plaintiffs shows that they do not contend that Weintraub did not have an equal interest with each of them in the land, when the deed and mortgage were executed, but that by failing to pay the amount advanced by them for him he thereby forfeited his interest in the land. As the failure to pay took place after the deed was executed, it could not have the effect of raising a resulting trust. The fact that the salary of Weintraub was applied by the plaintiffs to the expense account is inconsistent with the theory that there was a resulting trust, and tends to show that he was recognized, after the said agreement, as one of the owners of the land, and jointly liable for the purchase money. The agreement to pay him for his services was a part of the contract hereinbefore mentioned, made by the plaintiffs and said defendant on the 6th of July, 1908.

[5] The following principles are applicable to this case: "The rule is well settled that where one person lends money to another, to be used by the borrower in the purchase of land, no resulting trust arises in favor of the lender in the land purchased by the borrower, title to which is taken in the latter's name. And this has been held true, though at the time of the loan it was agreed between the borrower and the lender that the interest in the land to be purchased by the borrower should vest in the lender to the extent of his loans." 15 Enc. of Law, 1149, 1150. The principle just stated applied with greater force when, as in this case, the borrower and the lender are both liable under a mortgage executed by them, in favor of the vendor to secure payment of the purchase money.

[6] A resulting trust may be established by parol evidence; but, when the proposed testimony shows an agreement beyond what the law would imply, it involves an express agreement, inconsistent with a resulting trust. Bell v. Edwards, 78 S. C. 490, 50 S. E. 535.

[7] "A resulting trust arises in favor of one who pays the purchase money of an estate and takes title in the name of another, because of the presumption that he who pays for a thing intends a beneficial interest therein for himself; but this presumption cannot arise when a contrary intent appears, since it is based on the absence of evidence of such contrary intent. Manning v. Screven, 56 S. C. 83, 34 S. E. 22.

"Such a trust must arise, if at all, at the time the purchase is made. The funds must then be advanced and invested. It cannot be made by after advances, or funds subsequently furnished. It does not arise upon subsequent payments, under a contract by another to purchase." Oicott v. Bynum, 17 Wall. 59, 21 L. Ed. 570.

The exceptions raising this question are sustained.

Although there was not a resulting trust, and the money advanced must be regarded in the nature of a loan, secured by the interest of Weintraub in the land, it does not follow that the plaintiffs are not entitled to relief. The plaintiffs have an equitable mortgage on the interest of Weintraub in the land, and there is no reason why, under the authority of Phillips v. Anthony, 47 S. C. 460, 25 S. E. 294, they may not in this action apply for such an order as will subject the interest of Weintraub to the payment of the amount due them by him.

Conceding that the agreement between Weintraub and the Suraskys, whereby the interest of Weintraub in the land should stand as security for the amount advanced by them, was obnoxious to the statute of frauds, nevertheless, when the Suraskys performed their part of the agreement, by advancing the money, Weintraub was estopped from relying upon such statute.

In the case of Walker v. Railway, 26 S. C. 80, 1 S. E. 366, it was held that if a parol agreement was obnoxious to the statute of frauds still one party cannot avail himself of this statute after full performance of the agreement by the other. The court therein used this language: "But even if the contract when originally made was obnoxious to the statute, yet after it had been fully performed by the plaintiff the defendant could not then avail itself of the statute"—citing Bates v. Moore, 2 Bail. 614; Gee v. Hicks, Rich. Eq. Cas. 5; Carter v. Brown, 3 S. C. 298, to which may be added Brownlee v. Martin, 21 S. C. 392, and Turnipseed v. Sirrine, 57 S. C. 559, 35 S. E. 757, 76 Am. St. Rep. 580.

For the foregoing reasons I dissent from so much of the opinion of Mr. Justice WOODS, as is inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

WOODS, J. [8] I concur in the conclusion that there was no resulting trust in favor of the plaintiffs, but dissent from the last proposition laid down in the opinion of the Chief Justice that the plaintiffs have an equitable mortgage on the interest of the defendant Weintraub in the land. An equitable mortgage is not created by the mere advance of money accompanied by a parol agreement of the debtor that the creditor shall have a mortgage. There was no part performance, nor was there any promise to make a mortgage in the future from Weintraub to the Suraskys. Upon the purchase of the land by Weintraub and the Suraskys together and the making of the title to all of them, Weintraub took possession for all the parties including himself, under the right which he had in common with the Suraskys to enter and hold the land as a tenant in common. A mere promise by Weintraub to the Suraskys to pay his portion of the purchase money advanced by them, and his agreement that they should have a lien therefor, cannot create an equitable mortgage as long as the statute of frauds remains the law of the land. None of the cases cited by the Chief Justice sustain the position that a lien on land can be created in favor of a creditor advancing money, by a mere parol agreement from the debtor that the debt shall be a lien, and I do not think any authority for such a proposition can be found. The subject has been discussed at length in the opinion in the case of Folk v. Brooks, 74 S. E. 46, and I refer to that opinion for a full statement of the reasons for my conclusion on this point.

[9] It follows that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover an ordinary money judgment against Weintraub for the sum of $100 loaned to him to purchase his share of the land with interest thereon from the date of the loan. They will also be entitled to subrogation to the rights of the Cowards as mortgagees to the extent of any sum they may pay on the portion of the mortgage debt owing by Weintraub.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be modified to conform to the conclusions herein expressed.

NEW YORK LIFE INS. CO. v. MOBLEY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 11, 1912.)

1. ACTION (§ 35*)—STATUTORY REMEDIES—VACATION OF JUDGMENT—REMEDY AT LAW.

It was the intention of Const. 1868, art. 5, § 3, providing that the General Assembly shall provide for abolishing the distinct forms of action and for a committee on revision, and of the Legislature by Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 161, to abolish proceedings by petition for rehearing and by bill of review, and to substitute therefor the remedy provided by Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 195, providing for the opening and vacating of a judgment for fraud, inadvertence, or excusable neglect on motion in the court rendering the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 273-294; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§§ 499, 521*)—COLLATERAL ATTACK—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

A jurisdictional defect which does not appear upon an inspection of the record does not render a judgment void, but only voidable; and proceedings to have the judgment declared a nullity, other than a motion in the cause in which the judgment was rendered, must be regarded as a collateral attack.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 940, 964; Dec. Dig. §§ 499, 521.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 419*)—EQUITABLE RELIEF—GROUNDS.

An action cannot be maintained on the equity side of the court to set aside a judgment on the ground that it was a nullity, by reason of the fact that the summons was not served upon the defendant, unless the complaint alleges some other fact entitling plaintiff to equitable relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 794; Dec. Dig. § 419.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 407*)—EQUITABLE RELIEF—GROUNDS.

An action in equity for relief against a judgment on the ground that summons was not served on the defendant cannot be sustained because of the issuance of an execution upon the judgment, since relief against such execution may be obtained by motion in the cause in which the judgment was recovered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 769; Dec. Dig. § 407.*]

5. JUDGMENT (§ 460*)—EQUITABLE RELIEF—AVERMENT OF GROUNDS—MULTIPLICITY OF SUITS.

Equitable relief against a judgment for failure to serve the summons on the defendant will not be granted to prevent a multiplicity of suits, where no facts are alleged showing the necessity thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 879; Dec. Dig. § 460.*]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 307*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—ENFORCEMENT OF JUDGMENT—SERVICE OF PROCESS.

The contention that the refusal of equitable relief against a judgment in an action wherein the summons was not served on the defendant, though it appeared from the return of the sheriff that it had been served, will permit the taking of property of the defendant without due process of law, contrary to Const. U. S. Amend. 14, will not be sustained; the defendant having an adequate remedy at law by motion in the cause in which the judgment was rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 925; Dec. Dig. § 307.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the New York Life Insurance Company against Nannie B. Mobley. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 89 S. C. 189, 71 S. E. 817.

James H. McIntosh, R. B. Allison, and D. W. Robinson, for appellant. J. Harry Foster, for respondent.

GARY, C. J. This is an appeal from an order refusing an injunction and sustaining a demurrer to the complaint.

The action was brought by the New York Life Insurance Company for the purpose of having the judgment mentioned in the complaint declared to be null and void, and, in the meantime, of enjoining the enforcement of the execution issued upon said judgment.

The grounds upon which the plaintiff asks relief are thus summarized by the appellant's attorneys: "That the plaintiff, which was the defendant in the former action, had never been served with process and had had no opportunity whatever of being heard in the cause which had been instituted against it by the defendant. That the service of the summons and complaint in the action brought by defendant contained proof of service, such proof consisting of the certificate of the sheriff that he had served the summons and complaint on one M. L. Beckham, as an agent of the plaintiff company; but, in fact and in truth, said Beckham was not an agent of the plaintiff company, took no notice of the paper served upon him, and gave no information thereof to the plaintiff company; and that plaintiff has at all times had an agent, duly appointed and designated according to law, within this state, upon whom service of process could be made. That a judgment by default was taken and entered against the plaintiff upon such service, and entirely without the knowledge of the plaintiff, until a short time after it was entered. That plaintiff brought this action promptly, after learning of the default judgment. That the plaintiff had a good and valid defense to the action, which is set out in the complaint, to the effect that the policy of insurance sued on had lapsed several years before the death of the insured by reason of the nonpayment of the insurance premiums. That the plaintiff was prevented from setting up its defense and from being heard thereon through no fault or negligence on its part, and the judgment rendered against it is unjust; and that it will be inequitable and unconscionable to allow the enforcement of a judgment so taken. That the defendant is proceeding to enforce and collect said judgment, which is in fact null and void."

The plaintiff alleges "that, unless restrained, the defendant will issue execution on said judgment, and cause the same to be levied on its property, and thereby injure its good name and reputation within said state by creating the impression that it is unwilling to pay its just debts, and will harass and annoy it, and interfere with its business in said state, and involve said company in a multiplicity of suits, and will take the property of said company without due process of law, contrary to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to the great and irreparable injury of said company, for which it can have no adequate remedy at law."

The grounds of demurrer interposed by the defendant's attorney were as follows: "That the plaintiff has no cause of action, as alleged in the complaint, as the judgment therein set out is not subject to a collateral attack, and that the cause of action pleaded is a collateral attack on the said judgment. That the plaintiff has a plain and adequate remedy at law, to wit, a motion in the original cause to vacate, modify, or otherwise secure the appropriate relief, under section 195 of the Code, providing for the opening and vacating of a judgment for fraud, inadvertence, or excusable neglect. That the Code of Civil Procedure has abolished the form of action set out in the said complaint; and that there is no sanction thereof by the Code of Civil Procedure. That the said complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the complaint fails to show that the plaintiff has not a plain and adequate remedy at law. That the complaint on its face shows that the matters therein have been adjudicated, and the alleged cause of action is res judicata."

His honor, Judge Watts, made the following order: "This cause was heard before me, pursuant to notice given at Chester, S. C., November 13, 1911, upon the affidavits submitted by plaintiff and defendant, the pleadings of the cause, and the demurrer. Being of the opinion that the action by plaintiff will not lie, its remedy being under section 195 of the Code, I decline to grant the restraining order asked for, and the motion is hereby denied."

The plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

(1) "Because his honor held and ruled that the action of the plaintiff would not lie; it being respectfully submitted that the action would lie because: (a) The complaint set forth equitable grounds of relief; (b) the remedy sought by the plaintiff was a proper one; (c) the remedy is a direct proceeding to set aside the judgment upon the grounds that the same was void, and for equitable relief, as therein set forth, is in the same court, and between the same parties; (d) because this is a proper action, as provided in section 89, pt. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure."

(2) "The order of his honor, holding that the plaintiff's action will not lie, and that its remedy is under section 195, and declining to grant an order restraining the defendant from levying and collecting its execution, it being too late to assert the remedy under these provisions, would deprive the plaintiff of its property without due process of law, contrary to the Constitution of the United States."

(3) "The order of his honor, denying to the plaintiffs the right to maintain this action, and declining to restrain the issuance of the execution by the defendant, denies to the plaintiff the equal protection of the law, contrary to law and to the provisions of the Constitution of this state and of the United States."

(4) "Section 195, pt. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, does not furnish any remedy in this case, because said section is only applicable to judgments which were entered through 'mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect.' The judgment involved here was not recovered through the defendant's mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, but was entered without any notice whatever to or service of process upon the defendant."

(5) "That, inasmuch as the remedy provided under section 195, pt. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, is a right resting in the discretion of the court, and limited to one year, in the case at bar, where the plaintiff has never been served with process, and has never had an opportunity of being heard according to law, it is not an adequate remedy for the protection of the rights of the plaintiff, and deprives the plaintiff of the equal protection of the law, and takes its property without due process of law, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of this state and the United States."

[1-3] In the case of Crocker v. Allen, 34 S. C. 452, 13 S. E. 650, 27 Am. St. Rep. 831, the action was brought by the plaintiff therein to set aside a judgment previously recovered against her by the defendant therein, and to obtain an injunction to restrain the enforcement of the execution, issued on said judgment, solely upon the ground that she was never served with the summons in the former action, and had no knowledge of any such proceedings against her until her land was advertised for sale under said execution.

Mr. Justice (afterwards Chief Justice) McIver, in delivering the opinion of the court, used this language: "As it was well settled that a court of equity would not entertain a case asking for relief where the party complaining had a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law, the practical inquiry in this case is whether, under the former practice, the plaintiff would have had a plain and adequate remedy for the wrong of which she complains by motion to the court, and in the case in which the judgment in question was rendered. If she had, then she cannot maintain an action on the equity side of the court to obtain the redress sought, but must resort to the simpler and less expensive remedy by motion. A review of the authorities will show, beyond dispute, that the court of common pleas has always obtained and exercised the power to entertain such a motion."

After reviewing the authorities, he proceeds as follows: "These cases unquestionably establish the doctrine that the proper mode of proceeding to set aside a judgment, prior to the abolition of the court of equity, was by motion to the court, and in the cause wherein the judgment was rendered; and therefore a bill in equity for that purpose would not be entertained by the court of equity, unless it contained allegations imputing to the case some feature of equitable cognizance, such, for example, as fraud, accident, or mistake, or unless a discovery was demanded. * * * That the same practice has been recognized and followed since the court of equity was abolished as a separate tribunal. * * * If it is proposed to show that the return of the sheriff was false by evidence de hors the record, it should be done by a motion in that case; for, while it stands as it is, it must be regarded as a valid judgment in any other action or proceeding."

Section 3, art. 5, Constitution of 1868, which was not repealed by the Constitution of 1895, is as follows: "That justice may be administered in a uniform mode of pleading without distinction between law and equity, they [the General Assembly] shall provide for abolishing the distinct forms of action, and for that purpose shall appoint some suitable person or persons, whose duty it shall be to revise, simplify, and abridge the rules, practice, pleadings, and forms of the courts now in use in this state." Section 161 of the Code is as follows: "There shall be no other forms of pleadings in civil actions in courts of record in this state, and no other rules by which the sufficiency of the pleadings is to be determined, than those prescribed in this Code of Procedure." Section 195 of the Code provides: "The court may likewise, in its discretion, and upon such terms as may be just, * * * at any time within one year after notice thereof, relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding, taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect."

In the case of Durant v. Philpot, 16 S. C. 125, which was a motion for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence, Mr. Chief Justice McIver used this language: "Under the practice of the former court of equity, it might, perhaps, have been difficult to sustain the mode of proceeding adopted in this case. Under that practice, a petition for rehearing and a bill of review were sustainable on similar grounds, one of which was newly discovered evidence (Hunt v. Smith, 3 Rich. Eq. 541), but a petition for rehearing was the proper mode of proceeding where the decree had not been signed and enrolled or filed; whereas, after the filing of the decree, the proper mode of proceeding would be by application for leave to file a bill of review (Simpson v. Downs, 5 Rich. Eq. 425; Hinson v. Pickett, 2 Hill, Eq. 353), and such bill could not be filed without leave of the court (Simpson v. Watts, 6 Rich. Eq. 364 [62 Am. Dec. 392]). If, therefore, this should be regarded as a petition for rehearing, it is liable to two objections: First, because the decree has been filed; and, second, the petition is not verified by two counsel. Ex parte Terry, Rice Eq. 1; 8 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1623. On the other hand, if it be regarded as in the nature of a bill of review, no leave of the court to file it seems to have been obtained. It seems to us, however, that since the abolition of the court of equity, and the requirement of the Constitution, in section 3, art. 5, that justice shall be administered in a uniform mode of pleading, without distinction between law and equity, these modes of proceeding by a petition for rehearing and bill of review have become inapplicable, and that now the same results can be obtained by motion. * * *

After quoting the foregoing, in Ex parte Bank, 56 S. C. 12, 33 S. E. 781, the court used this language: "From the foregoing, it is manifest that it was intended to abolish the proceedings by petition for rehearing and by bill of review, and to substitute therefor the remedy provided by section 195 of the Code, which was intended to be exclusive."

In the case of Sanders v. Price, 56 S. C. 1, 33 S. E. 731, which was an action for partition, the question arose whether a judgment could be attacked in that proceeding on the ground that it was null and void. The court thus disposed of the question: "The judgment in Porter v. Porter is not void, but voidable; for the alleged jurisdictional defect is not manifest from an inspection of the record (which, presumptively, shows the contrary), but is only made to appear by evidence de hors the record. Such judgment, being merely voidable, is not subject to collateral attack, and must be held as valid and conclusive until set aside by a direct proceeding instituted for that purpose in that cause. * * * These actions cannot be considered such direct proceedings, brought for the purpose of impeaching the judgment in question."

The foregoing authorities show (1) that it was the intention of the Constitution and the Legislature to abolish proceedings by petition for rehearing and by bill of review, and to substitute therefor the remedy provided by section 195 of the Code, which, when applicable, was intended to be exclusive; (2) that a jurisdictional defect which does not appear upon an inspection of the record does not render the judgment void, but only voidable, and that any proceeding to have the judgment declared a nullity, other than a motion in the cause in which the judgment was rendered, must be regarded as a collateral attack on the judgment; (3) that an action on the equity side of the court to set aside a judgment on the ground that it was a nullity, by reason of the fact that the summons was not served upon the defendant therein, cannot be maintained, unless the complaint alleges some other fact entitling the plaintiff to equitable relief.

[4] We proceed to the consideration of the question whether there are any facts alleged in the complaint herein entitling the plaintiff to equitable relief; in other words, whether it shows upon its face that the plaintiff has a plain and adequate remedy at law. The first ground upon which the plaintiff relies is that an injunction is essential to the protection of its rights from the enforcement of the execution, issued upon the alleged void judgment. It cannot be successfully contended that this is a ground for equitable interference, for the reason that such relief may be obtained by motion in the cause in which the judgment was recovered. This question is settled by the case of Crocker v. Allen, 34 S. C. 452, 13 S. E. 650, 27 Am. St. Rep. 831, in which the court says: "It cannot be said that the necessity for an injunction would be sufficient to give the court of equity jurisdiction; for that relief was always obtainable by a motion to stay the execution, which the authorities above cited show could have been granted by a circuit judge at chambers even before the enactment of the statute conferring such power."

[6] The contention of the plaintiff that it is necessary to invoke the equitable aid of the court to prevent a multiplicity of suits is untenable, for the reason that no facts are alleged showing such necessity.

[8] The next ground upon which the plaintiff relies is that, unless restrained, the defendant will take the property of the plaintiff without due process of law, contrary to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

In the case of Roberts v. Pawley, 50 S. C. 491, 27 S. E. 913, the court had under consideration the validity of a judgment rendered against joint debtors, when the complaint alleged they were partners; but the summons was only directed to the one who was served. The court said: "If it should be said, as seems to be argued by counsel for respondents, that the motion should not have been granted, because the defendants failed to show by affidavit that they had a meritorious defense, or that they had sustained any prejudice, the answer is that, while such a showing may be required where the motion is to open a judgment by default upon the ground of some excusable mistake or negligence on the part of the defendants, no such showing is required where the judgment by default is sought to be set aside because without legal authority, for the obvious reason that in the one case the defendant is asking the favor of the court to be excused for his own default, while in the other case he is simply demanding his legal rights to be relieved from a judgment obtained by the plaintiff without pursuing the course prescribed by law. Accordingly it is said in 6 Ency. Pl. & Prac. at page 176: 'A motion to vacate or open a default or judgment thereon, because irregular or void, stands on a different footing from a proceeding for relief because of mistake in the defaulting party; and a case of excusable neglect need not be shown to authorize the court to grant the order, nor is an affidavit of merits or a good defense required.'"

These authorities show that a motion to be relieved from a judgment taken against a party through his mistake, etc., stands upon an entirely different footing from a motion to set aside a judgment on the ground that the summons was not served on the defendant, so as to make him a party to the action. The first of these motions is based upon the conduct of the party making the motion, and is addressed to the discretion of the court, while the other is merely the assertion of a legal right, founded upon the failure of the adverse party to comply with the requirements of the law, and is not dependent upon the discretion of the court.

Section 195 of the Code is inapplicable to the second of said motions, which the court has authority to grant under the general power of the court to relieve against its judgments, on the ground that they are void or voidable. It will thus be seen that the plaintiff has a plain and adequate remedy at law, and the demurrer was properly sustained.

There was also an appeal from an order, made by his honor, Judge Gage, refusing to allow the plaintiff to amend its complaint by alleging fraud. It has not, however, been made to appear that his honor, the circuit judge, erroneously exercised his discretion. Judgment affirmed.

AMERICAN FERTILIZING CO. v. SIMS
et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 11, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 419*)—PAROL EVIDENCE.

On assignment of a note payable in money, secured by a lien on a crop, parol evidence of an agreement to pay the note in services is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 419.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 967*)—DISCRETION—DENIAL OF MOTION TO AMEND.

A denial of a motion to reopen a reference to a master and to allow an amendment to the answer, made more than 10 years after the original answer, is within the discretion of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 967.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by the American Fertilizing Company against E. L. Sims and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bomar & Simpson, for appellants. Sanders & De Pass, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This is a suit on a note which included a lien on a crop for fertilizers signed by the appellants. The note was executed to one H. T. Butler for $225, on the 17th of March, 1898. The suit was commenced in 1901. The plaintiff alleged that, at the time said lien note was given by the defendants, the said H. T. Butler was the agent of plaintiff, and when said note was given it was and has ever since been the property of plaintiff, which is now the legal owner and holder thereof, and that no part thereof has been paid. The defendants admitted the purchase of the fertilizers and the execution of the note, but alleged that they bought from Butler and had paid the note to him by professional services of the defendant C. P. Sims, or the law firm of which he was a member; that the defendant Mrs. E. L. Sims had purchased the interest of Mr. Thomason, the law partner of Mr. C. P. Sims, without notice of any claim of the plaintiff; that Mr. Butler had recognized the defendants' rights and had delivered to the defendants a written order to the clerk of the court to mark satisfaction on the record; and, within the scope of a general denial, denied the plaintiff's ownership of the note.

There were two orders of reference to successive masters. The first order was to report on all the issues. The second was simply to take and report the testimony. The second master, Mr. G. T. Lanham, reported on all issues in his report, dated March 16, 1911. The appellants complain that the reference was closed without notice and moved to reopen the reference and to be allowed to amend their answer. Judge Watts, who tried the cause, ignored the master's findings as unauthorized, refused to recommit the case, refused the motion to amend, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for $429.91. From this order the defendants appealed upon five exceptions, but have consolidated them to two. We adopt this consolidation.

[1] "It was error to allow the plaintiff to introduce evidence tending to contradict or vary the lien note on which this suit is brought."

The question as to whether the contract can be varied by testimony or no, and by what kind of testimony it can be varied (if at all), are purely academic questions in this case. The plaintiff sets up a contract of which it alleges it is the owner and offers written evidence that it is the owner. The defendant answers setting up a parol agreement that the note was to have been paid, not in money, according to its terms, but by professional services. The answer says, "And to pay them for their services the sum of $250 and that this purchase of fertilizers should be in part payment therefor." The proof of this was by parol evidence alone. Now, exclude all evidence to vary the terms of the contract, and you have a contract for the payment of money and no money paid. A judgment follows of necessity. No one will contend that an assignment may not be had, whatever may be the effect of the assignment of such a paper. This exception is overruled.

[2] II. That his honor "erred in holding that the motion to recommit the case and to be allowed to amend the answer of the defendant came too late."

Appellant says: "His honor, it will be observed, did not refuse this motion as a matter of discretion, but because, as matter of law, the motion was made too late." It does not appear that the denial of the motion was in obedience to a misapprehended command of the law and that the finding was not in the exercise of his discretion. A defense may "come too late" to appeal to discretion. Where the defense is purely technical (as here), it might not appeal to the discretion of a judge to allow any time beyond that which the law allows. In this case the original answer was sworn to on March 16, 1901. The affidavit upon which the motion was made was dated July 5, 1911. More than 10 years had elapsed, and we cannot say that the trial judge did not exercise his discretion, or, in the exercise of it, has abused it. This exception is overruled.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

OHIO POTTERY & GLASS CO. v. TALBERT.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 11, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 237*)—QUESTIONS IN LOWER COURT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—MOTION TO DIRECT VERDICT.

Under Supreme Court Rule 77 (75 S. C. 572, 73 S. E. vii), which provides that a point that there is no evidence to support a defense shall be first made by motion to direct a verdict, an exception on that ground cannot be considered on appeal if no such motion was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—OBJECTIONS—ABANDONMENT—FAILURE TO ARGUE. Exceptions are abandoned by failing to argue them on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4256-4261; Dec. Dig. § 1078.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; R. O. Watts, Judge.

Action by the Ohio Pottery & Glass Company against B. C. Talbert. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Giles & Ouzts, for appellant. D. H. Magill, for respondent.

FRASER, J. This was an action for goods sold and delivered to the defendant by the plaintiff. The defendant acknowledged having received the goods, but pleaded payment. The defendant claims that he paid for the goods and paid the agent from whom he bought. The plaintiff denied that the agent to sell had any authority to receive payment. There was a verdict for the defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

The following are the exceptions:

"(1) We most respectfully submit that it was error of law in his honor to refuse the motion for a new trial when the record shows there was not a scintilla of evidence going to establish the fact that Bayol was the agent for the plaintiffs for the purpose of collecting the account in dispute, but, on the contrary, the positive testimony of the plaintiffs established the fact that Bayol was not the agent of the plaintiffs for that purpose.

"(2) It is most respectfully submitted that the jury disregarded the charge of his honor, and it was error of law to refuse the motion for a new trial.

"(3) It is most respectfully submitted that the testimony of the defendant shows conclusively that Bayol was the agent of the defendant when he received the purchase price for the bill of goods and was not the agent of the plaintiffs, and it was error of law for his honor to refuse to set aside the said verdict of the jury and order a new trial."

[1] The question of no evidence is a question of law, but this court has adopted and published the following rule 77 (75 S. C. 572, 73 S. E. vii): " * * * The point that there is no evidence to support a defense shall be first made by a motion to direct a verdict." No such motion was made, and this exception cannot be considered.

[2] The second and third exceptions were not considered in the argument, and therefore they are deemed abandoned.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by John Williams against R. C. McManus. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John Williams, on September 6, 1906, conveyed the premises in controversy by a deed absolute on its face for a stated consideration of $300 to R. C. McManus, who on the same day executed a bond for title in the penal sum of $300, reciting that: "Whereas, the above bounden R. C. McManus has this day agreed to sell to the said John Williams the following described tract of land in the county of Lancaster, said state, to wit: All that piece, parcel or lot of land situated within the incorporate limits of the town of Lancaster, containing one-fourth (1-4) acre, more or less, being in the shape of a triangle and bounded on the north by lot of R. C. McManus; east by Main street of said town of Lancaster; south by right of way of Southern Railway Company; and on the West by lot of said R. C. McManus, on condition that the said John Williams shall pay the sum of three hundred forty-eight and no 100 ($348.00) dollars, in manner following, that is to say: One hundred and seventy-four ($174.00) dollars on September 1, 1907, and one hundred and seventy-four ($174.00), dollars on September 1, 1907, and one hundred and seventy-four ($174.00) dollars on September 1, 1908: Now the condition of this obligation is such, that if the said John Williams shall pay the said purchase money so as aforesaid stipulated and shall in the meantime pay all taxes on said land, and the said R. C. McManus shall on the completion of said payments make, execute and deliver, or cause to be made, executed and delivered, a good and sufficient deed of conveyance (with warranty against himself, his heirs and assigns only) of the land above described to the said John Williams, then this obligation to be void and of none effect or else to remain in full force and virtue. And it is expressly agreed by and between the parties aforesaid that 'time is of the essence of this contract,' and that in the event of the nonpayment of said sum of money or any part thereof, promptly at the time herein limited, that then the said R. C. McManus is absolutely discharged from any and all liability to make and execute such deed and may treat the said John Williams as tenant holding over after the termination, or contrary to the terms of his lease; or if he prefer so to do may enforce the payment of the purchase money."

The following is the report of John T. Green, Special Referee:

"In obedience to an order of this court, of date October 27, 1909, the undersigned has taken the testimony in the above-stated cause and heard the argument of counsel on the issues of law and fact involved therein. The testimony so taken by me, consisting of 18 pages, is herewith separately reported. My rulings on objections made during the taking of the testimony are to be found noted on the margin. It is admitted that on the 5th day of September, 1906, the plaintiff, John Williams, in consideration of the sum of $300 in cash paid to him executed and delivered to the defendant, R. C. McManus, the deed of conveyance, marked by me 'Exhibit C,' for the lot therein described; that on the same day defendant and plaintiff entered into the agreement marked 'Exhibit B,' called a 'bond for title'; and that the lot described in said bond for title is the same lot referred to in said deed of conveyance. The only issues raised by the pleadings and testimony in this case, as I take it, are as follows: (1) Was the said deed from plaintiff to defendant intended by the parties at the time of its execution to be an absolute sale and conveyance of the lot therein mentioned, as claimed by defendant; or was it intended by them as a mortgage to secure a loan of $300 by defendant to plaintiff, as claimed by the latter? (2) Even if the said deed is held to be absolute, and that it was not intended as a mortgage, still was plaintiff entitled under the terms of the said bond for title to have the said lot reconveyed to him, when he tendered to defendant on April 10, 1909, the sum of $364.98 and demanded a deed from defendant?

"After a careful review of the testimony adduced before me, my findings are as follows:

"Findings of Fact.

"I find from the preponderance of the evidence adduced before me:

"(1) That on a number of occasions prior to the date of the execution of the said deed of conveyance and bond for title, plaintiff applied to defendant for a loan of money on the lot in question; but that defendant declined to make him any loan, expressing a willingness, however, to buy the said lot, if plaintiff would sell it.

"(2) That, at the time of the execution of the deed to the defendant, McManus, one F. R. Massey held a mortgage on said lot for $200, which plaintiff was unable to pay.

"(3) That plaintiff is, and was at the time of the execution of the said deed, a colored man of more than average intelligence, that he could read and write, and that no advantage was taken of him in the execution of the said papers.

"(4) That the said deed of conveyance and the said bond for title were executed at the same time and place and before the same witnesses.

"(5) That the plaintiff remained in possession of the premises, after the execution of the said papers, until the 22d day of June, 1908, when he was ejected therefrom by the sheriff of Lancaster county under a warrant of ejectment issued to him by W. P. Caskey and B. F. Phillips, magistrates for said county, under section 2421 of the Code of Laws of South Carolina (1902).

"(6) That since the execution of the said deed of conveyance the defendant, McManus, has continuously paid the taxes on the premises in question.

"(7) That no money was paid or tendered by plaintiff to defendant under the said bond for title or otherwise up to the time of his said ejectment on June 22, 1908.

"(8) That on the 10th day of April, 1909, H. M. Dunlap, Esq., as attorney for the plaintiff, did tender to the defendant, McManus, the sum of $364.98 and demanded that he execute to plaintiff a deed of conveyance for the lot in question, claiming that the said sum so tendered was 'in payment of the mortgage held by him from John Williams,' and that McManus refused to accept the same.

"(9) As to the most vital question of fact in the case, to wit, as to whether the said deed from plaintiff to defendant, which is absolute on its face, was really intended by the parties at the time to be a mortgage, I am forced to conclude from all the facts and circumstances of this case, as gathered from the testimony adduced before me, and from what I know of the character of the respective witnesses examined before me, that the original contract between the parties was a sale of the lot in question; that the deed of conveyance from plaintiff to defendant (Exhibit C) was a deed and not a mortgage; and that there was a contract (Exhibit B) to resell to the grantor (Williams) within a stipulated time, and upon conditions therein fully expressed.

"In the first place, no other conclusion can be drawn from the testimony in the case than that, at the time of the execution of the said deed, the said lot was not of greater value than $300, the sum paid plaintiff by defendant. Again, in view of the fact as established by the testimony that the defendant, McManus, had time and again previously refused to loan plaintiff money on this lot, nothing appeared in the case that was calculated to induce him to change his mind as to the wisdom of becoming plaintiff's creditor. Again, the lot in question adjoined that of the defendant, McManus, and lay between the McManus lot and the Southern Railway depot—a fact that would induce McManus to pay more for it than any one else, but a fact that would not induce him to make a loan to plaintiff to the extent of the full value of the lot.

"Again, the testimony of Jas. M. Knight, who was one of the witnesses to the deed in question, strongly corroborated the positive statement of the defendant, McManus, to the effect that the deed in question was not intended as a mortgage to secure a loan, but to convey the absolute title in this lot to defendant.

"Again, that positive testimony of the witness Geo. F. Payseur, as to the admissions made to him by plaintiff to the effect that he had sold the lot to McManus with the right to buy it back in two years without paying any rent, seemed conclusive to me on the question of the intention of the said deed.

"In addition to the fact that the witnesses Knight and Payseur are entirely disinterested in this case, they are in no way related to the defendant and are men of character and veracity.

"Again, the admissions of plaintiff as made to T. Y. Williams, Esq., as to the transaction between plaintiff and defendant, would seem to leave no doubt even of the fact that the instrument in question was intended as a deed and not a mortgage.

"I have been able to find nothing in the testimony tending to corroborate the statements of the plaintiff as to the transaction in question, except the fact that he was allowed by defendant to remain in possession of the lot until his ejectment therefrom without paying rent. And even that fact is explained by plaintiff himself when he told the witness Geo. F. Payseur, in substance, that in selling the lot to defendant it was understood that he was to pay no rent for two years.

"In the absence of clear, unequivocal, and convincing evidence, the presumption will prevail that a deed of conveyance is what on its face it appears to be." Brown v. Bank, 55 S. C. 70, 32 S. E. 816; Creswell v. Smith, 61 S. C. 579, 39 S. E. 757; Ray v. Counts, 82 S. C. 557, 64 S. E. 1135.

"The above being my conclusions of fact in this case, I am forced to find as my "Conclusions of Law.

"1. That the original contract between the plaintiff, Williams, and the defendant, McManus, was an absolute sale of the lot in question; that the deed of conveyance from the former to the latter was a deed and not a mortgage; and that therefor defendant took the absolute title to the real estate described in said deed.

"2. That under the terms of the bond for title (Exhibit B) the defendant did contract to resell the said lot to plaintiff within a specified time; that plaintiff forfeited his rights under said contract by failing to comply with its terms, in that he failed to pay the taxes on said lot and to meet the first payment of the purchase money, as provided for in said contract or bond for title. I hold that time was sufficiently made the essence of this contract; and that, when plaintiff failed to make the first payment required of him on September 1, 1907, he forfeited his rights under said bond for title.

"In addition to this, the plaintiff, under the ejectment proceedings had before the two magistrates, failed to appear or to answer the rule to show cause, allowed judgment to be taken against him by default, and took no step to prevent his ejectment from the premises in question. Under such circumstances, I am forced to conclude that the tender by his attorney of $364.98 on April 10, 1909, did not restore plaintiff's rights under said bond for title; and that defendant was not bound to accept the same and make plaintiff a deed to the said premises, as demanded by him. Having failed to comply with the terms of his contract to buy back this property from defendant, to whom he had previously sold it absolutely, plaintiff is not in a position to demand a specific performance of the contract—that defendant now make him a deed for the premises described in the complaint.

"Such being my conclusions of fact and law in this case, I would respectfully recommend that the complaint herein be dismissed, with the costs of the action."

Testimony was taken by the special referee, as follows (the figures in brackets referring to the objections hereinafter shown):

"W. B. Plyler, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

"Direct examination (by Mr. Dunlap): Q. Mr. Plyler, do you remember in the neighborhood of 1908 a conversation with you and John Williams here, the plaintiff, about a piece of property he had about the depot? It is described in the complaint as $\frac{1}{4}$ acre. Do you remember the conversation and the amount you offered him for property? (Objection [1] to this testimony by defendant on the ground that, if any testimony is competent as to value of the land, it must be as to the value of the land at the time of the execution of the deed and bond for title. The ruling of the referee reserved. All rulings on testimony will be reserved by referee until the conclusion of the reference.) A. Well, I had talked several times about that land, that property down there, and he did not name no certain price, and I did not make any certain price. Q. You own considerable real estate in the town of Lancaster, and, of course, you are conversant with the prices of property by reason of your holdings, are you not, sir? What would you estimate that about this time, 1908, that this piece of property was worth? (Objection [2] of defendant on the same ground as stated above, and on the further ground that the witness has not qualified as an expert.) A. I thought there was more land than the men say— $\frac{1}{4}$ acre. Q. What would you think it was worth? A. Well, I thought it was worth \$400 or \$500. I didn't think very much about it. The thought just come up.

"Cross-examination (by Mr. Williams): Q. That was about 1908? A. Yes, sir; about two years ago or a little better.

"John Williams, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

"Direct examination (by Mr. Dunlap): Q. John, in September of 1906 it is admitted that you owned this tract of land down at the depot. Now just state what become of that piece of property? A. Commence at the beginning? Q. Just state the agreement between you and Dr. McManus. A. All right. Well, what I want to say is that the first of the contract with Dr. McManus, Mr. Carter come along by my house, I just asked— Q. As a result of your conversation with Mr. Carter, what did you do after your conversation? After you got through with Mr. Carter, what did you do with Dr. McManus? A. I sent to Dr. McManus about letting me have some money. Mr. McManus he said, 'About how much do you want?' Well, I says that I would like to have about $300. He said, 'Reckon I could let you have that much,' I said I would be back to-morrow, and the next day come, and I come along back here and saw him about it, and the first thing he said to me was how long would I want it. I said about the space of two years. And we went in then to an agreement to get the money and he let me have it. At that time I wanted to pay Dick Massey out. And the next morning when I went to receive the money from Dr. McManus Dick Massey was there. After I had got the money, that was the end of it. Q. When you got the money, what did you do? Did you sign any papers? A. Yes, sir; I signed Doctor's papers for the money. Q. Did you get the money? A. He gave a check for the money; it was made out in a check. Q. Who got the proceeds of this money? A. Dick Massey. Q. Who gave it to him. A. I disremember whether Dick come down here and got it cashed or Mr. Charlie Jones. Q. How much did you pay at that time to Dick Massey. A. Dick Massey got $200, or some $210, I think. (Defendant objects [3] to the foregoing testimony on the ground that all transactions had between the plaintiff and defendant as regards the land in dispute should be proven by the written memorandum of instruments showing same. Witness shown bond for title to R. C. McManus from John Williams, Exhibit B.) Q. Is that your signature? A. Yes, sir. Q. John, was it your intention at the time of getting this money from Dr. McManus to sell him your property or to give it as security? (Mr. Williams objects [4] on the ground that plaintiff's intention is evidenced by the deed and bond for title, and further that the plaintiff cannot testify as to his intention, but only as to the agreement had between the parties.) A. No, sir; I had no idea of selling my place, and it was not mentioned. Not a word was brought up about him buying it. He says to me, 'All I want is my money back.' There was nothing mentioned about buying or selling. Q. What rate of interest did he agree to charge you? A. Eight per cent. Q. After you gave this instrument of writing to Dr. McManus, who was left in possession of this property? A. I was in possession of the property. Q. Have you ever paid, or has he demanded up until the time of your ejection—has he ever demanded rent? A. No, sir; no rent has ever been mentioned. Q. About, or since, the execution of this instrument of writing, were you on up until the present time allowed to remain in possession? A. I was; yes, sir. Q. Well up until when? A. I mean from the time we went into the writing until I was ejected. Q. Well, after you were ejected, have you ever made an offer to Dr. McManus that you would return the amount of money that he gave to you? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was his answer? A. Why, he told me I was too late. Q. Do you know about when this was? A. A short time after I was ejected. About one week before I had to hunt up the man from whom I was to get the money. Q. Who paid the taxes on this property during the years you were in possession? A. I did. I paid the taxes up until 1908. (Defendant objects [5].) Q. About that time, say the latter part of 1908, were you offered any price for this piece of property, and how much? (Defendant objects [6] on the ground that it is two years later than the execution of this deed and option.) A. Yes, sir; I was offered by Mr. Plyler once—I was offered by him $1,000, and the next man, Mr. Jim Porter, offered me a plantation of 40 acres. Q. Now, was this before or after you were ejected? A. It was before I was ejected.

"Cross-examination (by Mr. Williams): Q. John, you say Mr. Jim Porter offered you a plantation for the place? A. Yes, sir; out here by Blackmon, a colored man that has a plantation. Q. And you say Mr. Plyler offered you $1,000 for it? A. And I told him I wanted $1,500 for it, but would take $1,200 for it. Q. So when Mr. Plyler says he did not make you any offer at all, he is not telling the truth? A. He mought of forgot about what he told me about that time. Q. Well, when was it now that you claim Mr. Plyler made you this offer? A. This was at the time before I was ejected. I was about planting. I was setting down on the steps. Q. And at this time when Mr. Plyler was offering you $1,000, and Mr. Porter a plantation, you were trying to raise money to buy this place back. You were going all over the country, to W. U. Clyburn and Col. Springs, and other people, trying to buy back this place before the time expired, and at the same time you were offered by Mr. Plyler $1,000, with which you could have taken and paid Dr. McManus $400, and had the balance left? A. Well, I was just expecting if I could have got the money I wanted—the amount—I would just take it. Q. And so when you needed only $300 or $400 to buy this place back you were offered $1,000 and would not take it? A. Well, I just thought I could get more. Q. How much did you owe, John, when you made this deed to Dr. McManus? A. I owed Dick Massey $200. Q. Was this all you owed on the land? A. All that I owed except $10. I got $300 from Dr. McManus to pay off Dick Massey. Q. And so you claim now that you are borrowing $300 to pay off a $200 debt? A. Well, with this $300 I know I could pay off Dick and not owe him anything. Q. Well, you say you only owed him $200, why did you not borrow $200 from Dr. McManus to pay him off? A. Well, I could get the $300, and I got the $300. Q. Well now, John, is it not a fact that you went to Dr. McManus to try to borrow from him $200 to pay off this Massey debt, and that he refused to let you have it? A. Doctor did? No, sir; he never refused to let me have it. Q. Well, why then, John, did you borrow $300 to pay off a $200 debt? A. I borrowed $300 so that I could have money enough to settle all the debts that I owed. I just wanted the $300 because I knew then I wouldn't have anything dragging or hanging over me—so that I wouldn't be in any strain. Q. Was Dick Massey pressing you right hard at that time? A. No, sir; Dick Massey was not pressing me very hard. I wanted the money—Dick wanted to rue back. Q. Well, before he found you were going to get this money from Dr. McManus, he was pressing you for this money? A. No, sir; I wanted it out of Dick's hands because Dick had made a threat that he intended to build a negro hotel on the corner. Q. Of your land? A. Yes, sir. Q. Well, as a matter of fact, you thought he was getting in pretty close behind you? A. No, sir. Q. Well now, John, just answer truthfully when you found out you could not borrow this money to pay this debt, you turned and sold it for the best price you could get. A. No, sir; I never did. Q. John, did you not, right after this deed was made to Mr. McManus, did you not say to Dr. G. F. Payseur here, on the streets of Lancaster, that you had sold this land to Dr. McManus? A. No, sir; I never told him so since I was born. Q. That you could not borrow the money and had to sell it—but that Dr. McManus had given you two years in which to pay it back? A. No, sir; I never told nobody I had to sell it, never since I have been born. Q. While Mr. Payseur was doing some work on Mr. J. F. Gregory's house in the fall of 1908, the time he was fixing up the lightning rods, and talking about the matter, did you not tell Mr. Payseur that you had sold the land to Dr. McManus, but that he had given you a written contract which would allow you to buy back the land in two years' time without charging you any interest? A. No, sir; I never has talked that conversation with Mr. Payseur. I never had such conversation in all my life. No, sir. Q. Did you go into the furniture store department of the J. F. Mackey Company, one, or two or several times, and ask Dr. McManus to loan you money on this land in the presence of Mr. Jim Knight, and didn't he always refuse to do it? A. No, sir; when I asked Dr. McManus for this money he never refused. He never did. Q. Is it not a fact that you pestered him so much about loaning you money on this house that he got angry in the presence of Mr. Knight and used pretty sharp words to you? A. No, sir. Q. Didn't Dr. McManus always tell you he might buy your property, but he would not loan you money? A. No, sir, when we did come in contact about borrowing money, he never changed a word. Q. Well now, John, after September 1st, the date the first payment was defaulted, Exhibit B, did you have a conversation with Mr. T. Y. Williams about this at or near his office on Main street? A. On which occasion? Q. Did you have it on any occasion? I remember after being ejected I asked him what would I do about getting it back? What would I do? He told me he didn't know. Q. Did you not tell him at this time that you had sold this land to Dr. McManus and that he had given you two years in which to pay it back, but that one of the payments was not due when you were ejected? A. No, sir; there was nothing at all mentioned with me and Mr. Williams about buying the place back. Q. Did you not tell him on that occasion that you had a right to buy the land back at any time before the last payment became due? A. No, sir; I didn't. I didn't tell him that, but I had two payments, and the last payment was the one I was expecting to pay the whole to him at once—on the two payments. There were two payments mentioned, and I was expecting to pay the whole thing in the last payment. Q. John, wasn't it definitely understood between you and Dr. McManus, and wasn't it so shown to be the agreement in the presence of Mr. Knight and Mr. Jones, that what you would deed to him was an absolute sale of this property and that he would give you two years in which to buy it back? A. No, sir; if I had knew it was a sale I never would have let him have it. Q. You write your own name, don't you? You read pretty well, don't you? A. No, sir; I am not expert. Q. Have you ever read a South Carolina decision? Have you ever read an argument before the Supreme Court? Did you ever borrow one from me to read? A. I have got one of yours now. Q. And yet you come here today and say you signed up papers you don't know anything about or that you did not understand? A. I did not say that. Q. Well, you know a title of real estate when you see it, don't you? A. Well, if you give a title, I have never given anybody a title. Q. Well, isn't that a title? (Witness shown deed.) A. This was never read to me; it was simply handed to me to sign. Q. Who handed it to you? A. Mr. Charlie Jones. Q. Did he tell you what it was? A. No, sir; he told me it was a contract between Mr. McManus and me. Q. Did he tell you what kind of a contract it was? A. No, sir; he didn't tell me what kind of a contract it was; that it was just like the one the Doctor made for me that I signed. Q. Well, you signed papers to Dr. McManus didn't you? And you have signed papers to Mr. Charlie Jones, have you not? A. Yes, sir. Q. And who else have you ever signed papers to? A. Ed Davis. Ed Davis was the first man I ever started with. Q. And you want the referee to believe, with all sorts of business that you have done, and as well as you have managed to take care of yourself and attend to the affairs of life, that you do not know a title to real estate, and did not not know what you were doing? A. I never signed no title to real estate unless I was going to sell it. It was only a simple mortgage. Q. You sign it when you want to sell it, but not otherwise? A. I have never wanted to sell it. If Doctor had given me a little time, I never would have sold it. Q. John, don't you know if Dr. McManus had given you money on this property as a loan you would have taken a note or mortgage with 10 per cent. attorney's clause on it? A. That was what I was expecting giving him—a mortgage. I was expecting nothing but a mortgage. (Defendant offers in evidence deed from John Williams to R. C. McManus, dated the 5th day of September, 1905, Exhibit C.) Q. (By Referee). Did he demand that all papers be read over to him and explained? A. I asked Mr. Charlie Jones to tell me what it was. He said, 'It was just like the other one—a contract.'

"Redirect Examination (by Mr. Dunlap): Q. John, you were asked in regard to the money you borrowed from C. D. Jones and the others, in each instance did you give a similar paper to what you gave to Dr. McManus? A. No, sir; I only gave him a mortgage. Q. You were asked by Mr. Williams if you did not make application to Col. Springs for the loan of this money to pay off Dr. McManus. Now state to the court what Mr. Springs' reply was. (Objection [7] by Mr. Williams.) A. Mr. Springs said to me, 'Go and see would he take it.' And when I met Doctor and asked him would he take it, he said 'He did not have time to talk to me about it,' and went on off. And I went on back and told the Colonel he would not talk to me about it, and I never had any more to say to the Colonel about it. Q. You were asked about a conversation with Mr. T. Y. Williams, and you started to make a reply: what was your answer to Mr. Williams' question about the conversation which took place between you and Mr. T. Y. Williams? A. I went to Mr. Williams after I was ejected and asked him what would I do about it. He told me, 'I don't know.' And then I was left alone for what to do. I went then to Mr. Foster. Well, then, Mr. Williams and me was out, and when he told me he didn't know what to do I didn't know what to say.

"H. M. Dunlap, being duly sworn, testified as follows: On the 10th day of April, 1909, I tendered to Dr. R. C. McManus $364.98, being by my calculation the principal and interest on $300 to April 10, 1909. I had figured from the date of the bond for title of R. C. McManus from John Williams, and the amount was $364.98. I tendered this to Dr. McManus and announced I did so as the attorney for John Williams in payment of the mortgage held by him from John Williams. I announced to him the amount and asked him if he demanded that the money be counted. He stated first, 'I do not know what to say.' Then I asked him to either accept or decline the tender. He said, 'I will decline it, and refer you to my attorney, Mr. T. Y. Williams.' I then approached Mr. Williams, and he said, 'Of course, I will decline it.'"

The plaintiff rests.

Defendant offered in evidence proceedings by Caskey and Phillips, magistrates, in the petition of R. C. McManus, Plaintiff, v. John Williams, Defendant, to eject the defendant from the premises conveyed by his deed. On the 5th day of June, 1908, the defendant, R. C. McManus, under a claim of title, commenced a proceeding, under section 2421 of the Code of Laws of South Carolina (1902), to eject the plaintiff, John Williams, from the premises described in the complaint. The process, or pleadings, of the proceedings was duly and legally served upon the said John Williams on the said 5th day of June, 1908, said pleadings including the summons or rule to show cause, together with a verified complaint and copy of lease or bond for title. In both the rule to show cause and the complaint served upon the said John Williams, the said R. C. McManus specifically claimed title to the premises. That the said John Williams did not answer or demur by attorney, or otherwise, and did not appear, personally or by attorney, on the day set in the summons or rule to show cause for the hearing of said cause. The case was heard and submitted to a properly impaneled jury, and the said jury found for the said R. C. McManus, and the said John Williams was thereupon ejected from the premises under a warrant of the court.

"G. F. Payseur, being duly sworn, testified as follows: Q. I asked the plaintiff here, John Williams, if some time shortly after the execution of this deed to R. C. McManus and the execution of the bond for title from Dr. McManus to him, if he did not tell you here in the town of Lancaster that he could borrow the money on the place from Dr. McManus, but had sold it to him, but that Dr. McManus gave him the right to buy it back within two years. State whether or not he did tell you that? A. He did. He told me that. Q. I asked him later on, when you all were putting lightning rods on the residence of Mr. Gregory, if he did not have a further conversation with you in which he told you that he had been unable to borrow the money from Dr. McManus, but had sold it to Dr. McManus. Sold the property to Dr. McManus with the right to buy it back within two years without paying any rent? A. He did. Q. He denied it Mr. Payseur. Now state whether or not he told you. A. He did; yes, sir. (Objection [8] by plaintiff as to the first contradiction as announced by Mr. Payseur, referring to the purchase of this property from John Williams, by Dr. McManus, on the ground that a proper foundation for the contradiction was not laid.) Q. Mr. Payseur, when was this? A. This was spring a year ago. Court was in session, the second week of the March term, last year. Q. Then that would be in the spring of 1909? A. A year ago next week. The second week of court.

"T. Y. Williams, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

"Direct examination (by Mr. Williams): Q. I asked the plaintiff, John Williams, whether or not he had a conversation with you when I examined him, this morning, and he stated that he did have a conversation with you. I asked him if he had not said to you that he had sold this property to Dr. McManus, but the last payment under his contract to buy it back was not due at the time he was ejected. And he stated that he had not. Please state whether he did or not. A. Well, I do not recollect any such a conversation after the time he was ejected. I suppose I had as many as one-half dozen conversations with John prior to the time he was ejected in regard to giving up possession to Dr. McManus, who was in possession of this property. These conversations, I suppose, covered a period of three, four, or probably six months. What I mean by this is during the months previous to the time he was ejected, I talked with him and tried to get him to surrender possession of the property without forcing us to eject him. Dr. McManus had turned the papers over to me and authorized me to get possession of the property. He always claimed to me that he had two years from the time the papers were executed to pay for the property, and refused to deliver possession because he stated the two years had not expired. He never claimed to me in any conversation I ever had with him that this property had been mortgaged, nor any claim other than that he had sold the property to Dr. McManus and had two years in which to redeem it. I suppose this claim was made to me in every conversation I had with him on four, five, or six different occasions. (Attorney for the plaintiff objects [9] to all of the testimony of witness T. Y. Williams, in so far as the attempts to contradict John Williams, in that the intended contradiction was laid so far after he was ejected. The witness states that his conversations were all prior to the ejectment.) Q. Please state whether or not you were at that time and are now familiar with the real estate values in the town of Lancaster and vicinity. A. I was then and am now. Q. From your knowledge of such values, what would you say was the value of the property when the deed was executed on the date of September, 1906, one-fourth acre, I believe, is here described? A. Well, leaving out the one-fourth of an acre, which includes the railroad's right of way, which they have the right to use in such manner as they see fit for railway purposes, that would not leave more than one-eighth of an acre outside of the railroad's right of way. The house on it, I suppose, would be worth about $75. I wouldn't give anything for it, but I suppose at the time it was put up it would cost about $75. It is built of cheap lumber, poorly constructed. I don't think it would be worth more than $150. I wouldn't give more than that for it, and I think that $300 for the house and lot was an excessive price.

"Cross-examination (by Mr. Dunlap): Q. That is based upon the fact that it is about one-eighth of an acre of land? A. Why, I know the lot, Mr. Dunlap, as thoroughly as I know my own lot; it is just across the road from me. One side is the right of way of the railroad and the other side is a ditch, and except to get John Williams out of there and to get him out of the vicinity I would not pay over $150 for it. Q. The point you made, Mr. Williams, was that this one-fourth of an acre included the railroad's right of way; therefore that he could not have more than one-eighth of an acre of land; then the balance of your testimony would be based upon one-eighth of an acre? A. No, sir; what I said was this: One-fourth of an acre, as described in the deed, covers the railroad's right of way; that this right of way was included in it, and if the railroad saw fit to use it for railroad purposes—which it has—taking out this right of way, would leave about one-eighth of an acre. I would say this—considering that to be a fact, which it is—I thought that the $300 was excessive, and stated further, to get John Williams away, I would not give over $150 for the lot including that part of it covered by the right of way of the railroad.

"Dr. R. C. McManus, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

"Direct examination (by Mr. Williams): Q. Doctor, you are the defendant in this case.

Doctor, is that the deed set up in the complaint in this case? A. Yes, sir. (This is Exhibit C.) Q. Doctor, it is alleged in the complaint and sworn to by the plaintiff that this deed, Exhibit C, was intended as a mortgage and was not intended by executing this deed to convey the title to the property described in the deed. State whether or not this is true. A. The statement is not true. It was intended as a deed. Q. Did you ever loan John Williams any money? A. No, sir. Q. How much did you pay him for the lot? A. $300. Q. Did you have any agreement with him at this time about selling him the lot back? A. Yes. Q. Is that agreement expressed in the bond for title, which has been proven already? A. Yes; that is the agreement. Q. Was there any other agreement between you and John Williams as to this lot except as it is expressed and set down in the Exhibit C and the bond for title, Exhibit B? A. There was not. Q. Doctor, I notice that the first installment due on the bond for title was $174 on September 1, 1907. Was that payment made? A. It was not. Q. Did John Williams ever offer you that $174 on or about September 1, 1907? A. No, sir. Q. Did any one else—any one representing him—offer you the first payment of $174 on or before September 1st, when it was due? A. No, sir. Q. Had any payment been made to you on account of the bond at any time prior to the ejectment case? The time John was ejected from the premises? A. No, sir. Q. Mr. Dunlap and Dr. Foster testified to tendering you some money on a mortgage some time after the ejectment proceedings. Do you remember when that was? A. I do not remember. It was after the ejectment proceedings. Q. Had anybody, Doctor, ever made any claim to you until after these ejectment proceedings that this deed was a mortgage? A. No, sir. Q. When did you first hear of this claim as to that? A. When Mr. Dunlap came to me and made this tender after John had been ejected from the premises. Q. After John had been ejected from the premises? A. Yes, sir.

"Cross-examination (by Mr. Dunlap): Q. Doctor, you admit that you agreed that there were to be two payments, each of $174, one due September 1, 1907, and another due September 1, 1908, do you not? A. Yes, sir. Q. You admit that Williams had the right to pay either of these any time up to September 1, 1908, or both of them? A. No. Q. Your contract does not provide that upon the failure to meet either of the two installments of $174 that the whole amount shall not become due? A. No, sir; upon failure to meet the first installment all shall become due. This is my understanding. My understanding was that time was the essence of the contract, and a failure to meet the first payment at the specified time, the whole became due. Q. Doctor, you do know that John Williams was ejected prior to September 1, 1908? A. I don't know the exact date. Q. Doctor, what did you mean by your answer awhile ago? A. I mean that he had a bond for title, and he had a specified time in which to buy this land back, and if he failed to make this first payment, time being the essence of the contract, that he then lost his right to buy the land back. Q. Do you remember what costs you paid, Doctor, in the ejectment proceedings? A. I think it was $19.80. Q. To whom were those costs paid? A. W. P. Caskey. I think it was about $19.80. Receipt may be for more than that. (Objection [10] by Mr. Dunlap on the ground that Dr. McManus was not legally bound to pay these costs, except that he being the plaintiff in the action and the only redress against Williams would be a judgment against Williams.) Q. John testified this morning that he didn't know what he was signing when he signed this deed. That it was not explained to him or read to him. State whether or not this is true? (Objection [11] by the plaintiff upon the ground that it is an opinion.)

"J. H. Knight, being duly sworn, testified as follows: Q. Mr. Knight, you are a witness to this deed from John Williams to R. C. McManus, are you not? You are also a witness to bond for title to John Williams? That is your signature, is it not, with Mr. Jones for the bond? A. Yes, sir. Q. Will you state whether or not it was understood that this was an absolute sale between the parties? A. When this deed was executed, it was to carry absolute title to the property described. (Plaintiff objects [12] upon the ground that this is an opinion.) Q. Mr. Knight, have you ever heard John Williams attempt to borrow money from Dr. McManus on this property? A. Yes, sir; three or four times. Q. Did Mr. McManus consent to loan him money? A. He refused to loan him money. Q. Did you ever hear Dr. McManus say he would not loan money on this property? A. I did. I have heard him further say he might buy it from him, but he would not loan him money on it. Q. Is it not a fact that he pestered him so much about borrowing money on the property that Dr. McManus lost his temper? Q. The last time that I remember John Williams coming in the store and asked Dr. McManus to loan him some money on the lot he refused to talk to him, and John went out, and the next thing that I remember I was back in the store at work. Dr. McManus and one or two others, to the best of my recollection, and John Williams was talking over the matter, and Dr. McManus called me up to the office and told me he wanted me to witness the papers. After John Williams went out of the door, I says to Dr. McManus: 'You have got the land; you have got the land.' (Plaintiff objects [13] to all of the testimony of Mr. Knight in so far as it refers to conversation, deeds, and acts prior to the signing of the deed and bond for title. And, further, that part of the testimony after the bond for title and deed have been signed that refer to a conversation between Mr. McManus and himself in the absence of John Williams.)

"H. H. Horton, being duly sworn, testified as follows: Q. Mr. Horton, where do you reside, and what official position do you hold, if any? A. I am auditor for Lancaster county. Q. Will you state what property was returned by John Williams for taxation in 1906? A. One lot and a house. Q. Will you state whether any transfer to the lot was made on your books in the fall of that year or not? A. When I went to make up my duplicate for 1907 to enter the property on for taxation, I found in making the transfer, I found on the books where the transfer was made: 'September 5th, John Williams to R. C. McManus, one (1) lot, $300.00.' And I made the transfer from John Williams to R. C. McManus in 1907. Q. Since that time will you please state who has returned that property and paid the taxes on it? A. Dr. McManus. Q. John Williams said this morning that he paid 1907 and 1908 taxes on it, Mr. Horton? A. No, sir; he never paid. Q. Mr. Horton, are you positive that Dr. McManus paid the taxes on this property in 1907? A. Yes, sir. Q. Are you certain he paid them in 1908? A. I am certain in 1908 and 1909. Q. Are you positive in 1907? A. I will not be positive unless I go back and look at the books. I am satisfied that it is not charged up to John Williams, and it must have been paid by Dr. McManus."

The following are rulings of referee on objections to testimony:

Objection 1. "In the argument before me this objection was waived by counsel for defendant."

Objection 2. "Waived in the argument."

Objection 3. "Testimony of J. F. Griffin stricken out."

Objection 4. "Objection sustained. The checks to Williams and Massey being the best evidence of the amounts received by each of them."

Objection 5. "So much of this answer as refers to what was said and done by the parties at the time admitted. The balance of this answer held incompetent."

Objection 6. "Objection sustained."

Objection 7. "The defendant on cross-examination having brought out a part of the conversation between Williams and Springs, this objection is overruled, and the answer to the question is admitted."

Objection 8. "Objection overruled; the time and place was sufficiently laid for the contradiction."

Objection 9. "I hold the above testimony incompetent for the purpose of contradiction, but competent for the purpose of throwing light on the question as to whether plaintiff sold the land in question to defendant or whether he merely obtained a loan on the land."

Objection 10. "Overruled."

Objection 11. "No answer to question, but I rule the latter competent as to whether deed was read or explained to plaintiff."

Objection 12. "The witness Knight being present at the transaction between the parties, I rule the answer to the question competent."

Objection 13. "This objection is sustained to the extent that I hold incompetent so much of Knight's testimony as relates to conversations with defendant in the absence of plaintiff; otherwise the objection is overruled."

Dunlap & Dunlap, for appellant. Williams & Williams, for respondent.

WATTS, J. On September 6, 1906, John Williams was the owner of a certain tract of land in the town of Lancaster, and on that day made a deed to R. C. McManus for the property, and McManus contemporaneously made a bond for title for the said property due and payable, September 1, 1907, for $174, and on September 1, 1908, for $174. That John Williams failed to pay the amount due September 1, 1907, and under ejectment proceedings June 5, 1908, issued out of magistrate's court, he was ejected from said property, and since said time McManus has been in possession. On May 22, 1909, this action was commenced by Williams to declare the said deed a mortgage and to require McManus to make a deed for the property upon the payment of the amount due. After issue joined, the matter was referred to John T. Green, Esq., who filed his report containing his conclusions of law and fact and sustaining the contentions of defendant, and holding that the deed was intended as written. To this report plaintiff excepted, questioning pretty much all of his findings both as to law and facts. Judge Shipp heard the case upon these exceptions and made a decree sustaining the referee, Mr. Green, and in his decree says: "I have carefully read the evidence offered in this case and the report of the referee. The referee carefully took all the evidence and made an able report on the facts and the law of the case. I fully concur with the referee in both his conclusions of fact and law, and, accordingly, the exceptions are overruled." Plaintiff appeals from this decree and questions his honor's decision and all his findings both as to law and fact.

The report of the referee should be reported in this case. He finds as a fact: That on numerous occasions prior to the date of execution of deed and bond for title, the plaintiff wished to borrow money from the defendant on lot in question. Defendant would not make the loan on the lot, but offered to buy if plaintiff would sell. That when papers were executed one Massey held a mortgage on the lot in question for $200, which plaintiff was unable to pay. That the plaintiff was a colored man of more than ordinary intelligence. That he could read and write, and no advantage was taken of him in the execution of the papers. That the deed and bond were executed at the same time, and before the same witnesses. That the plaintiff remained in possession of the premises after execution of papers until he was ejected by legal proceedings, under warrant of ejection, issued by two magistrates under section 2421 of the Code of Laws on June 22, 1908. That since deed of conveyance McManus paid taxes on the premises. That no money was paid or tendered to McManus on bond for title up to the time of ejectment. That on April 10, 1909, Mr. Dunlap, as attorney for plaintiff, made a tender to defendant for $364.98 and demanded that he execute a deed for lot in question, claiming that the amount tendered was "in payment of the mortgage held by him from John Williams," and that McManus refused the same. He finds from all the facts and testimony in the case taken by him, and from his knowledge of the character of the witnesses examined: That the deed of conveyance was a deed, and not intended as a mortgage, and that there was a contract to resell to Williams within a stipulated time and upon conditions therein fully expressed. That the price of $300, the sum paid to Williams for lot, was the full value of the lot at the time of sale. In the bond for title we find this: "And it is expressly agreed by and between the parties aforesaid that 'time is the essence of this contract,' and that in the event of nonpayment of the said sum of money or any part thereof, promptly at the time herein limited, that then the said R. C. McManus is absolutely discharged from any and all liability to make and execute such deed and may treat the said John Williams as tenant holding over after the termination or contrary to the terms of his lease; or if he prefer so to do he may enforce payment of the purchase money." It will be borne in mind that we have findings of fact by referee concurred in by the trial judge.

[1, 2] Was the deed of conveyance from Williams to McManus a mortgage or absolute sale? For while it is undoubtedly true that a deed which appears on its face to be an absolute conveyance may in equity be declared a mortgage if the evidence be sufficient to show that such was the intention of the parties, yet it is equally true that the presumption is that the deed is what on its face it purports to be—an absolute conveyance—and to establish its character as a mortgage, the evidence must be clear, unequivocal, and convincing, for otherwise the natural presumption will prevail. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1196; Arnold v. Mathison, 3 Rich. Eq. 153; Petty v. Petty, 52 S. C. 54, 29 S. E. 406.

[3] "Whether any particular transaction amounts to a mortgage or absolute sale, with an agreement allowing the vendor to repurchase the lands at a special price and within a time limited, must to a large extent depend upon its own special circumstances, for the question finally turns in all cases upon the real intention of the parties as shown upon the face of the writings or disclosed by the extrinsic evidence." 3 Pom. Eq. § 1195; Brown v. Bank, 55 S. C. 70, 32 S. E. 816. The evidence in this case satisfies me that the minds of Williams and McManus met, and they fully understood each other when the papers were executed herein. McManus would not loan Williams any money on mortgage, but purchased the land at a fair and adequate price, and in no manner overreached Williams, and the real intention of the parties, as disclosed by the evidence, was that it was an absolute deed. At the same time, it was the intention of the parties if Williams could comply with the terms and conditions of the bond for title, and promptly meet the payments therein provided for, McManus was to reconvey the property to him. Williams understood that he was selling to McManus, and that if he did not promptly meet the payments, as provided for, that his right to have the lot reconveyed to him would be defeated. It is "so nominated in the bond," because the agreement was that "time is the essence of this contract," and upon the nonpayment of the said sum of money, or any part thereof, promptly at the time herein limited, that McManus is absolutely discharged from any and all liability to make and execute such deed and could treat Williams as a tenant holding over. Williams was neither a lunatic nor a fool, but, on the contrary, was of ordinary intelligence, and there is some proof that he consulted a competent attorney. If it was intended as a mortgage by McManus, we are bound to conclude that he did not act as a good business man, in that he made no provision to reimburse himself for any necessary expenses that he might be put to in the enforcement of his legal rights. The courts are to enforce contracts as they are made, and not to relieve parties who become dissatisfied or think they have made a poor trade.

Ejectment proceedings were instituted on June 5, 1908, by McManus, under section 2421 of the Code, to eject Williams from the premises, and on that day a summons and a complaint was duly served on him. The complaint was verified, and the copy of bond for title was served also. In these proceedings McManus specifically claimed title to the premises. Williams failed to answer or appear in person or by attorney on the day for the hearing. The case was heard and submitted to a jury, properly impaneled, and the jury found for McManus, and Williams was ejected from the premises under a warrant of the court. This is a circumstance going to show that Williams knew by that by his noncompliance with the terms and conditions of the payments, as provided for in the bond for title, that he had forfeited his claims thereunder, and submitted to the ejectment. He was ejected on June 22, 1908, and on May 22, 1909, 11 months from that time, he commenced this suit having on April 10, 1909, through his attorney Dunlap, made a tender to McManus of the sum of $364.98, with a demand that he execute to him a deed of conveyance claiming that the sum tendered was "in payment of the mortgage held by him from John Williams." So it is seen that nearly 10 months after the ejectment is the first time that we hear of any contention on the part of Williams that the deed, absolute on its face, was a mortgage. Property might have gone up in value in that time. The evidence shows that, while Williams remained in possession, McManus paid the taxes.

[4] Where "time is made the essence of the contract," the parties are bound by the time limited in the contract, and the vendee forfeits his rights by a failure to comply within the specified time. Doar v. Gibbs, Bailey, Eq. 371. In this case it was agreed that "time is the essence of this contract," and the plaintiff failed to pay taxes as they became due and failed to meet the first payment due, September 1, 1907, as he had obligated himself to do. Then he forfeited all rights he had under the contract to recover. In the case of Davenport v. Latimer, 53 S. C. 572, 31 S. E. 633, Justice Jones says: "Generally a vendee cannot maintain an action against vendor for specific performance of a contract to sell land, unless he shows that he complied with, or offered to comply with, the contract on his part and was refused by the vendor. But since equity leans to compensation, in preference to forfeiture, the vendee, if he cannot show exact compliance with the contract on his part, may still have a specific performance or compensation, provided he is not guilty of laches in the assertion of his claim and stands ready and willing to comply, and shows reason satisfactory to the court in excuse of his failure to comply." The plaintiff in this case has not brought himself within the principle, for he went into a contract with his eyes open. He knew what he was doing. He obligated himself to pay taxes on the land he was to pay $174 for on September 1, 1907, and the same amount on September 1, 1908. He knew that "time was the essence of the contract," and yet he failed to pay taxes and the $174 due September 1, 1907, and made no effort to do so, and when served with ejectment proceeding papers on June 5, 1908, he did not pay or attempt to pay it. On April 10, 1909, he tendered the amount through his attorney and demanded deed and commenced this action May 22, 1909. All of this shows there was no excuse for his default, and from all the evidence in the case, we conclude that the natural, logical, and proper conclusion is that he was at fault, and whatever rights he had on the bond for title he forfeited by failure to comply with the conditions he had obligated himself to perform.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

GARY, C. J., and WOODS and HYDRICK, JJ., concur.

FRASER, J. I concur in the result. The transaction here originated in an application for a loan. There was a contract to convey and reconvey as a part of the same transaction. The law, as I understand it, is well stated in Pomeroy's Eq. Jurisp. vol. 3, p. 171, § 1194: "Where land is conveyed by an absolute deed and an instrument is given back as a part of the same transaction, not containing the conditions ordinarily inserted in mortgages, but being an agreement that the grantee will reconvey the premises if the grantor shall pay a certain sum of money at or before a special time, the two taken together may be what on their face they purport to be—a mere sale with a contract of repurchase—or they may constitute a mortgage. In the first case, where the transaction is merely a sale and contract of repurchase, the agreement must be fulfilled according to its terms. If the grantor fails to pay the money at the stipulated time, all his rights, either at law or in equity, under the contract, are gone. There is no equity of redemption. In the second case, if the transaction be a mortgage, all the qualities and incidents of a mortgage attach, whatever be its external form, and whatever be the collateral stipulations. The maxim, 'Once a mortgage, always a mortgage,' applies to this condition with especial emphasis."

It is sometimes a very nice question as to whether a contract to convey and a contract to reconvey, executed at the same time, is to be taken as an absolute conveyance, with a mere right to repurchase, or whether the two papers together constitute a mortgage. If Williams, from the first, had claimed that this transaction amounted to a mortgage, he may have had a cause which this court could have sustained. He did not speak when he ought to have spoken, permitted himself to be turned out of possession, and for eight months laid no claim to the place, and it seems to me that whatever doubts the court may have had are solved against him. Courts ought to construe contracts between parties to be what on their face they purported to be, and, if otherwise, clear and convincing proof according to the strict rules of law must be furnished to show that they are not.

It seems to me that Williams' conduct is inconsistent with the position of a mortgagor, and for this reason I concur in the result.

JONES et al. v. BELLINGER et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. March 12, 1912.)

DEEDS (§ 133*)—VESTED REMAINDERS—TERMINATION OF LIFE ESTATE BY SUBJECTING ESTATE TO DEBT.

A deed conveyed land to a husband and wife for their joint lives, and after the death of either to the survivor for life, and after the death of both to the child or children of the husband and wife living at the death of the survivor and their heirs, any child of a predeceased child to take the share to which he would have been entitled, had his parents survived the life tenant, and provided that if any creditor should attempt to subject the life estate to the payment of the debts of either of the life tenants that the life estate should immediately determine, and that the remainder should vest immediately and absolutely in the remainderman. Held that, upon the threat and attempt of the mortgagee of the surviving life tenant to foreclose and subject the land to the payment of the debt, the surviving life tenant's interest terminated, and the title to the lands vested immediately in the children of the grantees, all of whom were living, to the exclusion of the grandchildren.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action for construction of a deed by Laura Bellinger Jones and others against Melvina Bellinger and others; the infant defendants appearing by W. H. Jones, their guardian ad litem. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The master's report, approved by the trial court, is as follows:

"The master, to whom the above-entitled cause was referred to take the testimony and report the same, together with his findings of fact, and conclusions of law, begs leave to report:

"That he has taken the testimony, notes of which are hereto attached. That from the evidence he finds: That on the 11th day of October, A. D. 1892, one A. T. Woodward conveyed to the late Martin Bellinger and the defendant Melvina Bellinger the lot of land described in the complaint, upon the following limitations: 'To have and to hold all and singular the said premises unto the said Martin Bellinger and his wife, Melvina Bellinger, for and during their joint lives and after the death of either, then to the survivor for and during the balance of his or her life; and after the death of both, then to such child or children of the said wife by him begotten as shall be alive at the death of the said survivor and their heirs, any child or children of a predeceased child or children to take the share or shares to which he, she or they, would have been entitled had their parents survived said life tenant: Provided nevertheless that the power is hereby expressly granted the said life tenants by their joint deed, or in the case of the death of either, by the deed of the survivor, may sell and convey said premises in fee simple, reinvesting the proceeds thereof in real estate of like value, taking conveyances therefor having like trusts and limitations as are herein contained. And further provided that if at any time any creditor or creditors shall attempt to subject the life estate hereby conveyed to the payment of the debts of either of said life tenants, then and in that case the estate, right, title and interest shall immediately cease and determine, and all of his or her interest and estate herein shall pass and vest in the other life tenant of them living, and if dead, then the remainder shall vest immediately and absolutely in the remaindermen.' That Dr. Martin Bellinger, one of the life tenants, died about the year 1893, more than eight years ago, leaving surviving him the other life tenant, who was his wife, and their three children, who are the plaintiffs in this action. Only one of these children has married, and she (Mrs. Laura Bellinger Jones) has three children, the infant defendants named in the complaint, each of whom is under the age of 14 years, and appears in this action by his or her father, W. H. Jones, as his or her guardian ad litem. That on the 1st day of November, 1911, Mrs. Melvina Bellinger became indebted to Idis Brabham in the sum of $500 to be paid him December 1, 1911, together with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and in order to secure the payment of said debt gave said Brabham a mortgage on the lot in question; and said Brabham now asks that the lot be sold in order to pay said debt, and for judgment for the amount thereof against Mrs. Melvina Bellinger. That upon the threat of Brabham to foreclose said mortgage the plaintiffs filed this complaint, claiming that the interest and estate of Mrs. Melvina Bellinger in said lot had ceased, and that the title to said lot had thereupon become vested in the plaintiffs under the limitations contained in said deed.

"I conclude, as matter of law, that the defendant Idis Brabham is entitled to judgment against the defendant Melvina Bellinger in the sum of $504.33, including interest to the date of this report at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. That in consequence of the threat and attempt of Idis Brabham to subject said lot to the payment of the debt due him by Mrs. Melvina Bellinger, under the provisions of the mortgage given by her, Mrs. Bellinger's interest and estate in said lot ceased and determined, and the title to said lot became, under the terms of said deed, vested in the plaintiffs in fee.

"As said by the Hon. S. W. G. Shipp in the case of Symmes v. Cauble (affirmed in 85 S. C. 438, 439, 67 S. E. 549), 'the creditor had the right to terminate his (the life tenant's) estate, and that was the extent of their power. They had no right to make the estate or any part of it their own.' This construction of the clause in the deed is also sustained by the decisions in the leading case of Heath v. Bishop, 4 Rich. Eq. 46, 55 Am. Dec. 654; Howe v. Gregg, 52 S. C. 88, 29 S. E. 394.

"Inasmuch as the deed provides that the life estate of Mrs. Bellinger shall immediately cease and determine upon the attempt of the creditor being made to subject the life estate to the payment of his debt, it at the same time provided for the acceleration and immediate vesting of what would otherwise be contingent remainders in the plaintiffs until the death of their mother, liable to being defeated by their death before her. This is in accord with the general doctrine that the estate in remainder must vest immediately upon the termination of the life estate supporting it. Geiger v. Brown, 2 Strob. Eq. 859, note. If the estate in remainder were still contingent, it would fall with the supporting life estate. Hence my conclusion that the estate in remainder vested in the children of Dr. and Mrs. Bellinger immediately upon the termination of the life estate in Mrs. Bellinger, to the exclusion of the grandchildren, infant defendants, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief demanded in the complaint. As the plaintiffs receive the greater benefits under this litigation, they should pay the costs of this action."

W. H. Townsend, for appellants. G. Duncan Bellinger, for guardian ad litem of infant appellants. James H. Hammond, for respondents.

WATTS, J. This is an appeal from a decree of Judge Shipp, confirming in a short order the report of H. L. O'Bannon, Esq., master for Barnwell county, made in the above case. The report of master should be printed in the case.

For the reasons set out by the master in his able report, we think there is no error in Judge Shipp's decree confirming the same, and adopting it as the decree and judgment of the court and under the authorities quoted in said report and his conclusions.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 337*)—TIME FOR TAKING PROCEEDINGS—PREMATURE PROSECUTION.

In an action to recover land, where both parties claimed under a will, and counsel for the parties entered into an agreement to submit to the presiding judge, without a jury, a construction of the will, reserving the right to a trial on the facts after the court has construed the will, and the judge, in rendering his opinion construing the will, proceeds to enter a decree that the devisee under whom defendant claimed took a fee simple to the land, and that the land could not be recovered in the pending suit, a writ of error, prosecuted without trial on the facts, is premature, since a holding by the appellate court contrary to that of the trial judge in construing the will would require a trial of the facts.

Error from Superior Court, Warren County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by Mrs. J. T. Perdue and others against T. L. Anderson, administrator. From the judgment, both parties bring error. Writ of error dismissed.

L. D. McGregor, for plaintiffs in error. E. P. Davis, for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. No case can be brought to the Supreme Court upon a bill of exceptions, so long as it is pending in the court below, unless the decision or judgment complained of, if it had been rendered as claimed by the plaintiff in error, would have been a final disposition of the case, or final as to some material party thereto. To an interlocutory decree a bill of exceptions pendente lite may be filed. Civil Code, § 6138.

In the present case an action of complaint to recover 135 acres of land was brought. In the petition it was alleged that both parties claimed by virtue of the terms of a will, and that a devise was made to a certain legatee, defeasible upon a condition which had happened, and that the defendant claimed under such devise, and therefore had no title. The defendant denied holding all of the land under such devise, but alleged that a certain interest in the property of the testator passed to another legatee, who had conveyed it for a consideration to the devisee first mentioned; that there had been a subsequent division of the property, and that 114 acres, forming a part of that in controversy, had been set apart as the share thus conveyed. Counsel for the parties entered into an agreement to submit to the presiding judge, without a jury, a construction of the will, but expressly provided in the agreement of submission: "Neither party waives his or her right to a trial of the case on the facts after the court has construed the will." And also: "By this agreement and the judgment of the court on the same neither party is to be concluded on the facts of the case; and the question as to how much land W. S. Pate [the legatee who was alleged to have conveyed his interest] received as legatee under the will of Nathan Pate is left open to be passed on by a jury, as are all of the other facts in this case, except such as are herein agreed upon." Thereupon the presiding judge filed an opinion construing the will in a manner which would result favorably to the defendant. In the beginning of the opinion he referred to the agreement submitting the construction of the will to him, "with all the rights reserved to the parties as set out in said agreement attached hereto." At the close of his opinion he stated: "It may be that what is above held by this court is as far as is necessary to go in this matter; but under the pleadings and agreed statement of facts in the submission of the construction of the will to the court, it may not be beyond the intent of the parties and the spirit of the submission to go further." He then stated that it was held, ordered, and decreed that the devisee under whom the plaintiff alleged that the defendant claimed took a fee-simple, indefeas-ible title to the land, "and that said land cannot be recovered in the suit pending."

[1-4] Under the enumerated circumstances, this ruling of the court was not such a final disposition of the case as to authorize it to be brought directly to this court by bill of exceptions. The parties did not agree for the presiding judge to enter a final judgment or decree in the case, but to adjudicate the proper construction of the will, reserving the right to further try the case on issues of fact before a jury. If this court should construe the will differently from the presiding judge in the court below, it would not terminate the case, but only be a step in the progress of the trial, and it would still remain open for trial upon other issues in accordance with the agreement of submission. If a single question of law is selected, and adjudication invoked upon it, and the case still left pending for trial on other issues, the issue submitted not necessarily controlling the whole case, this does not present a case for exception and for adjudication by this court, and a bill of exceptions brought for that purpose is premature.

1. DEMURRER TO PETITION.

The petition was not subject to any of the grounds of demurrer.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 588, 706*)—REVIEW—INSUFFICIENT BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

There being no bona fide effort to brief the evidence in the case, and the so-called brief of evidence contained in the record being largely composed of objections to evidence and the MASSACHUSETTS BONDING & INS. CO. v. REALTY TRUST CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 117*)—CONTRACTOR'S BOND—RELEASE OF SURETY.

Relatively to a surety on a contractor's indemnity bond, the owner of a building is not bound to withhold payments to the contractor, as stipulated and agreed in the contract, on the ground that the contractor is in default with the materialmen. Under the contract in this case, the contractor was to be paid in monthly installments, and the amount of the installment was to be fixed by the value of the materials and labor which entered into the construction of the building during the previous month, plus the agreed commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 283-285; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

2. EQUITY (§§ 51, 52*)—INDEMNITY AGAINST LIENS—ACTION ON BOND.

Where a contractor gave to the owner of a building which he was to construct a bond, with surety, conditioned for the faithful performance of his contract, and the owner brings an equitable suit against the contractor and his surety for breach of the bond, wherein it is alleged that numerous subcontractors and materialmen are claiming liens against the building, which liens are disputed, but, if established, will be valid liens against the property, and the claimants of the liens are made parties, and a reference of the claims of lien to a master is prayed, and judgment is asked against the contractor and his surety for the amount of such claims found to be valid and due, such suit is maintainable without prior payment of the liens by the owner, on the ground of avoidance of multiplicity of suits and circuity of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 167-172; Dec. Dig. §§ 51, 52.*]

3. EQUITY (§ 150*)—MULTIFARIOUSNESS.

Such a suit as is described in the preceding headnote is not multifarious for misjoinder of parties or causes of action.

4. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 117*)—CONTRACTOR'S BOND—RELEASE OF SURETIES.

The surety on the bond of a contractor for the faithful performance of a building contract is not released because at the time of the payment of the last installment of the contract price, pursuant to the terms of the contract, the work is incomplete and there are unpaid subcontractors and materialmen.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by the Realty Trust Company against the Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company brings error. Affirmed.

Dodd & Dodd, for plaintiff in error. Wimbish & Ellis, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. The Realty Trust Company contracted with H. L. Stevens to construct an office and theater building in the city of Atlanta. By the terms of the contract Stevens was to furnish all labor and material and to construct the building in conformity with the plans and specifications of an architect, at actual cost, plus 10 per cent., with a guaranty that the cost of the work should not exceed $160,000, exclusive of his commissions and of certain extras referred to in the contract. The contract stipulated that Stevens was to be "paid for the execution of the work covered by the contract and such other work as may be ordered as hereinafter provided, actual cost, plus 10 per cent., to be paid as follows: On the 1st day of each month the party of the first part shall be reimbursed for all expenditures incurred in connection with the work for the month previous, plus 5 per cent. The remaining 5 per cent. to be due and payable within ten days after the completion and acceptance of the work by the architect.

* * * In consideration of the payments to be made as herein provided, the party of the first part guarantees that the actual cost of the work to be performed by the party of the first part under this contract shall not exceed the sum of one hundred and sixty thousand ($160,000) dollars, not including the 10 per cent. hereinafter mentioned; and the party of the first part shall, if the cost exceeds this sum, complete said building as herein provided at his own expense." Pursuant to his agreement in the contract, Stevens gave to the Realty Company a bond in the sum of $50,000, with the Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Company as surety, conditioned for the faithful performance of his contract. This bond contained the following provision: "A substantial compliance with the contract herein referred to, on the part of the obligee herein, shall be a condition precedent to its right of recovery hereunder. And the obligee shall take from contractor, on the 1st day of each month, an itemized sworn statement of the amount and cost of labor employed and the amount and cost of material used or delivered to the contractor on the job for use in the building, and the obligee herein shall, at the same time, furnish the surety hereon with a true copy of such statement, by mailing the same to Fair Dodd, Atlanta, Georgia, its general agent."

The building was not completed by the contractor, and certain subcontractors and materialmen were claiming liens against the building, when the Realty Company filed its equitable petition against Stevens, the contractor, his surety, and the different claimants of liens. The petition alleged that Stevens entered upon his contract; that various monthly payments were made upon the architect's certificates during the progress of the work, according to the terms of the contract; that the last certificate of the architect included a sum which, added to the previous payments, exceeded the guaranteed contract price; that the plaintiff paid on this certificate $13,748.71, which completed the payment of the full contract price; that the plaintiff took from the contractor, on the 1st day of each month, an itemized sworn statement of the amount and costs of labor employed, and the amount of material used, and furnished a true copy of it to the Surety Company as provided in the bond; that Stevens, though having received the entire contract price, has abandoned his contract, and the plaintiff has undertaken to complete the building, and a stated sum will be required for this purpose; that 25 named subcontractors and materialmen are claiming liens for work done on the building and material furnished, and though plaintiff denies its property is liable to these liens, yet it maintains that the contractor and surety on his bond are liable for such sums as it might be required to pay on account of their claims of lien, if found to be valid liens against the plaintiff's property. A reference was prayed of these claims of lien to a master, to report as to the existence and amount of each, and the liability of the plaintiff's property therefor. Judgment was prayed against the contractor and his surety for such damages as accrued from the breach of the bond. General and special demurrers by the surety were overruled, and it excepted.

The subject-matter of the contract between Stevens and the Realty Company was the construction of a building upon stipulated terms. The contract provides that Stevens is to furnish all the labor and material, and construct the building according to the plans and specifications, at a cost not to exceed a guaranteed sum. The contract of the surety is that it is liable to the Realty Company to the extent of $50,000, unless "the said Stevens faithfully, well, and truly perform his said contract in erecting and completing said building according to all its terms and provisions and the provisions of the plans and specifications made a part of said contract." In effect, the surety guarantees that Stevens will complete the building according to the contract; that is, he will deliver the completed building to its owner for the contract price. The allegation is that Stevens has abandoned his contract without completing the building, that certain materialmen are claiming liens in a stated amount, and that a certain sum will be required to complete the building. According to the allegations of the petition, the contractor has breached the contract, and the Realty Company is entitled to sue.

[1] The demurrer challenges the right of the obligee to recover anything on account of liens for material used in the construction of the building. Relatively to a surety on a contractor's bond for the faithful performance of the building contract, the owner of the building was not bound to withhold the payments made to the contractor, where such payments are stipulated for and agreed upon in the contract, on the ground that the contractor is in default with the materialmen. Thomason v. Keeny, 8 Ga. App. 854, 70 S. E. 220; Hayden v. Cook, 34 Neb. 670, 52 N. W. 165. It is contended that the provision that "on the 1st day of each month the party of the first part shall be reimbursed for all expenditures incurred in connection with this work for the month previous, plus 5 per cent., the remaining 5 per cent. to be due and payable within ten days after the completion and acceptance of the work by the architect," contemplates that only such expenditures that were actually paid for by the contractor should be included in the monthly installments. We think this construction is too strained, when we consider the general scope and purpose of the bond. The contract reflects the intention of the parties that the contractor was to be paid in monthly installments, and the amount of the installment was to be fixed by the value of the materials and labor which entered into the construction of the building during the previous month, plus the agreed commission. Indeed, the provision in the bond that the obligee shall take from the contractor, on the 1st day of each month, an itemized statement of the amount and cost of labor and of the material used or delivered to the contractor on the job for use in the building, and furnish the surety with a true copy of it, indicates an appreciation by the surety that they may be a source of liability from liens for unpaid material; and it exacted monthly notices of the extent of the material and labor used, that it might be advised of the facts, so that it might take such steps as it should deem proper to avoid liability from this source.

[2] Again, it is insisted that the obligee cannot recover the amount of these liens until it has discharged them by payment. It is true that in a common-law action for a breach of contract of indemnity the damages are usually limited to actual loss. But this action is equitable in its nature, and calls for the application of equitable principles. It is alleged that numerous subcontractors and materialmen, 25 in number, are claiming liens to the aggregate amount of $48,768 upon the building and real estate upon which it is located, and, while denying liability to these several subcontractors and materialmen, they are made parties to the petition, and it is prayed that their claims of lien be referred to a master, who shall report the amounts due to them by the contractor, and to what extent, if any, they are liens against the building and real estate of the obligee. Unless this course is permissible, the owner of the building would be obliged to pay them at his risk, if paid without foreclosure, or await the pleasure of the materialmen to assert their liens within the statute of limitations, in as many suits as there are claims of lien, before he could have recourse on the bond. Such a requirement would result in vexatious delays and a multiplicity of suits, to prevent which equity will take cognizance and settle all the matters in one proceeding. By bringing the lienors into the case their rights will be fixed as against the plaintiff, and at the same time the extent of liability of the surety and its principal will be fixed.

[3] The joining of the lienors as defendants does not render the petition multifarious. Wilson v. Stillwell, 9 Ohio St. 467, 75 Am. Dec. 477. Our ruling in this respect does not in any way militate with the ruling in McGarry v. Selz, 129 Ga. 296, 58 S. E. 856. The bond in that case was essentially different from the one in the case at bar.

[4] After receiving the payment of the last installment of $13,748.71, it is alleged that Stevens abandoned his work, leaving it in an incomplete state, and did not apply this payment to subcontractors for material and labor. The surety set up in its demurrer that this last payment under these circumstances operated to discharge it from liability. The payments were made by the plaintiff to the contractor according to the stipulations in the contract, and the surety cannot claim as a release any act done by the plaintiff authorized by the contract. Duluth v. Heney, 43 Minn. 155, 45 N. W. 7; Leavel v. Porter, 52 Mo. App. 632.

The grounds of the demurrer are numerous, but we do not think they are meritorious. The foregoing principles which we have ruled control the essential points made by the demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al. v. TAYLOR.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 208, 222*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER.

A servant assumes the ordinary risks of his employment, and is bound to exercise his own skill and diligence to protect himself. Civil Code, § 3131; Stewart v. Seaboard Air-Line Ry., 115 Ga. 624, 41 S. E. 981; East Tenn. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 93 Ga. 570, 20 S. E. 70.

(a) In order for a servant to recover for an injury on the ground that it resulted from his compliance with a direct order of his master, or his master's representative, the servant must show that the order was a negligent one under the circumstances. If the order was negligent, and the servant knew of the peril of complying with it, or if he had equal means with his master of knowing of the peril, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known thereof, then he cannot recover for an injury received in complying with the order. 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, § 433 et seq.; Central R. Co. v. Kenney, 58 Ga. 486; Worlds v. Georgia R. Co., 99 Ga. 283, 25 S. E. 646; Daniel v. Forsyth, 106 Ga. 568, 32 S. E. 621; Hendrix v. Vale Royal Co., 134 Ga. 712, 68 S. 2. INSTRUCTIONS.

Civil Code, §§ 3130, 3131, in regard to the master's duty to employ competent servants and furnish proper machinery, were not applicable in their entirety to the facts of this case; but as the judgment must be reversed on another ground, it is unnecessary to decide whether the giving of such sections in charge to the jury would require the grant of a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by R. F. Taylor against the Southern Railway Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Taylor sued the Southern Railway Company and Avery for personal injuries. There was a verdict for the plaintiff against both defendants, whose motion for a new trial being overruled, they excepted. Upon the trial the evidence submitted in behalf of the plaintiff tended to show the following facts:

The plaintiff was 45 years old at the time he was injured, was a bridge carpenter, and had been engaged in work as such for off and on about 20 years. Avery was superintending and directing the work in reconstructing a trestle on the railway company's road. The plaintiff was working on the trestle, with others, under Avery. A plank was needed at the place where the work was being done by the plaintiff and others. He testified as follows: "Mr. Avery told us he would look us up one; so he went off, and me and several went on back with him, and he pointed this plank out, and told us to go to the end of the trestle and get a rope and tie to it and lift it to the top, so we could put it down across that. It was Mr. Avery that directed us to go and get this particular plank. To get it we had to go down there to it and tie a rope to it. I reckon it was 3 or 4 feet below the top of the trestle to where this plank lay, somewhere along there below the top surface. It was on the side of the bent at the outside of the ballast. * * * In getting down off the bridge, I got down right here on this cap [referring to a model of the trestle], and had my right side, my face, turned towards the trestle, you know, and caught around the tie and cap too, and put my right foot on the right edge of the plank, and then put the other one down, you know; straightened up to get in position on the plank, and it turned with me and threw me. What caused the plank to turn with me was not having a full bearing; did not have enough bearing here, you know, over the plank, the width of the plank. Before I got down on it, I could not see from where I was that it did not have a full bearing. It lapped over, you know, and I could not discover it. It was standing out straight. You could not tell about it from the position I would have to get down on it. * * * The plank rested on the sill, and did stick out over it, and covered it. You could not see under the plank. If you was down under the plank, you could tell what was under it. I could not. * * * In getting down on that plank, there was no place to get down on it other than the place I did get down. I could not see any other place, and there was no other place. That was a safe place to step down upon. You know, this scaffolding was the only place you could get on, and you would have to get down there to tie the rope to it. Mr. Avery told us to get a rope and get down on it. He came along ahead of us and pointed out this plank and told us, 'Here is one you can get.' He was hunting a loose plank, to carry it back for scaffolding, and he told us to get ropes and tie it, and move it down to the next place."

A witness for the plaintiff testified as follows in reference to the plank: "It had been there 5 or 6 days. It was not nailed. It was left there on Saturday when we quit, and it was there Monday morning. [The plaintiff was injured on Monday.] The trains passing would shake it a little. It would be bound to shake it. I don't know whether it would shake it off or not. * * * I heard Mr. Avery tell Mr. Taylor to get down and tie a rope around that plank, so that they could pull it up and move it to the next bent; and Mr. Taylor obeyed that order." Another witness testified: "This plank was put there for the purpose of serving on that part of the scaffolding. * * * I suppose the work was done there was the reason we were going to move that plank. * * * When Mr. Taylor got down on it, I suppose he could have stepped on the cap sill, instead of stepping on the plank. I don't know whether he could or not. I did not see the cap. I seen the plank, all right. I know the construction of it. I know that he could have stepped on the cap sill without stepping on the plank. This plank is something like 2½ feet below this top here. If you step off that point there, you have got to step around in that direction, then around and kind of under. I don't know how far it is from this top to underneath there, exactly. Of course, it is more inconvenient to go around down under there and get on that cap than to step on the 3x10 [the plank plaintiff got on]. It necessitates some strain from that point around underneath there, and on the plank. If this place had been sticking out as the plank, it would not have fallen. By close inspection any one could have discovered that this thing was not nailed, and that it did not stick out as far as the plank. By a casual observation I could not see it underneath there, how far it was under there." The witness had a model of the trestle before him when testifying.

There was evidence showing the nature and extent of the plaintiff's injuries, the amount he was earning at the time he was injured, and his life expectancy. The defendant introduced no evidence.

F. A. Cantrell and Maddox, McCamy & Shumate, for plaintiffs in error. Lawton Nalley and J. G. B. Erwin, Jr., for defendant in error.

ATKINSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] No complaint is made of any inherent weakness or other defect in the plank or the sills upon which it rested, or that the sills did not project sufficiently for the plank to have had a secure position upon them; but the whole complaint is merely that the plank, though loose, projected so far beyond the ends of the sills as to render it insecure, and when plaintiff rested his feet upon the outer edge it tilted, precipitating him and causing the injury. The plaintiff knew that the plank was not nailed, or otherwise fastened to the sills; in other words, that it was a loose plank. He saw that the ends of the sills upon which the plank rested did not extend beyond the plank, as he testified that he could not see the ends of the sills beyond the plank as he got down on it. Yet he undertook to stand on it, without any effort to ascertain whether it would be safe for him to do so, notwithstanding he knew that the plank was loose, and that the ends of the sills upon which it rested could not be seen beyond it. If Avery, the representative of the railway company, was with Taylor at the time the latter got down on the plank, the peril of doing so in obedience to Avery's order was no more apparent to the latter than to Taylor; and if the danger was hidden to both of them, and could not have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care, then Taylor could not recover, for he assumed the risk incident to getting on the plank. If the danger was obvious, then it was equally so to both Taylor and Avery. The plank did not constitute a part of the work planned by Avery, nor a part of the permanent structure of the trestle, but was merely a loose plank, left where a portion of the trestle had been completed. Considering the plaintiff's age, his long experience in bridge-building, and his knowledge of all the circumstances of the situation at the time he got upon the plank, and applying the principles announced in the first headnote to all the facts of the case, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

1. RAILROADS (§ 446*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO ANIMALS ON TRACK.

The evidence submitted in behalf of the plaintiff showing that his horses ran along the railway track ahead of the train, of their own accord, until, reaching a trestle, they fell into it and were injured, and that the train was moving very slowly, hardly faster than a man could walk, so that the horses had time to escape, and that the whistle was continuously blown to frighten them from the track, and that the disaster was caused by the horses following the track, when the character of the embankment along which they were running was such that they might have left the track without going upon the trestle, the plaintiff failed to prove a cause of action against the railway company, and the court erred in not granting a nonsuit. Gay v. Wadley, 86 Ga. 103, 12 S. E. 298.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 446.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 439*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO ANIMALS—PLEADING.

Under the allegations of the petition, the embankment and obstructions along it were such as to render it impossible for the horses to leave the track; and therefore the petition as amended was not subject to demurrer.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 843*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED.

As a nonsuit should have been granted, it is unnecessary to pass upon the grounds of the motion for a new trial.

1. WILLS (§ 641*)—CONSTRUCTION—PRIOR AND SUBSEQUENT ITEMS.

It is competent for a testator, in a subsequent item of a will, to impose restrictions and limitations upon a bequest made in a former item; and in the present case this was done in clear and unambiguous language.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1525-1527; Dec. Dig. § 641.*]

(Additional Syllabus by Editorial Staff.)

2. WILLS (§ 548*)—CONSTRUCTION—PRIOR AND SUBSEQUENT ITEMS.

A will left certain stock in three companies, subject to trusts or limitations over, specifying that the bequest was subject to a restriction in a later item of the will. Similar language as to a restriction in the later item was used in regard to another share, where there was no trust. By the third item a share in the estate, including stock in the same companies, was left to a son in fee simple. The fourth item directed that stock of the three companies should be held by the executors until January 1, 1925, and then distributed among the legatees mentioned in items 1 and 3 and certain paragraphs of item 2, "as in each of said items and paragraphs written," provided that, if any of the legatees should die before January 1, 1925, leaving no child or children, the income and dividends from the stock, as well as the stock, should revert to the estate and be distributed among the surviving children in equal shares. Held, that the provision as to reversion applied to the bequest contained in the third item, as well as to the other items of the will.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Jack Lamar and another, executors, against W. D. Lamar, executor. To a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs bring error, and defendant files a cross-bill of exceptions. Affirmed on main bill of exceptions, and cross-bill dismissed.

Mrs. Jack Lamar and Henry J. Lamar, Jr. (hereinafter called the Third), brought their equitable petition, alleging that they were the executrix and executor, respectively, of the last will and testament of Henry J. Lamar, deceased (called the Second), and praying for an accounting against Walter D. Lamar, as executor of the estate of Henry J. Lamar, Sr. (referred to in the petition as the First). It is alleged in the petition that the defendant, as executor aforesaid, is in possession of certain shares of stock which had been bequeathed by the third item of the will of Henry J. Lamar, Sr. (the First), to Henry J. Lamar, Jr. (the Second), in fee simple, and that petitioners are entitled to the possession of the stock so bequeathed and certain dividends and profits arising therefrom. It appears from the answer filed in the case that the executor of Henry J. Lamar, the First, differs with the petitioners in their construction of the will of their testator, insisting that the shares of stock referred to in the third item of the will were not bequeathed to the legatee named in that item in fee simple, but that the bequest was affected by certain restrictions and limitations appearing in another item of the will. The portions of the will material to a consideration of the issues in the case are as follows:

"Item 1st. I devise and bequeath unto my son, Henry J. Lamar, Jr., in trust for my grandson, Henry J. Lamar Washington," certain property, describing it. "The income and interest of the money and property herein bequeathed, as well as that arising from the aforesaid residence lot in Nashville, Tenn., or so much thereof as may be necessary, is to be used by said trustee for the support, maintenance and education of my said grandson during his minority, provided he remains under the control and influence of, and is domiciled with my immediate family, or some member thereof; but in the event my grandson should be removed beyond the limits of the state of Georgia, or should otherwise be taken from the control and influence of my immediate family, or some member thereof, or his domicile be changed therefrom, said income, interest and profits shall no longer be applied to his support, maintenance and education, and all of said income, interest and profits not expended by reason of the direction aforesaid, shall not pass with the money and other property herein bequeathed to him, but shall revert to and become a part of my estate for equal distribution amongst my children as hereinafter directed." Testator then proceeds to give certain directions about the property bequeathed to his said grandson, and closes item 1st as follows:

"Having received by due transfer all the parental powers of his father over my said grandson, I hereby appoint Henry J. Lamar, Jr., guardian of his person, and in event of his failure or inability to act, I appoint Walter D. Lamar such guardian in his stead.

"The bequest of the Lamar & Rankin Drug Company stock, the 'S. S. S.' (Swift's Syphilitic Specific) Company stock and the Bradfield Regulator stock, herein made, is subject to the restrictions hereinafter imposed by a subsequent item of this, my will.

"Should Henry J. Lamar, Jr., from any cause be unable to act as trustee for my said grandson, then I appoint Walter D. Lamar trustee in his stead, with all the powers herein conferred upon Henry J. Lamar, Jr., as trustee."

"Item 2nd. I will and direct that all the residue of my estate, of whatever the same may consist and wheresoever the same may be situated, shall be divided into six equal shares or parts and shall be disposed of as follows, each legatee, however, to account for such advancements, as have heretofore or may hereafter be made, as stated in subsequent clauses of this will, but without liability for interest thereon:

"(A) To my son, Walter D. Lamar, one such sixth equal share which I direct shall consist, in part, of my lands in Butts," etc., giving him also stock in all of the corporations above named, and the testator then closes this paragraph (A) in the following language: "The bequest of the Lamar & Rankin Drug Company stock, the 'S. S. S.' (Swift's Syphilitic Specific) Company stock, and the Bradfield Regulator stock is, however, subject to the restrictions hereinafter, in a subsequent item of this will, imposed."

"(B) To my son, Henry J. Lamar, Jr., in trust for my daughter, Valeria McLaren, I give one other sixth part of my estate, consisting, in part, of" a certain property, real and personal, including stock in the corporations already mentioned. The testator proceeds: "The aforesaid property to be held by the said Henry J. Lamar, Jr., in trust for my said daughter, for and during her natural life, and, at her death, for such child or children as she may leave surviving her, by her present or any future husband, share and share alike, with the power to her trustee to advance, with her consent, such sums to each child that may be born to her, if any, as may be reasonable, upon the marriage of such child or children, or upon their arrival at the age of twenty-one years; the said trustee to pay over to my said daughter the income arising from the aforesaid property as the same may come into his hands. In the event of the death of my said daughter, leaving no child or children, she is hereby invested with the power to dispose of one-half of the aforesaid property by will to any person she may choose; that right of disposition by will being, however, restricted to the exercise of this right over the aforesaid property, other than the eighty shares of Lamar & Rankin Drug Company stock, the seven shares of 'S. S. S.' Company stock and the ten shares of Bradfield Regulator stock, the power to dispose of which by her will being hereby withheld; the other half of said property to revert to my estate. In the event my said daughter should die leaving no child or children, and without making a disposition of any of said property by will, then the whole of it is to revert to my estate and become a part thereof." After making certain directions, the testator closes this paragraph (B) as follows: "The bequest herein made of the Lamar & Rankin Drug Company stock, the 'S. S. S.' (Swift's Syphilitic Specific) Company stock and the Bradfield Regulator stock is subject, however, to the restrictions hereinafter, in a subsequent item of this, my will, imposed."

"(C) I give to my daughter, Mrs. Fannie L. Rankin, in trust for herself and children, one other sixth part of my estate, consisting, in part, of" certain stock in the corporations already named above. The testator gives her the power of making certain advancements to her children, and directs how the same shall be accounted for, and closes said paragraph (C) with the following words: "The bequest of the Lamar & Rankin Drug Company stock, the 'S. S. S.' (Swift's Syphilitic Specific) Company stock, and the Bradfield Regulator stock, herein made, is subject, however, to the restrictions hereinafter imposed by a subsequent item of this, my will."

"(D) I give and bequeath to my son-in-law, Eli S. Shorter, one other sixth part of my estate, to be held by him in trust for my daughter, Wilena Shorter, for and during her natural life, and, at her death, to her children, share and share alike, said one sixth part consisting of" shares of stock in all the corporations already named above. The testator then provides for advancements to her children, and directs how the same shall be accounted for, closing said paragraph (D) with these words: "The bequest herein made of the Lamar & Rankin Drug Company stock, the 'S. S. S.' (Swift's Syphilitic Specific) Company stock and the Bradfield Regulator stock is, however, subject to the restrictions, hereinafter by a subsequent item of this my will, imposed."

"(E) As a part of one other sixth share of my estate, I give and bequeath to my son, Walter D. Lamar," certain described property, real and personal, including stock in all of the corporations already above named, "in trust for my son, J. T. Lamar. * * * This bequest of the Lamar & Rankin Drug Company stock, the 'S. S. S.' * * * Company stock, and the Bradfield Regulator stock, however, is subject to the restrictions hereinafter imposed by a subsequent item of this, my will. The income from all of the aforesaid property to be applied to the maintenance of said J. T. Lamar, and the remainder of said income, after the application of so much thereof as may be necessary for his support and maintenance, I direct shall be, by said trustee, distributed amongst his children in equal shares. At his death, I desire and direct that the aforesaid property, as well as the income that may remain on hand, shall vest in and become the property of his children, share and share alike. As a part of this one sixth share, I give to my daughter-in-law, Mrs. Julia Lamar, for and during her natural life," a certain house and lot, and at her death or upon her marriage the same to pass to and become the property of the children of J. T. Lamar. "The remaining part of this one sixth share of my estate, that is to say, one sixth part, less the property herein bequeathed to Walter D. Lamar, as trustee for J. T. Lamar, and the house and lot bequeathed to Mrs. Julia Lamar, I give and bequeath to my son, Henry J. Lamar, Jr., in trust, to hold and manage for the benefit of such children as my son J. T. Lamar now has, or may hereafter have born to him, by his present or any future wife, a portion of said remaining part, consisting of" certain shares of stock in all of the corporations already above mentioned. The testator then says: "The bequest of the Lamar & Rankin Drug Company stock, the 'S. S. S.' (Swift's Syphilitic Specific) Company stock, and the Bradfield Regulator stock is, however, subject to the restrictions hereinafter and in a subsequent item of this, my will, imposed." The testator then provides for successors in trust for J. T. Lamar and his children.

"Item 3rd. I give and bequeath to my son, Henry J. Lamar, Jr., one other sixth part of my estate, consisting, in part, of seventy-five shares of Exchange Bank stock, if not disposed of by me before my death, and, if so disposed of, then seven thousand and five hundred dollars in cash, in lieu thereof; also eighty shares of Lamar & Rankin Drug Company stock, seven shares of 'S. S. S.' (Swift's Syphilitic Specific) Company stock, ten shares of Bradfield Regulator stock, and twenty-five shares of Albany Drug Company stock, subject, however, to advances of thirty-nine thousand and one hundred and fifty dollars, which I have heretofore advanced to him, to have and to hold the same in his own right, for himself and his heirs forever."

"Item 4th. I desire and direct that all the shares of stock of the Lamar & Rankin Drug Company, the 'S. S. S.' (Swift's Syphilitic Specific) Company, and the Bradfield Regulator Company, herein devised under the preceding items and paragraphs of this, my will, shall be held by my executors, hereinafter named, until the first day of January in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and twenty-five, at which time, and not until then, I direct that said stock be distributed amongst the legatees mentioned in items 1 and 3 and paragraphs (A), (B), (C), (D) and (E) of item 2, as in each of said items and paragraphs directed; the dividends arising from all of said stocks up to the first day of January, 1925, to be divided in the following manner, to wit: The dividends and profits arising from said Lamar & Rankin Drug Company stock shall be distributed to each of said legatees, annually and within eight months after they are declared by said company in the proportion as said stock is herein bequeathed to each legatee in said items and paragraphs of this my will and testament; and the dividends and profits arising from the Swift's Syphilitic Specific Company stock shall in like proportion be distributed to each of the legatees in said items and paragraphs mentioned, whenever and as often as the same shall amount to ten thousand dollars; and the profits and dividends arising from the Bradfield Regulator Company stock shall in like proportion be distributed to each of the legatees in said items and paragraphs mentioned, whenever and as often as the same shall amount to five thousand dollars. The corpus and the income herein provided for to be subject to the same uses, trusts and limitations as is provided for respectively in item 1 and paragraphs (B), (C), (D) and (E) of this my will and testament; provided, however, that if any of the legatees, to whom the same is devised, shall die before the first day of January, 1925, leaving no child or children, the income and dividends from the said stocks so bequeathed to such legatee, as well as the stock, shall revert to and become a part of my estate to be distributed amongst my surviving children in equal shares. The excess of said stocks or shares which I may own at my death over and above the number hereinbefore specifically devised, I direct also to be held by my executors until January the first, 1925; the dividends and profits arising therefrom to be distributed amongst my children at the time above designated in this item, and in the proportion as each may hold said stock; the said stocks and dividends therefrom to be subject to the same uses, trusts and limitations as is provided for in paragraphs (B), (C), (D), and (E) of this my will. In the event of the death of any one of my children before January the first, 1925, leaving no child or children, then his or her share of this stock, as well as the dividends, shall revert to my estate to be distributed amongst my surviving children, share and share alike."

Upon the trial of the case the jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and further found that the defendant was entitled to the control and custody of all certificates of stock of the estate of Henry J. Lamar, Sr., deceased, which were in the possession of their testator, Henry J. Lamar, Jr. (the Second), at the date of the latter's death. The court entered up judgment accordingly, and further decreed that "the legacy of Henry J. Lamar, 2d, in and to the three stocks mentioned in the petition—that is, the special legacy in item 3 of the will of Henry J. Lamar, 1st, as well as the legacy of the excess shares as shown in paragraph 4 of said will, has reverted to the estate of said H. J. Lamar, 1st, to be divided among the other children of H. J. Lamar, 1st, as provided in said will and under the terms of said will, said Henry J. Lamar, 2d, and his heirs, administrators, executors, and assigns, being excluded from the division of said reversion, which excluded both corpus and dividends." The plaintiffs made a motion for a new trial, which the court overruled, and they excepted. The defendant, by cross-bill of exceptions, assigned error upon the exclusion of certain documentary evidence offered by him at the trial.

Gurry, Hall & Roberts, for plaintiffs in error. Hall & Hall, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. (after stating the facts as above). [2] An examination of the will of the testator will show, that, relatively to the stock in three specified companies, a common purpose or scheme pervaded the entire will, in the respect hereafter mentioned. Certain shares of this stock were left to the legatees. As to some of these, there were trusts or limitations over, and it was also specified that the bequest as to the stock was subject to a restriction stated in a later item of the will; and similar language as to a limitation was used in regard to another distributive share, where there was no trust. By the third item a share in the estate was left to a son. This included stock in the same three companies. Here there was no declaration of a trust or remainder over, and no specific reference made to a future item. Then followed item 4. This began with the following words: "I desire and direct that all the shares of stock of the Lamar & Rankin Drug Company, the 'S. S. S.' (Swift's Syphilitic Specific) Company, and the Bradfield Regulator Company, herein devised under the preceding items and paragraphs of this, my will, shall be held by my executors, hereinafter named, until the first day of January in the year of our Lord 1925," when a distribution should take place. It is beyond controversy that this language was sufficiently broad to cover the shares of stock in the three companies mentioned, which had previously been bequeathed to all of the legatees, including those which had been bequeathed to the son absolutely, as well as those which had been bequeathed to others incumbered with a trust or remainder. Therefore item 4 began by dealing with all the shares of stock in those three companies, which had been bequeathed, and not merely some of them. It was then declared that at the date mentioned the stock should be "distributed among the legatees mentioned in items 1 and 3, and paragraphs (A), (B), (C), (D) and (E) of item 2, as in each of said items and paragraphs written." It could not have been the purpose of the testator, by this language, to limit the retention of stock until the date mentioned merely by saying that, when it should be divided, it should be distributed as written in previous items and paragraphs of the will. After providing for divisions of dividends and profits arising from the stock in the interval, the item then declared "the corpus and income herein provided for," etc. What corpus and income was "herein provided for"? Obviously, it included all the shares of stock in the three named companies previously mentioned; for, as stated above, the item is careful to cover and provide for all such shares dealt with in any preceding item of the will. Therefore, when the expression, "the corpus and income herein provided for," was employed, it could not be restricted to anything less than all the shares in those companies which had previously been provided for. Omitting, for the moment, the reference to the uses and trusts applicable to some of the distributive shares, the item then proceeds: "Provided, however, that if any of the legatees, to whom the same is devised, shall die before the first day of January, 1925, leaving no child or children, the income and dividends from the said stocks so bequeathed to such legatee, as well as the stock, shall revert to and become a part of my estate to be distributed among my surviving children in equal shares." What is the meaning of the words, "if any of the legatees, to whom the same is devised"? The same as what? Unquestionably the same as something which had preceded—the same stock as that which had been mentioned, or as to which provision had been already made in that item. As has been seen, there has been a provision and reference so made to all of the stock in the three companies which had been bequeathed in previous portions of the will. What, then, could the same stock mean, except all of the stock which had been so bequeathed? To be the same it must be all, not a part, of whatever those words refer to. It cannot be held that the statement, "the corpus and the income herein provided for to be subject to the same uses, trusts and limitations as is provided for in item first and paragraphs (B), (C), (D), and (E) of this my will and testament," operated to limit the other provision for a reversion of the stock to only so much of it as had been made subject to certain uses, trusts, and limitations in the previous items and paragraphs mentioned. The testator was preserving and carrying forward the uses, trusts, and limitations respectively applicable to certain distributive shares. But by so doing he did not cut down the amount of the stock dealt with in item 4 from the whole to only a fractional part, or destroy the express provision for a reversion, applicable to all the stock.

This construction is further borne out by the fact that there was an excess of shares in the three companies beyond those which had been specifically bequeathed in previous items of the will. In the item which is now under consideration the testator undertook to deal with this excess, thus showing that he had in view, in making this item of the will, the entire stock in these three companies—first, that which he had previously bequeathed specifically; and, second, all the excess of stock in those companies which he might own and which he had not previously specifically dealt with. In other words, the fourth item of the will shows an intent on the part of the testator to deal with the stock in these three companies entirely and in accordance with the general testamentary purpose in the respect mentioned. In that portion of the item which deals with the excess of the stock it was provided that, "in the event of the death of any one of my children before January 1, 1925, leaving no child or children, then his or her share of this stock, as well as the dividends, shall revert to my estate, to be distributed amongst my surviving children, share and share alike." In this connection, again, the testator mentioned the trusts and limitations previously created as to certain shares of the estate, and, in pursuance of the general scheme in that regard, said: "The said stocks and dividends therefrom to be subject to the same uses, trusts and limitations as is provided for in paragraphs (B), (C), (D) and (E) of this my will." It cannot be successfully contended that, by this reference, the testator intended to limit the provision for distribution of the excess, so as to make the clause as to a reversion apply to only a part of such excess. So that, construing the fourth item as a whole, the reference to the uses, trusts, and limitations expressed in other items neither limited the amount of stock dealt with in that item, nor the general provision (applicable to all of the stock so dealt with) that upon the death of a legatee prior to the date fixed for distribution, leaving no child or children, the stock applicable to that share should revert to the estate and be distributed among the testator's surviving children in equal shares. This construction gives to the will a consistent testamentary scheme as to these stocks. The construction which would exclude from the reversionary provision the bequest of stock in the companies to the son, contained in the third item of the will, would attribute to the testator inconsistency and lack of harmony in intent as to these stocks. Carrying out the same general purpose, by item 6 it is provided that, should any of the property "herein bequeathed" revert to the estate, it should "be divided equally amongst my surviving children." He again adds: "To be held for such uses and trusts and with the same restrictions and limitations as attach to the legacies herein bequeathed to such children."

[1] If the construction which we have thus placed upon item 4 is a correct one, it is evident that it must be construed with and modifies the broad language employed in the third item, which gave absolutely some of these stocks to one of the testator's sons. A testator unquestionably has the power, after having given, in one item of his will, a bequest to a legatee for himself and his heirs, forever, to attach a condition, by a later item, under which the property will revert upon a certain contingency. If the contingency did not happen, the legatee would have an absolute title. If it did happen, there would be a reversion. The question is, not, can he do it, but has he done it? We think that the testator has by the fourth item expressly provided for a reversion, applicable to this distributive share as well as to others. The decree of the court was in accordance with what is ruled above.

Judgment affirmed on main bill of exceptions. Cross-bill of exceptions dismissed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

SALMON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 266*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—LIABILITY.

It was held in Southern Ry. Co. v. Harbin, 135 Ga. 122, 68 S. E. 1103, 30 L. R. A. (N. S.) 404, 21 Ann. Cas. 1011: "In an action against a railway company and its servant, to recover damages for the homicide of the plaintiff's son, solely in consequence of the servant's misfeasance, where a verdict is returned finding the servant not liable, but finding in favor of the plaintiff against the railway company, such verdict should be set aside and a new trial granted." Upon a review of the ruling made in that case, in which five Justices concurred and one dissented, the ruling is reaffirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 854-858; Dec. Dig. § 266.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1201*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—REMAND TO LOWER COURT—AMENDMENT.

Salmon brought an action for personal injuries against the Southern Railway Company and Hopkins, in which the petition alleged that "the said defendants, by their joint and concurrent negligence, as herein described, have endamaged plaintiff in" a given sum, "and this action is brought jointly against them." "The defendant Hopkins was the engineer in charge of the said engine of the freight train upon which plaintiff was at work, and all the acts of negligence charged against the railroad company were committed by the said other defendant, Hopkins, and the said railway company was negligent through said Hopkins, and said Hopkins was negligent as representing said railway company, and the negligence of the two concurred, and this action is brought therefor." Upon the trial of the action a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant Hopkins against the plaintiff, and in favor of the plaintiff against the railway company. The railway company alone moved for a new trial, in which motion there was no ground presenting the point that the verdict should be set aside and a new trial granted because the jury by their verdict exonerated Hopkins, the other defendant, whose misfeasance as the servant of the railway company was the sole cause of the plaintiff's injuries. A new trial was refused, and upon review thereof by this court the judgment of the trial judge was reversed and a new trial ordered on the ground of an erroneous instruction to the jury. Southern Ry. Co. v. Salmon, 132 Ga. 753, 65 S. E. 70. When the case came on for a second trial in the superior court, the court allowed the defendant railway company to amend its answer by setting up in effect that the verdict and judgment rendered on the first trial were conclusive of the nonliability of the railway company, in that it was there found and adjudged that Hopkins, the railway company's servant, whose misfeasance was the sole ground of negligence alleged against the defendant railway company as causing the injuries, was not negligent as claimed.

(a) The allowance of such amendment was not error for any of the following reasons urged against it: Because (1) it was a special plea and not sworn to; (2) it was "a dilatory plea and should have been filed at the first term available after the decision of the Supreme Court"; (3) the railway company had waived the defense set up in the amendment, because the judge on the first trial had instructed the jury that they could find any one of three verdicts, viz., a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against the railway company alone, a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against both of the defendants, and a verdict in favor of the defendants, and that such instruction was not excepted to nor complained of in the motion for a new trial made by the railway company; (4) it set up "no defense whatever to this action"; and (5) "the case was called for trial and the parties announced ready before the amendment was tendered."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1201.*]

3. ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DIRECTION OF VERDICT.

There was no error in the rulings of the court in admitting or rejecting evidence. The evidence submitted demanded a verdict in favor of the railway company on its amended answer, and the court did not err in directing a verdict in behalf of the railway company and in overruling the plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

2. SALES (§ 38*)—VALIDITY—FRAUD.

Where a written contract of bargain and sale stipulates that "this sale is made under inducements and representations herein expressed and no others," it is not a valid defense to an action for the price of the goods that the purchaser was induced to enter into the agreement by reason of false representations made by an agent of the seller, but not contained in the contract, when there is nothing to show that the purchaser was misled or deceived as to its contents, or in any manner prevented from ascertaining the same. Equitable Mfg. Co. v. Biggers, 121 Ga. 381, 49 S. E. 271. See, also, Biggers v. Equitable Mfg. Co., 124 Ga. 1045 (2), 53 S. E. 674.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 65-77, 85; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

3. SALES (§ 38*)—ILLEGALITY—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.

Applying the foregoing rulings to the facts of the present case, as shown by the written contract between the parties, the court erred in not dismissing the affidavit of illegality to the mortgage execution; for, even if the alleged representations of the salesman of the plaintiff company, as set out in the affidavit, were fraudulent, and made to induce the defendant to purchase the engine which he bought under the terms of the written contract signed by him, and for part of the purchase price of which he gave his notes and the mortgage to secure the payment of them, it appears from such contract that he expressly agreed that the company should not be bound by any representations or misrepresentations made by such agent. There was no averment in the illegality that any device or trick was perpetrated upon the defendant by the company or its agent to induce him to sign the written contract. In this connection, see the cases above cited, and Rounsaville v. Leonard Mfg. Co., 127 Ga. 735 (2), 56 S. E. 1030.

(a) The present case, wherein there was a complete and certain agreement between the parties, is manifestly different from such cases as McCrory v. Fritchard, 119 Ga. 876, 47 S. E. 341; Pryor v. Ludden & Bates, 134 Ga. 288, 67 S. E. 654; Anthony v. Cody, 135 Ga. 320, 69 S. E. 491, and such other cases, where the action was based on a promissory note which did not purport to contain the entire contract between the parties.

(b) The case under consideration differs, also, from such cases as International Harvester Co. v. Dillon, 126 Ga. 672, 55 S. E. 1034, wherein the defense set up was a breach of a warranty contained in the written agreement, while in the present case the defense sought to be set up was the misrepresentations of the agent of the plaintiff, made during the negotiations of the sale, and prior to the execution of the written contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 65-77, 85; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 843*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED.

The court having erred in refusing to dismiss the affidavit of illegality, it is unnecessary to pass upon the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Oglethorpe County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company against W. A. Broach. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Broach bought of Randall, the plaintiff's salesman in charge of its Atlanta office and storeroom, a 12 horse power compounded portable engine, at the price of $850, paying in cash $200 and freight charges of $55.40, and giving his notes for $650, with a mortgage on the engine. He signed, also, a written order or contract of sale, which Randall signed as salesman. Upon refusal to pay the notes, foreclosure of the mortgage was commenced; and Broach interposed an affidavit of illegality. The plaintiff moved to dismiss this affidavit as insufficient in law to arrest the foreclosure, because it undertook to vary the written contract of sale by setting up a parol agreement and representations made at the time of its execution, and a warranty different from the one therein contained. The motion was overruled, and, after verdict for the defendant, a new trial was denied. The plaintiff excepted to these rulings.

The written order for the engine contained the following stipulations: "No person has any authority to waive or alter or enlarge this contract, or to make any new or substituted or different contract, representation, or warranty. Salesmen, mechanics, and experts are not authorized to bind the company by any contract or statement. Said machinery is purchased upon and subject to the following independent conditions, and none other, namely: It is warranted to be made of good material, and durable, with good care, to do as good work under the same conditions as any made in the United States, of equal size and rated capacity, if properly operated by competent persons with sufficient steam or horse power, and the printed rules and directions of the manufacturers intelligently followed. If by so doing, after trial of ten days by the purchasers, said machinery shall fail to fill the warranty, written notice thereof shall at once be given to J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company at Racine, Wis., and also to the agent through whom received, stating in what parts and wherein it fails to fulfill the warranty, and reasonable time shall be given to said company to send a competent person to remedy the difficulty, the purchaser rendering necessary and friendly assistance, said company reserving right to replace any defective part or parts; and if the machinery cannot be made to fill the warranty, the part that fails to be returned by purchaser free of charge to the place where received, and the company notified thereof, and at the company's option another substituted therefor that shall fill the warranty, or the notes and money for such part immediately returned, and the contract rescinded to that extent, and no further claim made on the company. Failure so to bind [?] such trial or to give such notices in any respect shall be conclusive evidence of due fulfillment of warranty on the part of said company, and that the said machinery is satisfactory to the purchasers, and the company shall be released from all liability under the warranty. Any assistance rendered by the company, its agents or servants, in operating said machinery or in remedying any actual or alleged defects, either before or after ten days trial, shall in no wise be deemed any waiver or excuse for any failure of the purchaser to fully keep and perform the conditions of this warranty. When at request of purchaser a man is sent to operate the said machinery, which is found to be carelessly or improperly handled, said company putting same in working order again, the expense incurred to J. I. Case Threshing Machine Company shall be paid by the purchaser. If any part of the machinery, excepting belting, which is not warranted, fails, from defect of material, while this warranty is in force, the company has the right to repair or replace the same, on presentation of the defective part or parts; but deficiency in any piece shall not condemn other parts, and purchaser shall expressly waive all claims for damages on account of the nonfulfillment of said warranty by any of the above-described machinery. Each machine and attachment is ordered at a separate fixed price, which price, unless otherwise specifically agreed, bears the same ratio to the aggregate price above specified as the company's 1906 list price of each said machine and attachment bears to the aggregate list price of all said machines and attachments. This order is divisible as to each machine and attachment ordered, and the failure of any separate machine or attachment to give the warranty shall not affect the rights of the parties with respect to any other machinery sold the purchasers or any warranty of such other machinery, and no cause of action arising out of this contract or transaction shall be offset or counterclaimed against any liability of the purchaser arising out of any other contract or transaction. In no event shall the company be liable otherwise than by return of cash and notes actually received by it. Failure to fully settle on delivery as above provided, or to comply with any of the conditions of this warranty on purchaser's part, or any change in the printed terms of this warranty or the conditions thereof by any persons whomsoever, agent or otherwise, by addition, erasure, or waiver, or any abuse, misuse, unnecessary exposure of machinery or waste committed or suffered by the purchasers, discharges the company from all liabilities whatever. No representation made by any person as an inducement to give and execute this order shall bind the company. The purchaser hereby waives notice of the acceptance of this order by the company."

The affidavit of illegality was in substance as follows: When Broach went to buy, he asked Randall to show and price to him a 15 horse power engine and boiler, stating that he wanted it to run his sawmill with a 48-inch saw. Randall said he had in stock no 15 horse power simple engine, but had and would sell Broach a 12 horse power compounded and portable engine that would do the work of a 15 horse power simple engine with less fuel and water, and would operate his sawmill with ease and efficiency, and would develop at least as much horse power as any 15 horse power simple engine, and urged Broach to purchase the same. Broach then stated to Randall that he (Broach) was a farmer, not a machinist, and knew nothing of the construction and principles of the different kinds of engines, or of a compounded engine, and whether it was or could be made as efficient as a simple engine of nominally greater horse power rating; and Randall willfully and knowingly made to him the statements and representations just set forth, for the purpose of inducing him to buy the engine for which he contracted. Immediately upon receipt of it he undertook to operate his sawmill with it; and it failed completely to develop sufficient power to run the saw, although he used all the skill at his command, guided by such instructions as were furnished by the plaintiff. When he had exhausted his own ingenuity, and availed himself of all the assistance and suggestions of the plaintiff, he immediately reported these failures to the plaintiff, which responded by sending its agents and mechanics with instructions so to alter, repair, and reconstruct the engine as to make it do the work of driving the sawmill, all of which efforts failed to increase or improve the power of the engine to the stipulated requirements. Convinced from his own efforts, and those of the plaintiff, that the engine could not be made to perform the services contracted for, and that consequently the engine was worthless to him, he tendered it to the plaintiff, offered to rescind the contract of purchase, and demanded that the plaintiff refund to him the cash payment and cancel the notes, which the plaintiff refused. Wherefore he prays that the contract be adjudged fraudulent and void, and for judgment against the plaintiff.

ERK v. SIMPSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§ 192*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—RE-SALE.

A fruit grower and a produce company entered into a written contract whereby, "for and in consideration of $1,000 (represented by a check duly certified) this day delivered," the fruit grower agreed to deliver "f. o. b. at Rome, Ga., first ten car loads of peaches of the Elberta variety, and the said second party hereby contracts and agrees to pay to the party of the first part 85 cents per crate of six baskets for all good, sound, hard peaches which are approved and accepted by party of the second part through its authorized agent at Rome, Ga., the peaches to be paid for when accepted and loaded in the cars at Rome, Ga., and the bill of lading delivered to the party of the second part. The $1,000 check referred to in this contract to be returned to the party of the second part when all of said purchase price of said peaches is paid: Provided, however, the same may be used toward paying for the last cars delivered." Held, that this contract did not authorize the seller to cash the check at once and keep the money, and at the same time to demand payment for each of three car loads of peaches as they were shipped, and on failure of payment for the first car load of a draft given by the local agent of the buyer to divert the second and resell it at a loss; the amount of the purchase price for the two car loads being less than the amount of money so held by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

2. SALES (§ 192*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—RE-SALE.

Nor, after so diverting the second car load, which had been received and approved by the agent of the buyer as provided by the contract, could the seller tender a third car load, and, upon its refusal, sell it and hold the buyer liable in damages for the difference between the amount realized and the amount which such car load would have brought at the contract price.

(a) There is no evidence in the record tending to show a waiver or assent on the part of the purchaser to a deviation from the terms of the contract on the part of the seller.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 843*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED.

Some parts of the defendant's answer were demurrable; but as the same grounds of the demurrer covered some allegations which were good and some which were bad, and as the ruling above made deals with the merits of the defenses, the grounds of the demurrer need not be considered in detail.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 843.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 323*)—HEARSAY—MARKET VALUE.

Where a witness had testified that he had been engaged in marketing peaches and other fruits for 18 or 20 years in the locality where the contract was made and to be fulfilled, and that he kept "posted" as to the prices of fruit in car load lots in the different markets during the season covered by the contract, by means of daily communications by telegraph, there was no error in permitting him to testify that, from information received at that time, the markets where the peaches were resold compared favorably with other markets, and that, from a book of the copy telegrams of that year, the market price for Elberta peaches during the season covered by the contract was from $1 per crate downward, while a few markets between certain dates mentioned quoted the price at $1.25 per crate. Such evidence was not objectionable as being hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 323.*]

5. DEPOSITIONS (§ 111*)—ADMISSION IN EVIDENCE—TIME FOR OBJECTIONS.

Where the depositions of a witness were taken before a commissioner under Civil Code 1910, § 5910 et seq., and certain objections to parts of the testimony were made and noted, this did not preclude the party against whom the evidence was offered from objecting at the trial in court to certain parts of the testimony on the ground that they were hearsay and secondary in character, although such objections were not noted on the examination before the commissioner.

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; J. W. Maddox, Judge.

Action by J. H. Erk, trustee, against W. P. Simpson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. P. Simpson and the Pittsburg Fruit & Produce Company entered into the following written agreement: "This agreement, made and entered into this the 14th day of July, 1906, between W. P. Simpson, of said state and county, of the first part, and the Pittsburg Fruit & Produce Company (Incorporated), of Pittsburg, state of Pennsylvania, of the second part, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of $1,000 (represented by a check duly certified), this day delivered to the party of the first part by the party of the second part, the party of the first part hereby agrees to deliver f. o. b. at Rome, Ga., first ten car loads of peaches of the Elberta variety, and the said party of the second part hereby contracts and agrees to pay to the party of the first part 85 cents per crate of six baskets for all good, sound, hard peaches which are approved and accepted by the party of the second part through its authorized agent at Rome, Ga., the peaches to be paid for when accepted and loaded in the cars at Rome, Ga., and the bill of lading delivered to the party of the second part. The $1,000 check referred to in this contract to be returned to the party of the second part when all said purchase price of said peaches is paid: Provided, however, the same may be used toward paying for the last cars delivered. It is agreed that said first party shall not be liable for failure to deliver said ten cars of peaches if such failure is due to providential causes or a strike."

On December 22, 1906, the company brought suit against Simpson. As amended, the petition alleged as follows: The defendant delivered only one car load of peaches to the plaintiff, the price of which amounted to $297.50. Another car load was accepted by the plaintiff's agent at Rome, but the defendant diverted it while it was in transit, and it was never finally received by the plaintiff. Defendant shipped only three car loads of peaches during the year 1906. Under the contract with plaintiff, he was to ship ten car loads of peaches. He only made three car loads of peaches of the Elberta variety in that year, and they were of such low grade that they did not come up to the standard fixed by the contract. The defendant had no authority to cash the check when he did so. Having done so, it was an acknowledgment upon his part that the amount would be applied to the payment of the three car loads of peaches, and he had no authority to apply the check, or the money received thereon, to any other purpose. Having delivered but one car load on the contract, the defendant became liable to the plaintiff for the balance of the funds remaining in his hands after paying for such car load. If he suffered any loss by reason of shipping the peaches to any other person, it was his own fault, for which the plaintiff was not liable. About September 5th, after all the Elberta peaches were gone, and there was no possibility for the defendant to deliver the other nine car loads named in the contract, the plaintiff demanded of the defendant the balance of the $1,000, after deducting the amount of the car load of peaches actually received.

The defendant answered as follows: After the making of the contract the defendant delivered to the plaintiff's agent one car load of peaches, the price of which amounted to $452.20. The plaintiff's agent delivered to the defendant a draft for that amount drawn on the plaintiff. It was forwarded for collection, and was dishonored and returned to the defendant. Prior to such dishonor the defendant delivered to the plaintiff's agent another car load of peaches, and the agent executed to him a second draft for $446.25 to cover the purchase price thereof. Before this second car reached its destination, the defendant learned that plaintiff had refused to pay the first draft. Thereupon the defendant diverted the second car, because of the dishonor of the first draft, and the consequent breach of the contract. From the proceeds of the second car he received $116.54, thereby sustaining a loss of $329.71, the difference between the amount of the draft given therefor and the amount so received. The defendant tendered to the plaintiff's agent another car load of peaches, containing 525 crates. This car load the plaintiff refused to accept, and the defendant shipped it to Providence, R. I., and realized therefrom the sum of $71.83, thus sustaining a loss of $374.42. After receiving notice of the dishonor of the draft given by the plaintiff's agent for the first car load, the defendant notified the agent that he intended to resell the peaches bought by the plaintiff of the defendant, and hold the plaintiff liable for the difference in price realized on the sale and the contract price. In making the resale of the two car loads, the defendant exercised his best judgment in selecting the market in which to sell them, so as to realize the best price for said peaches. He has always been ready to perform the terms of the contract binding on him, and so notified the agent of the plaintiff; but the latter declined to accept the peaches in accordance with the contract. He suffered damages to the extent of $1,156.33 on the three car loads of peaches. For this he prayed to recover judgment.

While the case was pending the plaintiff became a bankrupt. The trustee was made a party plaintiff, and the case proceeded. So far as necessary to an understanding of the decision, the evidence is stated in the opinion. At the close of the evidence, the court directed a general verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was refused. He excepted to this ruling, and to the overruling of a demurrer to certain parts of the answer.

Geo. A. H. Harris & Sons, for plaintiff in error. Dean & Dean, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The purchaser of certain peaches brought suit against the seller, under the contract set out in the statement of facts, to recover the balance of the $1,000 represented by the certified check, after deducting the purchase price of the peaches received. The court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted.

[1] 1. Under the contract, the certified check for $1,000 was placed with the seller apparently to guarantee payment for the peaches purchased, or to be used in paying for the last of those delivered. They were to be paid for when accepted by the agent of the purchaser at Rome, and loaded in cars at that place, and the bill of lading delivered to the purchaser. The certified check was to be returned to the purchaser when all of the purchase price was paid, provided that it might be used toward paying for the last cars delivered. There is not a word in the contract indicating that such check was put up as a forfeit, or as liquidated damages for a breach of contract. The seller was given no authority to cash the check, unless for the purpose of paying for the last cars of peaches agreed to be shipped. The contract to return the check negated any right of the holder to cash it for other purposes, and so render himself unable to return it. There is no hint in the contract that the parties intended that the seller should cash the check at once, have the use of the $1,000 represented by it during the whole season, and require the purchaser to pay for the peaches as each car was delivered, and thus have in his hands, and subject to his use, both the $1,000 and the price of the peaches. When the seller, on the same day that he received this check (or draft, as it is also called), and before delivering any peaches, cashed it (as was admitted), he violated the contract. It was argued in the brief of counsel for defendant in error that the purchaser waived this, because such purchaser "paid the draft." The evidence did not disclose that the check or draft was drawn on the purchaser. If it was a check, it must have been drawn on a bank. Besides, it was a "certified" check or draft, and there is nothing in the record to show that the purchaser could have stopped payment.

[2] 2. Four days after delivering the first car load of peaches, the seller delivered to the buyer, through its agent at Rome, a second, which the agent inspected and accepted. After this delivery, the seller's agent learned that the draft given by the buyer's agent on his principal for the price of the first car load had not been paid; and thereupon the seller diverted the second car load, which was in transit, sent it to Ohio, had it sold, and charged to the buyer the difference between the agreed price and what was received under the sale. What right the seller had to do this is not apparent. The contract provided for delivery of the peaches "f. o. b. Rome, Ga.," upon approval and acceptance by the buyer's agent there, and delivery to the purchaser of the bill of lading. The second car was inspected, accepted, and delivered. While the shipper may have a right of stoppage in transitu, when the vendee becomes insolvent before he obtains actual possession (Civil Code 1910, § 2739), we know of no law which authorized the seller to take the car load of peaches away from the purchaser, after such a delivery, because the purchaser had not paid the draft for the first car load, and deal with the second car load as if refused. There was no evidence that the purchaser had then become insolvent. The seller had $1,000 of the purchaser's money in his hands. This was more than the price of both car loads of peaches. He was in no danger whatever of loss on those two cars. He could not at the same time break the contract and insist on its performance by the other party.

There was some evidence, not in entire accord, as to whether the agent of the seller actually tendered or offered other peaches to the agent of the purchaser, or whether he only said he could get up eight car loads in addition to the first two, by getting his neighbors to join with him, and also as to whether such peaches would have been of the quality called for by the contract. But, aside from this, when the seller cashed the check, and, after delivering a second car load of peaches to the defendant at Rome, took it away by diverting it and selling it elsewhere because a draft for the first car load had not been paid, the buyer was not compelled to receive further car loads. The purchaser was entitled to have restored to it the $1,000, after deducting the amount due for the car load of peaches which it received and failed to pay for. And the purchaser having become bankrupt pending the case, the trustee in bankruptcy, who was made a party, could recover.

[3] 3. Some parts of the defendant's answer were demurrable; but inasmuch as the same grounds of demurrer covered some allegations which were good and some which were bad, and as the ruling made above deals with the merits of the defenses, it is unnecessary to discuss the grounds of demurrer in detail.

[4] 4. Proof of market price in certain markets necessarily involves a hearsay element, and is not subject to the same strictness of rule as proof of a physical fact or occurrence. The fourth headnote requires no elaboration. Central Railroad Co. v. Skellie, 86 Ga. 686 (4), 692, 12 S. E. 1017; Armour & Co. v. Ross & Barfield, 110 Ga. 403, 412, 35 S. E. 787.

[5] 5. The depositions of a witness were taken before a commissioner under Civil Code 1910, § 5910 et seq. Before the commissioner certain objections to parts of the testimony were made and noted. On the trial of the case in the superior court, other objections were raised to the testimony, on the ground that it was hearsay and secondary in character, and stated the conclusions of the witness. The court held that such objections should have been made at the time when the testimony was taken, and refused to entertain them when the depositions were read on the trial. This was error. Civil Code 1910, § 5913, declares that all motions or applications to postpone or adjourn the proceedings, "and all objections to the witnesses or proceedings, shall be made to the commissioner, and, if in writing, filed with the return, and, if not in writing, noted in and become part of the return, with the ruling of the commissioner thereon, and the answer of the witnesses, whether the objection be sustained or not." It will be observed that this section requires applications for postponement or adjournment, and "all objections to the witnesses or proceedings," to be made to the commissioner. Such objections are to be noted and returned with the answers of the witnesses, whether the objection be sustained or not. The language used indicates rather objections to witnesses and the form of procedure than substantial objections to the competency or relevancy of certain parts of the evidence. We do not think that it was the intention of the Legislature to require the admission of secondary or hearsay evidence, unless objection thereto was made before the commissioner. See, in this connection, Georgia Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Bailey, 9 Ga. App. 106 (3), 70 S. E. 607. This construction harmonizes the practice with that where the evidence is taken by interrogatories, though, of course, the two methods of obtaining testimony are not identical. No doubt good reason might be suggested why, in taking depositions, where both parties have the right to be present, to make objections, and to examine the witnesses, objections ought to be noted, so that the adverse party might conduct his examination accordingly. But we cannot hold that the Legislature has required that all objections to evidence on the ground of being secondary or irrelevant or hearsay should then be made, under penalty of waiving the right to urge such objections on the trial. As the rulings of the presiding judge in regard to the objections made to certain evidence appear to have been based on the ground that they could not be made before him, because not made before the commissioner, and not upon the merits of the objection, we deal with the question in the same manner.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur, except HILL, J., not presiding.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Laura Glover against Mrs. E. L. Cox and others. To a judgment for defendants, plaintiff brings error, and defendants file a cross-bill of exceptions. Affirmed on main bill of exceptions, and cross-bill dismissed.

This was an action by Laura Glover against the National Building Association of Baltimore City, a corporation of the state of Maryland, M. McDonald Pritchard, as trustee for the corporation, also of Baltimore, state of Maryland, Mrs. E. L. Cox, and Jno. W. Nelms, sheriff, to vacate and set aside a sheriff's deed and to recover the land. Various amendments to the petition were allowed, and the petition and amendments were demurred to. Some of the demurrers were sustained, and some overruled. The defendants filed their answers, and the case was tried before the judge, without the intervention of a jury, who rendered judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff sued out a bill of exceptions, complaining of the judgment, and assigning error on certain pendente lite exceptions; and the defendants sued out a cross-bill of exceptions.

On the trial of the case it was made to appear that on April 23, 1897, Laura Glover executed to M. McDonald Pritchard, of the city of Baltimore, state of Maryland, and W. R. Dimmock, of Fulton county, Ga., trustees for the National Building Association of Baltimore City, upon a consideration of $1,- 680, certain land. The deed stipulated that "the said parties of the second part are to hold said property in trust as security to secure the payment of the dues upon 42 shares of stock to the National Building Association of Baltimore City, * * * upon due performance of said covenants to reconvey the same to the said Laura Glover, and, if not, they are to sell the same at public outcry," etc. The trustees accepted the trust in writing, and the deed was duly recorded. Laura Glover having made default in the payment of the indebtedness secured by the deed, the trustees, by virtue of the power of sale in the deed, advertised the land for a sale to occur on June 7, 1898. Four days prior to the time the sale was to take place Laura Glover filed a suit against the National Building Association of Baltimore City and W. R. Dimmock and M. McDonald Pritchard, as trustees for the association, to enjoin the sale. The association and the trustees answered the petition, and prayed that the temporary injunction be dissolved, and the trustees be allowed to proceed with the sale, that a special decree be passed, charging the property in dispute with a special lien for the indebtedness of the association, that the property be sold for the satisfaction of said indebtedness, that judgment be rendered for said amount, and that other and further relief as to the court seemed proper be granted. The defendants subsequently amended their answer, praying that a judgment be rendered in favor of the defendant against the plaintiff for the sum admitted to be due, that the instrument attached to the petition be declared to be a deed passing title to the trustees to secure the sums admitted to be due, that the judgment above referred to be a special lien upon the land in dispute, that the trustees make a quitclaim deed to the plaintiff, and that execution be issued upon said judgment, and that it be levied upon said land, and that a sale thereof be made. On March 15, 1910, a verdict was rendered, the material parts of which are as follows: "That the instrument attached to the petition in said cause is a deed, and not a mortgage; that the trustees for the said National Building & Loan Association of Baltimore do recover of the plaintiff, Laura Glover, the sum of $1,424.40, principal, and $279.55, interest to date, and future interest; that said trustees of said association have a special lien upon the land for the sums aforesaid; that judgment and execution, to be issued upon this verdict when said trustees quitclaim said land to the plaintiff, be levied upon said land, and the same be sold to satisfy said judgment and execution." The judgment complained of in this proceeding was rendered on March 30, 1900. The clerk issued a fi. fa., directed to all and singular the sheriffs of said state, against Laura Glover, and especially the land described in the deed to secure debt, reciting the principal, interest, and cost, "which at our superior court for said county to wit, on the 15th day of March, 1900, the National Building & Loan Association of Baltimore, as plaintiff, recovered against said Laura Glover, defendant, for principal, interest, and cost." A quitclaim deed was filed by the trustees to Laura Glover, and recorded on June 7, 1900.

On June 8, 1900, the sheriff of Fulton county levied the fi. fa. on the land, which was fully described, and recited "that the above-described property was deeded to the trustees by Laura Glover. See Deed Book 126, page 290. Levied on as the property of Laura Glover, June 8, 1900." The sheriff entered on the fi. fa. the following entries: "Served Laura Glover personally with the above levy June 18, 1900." "Georgia, Fulton County. After due and legal advertisement as required by law, the property described in the attached levy was exposed for sale at public outcry before the courthouse door in the city of Atlanta, Fulton county, Georgia, on the 1st Tuesday in December, 1901, within the legal hours of sale, when and where the same was knocked down to National Building & Loan Association for the sum of $500, being the highest and best bidder, and the receipt of said sum is hereby acknowledged. This December 3, 1901. R. P. Thomas, D. Shff." Next follows the receipt, signed by the plaintiff's attorneys, for $435.90, as a credit on the fi. fa., and an entry apportioning the cost among the officers of court. On the back of the fi. fa. is a statement that it was issued on a judgment dated March 15, 1900, in suit No. 0037, also style of the case, amount of the judgment as to principal, interest, and cost, and the various places of entry on the execution dockets as required by law, with the names of the plaintiff's counsel. Also there was the entry: "I, G. H. Tanner, do hereby amend this fi. fa. by adding before the name of the plaintiff in fi. fa. the following words: 'M. McDonald Pritchard and W. R. Dimmock, Trustees for.' This October 5, 1900, G. H. Tanner, Clerk." Also the entry: "This amendment allowed this October 31, 1900. J. H. Lumpkin, Judge." Also an entry that the same was recorded in Book 126, page 88, the 5th day of December, 1901. On December 3, 1901, the sheriff of Fulton county executed and delivered a deed conveying the land in controversy to National Building Association of Baltimore City, wherein the following recitals appear: "Whereas, in obedience to the writ of ieri facias issued from the superior court of the county of Fulton, at the suit of National Building & Loan Association against Laura Glover," etc. "The above-described property was deeded to said trustees by Laura Glover. See Deed Book 126, page 290." A claim was filed, after the levy of the fi. fa., by Laura Glover, as agent and trustee for Arsene L. and Elise Glover, and the style of the case was "National Building & Loan Association v. Laura Glover, Defendant in fi. fa., and Laura Glover, Trustee, Claimant." The claim case was tried prior to the sale, and the property was found subject.

On February 10, 1903, Laura Glover filed, in Fulton superior court, a petition against W. R. Dimmock and M. McDonald Pritchard, as trustees of the National Building Association of Baltimore City, in which, after reciting the filing of the petition, as set out, in suit No. 6037, wherein she sought to enjoin the sale of the disputed property by the trustees, and the filing of the cross-bill in that case, she alleged as follows: "On March 15th said case was heard. The court at said trial directed a verdict to be made in accordance with the prayer of the answer of the defendant, which was done. A verdict and decree was made in said case on said date, which adjudged same to be a deed, and not a mortgage, and that the trustees of said association had a special lien on said land for the sum of $1,446 principal and $279.55 interest to that date, and that judgment and execution issue for that amount, and that defendant make a deed to plaintiff, and that defendant pay the costs. Said judgment and verdict were erroneous, as said paper was not in law a conveyance of the title, as it appears on its face. That her plea of usury was a good one, and voided said paper as a deed. That this proceeding is filed within three years from the date of said judgment." She prayed that the verdict and decree rendered against her in favor of W. R. Dimmock and M. McDonald Pritchard be vacated and set aside. This suit was dismissed on general demurrer, which judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court. On August 10, 1904, Laura Glover filed an action in ejectment against Mrs. E. L. Cox, who purchased the land from the National Building Association of Baltimore City, which resulted in a verdict for the defendant, which judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court.

W. H. Terrell, for plaintiff in error. L. Z. Rosser and J. H. Porter, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. The correct name of the corporation which loaned the money and to whom the deed to secure the loan was made is the National Building Association of Baltimore City. It appeared in its true name in the pleadings filed by itself and its trustees in which the judgment was rendered. The verdict and judgment is in favor of the "trustees for the said National Building & Loan Association of Baltimore." In her petition the plaintiff alleges the sheriff's sale and deed to be void, "because there is no judgment in Fulton superior court against petitioner in favor of W. R. Dimmock and M. McDonald Pritchard, trustees for National Building & Loan Association of Baltimore." If this allegation is to be taken literally, it is disproved by the record. If it is to be taken as an allegation that the variance in the corporate name between the judgment and the pleadings is of such vital nature that the judgment is void, it becomes necessary to inquire into the legal sufficiency of the attack made on it. The judgment followed the verdict. "Verdicts must have a liberal construction, and should be construed so as to stand if practicable; and the judge may examine the entire pleadings, the admissions in the answer, and all the undisputed facts, in making a final decree." Mayor, etc., of Macon v. Harris, 75 Ga. 761. There can be no doubt that the National Building & Loan Association of Baltimore, referred to in the verdict, is the corporation which was a party to the case, and the correct name of which appeared in the pleadings as the National Building Association of Baltimore City. The misnomer of the corporation in the verdict and judgment is not so radically different as to indicate an entirely different corporation was intended. The plaintiff is estopped from complaining of this irregularity. After the sale of the land, she filed a proceeding to set aside this verdict and judgment, and her petition was dismissed on general demurrer. Although she did not raise this particular objection, she is just as much estopped by the judgment as if she had made the point. It is not permissible for a party who has several grounds of attack on a judgment to file successive actions on each ground to vacate the judgment. The defect was an amendable one; and the defendant in the judgment, having litigated with the plaintiffs as to the validity of the judgment, should have raised this objection, and, failing to do so, she will be thereafter estopped. Bradford v. Water Lot Co., 58 Ga. 280 (3); Mitchell v. Toole, 63 Ga. 93.

[2] 2. It is alleged that the levy and sale are void, because the deed filed for levy and sale recites that it was filed for the purpose of having a fi. fa. in favor of the National Building Association of Baltimore City levied on the property, and for no other purpose, and that the variance in the name of the plaintiff in the sheriff's deed and the judgment and execution is a fatal defect. This variance between the recital of the name of the plaintiff in the sheriff's deed and in the fi. fa. does not render the deed void. It is said in 3 Freeman on Executions, § 329: "While the recital of the several facts upon which the officer's authority to convey is not indispensable, yet it is usually made or attempted in each deed. The attempt frequently results in mistakes. The name of one of the parties, the date of some of the facts, or the amount of the execution or of the sale, may be incorrectly stated. But, if the recital is unnecessary, the fact that it is either imperfectly or incorrectly made can be of no consequence." See, also, 3 Devlin on Real Estate, § 1430. Certainly the misrecital of the name of a plaintiff in the judgment, does not vitiate the deed, if the identity is made clear. Loomis v. Riley, 24 Ill. 307; Union Bank v. McWharters, 32 Mo. 34. In the case of Wilson v. Campbell, 33 Ala. 249, 70 Am. Dec. 586, a judgment was entered in favor of the Branch Bank at Mobile as plaintiff, and the execution followed the judgment. In the sheriff's deed the execution was recited as having issued in favor of the "Branch of the Bank of the State of Alabama at Mobile," and the court held that the deed was not rendered invalid because of the variance between the judgment and execution under which the sale was made and the recitals thereof in the deed. In the case in hand the reference in the sheriff's deed to the execution under which the sale was made is so clear that no confusion can result from the misrecital, and the deed is not void on this account. See White v. Forsyth, 136 Ga. 634, 71 S. E. 1073.

[3] 3. The sheriff's sale is alleged to be void, because the deed from the plaintiffs to the defendant, filed for the purpose of levy and sale, was not properly attested for record. As will be seen from the statement of facts, Laura Glover had borrowed money from the National Building Association of Baltimore City, and had secured the loan by deed to W. R. Dimmock and M. McDonald Pritchard as trustees for the association. Under the statute the grantee or lender must sue his debt to judgment, then execute a quitclaim deed to the grantor or borrower, and, when this deed is filed and recorded, the execution issued upon the judgment may be levied on the land. A levy and sale, made without filing and recording the deed, is void. Benedict v. Gammon, 122 Ga. 412, 50 S. E. 162. So that it becomes necessary to inquire into the legality of the record of the deed made by the trustees of the National Building Association of Baltimore City for the purpose of levy and sale. The caption of the deed is "Georgia, Fulton County." It is made "between M. McDonald Pritchard and W. R. Dimmock, as trustees of the National Building Association of Baltimore City, parties of the first part, and Laura Glover, of the second part." It contains this clause: "Whereas, the said National Building Association of Baltimore City, on the 15th day of March, A. D. 1900, recovered judgment against the said Laura Glover for the sum of $1,743.80, upon which execution has issued; and whereas, the said execution is a special lien upon the above described property: Now, therefore, in accordance with the Code of Georgia of 1895, § 2771, have parties of the first part executed this deed, for the purpose of having said execution levied upon said property, and having it sold thereunder in satisfaction thereof, and for no other purposes whatsoever." It is signed and attested as follows: "In witness whereof, the parties of the first part have hereunto set their hands and fixed their seals the day and year above written. M. McDonald Pritchard, Trustee. W. R. Dimmock, Trustee. Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of Robert Ogle, Clerk Superior Court of Baltimore City, the Same Being a Court of Record. [Seal.] Peter Stevens. As to Dimmock: J. R. Fox. J. H. Porter, N. P. Fulton County, Ga."

The recording acts only authorize the clerk of the superior court to record such papers as are entitled to record and which have been attested in manner and form as the statute prescribes. The registry of a deed serves a dual function. It is constructive notice of the existence of the original deed and permits its reception in evidence without proof of its execution. Our recording statutes provide that "in order to authorize the record of a deed to realty or personalty, if executed in this state, it must be attested by a judge of a court of record of this state, or a justice of the peace or notary public," etc. Civil Code 1910, § 4202. "To authorize the record of a deed to realty or personalty, when executed out of this state, the deed must be attested by or acknowledged before a commissioner of deeds for the state of Georgia, * * * or by a judge of a court of record in the state where executed, * * * or by a clerk of a court of record under the seal of the court," etc. Civil Code 1910, § 4203. Unless a deed shows on its face that it is entitled to record, the clerk should not record it. In the absence of a recital in a deed that it was executed elsewhere, the presumption is that the situs of its execution was the place named in the caption; and unless it appears from the face of the paper that the officer by whom it was officially attested was without the territorial limits of his official jurisdiction in attesting the same, it will be presumed prima facie that he was acting within his jurisdiction. Rowe v. Spencer, 132 Ga. 426, 64 S. E. 468. But if the attesting official describes himself as an official of a county different from that stated in the caption, the prima facie presumption is that the deed was executed at the place named in the caption and attested by an official of the county which he describes himself to be; and if that official has no authority to attest deeds in the venue of the caption, the deed cannot properly be recorded. Allgood v. State, 87 Ga. 668, 13 S. E. 569. Every presumption which the law may indulge from the maxim, "Omnia præsumuntur solemniter esse acta," may be invoked in favor of the inference that the deed was executed within the attesting official's jurisdiction, where the deed does not bear evidence to the contrary. In the case of a deed executed by one person, the application of the foregoing rules are attended with less difficulty than where there are several signers. In the case at bar the caption of the deed was "Georgia, Fulton County." As to one of the signers it was attested by an official of that county, and as to this signer there can be no doubt that the deed was properly executed for record. As to the other signer, the deed does not disclose his residence, but does bear internal evidence that he is the trustee of a corporation of Baltimore City and is making the deed in its behalf. This at least affords some ground for assuming that the trustee in the performance of a corporate act was at the place of business of the corporation. Indeed, were it not for the presumption to be drawn from the situs of the caption and the official jurisdiction of the attesting magistrate to one of the signers, we might assume that both trustees in the performance of a corporate act were discharging corporate functions at the home of the corporation.

One fact apparent from the double attestation is that the deed was not signed coincidentally by the two trustees. And is not this sufficient, in connection with the fact that the other trustee was performing a corporate act for a corporation of Baltimore City and went before a clerk of a court of record of Baltimore City to have his signature attested, to justify the inference that one trustee signed the deed in Fulton county, Ga., and the other signed it at Baltimore City? We think so. In drawing this conclusion, we do not put the recital of the situs in the caption in opposition to the recital of the jurisdiction of the attesting official. On the other hand, we give effect to both, by holding that the recital of the situs in the caption and the recital in the signature of the magistrate who attested Dimmock's signature that he was an official of the same county indicates that the deed was executed in Fulton county, Ga., by Dimmock; and the other circumstances to which we have adverted indicate that the other signer, Pritchard, executed the deed at Baltimore City. Courts will always construe an official document or official act so as to give effect to it, if it can be done consistently with the act and the rules of construction. The point is not that the public or the person interested is concluded by the inference, because all-unde evidence is allowable to show that the deed was not properly attested for record, but whether the deed bears on its face facts authorizing the inference that it was properly executed for record. We deem it a fair presumption that the deed was not executed simultaneously by the two signers, that it was executed by Dimmock in Fulton county, Ga., and by Pritchard at Baltimore City, and that it was entitled to record.

The foregoing rulings make it unnecessary to decide the other points raised in the record.

DE LOACH et al. v. GEORGIA COAST & P. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 17, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 518*)—RECORD—SCOPE AND CONTENTS—AMENDMENT.

An amendment offered, but disallowed by the court, is no part of the record, and consequently cannot be considered by the Supreme Court, unless it be set out in the bill of exceptions, or annexed thereto as an exhibit, and duly authenticated. Moore v. Town of Guyton, 110 Ga. 330, 35 S. E. 339.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2342-2355; Dec. Dig. § 518.*]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 293*)—REMEDIES OF OWNERS OF PROPERTY—ACTIONS FOR COMPENSATION.

The petition contained, among others, the following allegations: The plaintiff owned a tract of land containing 8 acres, more or less, in a named city, bounded on the north, south, and west by the lines of a certain named person, and on the east by the right of way of the defendant railroad company. The defendant has a railroad running through the city, which railroad runs for 1,400 feet within 10 feet of the lands of the plaintiffs, on which they have a dwelling. The railroad was placed there by another company, which sold it to a second company, which changed its name to that of the defendant, "and it is liable at present for all the damages that the said railroad has occasioned to said property ever since it was first laid down, and is liable for all the damages that are now being done to said property by said road. The said railroad was built in the main street of the city of Glenville, near your petitioners' property as aforesaid, without their consent, and they were no parties to letting the said road place its track where it is. That, before said road was built as aforesaid, your petitioners' land lay alongside of the main street of said city a distance of 1,400 feet, and the building lots bordering on said street were indeed very valuable, and there were several building lots bordering on said street that the said nuisance has caused to depreciate in value in a very large sum." The operation of the railroad causes a continuing nuisance and disturbance to any person occupying the lots, and creates danger to the lives of persons and stock going on and from the premises. It has destroyed the value of the property for building purposes, as the noise made by the trains passing opposite the property makes it impossible for one to live in peace and safety so near the railroad. Held, such petition was properly dismissed on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 293*)—RAILROADS (§ 129*)—NUISANCE (§ 48*)—REMEDIES OF OWNERS OF PROPERTY—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES.

While there is some vague suggestion that at one time the property, or some of it, abutted on the public highway, it is alleged in the present petition that at the time the suit was brought the property was bounded on that side by the right of way of the railroad company. The pleadings must be construed most strongly against the pleader; and these allegations are not sufficient to show that the plaintiffs were the owners of lots abutting on a public street in a city at the time the railroad was laid upon it longitudinally, and are still so, and that such lots have been damaged by the act of the defendant, so as to bring the case within the ruling in the case of Athens Terminal Co. v. Athens Foundry & Machine Works, 129 Ga. 393, 58 S. E. 891.

(a) In so far as the damage was done by the company which originally constructed the railroad, it was alleged that such company sold its road to another, which by a change of name became the defendant. A mere sale of its property by one railroad company to another does not alone make the purchaser liable for damages previously caused by the vendor. Hawkins v. Central R. Co., 119 Ga. 159, 46 S. E. 82.

(b) In so far as the action rests upon the mere maintenance by the defendant of a nuisance created by another company, from which it purchased, no demand was shown for an abatement. Civ. Code 1910, § 4458; Southern R. Co. v. Cook, 106 Ga. 450, 32 S. E. 585.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 293;* Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 392, 393, 399-403; Dec. Dig. § 129;* Nuisance, Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

4. SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION—DAMAGES FROM OPERATION OF RAILROAD.

In so far as it rests upon a claim for damages arising from the operation of the railroad, it is fatally defective for the reasons above indicated.

JOHN MALLOCK & CO. v. KICKLIGHTER. (No. 3,653.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1912.
Rehearing Denied March 2, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 730*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SPECIFICATIONS OF ERROR—SUFFICIENCY.

The assignments of error alleging that certain instructions of the court were not authorized, and were "otherwise illegal," are not supported by the record. The evidence authorized the instructions given; and, if these instructions were for any other reason illegal, the allegation that they were "otherwise illegal" is too general to present any point for the consideration of this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3013-3016; Dec. Dig. § 730.*]

2. DAMAGES (§ 62*)—DUTY TO MINIMIZE DAMAGES—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

The evidence authorized the court to instruct the jury that, wherever there is a breach of contract, the party injured by the breach is bound to make reasonable efforts to minimize his damages, and that if, in this case, there was a breach or breaches of the contract by Mallock & Co., it was Kicklight-er's duty, if he could, to minimize his damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 119-132; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 198*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EFFECT OF CONTRACT.

The question as to whether the plaintiff, by agreeing that certain cotton be handled by the defendants as factors, for the account of and under the direction of the bank, which had a title to the cotton by reason of ownership of the bills of lading, surrendered any rights claimed by him, or which he may have had, due to a breach of a prior contract with the same factors, was an issue of fact, and was properly submitted by the court to the jury for determination. Nor did the court err in instructing the jury, in this connection, that a surrender of the plaintiff's pre-existing rights, growing out of a breach of the contract by the factors, would not necessarily arise, unless the plaintiff expressly or impliedly agreed that, if they handled the cotton, he would surrender his claim against them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 198*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DUTY OF COURT—CONSTRUCTION OF MEMORANDUM.

It was the duty of the court to construe for the jury the written memorandum introduced in evidence, and the court did not err in instructing them in that connection, that such memorandum or remarks was not in and of itself an express release of the plaintiff's demands.

HILL, C. J. Judgment affirmed.

On Rehearing.

[1] The ruling embodied in the first head-note conclusively decides this case, and renders unnecessary a discussion of the other questions raised.

[2] In one of the grounds of the petition for certiorari it is insisted that the recorder's court of the city of Rome does not exist, having been repealed on August 10, 1909. In this view of the case it was entirely immaterial, in the consideration of the certiorari by the judge of the superior court, whether the charter of the city of East Rome still exists or has been repealed. It is strenuously insisted by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the act which sought to include the territory embraced in the city of East Rome within the corporate limits of Rome was ineffectual for that purpose, because the Legislature, six days after the passage of that act, passed an act amending the charter of East Rome; and it is also insisted that the assumption that the charter of East Rome has been repealed, in the opinion of the Supreme Court in Ivey v. City of Rome, 129 Ga. 286, 58 S. E. 852, is mere obiter, because the question was not directly presented or involved, and we are asked to certify this question to the Supreme Court. Under the terms of the constitutional amendment creating this court we are not permitted to uselessly certify questions to the Supreme Court. It is only when an answer to the certified question is material to the proper determination of the cause that we are permitted to certify questions for instructions.

[3] Since the Supreme Court decided in Bass v. City of Milledgeville, 122 Ga. 177, 50 S. E. 59, that the writ of certiorari could not be used to bring in question the legal existence of the court to which the writ is directed, the judge of the superior court was necessarily compelled to refuse to sanction the writ of certiorari.

The application for rehearing is denied.

The statutory presumption of negligence, arising on proof of killing by the running of the locomotive and cars of the railroad company (Civil Code 1910, § 2780), was not fully rebutted. No error of law is complained of, and the judgment refusing to grant a new trial must be affirmed.

1. CERTIORARI (§ 59*)—DISMISSAL—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

A petition for certiorari should not be dismissed for want of an assignment of error, when it sets forth the evidence alleged to have been introduced at the trial, the judgment of the inferior judicatory, and avers that the judgment is contrary to law, contrary to evidence, and decidedly and strongly against the weight of the evidence.

CONTRACTS (§ 333*) — ACTION — PLEADING — ALLEGATION OF PROMISE.

The court did not err in overruling the general demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 333.*]

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by R. S. Morris against W. H. West. From a judgment overruling demurrer, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Smith, Hastings & Ransom, for plaintiff in error. A. E. Ramsaur and A. E. Wilson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. According to the allegations of the petition, the defendant requested the plaintiff, as his agent, to employ an attorney to make an abstract of title for him. This, of course, would imply a promise on the part of the defendant to pay a reasonable fee to the attorney whom the plaintiff, as the defendant's agent, employed, and consequently there was enough in the petition to withstand a general demurrer, and the court did not err in overruling the demurrer in the form in which it was presented.

It appears, however, from the contract which was entered into, that the petition would have to be amended by inserting a new plaintiff, suing for the use of the present plaintiff, before he could recover the commissions, also claimed, even if he establishes the other allegations of the petition. The contract upon which the suit is based is as follows:

"Atlanta, Ga., Feby. 17, 1910.

"I hereby agreed to purchase from owner, through R. S. Morris, agent, one house and lot, known as 305 Formwalt St., for which I agree to pay $3,400.00 on the following terms: $2,500.00 cash, assume loan for $——, due —— at ——, and balance $25.00 per month with 7% interest made on or before. I have this day, at 9 o'clock a. m., deposited with R. S. Morris, agent, $25.00 to bind this trade. A reasonable length of time to be allowed for examination of titles by my attorney, and if titles are good, I agree to make settlement at once; but if titles are not good, and cannot be made good in a reasonable length of time, this deposit is to be returned to me and trade canceled. Upon my failure to comply with contract, I agree to pay R. S. Morris, agent, the amount of his commission on said sale.

"[Signed] W. H. West, Purchaser.

"—— hereby accept the above offer upon the terms and conditions herein named, and guarantee the titles to be good, and agree to pay R. S. Morris, agent, a commission on the gross amount as follows, viz.: 5 per cent. on the first $2,000, and 3½ per cent. on the excess over the first $2,000. In the event the buyer fails to pay for the property as stipulated above, then the amount paid in is forfeited, and is to be kept by R. S. Morris, agent, as compensation for services rendered by him in the trade.

"[Signed] D. M. Deitch, Owner."

Morris cannot recover upon this contract, though Deitch, the owner, suing for his use, might do so.

Judgment affirmed.

2. DOMICILE (§ 9*)—EVIDENCE.

Where an attachment was issued on the ground of nonresidence, and this ground was traversed by the defendant, it was not erroneous to allow him to testify that he was only temporarily absent from the state on business, and that he intended to come back to Georgia to live. The fact of actual residence is to be determined by the ordinary and obvious indicia of residence; and where one leaves the state of his residence, his declaration that he intended his absence to be only temporary, and that he intended to return to the state of his residence, is explanatory of his conduct, and is competent.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*) — REVIEW — HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

As even the plaintiff's evidence demanded a verdict for the defendant, the errors assigned upon the charge of the judge are immaterial. There was no testimony in behalf of the plaintiff, other than such as required a finding that the casualty was a pure accident; but, even if the usual presumption of negligence applicable to injuries resultant from the operation of the trains of a railroad company could be said to have arisen, this presumption was fully rebutted.

Osborne & Lawrence and R. R. Arnold, for plaintiff in error. H. W. Johnson, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. There are various assignments of error predicated upon the charge of the court. The court erred in charging that the plaintiff, who was an employé of the defendant company, must show himself free from fault. This was unnecessary in this case. The action, as was pointed out when this case was here before (7 Ga. App. 528, 67 S. E. 274), was distinctly brought under the federal "employer's liability act." Some of the other excerpts from the charge, to which exceptions are taken, may not be aptly adjusted to the cause. But all of these exceptions become immaterial; for, upon review of the plaintiff's own testimony, it is quite apparent that the finding of the jury in behalf of the defendant was demanded. No other verdict could have been legally reached. Even if the jury believed the unreasonable story of the plaintiff, there was nothing that could have been done by the engineer that was not done, and the plaintiff himself did nothing. He did not even call the attention of the engineer to the cow which he said was approaching from his side of the track, and which, according to his account, he thought would probably be run over. He did not ring the bell to frighten the cow, and deliberately got down from his seat in the presence of danger and went to shoveling coal. There was no negligence proved by the plaintiff, except his own. There was nothing in the testimony of the defendant's witnesses to evidence anything but a pure accident.

Judgment affirmed.

BROWN v. BOWMAN. (No. 3,802.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 687*)—FRATERNAL ORDERS—NATURE.

The admission that a mutual benefit society organized to do an insurance business is a fraternal benefit order, duly licensed as such by the state, is equivalent to an admission that such an order has a representative form of government and a lodge system, such as is described in section 2866 of the Civil Code of 1910.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1824; Dec. Dig. § 687.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 694*)—MEMBERSHIP—PREMIUMS—INITIATION OF INSURED.

Where such a fraternal benefit order issues a policy of insurance and accepts from the policy holder a note for the premium, it is no defense to an action on the note that the maker thereof has never had an opportunity to be initiated into one of the subordinate lodges of the order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 694.*]

3. FRATERNAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATIONS—NOTE FOR PREMIUM—ESTOPPEL.

Quære: Where an association has been duly licensed by the state as a fraternal benefit order and authorized to organize and conduct its business under the provisions of section 2866 et seq. of the Civil Code of 1910, can a policy holder in the order defeat recovery upon a note given for the premium, by showing that the association was never organized in accordance with the provisions of the statute, and that it has no representative form of government or lodge system as therein provided?

Error from Superior Court, Elbert County; D. W. Meadow, Judge.

Action by Lee S. Brown against Lewellyn Bowman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Lee S. Brown brought suit in a justice's court against Lewellyn Bowman upon a promissory note given for the premium due on an insurance policy issued upon the life of the defendant by the Fraternal Life Association. The defense was that the insurance association was not a fraternal benefit order, as defined by Civil Code 1910, § 2866, because it did not have a representative form of government and a lodge system, with a ritualistic form of work. The answer of the magistrate recites: "It was agreed by counsel that the Fraternal Life Association was a beneficiary order, and that it was licensed to do business as such in the year 1908, and that Lee S. Brown was the manager and joint owner of same." The defendant testified that when the policy was issued to him, and when he gave the note sued on for the premium, the agent never said anything to him about it being necessary to establish a lodge, or for him to be initiated into a lodge, that so far as he knew no lodge was ever established, that he and many others who gave premium notes lived in the same community and talked frequently about the notes, and that they had never heard of any lodge being established by the association. Several witnesses were permitted to testify, over objection by the plaintiff, that they had given notes for premiums to the Fraternal Life Association, and that they had never heard of any lodge being established by the association, nor had they ever been initiated into any lodge. The defendant prevailed at the trial, and in the petition for certiorari error is assigned upon the admission of testimony of the witnesses above referred to, and also upon the ground that the verdict in favor of the defendant was contrary to law and the evidence. The trial judge overruled the certiorari.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r indexes

J. T. Sisk, for plaintiff in error. Geo. C. Grogan, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. (after stating the facts as above). [3] It was admitted that the Fraternal Life Association had been licensed by the state to do business as a fraternal benefit order. If this is true, it is clear that the association would be estopped to deny its corporate existence, or its authority to accept contracts of insurance, in a suit brought by a beneficiary upon one of such contracts. 1 Joyce, Insurance, § 350, p. 39; 29 Cyc. 15-16. As estoppels must be mutual, it would also seem to be clear that, when the duly authorized officers of the state issue a license to an insurance company to do business within the state, a policy holder could not, in defense to an action brought upon a premium note, challenge the right of the insurance company to do business within the state, or raise the question that the company had not complied with the statutes of this state, so as to authorize it to execute contracts of insurance. See 2 Joyce, Insurance, § 1311; 1 Bacon, Benefit Societies, § 60. The license having been duly and regularly granted, it would seem that the right of the company to do business could be brought into question only in a direct proceeding instituted by the state.

[1] But it is not necessary upon the present record to definitely determine this question. It was agreed that the insurance association was a fraternal benefit order. Civil Code 1910, § 2866, defines a benefit order to be one "formed or organized and carried on for the benefit of its members and their beneficiaries, and having a representative form of government and a lodge system, with ritualistic form of work for the meeting of its lodges, chapters, councils, or other designated subordinate bodies, and the benefits, insurance, charity, or relief shall be payable by a grand or supreme body of the same, excepting sick benefits, which may also be paid by local or subordinate bodies."

[2] The evidence in the present case shows that no subordinate lodge was organized in the community where the defendant resided, and that he was never initiated in any lodge. But the law does not require the institution of a subordinate lodge in every community where a fraternal benefit order issues policies of insurance. It would, we think, be a sufficient compliance with the statute if such an order had one lodge, such as is described in the statute, at some place in the state, where its members might be initiated. The fact that a particular member might not have been initiated into a lodge would not render the association illegal, or invalidate its contracts. Nor do we think that the failure of the association to give a particular policy holder an opportunity to be initiated into one of its lodges would render invalid and unenforceable either a policy of insurance issued to such member or a note given by the member in payment of a premium due on the policy.

We are not prepared to hold that a policy holder can defeat recovery on a premium note, even though it should appear that the association had no lodges within the state. But, so far as this case is concerned, it does not appear but that this association may have a number of lodges in different parts of the state. The admission that it was a fraternal benefit order necessarily carries with it the idea that the association has a representative form of government and a lodge system, such as is described in the statute; and, this being so, its contracts will not be held to be invalid, nor will a policy holder be allowed to defeat a premium note solely upon the ground that he has not been initiated into one of the lodges of the association. The certiorari should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed.

1. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER (§ 28*)—PLEADING—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Where an affidavit founded upon Civil Code 1910, § 5395 et seq., charges the defendant with both forcible entry and forcible detainer, in order to authorize a general verdict against the defendant, it must appear that he entered upon the premises in defiance of the occupant, and with such a display of force as to deter him from maintaining his possession, and that, after so entering, the defendant detained possession of the premises with a display of like force.

Error from Superior Court, Walker County; J. W. Maddox, Judge.

Action by James Knight and others against Charles Cate. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Foust & Payne, R. M. W. Glenn, and W. M. Henry, for plaintiff in error. W. P. McClatchey, for defendants in error.

POTTLE, J. Knight and others instituted an action against Cate under the provisions of Civil Code 1910, § 5395 et seq., charging that the defendant did, "with menaces and force and arms, violently and without authority of law," take possession of a described lot of land, and does now "forcibly detain same without authority of law." The jury found for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepts to a judgment overruling his certiorari. The only point made in this court is that the verdict is contrary to law and the evidence.

[1] It has been held that, where a defendant is indicted for forcible entry and detainer as one offense, he cannot be convicted unless the evidence shows both a forcible entry and a forcible detainer. Blackwell v. State, 74 Ga. 816. Analogizing this to the civil proceeding, it would seem that, where the affidavit alleges both a forcible entry and a forcible detainer, it would be necessary to prove both a forcible entry and a forcible detainer. See, in this connection, Griffin v. Griffin, 116 Ga. 754, 42 S. E. 1005. The only issues involved in a proceeding of this character are the possession and the force. Civil Code 1910, § 5398.

[3] There is some question under the evidence as to whether the plaintiffs were in possession of the premises in dispute; but, without reference to this question, we are clear that the verdict was unauthorized, because no such force was shown as is contemplated by the statute. "To enter upon premises in defiance of the occupant, and with such a display of force as reasonably to deter him from maintaining his possession, is forcible entry." Lissner v. State, 84 Ga. 669, 11 S. E. 500, 20 Am. St. Rep. 389. See, also, Lewis v. State, 99 Ga. 692, 26 S. E. 496, 59 Am. St. Rep. 255; Griffin v. Griffin, 116 Ga. 754, 42 S. E. 1005; Hamrick v. Darnell, 43 Ga. 433; Lott v. Peterson, 95 Ga. 516, 20 S. E. 275. It seems from the evidence that the defendant owned lot No. 200, and the plaintiffs owned lot No. 233. There was a dispute in reference to the location of the line between these two lots. The defendant built a house and occupied it. He claims that the house is on his lot, and the plaintiffs claim that he built the house over the line on their land. There is absolutely no evidence of any character to show any forcible entry by the defendant. One of the plaintiffs testified that he told the defendant not to build or to move on the place. But the mere fact that the defendant disregarded this notice, and peaceably and quietly moved into the house which he had built, is no evidence of force such as is contemplated by the statute. Nor do we think there was any evidence authorizing a finding that the defendant had forcibly detained the premises in dispute.

After the defendant had moved into the house, one of the plaintiffs went to him and told him to move off, and he refused to do so, "but told him that before they got rid of him they would have a happy time of it." He made no display of force, offered no violence, and made no other threat. It is claimed that this was such a show of force, such an indication that the defendant would use force, if necessary, to maintain his possession, as to bring the case within the rule laid down in Lissner v. State, supra; but we do not agree with this conclusion. The defendant's language may have been a mere idle threat. He may simply have meant that he intended to resist the plaintiffs with legal proceedings, which he had a right to do. At any rate, there was absolutely no manifestation of any force. The proceeding is not intended to try title to land, nor to take the place of an action of ejectment, nor to settle disputed land lines.

[2] There being no evidence of either forcible entry or of forcible detainer, the trial judge should have granted the certiorari. Judgment reversed.

SIMS-MCKENZIE GRAIN CO. v. G. E. PATTERSON & CO. (No. 3,820.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

SALES (§§ 333, 339*)—DEFAULT OF PURCHASER—RIGHT OF RESALE—NOTICE TO PURCHASER.

Where a purchaser fails to take and pay for goods sold, and the measure of the seller's damages is the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery, before the seller can conclude the purchaser upon the question of damages by a resale of the rejected goods, it is essential that he should notify the purchaser of his intention to resell. A petition for damages, brought by a seller of goods against a purchaser who refused to take and pay for the goods, is subject to demurrer when it neither alleges the market value of the goods at the time and place of delivery nor that after notice to the purchaser the goods were resold by the seller and a price less than the agreed price realized at the resale.

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by G. E. Patterson & Co. against the Sims-McKenzie Grain Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Walter A. Sims, for plaintiff in error. R. H. Jones and Alfred C. Broom, for defendants in error.

POTTLE, J. The allegations of the plaintiff's petition, so far as are necessary to an understanding of the opinion about to be rendered, are as follows: Damages are alleged in the sum of $272 for the breach of a written contract, under the terms of which the plaintiff sold to the defendant five cars of oats to contain 5,000 bushels, which were to be shipped in February, buyer's option, and for which the defendant was to pay 58 cents per bushel, "f. o. b. Atlanta." The oats not having been ordered out, the petitioner alleges their shipment in four cars, each containing 1,250 bushels, on February 28th. The petition further alleges that upon the arrival of the oats in Atlanta the defendant accepted one car and rejected the others; that after tender and refusal to accept, and further refusal to pay for the oats as contracted for, the plaintiff availed itself of the right to resell the oats, and on the 25th of March, through its broker, did sell the oats under the highest offer of 52 cents per bushel. The following damages were alleged as arising out of and incident to the aforesaid breach of the contract: Difference between contract price and resale price, $225; demurrage, $38; brokerage on reselling, $9.

The defendant demurred to the petition upon the following grounds: (1) Because it set forth no cause of action; (2) because under the contract the oats were to be shipped in five cars of 1,000 bushels each, and it appeared from the petition that they were shipped in four cars of 1,250 bushels each; (3) because the petition failed to allege what was the difference between the contract price and the market price of the oats at the time and place of delivery; (4) because the petition failed to allege that the defendant was notified of the plaintiff's intention to resell the oats, and of the time and place of the resale; (5) because it appeared from the petition that the resale of the oats was unreasonably delayed; (6) the item of $38, demurrage, should be stricken; (7) the items for brokerage and resale should be stricken. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendants excepted.

"If a purchaser refuses to take and pay for goods bought, the seller may retain them and recover the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place for delivery; or he may sell the property, acting for this purpose as agent for the vendee, and recover the difference between the contract price and the price on resale; or he may store or retain the property for the vendee and sue him for the entire price." Civil Code 1910, § 4131. In the present case the seller elected to resell the property. The theory of the petition is that the defendant is bound for the difference between the contract price and the price realized at the resale, without reference to whether the latter price represents the market value of the oats or not. There are no allegations in the petition that the defendant was notified of the plaintiff's intention to resell. Before the plaintiff could avail itself of the special statutory right to resell the property and conclude the defendant on the question of damages by the price realized at the resale, it was absolutely necessary that notice should be given, though it was not essential that the notice embrace information as to time and place of the sale. Green v. Ansley, 92 Ga. 647, 19 S. E. 53, 44 Am. St. Rep. 110; Mendel v. Miller, 126 Ga. 834, 56 S. E. 88, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1184.

The decision in Davis Sulphur Ore Co. v. Atlanta Guano Co., 109 Ga. 607, 34 S. E. 1011, does not rule to the contrary. The headnote in that case is somewhat misleading, but the opinion is very clear in laying down the rule above announced. Indeed, it appeared in that case that the goods were never tendered, no demand for payment was ever made, and the goods were resold before the time for payment or that for delivery had arrived. Where the seller fails to give notice, he can still hold the purchaser liable for the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time and place of delivery, without reference to what disposition is made of the rejected goods. In the present petition there is no allegation in reference to the market price of the goods sold at the time and place of delivery. In the absence of a notice of intention to resell the goods as agent of the purchaser, the purchaser was not bound by the price realized at the time of the resale.

It cannot be said as a matter of law in the present case that the seller delayed unreasonably in making a resale of the goods. The contract was for five cars of 1,000 bushels each. It was a substantial compliance therewith to ship the oats in four cars of 1,250 bushels each. The defendants were not chargeable with demurrage, nor with brokerage charges resulting from a resale of the oats. There being no allegation as to what was the market value of the oats at the time and place of delivery, and no averment that notice had been given the purchaser, as Civil Code 1910, § 4131, requires, the petition was subject to the demurrer filed thereto, and should have been dismissed.

Judgment reversed.

HODNETT v. MANN. (No. 3,725.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 8, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 3)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—LEASE WITH OPTION.

Where an owner of land contracts with another to sell the land at a stipulated price, to be divided into installments becoming due at specified times, and further stipulates that, in the event the installments are not paid when they mature, the owner shall be paid a specified sum, as rental for the land, the legal effect of the contract is to create the relation of landlord and tenant between the parties, with an option to the tenant to purchase the land upon the terms and conditions set forth in the contract.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 245*)—RENT—LIEN.

Where, after the execution of such a contract and before the first installment of the purchase price becomes due, the parties mutually agree upon a rescission of so much of the contract as relates to a purchase of the land, the owner has a lien upon the crops grown upon the premises described in the contract, both for rent and for supplies furnished by him which were necessary to make the crop.

Error from Superior Court, Coweta County; R. W. Frieleman, Judge.

Money rule between G. P. Hodnett and L. B. Mann. From the judgment, Hodnett brings error. Affirmed.

T. F. Rawls, for plaintiff in error. W. L. Stallings, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. This was a money rule. The contest was between the holder of a common-law fi. fa. issued in 1909 and the holder of a distress warrant sued out in 1910 and claiming rent for that year. The judge awarded the fund to the holder of the distress warrant, and the judgment creditor excepts.

The facts were these: In January, 1910, Mann entered into a written contract with Georgia Peeples and Walt Peeples, under the terms of which he agreed to sell to the other parties a described tract of land for $800, to be paid in installments. The first installment was to fall due October 15, 1910, and the last installment October 15, 1913. The contract further provided: "And it is further agreed that, in the case the said Georgia and Walt Peeples fail to pay one or either of those notes as they come due, we agree to pay 1,500 pounds of middling lint cotton rent for that year, for the use of said farm. And upon payment of all of the above notes L. B. Mann agrees to make or cause to be made a good and sufficient title to said land." The contract was signed by all three of the parties. During the year 1910 Mann advanced to the two Peeples money and supplies necessary to make a crop. Early in the fall of 1910, and some time before October 15th, the parties to this contract agreed on a rescission of so much of it as related to the agreement to purchase the land, leaving the contract standing as one of rental only. Mann received 1,600 pounds of lint cotton which was grown on the premises in question, and, after paying for supplies which he had advanced to the persons who made the crop, he credited 880 pounds of cotton on the rent. The common-law fi. fa. was levied on the remainder of the crop, and Mann claims the proceeds arising from the sale under his distress warrant, which he duly foreclosed and placed in a constable's hands.

[1] In Perry v. Paschal, 103 Ga. 134, 29 S. E. 703, Perry delivered to Sims a paper of which the following is a copy: "This is to certify that I have this day bargained to Jim Sims 50 acres of land, off of the south-east corner of lot No. 20 in the Fourth district of Terrell county, Ga.; the road running from the Hayes place to Dorse Henry's being the line. I agree to make him a good title on his paying me $500. I agree to run said amount three years, provided he pays the rent promptly." In construing this paper the Supreme Court said: "While the paper evidencing the contract in the case under consideration is informal, it might be treated as a lease of the premises for three years, with the privilege to the lessee to buy at any time for the amount stated in the contract." Following the principle of this decision, the contract involved in the present case was one of rental, with Mann as the landlord and the other persons as tenants, with an option to the tenants to purchase the land upon the terms and conditions stated in the writing.

The contention of counsel for the plaintiff in error is that Mann had no right to claim rent under the contract until October 15, 1910, or at least until that portion of the contract relating to the purchase of the property had been rescinded. This contention is sound. Oxford v. Ford, 67 Ga. 362. In that case it was held that the landlord had no right to distrain for rent before the date on which the first installment on the agreed purchase price was due, or at least before the date upon which the purchaser had agreed to a rescission of that part of the contract. It is argued, upon the principle of this decision, that Mann was simply an ordinary creditor as to the money and supplies which he had advanced, and, being such, he had no right to apply any portion of the cotton to this unsecured debt, so as to defeat the holder of the common-law fi. fa. Where a creditor holds both a secured and an unsecured claim, he cannot approprorate the payment first to his unsecured claim, over the objection of another creditor holding a lien upon the property or the fund from which the payment is made. Such an appropriation by the creditor would in equity amount to a payment or extinguishment pro tanto of his lien. Cofer v. Benson, 92 Ga. 793, 19 S. E. 56; Stubbs v. Waddell, 4 Ga. App. 264, 61 S. E. 145.

[2] But we do not think this principle has any application to the present case. The contract between the owner of the land and the persons who made the crop was primarily a contract of rent with an option to buy. The relation of landlord and tenant existed between the persons, subject to be terminated by the exercise of the option to buy the land and the payment of the first installment due on the purchase price. So much of the contract as related to the purchase of the land having been rescinded by mutual agreement, the relation of landlord and tenant never became terminated, and the landlord was entitled to his lien both for supplies and for rent. His claim for both being superior to the claim of the holder of the common-law f. fa., he had a right as against the holder of that f. fa. to appropriate the cotton which had been delivered to him, first, in satisfaction of the lien for supplies and advances, and to credit the remainder on the claim for rent. His claim for the balance of the rent being superior to that of the holder of the common-law f. fa., the judge did not err in awarding the fund to the holder of the distress warrant.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from City Court of Reidsville; E. C. Collins, Judge.

Action by the Tattnall Supply Company against J. C. Groover. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Way & Burkhalter, for plaintiff in error.
H. C. Beasley, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. Suit was brought upon an account for goods sold and delivered. Over objection of the defendant, the plaintiff was allowed to amend the petition by alleging in substance that the goods described in the bill of particulars were sent to the defendant to be sold for the account of the plaintiff, and that the defendant had sold the goods and collected the money, and had failed and refused to pay over the same to the plaintiff. The objection to this amendment was that it set forth a new and distinct cause of action. We think that the objection was well taken, and that the amendment should not have been allowed. The original petition was framed upon the theory that the defendant had bought the goods from the plaintiff for his own use, and had failed and refused to pay for the goods. The relation thus created was that of debtor and creditor, or purchaser and seller. The amendment converted the action into one for money had and received. It sought to create the relation of principal and agent, and to count upon a breach of contract by the defendant, under the terms of which he was to sell the goods for the plaintiff and to account to the plaintiff for the proceeds thereof. In other words, the goods were shipped to the defendant on consignment, to be resold for the plaintiff. The defendant was to act as agent for the plaintiff, and to sell the goods, collect the money, and pay over the proceeds. The issues were entirely different from those arising upon the petition as originally framed, and the cause of action was completely changed by the amendment. Chapman v. Americus Oil Co., 117 Ga. 881, 45 S. E. 268; Lamar v. Lamar, 118 Ga. 850, 45 S. E. 671.

The amendment having been erroneously allowed, the case was tried upon the wrong theory, and everything that took place after this erroneous ruling was nugatory.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 136*)—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES AS TO THIRD PARTIES—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID TO AGENT.

In a suit against an agent to recover money voluntarily paid to him by mistake in fact, the controlling question in determining his individual liability to repay the money is whether he still has the money in his possession at the time of the suit, or whether he had, before the suit was brought and before he had any notice of the mistake, paid over to his principal the money which he had received by mistake. If he still has the money in his possession at the time of the suit, or had it in his possession when he received notice of the mistake, he would be personally responsible, although payment to his principal may have been subsequently made by him. In the present case this controlling question was issuable under the evidence, and the direction of a verdict for the plaintiff was erroneous.

Error from City Court of Statesboro; H. B. Strange, Judge.

Action by R. L. Durrence against S. A. Rogers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Homer C. Parker, for plaintiff in error. Remer Proctor and Johnston & Cone, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. R. L. Durrence brought suit against S. A. Rogers, alleging that the defendant was indebted to him on an account in the sum of $250, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. from February 6, 1911. At the conclusion of the evidence the trial judge directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount, and the defendant assigns error.

The facts in the case, substantially stated, are as follows: The defendant in the court below, S. A. Rogers, was a contractor, and had agreed to build a house for Dr. J. T. Rogers for $1,000. Dr. Rogers made arrangements with the Statesboro Building & Loan Association to borrow $1,000 on the property, and instructed the plaintiff, R. L. Durrence, who was secretary and treasurer of the building and loan association, to pay this money over to S. A. Rogers for the purpose of being used in the construction of the house. This was early in the year 1910. As the money was needed S. A. Rogers was to call on Durrence, secretary and treasurer of the loan company, from time to time and get from him checks drawn on this fund to be used for the principal, Dr. Rogers. These checks were all made payable to S. A. Rogers, and in the corner of each check there was this memorandum for identification: "For J. T. Rogers." While the house was being erected, Dr. Rogers asked S. A. Rogers to let him have $250 of the money borrowed from the association on this account, promising at the time to replace it. In pursuance of this request S. A. Rogers gave Dr. Rogers $250 of the money. The evidence does not clearly show what Dr. Rogers meant when he said he would replace the money—whether he would return it to S. A. Rogers, or to the bank, subject to the check of S. A. Rogers. After the completion of the house Durrence discovered that he had overpaid S. A. Rogers to the extent of $250, the amount for which he sues. He claims that he made this overpayment through a mistake, and that after he discovered the mistake he called upon the defendant to reimburse him this amount, as he had settled with the loan company for his mistake, and that he was entitled to recover this amount as an individual from the defendant. The defendant admitted that he had received on account of the loan made by the loan company $250 in excess of the amount which had been borrowed from the company by Dr. Rogers, but claims that before he discovered the mistake, and before any demand had been made on him for this excess, he had disbursed all the money received by him for the benefit and at the direction of his principal, and that he had none of the funds remaining in his hands; that in making the disbursements he was acting simply as the agent of Dr. Rogers, and, having paid over to him or used for his benefit all the money, including this excess, he was not individually liable for the same.

The evidence is not clear as to whether the defendant as the agent of Dr. Rogers had in fact paid the money over to his principal, or had used it for the benefit of his principal, before the mistake was discovered and his attention called to the fact. There are some circumstances from which the jury might have inferred that the defendant knew that he had been paid the $250 in excess of the amount borrowed by Dr. Rogers from the loan company, before he paid the amount to his principal or used it for his benefit. Civil Code 1910, § 3608, provides as follows: "If money be paid to an agent by mistake, and he in good faith pays it over to his principal, he shall not thereafter be personally liable therefor. In all other cases he is liable for its repayment. If money be paid by an agent by mistake, he may recover it back in his own name." In the case of Law v. Nunn, 3 Ga. 90, it is held: "In actions against agents, for money voluntarily paid by mistake in fact, the true distinction is: Where the agent has paid the money over to his principal in good faith, he is not personally liable; but when he has not paid the money over, or before such payment he has notice of the mistake, and is required not to pay it, then he is personally responsible, although payment to his principal may have been made."

The overpayment made by mistake to the defendant is not disputed. The fact that the money was paid to him to be used for the benefit of his principal, Dr. Rogers, in the construction of the house, is not in dispute. While the defendant testified positively that he had paid the money over to his principal, or used it for the benefit of his principal, in good faith, before he had notice of the mistake, there are circumstances which are apparently in conflict with his testimony on this point; and under the Code section, cited supra, and the decision in the case of Law v. Nunn, supra, the individual liability of the defendant as the agent of Dr. Rogers to refund the $250 paid to him by mistake by the plaintiff depends upon whether, as agent, he paid the money over to his principal, or used it for his benefit, before he knew of the mistake. We think this question was clearly issuable, and should have been submitted to the jury, and for that reason the trial judge erred in directing a verdict for the plaintiff.

DAMAGES (§ 123*)—MEASURE—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

Where one contracts with the owner of a house to install therein a heating plant of a certain character and quality, and the plant actually installed is inferior to that contracted for, the measure of the owner's damage is the sum required to make the plant conform to the specifications fixed by the contract. This rule is not in a particular case varied by reason of the fact that the contractor offers to make the necessary changes for a specified sum and to give bond for the faithful performance of the work.

Action by W. A. Carlton against Julius Dornblatt. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

B. E. Fortson and Jno. J. Strickland, for plaintiff in error. Cobb & Erwin, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. Carlton employed Dornblatt to install a hot water plant in his dwelling, and paid him the full amount of the purchase price, upon Dornblatt's assurance that the work would prove satisfactory, and that, if it did not, he would make it so. The work not proving satisfactory, Carlton had it overhauled at an alleged expense of $687.67, for which he sued Dornblatt. The jury found for Carlton $604.87 principal, and Dornblatt's motion for a new trial was overruled. The only defense insisted upon here is that, inasmuch as Dornblatt offered to make the necessary changes for $175 and to give bond for the satisfactory performance of the work, this sum fixed the measure of the plaintiff's damage.

We cannot assent to this view. The questions for the jury were: Was Carlton damaged? And, if so, how much? The defendant's estimate of the sum necessary to bring about a compliance with his contract was not conclusive, nor did his offer to give bond to do the work for the sum so fixed by him bind the plaintiff to intrust the repairs to him. Assuming, as the jury found, that it would cost slightly more than $600, the plaintiff was not bound to give the defendant an opportunity to do further unsatisfactory work, merely because he offered a bond, upon which the plaintiff might sue for the ultimate damages he would sustain. The jury found that the defendant had failed to perform his contract. The plaintiff had a right to have the work done in accordance with this contract, and charge the defendant with what the repairs were reasonably worth in the market. The verdict was warranted by the evidence, and no error of law was committed.

Judgment affirmed.

Action by T. H. Booze against W. L. Pyle. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

M. B. Eubanks, for plaintiff in error. Dean & Dean and J. M. Hunt, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. This case is the sequel to that of Booze v. Neal, 6 Ga. App. 279, 64 S. E. 1104.

After the affirmance of the judgment in that case, as a result of which Booze was compelled to pay off the fi. fa., he sued Pyle, the seller, for breach of warranty, and the trial judge directed a verdict in the plaintiff's favor. Pyle's defense was that he sold Booze the cotton as agent for one Payne, who was present at the sale, and that Booze knew the cotton was Payne's, and therefore took the chances, so far as he (Pyle) was concerned, of a failure of Payne's title.

The evidence showed that in 1906 Payne was a tenant on a farm bought from Coker by Pyle, who gave his joint note with Payne at the bank in order to raise money necessary to make the crop. In the fall Payne had five bales of the cotton ginned in Pyle's name and delivered to Pyle at the warehouse; the receipts being issued in Pyle's name. Pyle went with the receipts to the bank, took up the note which he and Payne had given, and gave his individual note in renewal, hypothecating the warehouse receipts as collateral security. Subsequently Coker levied a distress warrant on the cotton. Pending this levy, negotiations were opened for the purchase by Booze from Pyle of a lot of cotton. Coker, having been satisfied, dismissed his levy, and Pyle sold to Booze nine bales of cotton, including the five bales delivered to him by Payne, paid the note at the bank with a portion of the money, and delivered to Booze the five warehouse receipts. Subsequently Neal levied on the five bales in the possession of Booze, and, when the verdict finding the property subject was approved by this court, Booze paid Neal's claim. Booze sued Pyle for the amount paid by him on the Neal fi. fa., but the judge directed a verdict for the amount paid Pyle for the cotton, a somewhat smaller sum than that paid Neal. Booze testified that he dealt with Pyle as the sole owner of the cotton, and did not know Payne in the transaction at all; that Pyle claimed he owned it all the time; and that after Coker's claim for rent was settled there was, so far as Booze knew, no other claim against the cotton. Pyle and Payne testified that the cotton was Payne's; and the point in the case is whether there was any evidence from which the jury could find that Booze knew this when he bought the cotton.

It is insisted for the defendant in error that Pyle, having taken the warehouse receipts in his name, is estopped to deny his title. If he sold the cotton as his own, he would, of course, be estopped, not so much because of the receipts, but upon the general principle that one who sells property to another and takes the other's money cannot be heard, as against the purchaser, to deny his title. But if Pyle sold the cotton as agent of Payne, and Booze knew this, the doctrine of estoppel has no application. We are reluctant to disturb the verdict directed, because it seems to be a manifestly just disposition of the case; but, if there is any evidence to support a different result, the trial judge had no power to deny the defendant a jury trial, nor have we authority to uphold him in so doing. While in the trial of the claim case Pyle swore pointedly that the cotton was his when he sold it to Booze, having been delivered to him by Payne in settlement of a supply bill, in the present trial both he and Payne testified that the cotton was Payne's and that Booze knew it. We quote from Pyle's testimony: "I had not bought that cotton from Payne, nor never in my life told anybody I bought it from Mr. Payne; only stated it was mine by rights of mortgage, and nothing else. I said the cotton was mine by rights under the mortgage, and nothing else; never had any more claim on it. * * * I did sell that cotton in that transaction for Payne, because Payne told me to do so, then and there, and Payne was present at the time. Booze knew who that cotton belonged to at that time just as well as I did, because he would not buy it until the levy was dismissed, and I know I would not have gone on my own bond for the cotton." Payne swore: "I paid the interest and put the cotton in there in Mr. Pyle's name, so that he could put up his own note as collateral security to extend my note until he got ready to sell the cotton; did not sell that cotton to him, only just that agreement. I turned it over to Pyle to sell and apply to these notes. * * * Booze knew, at the time he bought this five bales of cotton, that it was my cotton he was buying, and that the proceeds were being applied to my debts. He knew it, and he went to Coker to find out whether Coker had anything else against the cotton before he bought it, and came back and said that Coker had a claim for rent for the year before, and he made it up in his own mind that Coker could not collect that, and he bought it anyhow." He further testified: "I never told Booze I owned it; but he knew it. He knew it was my cotton, I told him so, and he objected to buying it, because it was levied on, and he afterwards went and got that rent affair out of the way."

We think this testimony made a jury question. If Pyle was acting as Payne's agent in making the sale, and Booze knew it, he cannot look to the agent for a breach of the warranty of title. There is nothing in the evidence to demand, even if there is to authorize, a finding that Pyle knowingly concealed from Booze the existence of the judgment in favor of Neal which afterwards subjected the cotton, although such concealment would not support the action as brought. There is nothing in the point that, because Booze sued for the amount paid by him to Neal, he cannot recover his true measure of damages, to wit, the sum paid Pyle for the cotton. We feel constrained to send the case back for a trial before a jury.

Judgment reversed.

PAYNE v. ROME COCA-COLA BOTTLING CO. (No. 3,888.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)EXPLOSIVES (§ 8)—EXPLOSION OF BOTTLE—LIABILITY OF MANUFACTURER.

Where an action is brought to recover damages for an injury caused from the explosion of a bottle, the contents of which were manufactured, bottled, and sold by the defendant as a harmless beverage, an inference of negligence on the part of the manufacturer arises, when it is shown that all the persons through whose hands the bottle had passed were free from fault, and that the condition of the bottle and its contents had not been changed since it left the defendant's possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

Error from City Court of Floyd County; John H. Reece, Judge.

Action by Sam Payne, by next friend, against the Rome Coca-Cola Bottling Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. L. Tison, W. H. Trawick, and Maddox & Doyal, for plaintiff in error. Lipscomb, Willingham & Wright, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. A bottle of Coca-Cola, manufactured and sold by the defendant exploded, and fragments of glass flew into the plaintiff's eye and destroyed the sight. The plaintiff alleges that the water in the bottle had been charged with carbonic acid gas, and that the explosion was due to the fact that the bottle was too highly charged with the gas by the defendant. A nonsuit was awarded and the plaintiff excepted.

The bottle of Coca-Cola was bought by the plaintiff's brother from Cook, a retail vender, who bought it from Barnett, to whom it was sold by the defendant. There was nothing in the appearance of the bottle to differentiate it from other bottles of Coca-Cola put on the market by the defendant. Neither the plaintiff nor his brother did anything to cause the explosion, nor had the bottle or its contents been changed in any way since the manufacturer sold it to Barnett. Coca-Cola, such as was contained in the bottle, was advertised and sold by the defendant as a refreshing and harmless beverage. A small cap, fastened tightly down, covered the mouth of the bottle. There was no direct evidence in reference to the manner in which the bottle was charged, nor as to the quantity of gas used.

If the plaintiff can recover at all, he can do so only upon an application of the maxim "res ipsa loquitur." The occurrence was unusual. Bottles filled with a harmless and refreshing beverage do not ordinarily explode. When they do, an inference of negligence somewhere and in somebody may arise. There is no presumption of law, but merely an inference of fact. Negligence is not necessarily to be inferred merely from the act itself; but the tribunal designated by the law to decide the issues of fact may infer negligence from the happening of an event so unusual. So much may be gathered from previous decisions. Chenall v. Palmer Brick Co., 117 Ga. 106, 43 S. E. 443; McDonnell v. Central Railway Co., 118 Ga. 86, 91, 44 S. E. 840; Palmer Brick Co. v. Chenall, 119 Ga. 837, 47 S. E. 329; Monahan v. National Realty Co., 4 Ga. App. 680, 62 S. E. 127; Cochrell v. Langley Mfg. Co., 5 Ga. App. 317, 63 S. E. 244; Sinkovitz v. Peters Land Co., 5 Ga. App. 788, 64 S. E. 93; Central Railway Co. v. Butler, 8 Ga. App. 243, 68 S. E. 956. In the Cochrell Case, supra, the Chief Judge called attention to the fact that the doctrine expressed in the maxim "res ipsa loquitur" was the foundation for the rule stated in section 5157 of the Civil Code of 1895 (Civil Code of 1910, § 5743), which is merely a codification of previous decisions of the Supreme Court.

But it is said that, before the doctrine can be applied, the act must speak not only of negligence, but of negligence on the part of the defendant. To this, of course, all are agreed. But the argument of the able and earnest counsel for the defendant is that the principle at the foundation of the maxim cannot be applied here, because the bottle was not in the possession or control of the defendant when it exploded; that, therefore, there can arise no inference that it was negligent; and that, if negligence is to be inferred, it must be ascribed to the vender, from whom the plaintiff's brother bought the bottle, or to the brother himself. The counsel relies upon language of Mr. Justice Lamar in the Chenall Case, supra, that, "prima facie, that want of due care should be referred to him under whose management and control the instrument of injury was found." Further along in the opinion the learned Justice said: "All that the plaintiff should be required to do in the first instance is to show that the defendant owned, operated, and maintained, or controlled and was responsible for the management and maintenance of, the thing doing the damage; that the accident was of a kind which, in the absence of proof of some external cause, does not ordinarily happen without negligence. When he has shown this, he has cast a burden on the defendant, who may then proceed to show that the accident was occasioned by vis major, or by other causes for which he was not responsible." In the headnote the rule is stated somewhat differently, thus: "Prima facie, such negligence will be attributed to the person charged by law with the duty of maintaining and managing the thing causing the injury." In that case the court discussed and applied the doctrine in favor of one injured by the falling of a brick arch, and did not have in mind such an occurrence as the one presented in the case now at hand.

Granting, for the sake of the argument, that, prima facie, inferential negligence will be imputed to the person who sold the bottle to plaintiff's brother, or to the brother himself, the inference is completely rebutted when it affirmatively appears, as it does here, that neither was at fault, that neither handled the bottle improperly, or did anything to change the condition from that in which it was when received. Since for every effect there is a cause, where negligence exists, some one must have been the responsible author. If he can be found, it is right that he should pay the penalty. The bottle exploded. Inferentially some one was negligent. It was not Cook, the last vender of the bottle, nor the plaintiff's brother, nor the plaintiff, nor yet Barnett, because they all stand exonerated by direct or circumstantial evidence of their freedom from fault. But the inference of negligence remains, and some one is prima facie blame. By a process of elimination we get back to the manufacturer, who set the dangerous agency in motion, and upon whom the blame ought inferentially to be fastened.

It is certainly no hardship to require at the manufacturer's hands an explanation of the occurrence, that the jury may say whether it, like the other persons who handled the bottle, has been exonerated. If a manufacturer should sell to a jobber a gun, and after passing through the hands successively of the wholesaler and retailer, it finally reaches the marksman, and explodes in his hands while being used in the ordinary and usual manner, and injury results, it is plain that there was a defect in the gun. Somebody ought to be responsible. Concede that inferentially it could be said that the marksman must have done something to the weapon to cause it to explode, if he disproves this, and the retailer, the wholesaler, and the jobber all in turn show that they kept and handled the gun in the usual way, and did nothing to change its condition, the inference of negligence would be shifted back upon the manufacturer, who put the weapon of destruction in circulation with his indorsement that, when used in the ordinary and usual manner, no harm would come to him who used it. In such a case it would be no answer, when the maxim that the thing spoke for itself is invoked, to say that, when the injury resulted, the thing was not in the possession, power, or control of the manufacturer.

Under the proven facts, the occurrence speaks of the defendant's negligence, and it alone. The inference is that it was negligent in the manner alleged in the petition.

It charged the bottle with carbonic acid gas, it put together the constituent elements of the beverage, it manufactured or procured the bottle to hold these elements, and it put the bottle in circulation, with an invitation to the public to use the contents as a harmless and refreshing beverage. The attempt to use it caused the plaintiff the loss of his eye. Somebody is responsible, and the inference is that the defendant is the guilty party. See Blood Balm Co. v. Cooper, 83 Ga. 461, 10 S. E. 118, 5 L. R. A. 612, 20 Am. St. Rep. 324; Watson v. Augusta Brewing Co., 124 Ga. 121, 52 S. E. 152, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1178, 110 Am. St. Rep. 157; Hudgins v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 122 Ga. 695, 699, 50 S. E. 974. In the Monahan Case, supra, Judge Russell, speaking for the court, held, that the doctrine underlying the maxim "res ipsa loquitur" might be applied in a case where one was injured by a falling window in the office of a tenant, and that inferentially the landlord was guilty of negligence, although the window was under the immediate control and in the actual possession of the tenant at the time.

We do not say that under the proved facts the jury must find the defendant liable, but there was enough evidence to make a prima facie case and to require an explanation from the defendant. We deal with the case upon the facts presented. As to whether an inference of negligence would arise against the manufacturers upon mere proof of the explosion, without more, we express no opinion.

Judgment reversed.

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 113*)—SUFFICIENCY OF WRITING—SALES OF GOODS.

Where one party to an alleged contract for "the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise" relies upon a written memorandum to show compliance with the statute of frauds, the memorandum must show all the terms of the contract, and that both parties thereto assented to those terms. Borum v. Swift, 125 Ga. 202, 53 S. E. 608; Clark on Contracts, 83.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 103*)—SUFFICIENCY OF WRITING—ACCEPTANCE OF WRITTEN OFFER.

An acceptance of a written offer relating to a subject-matter within the statute of frauds must itself be in writing, in order to make a contract mutually binding. Pope & Fleming v. Graniteville Mfg. Co., 1 Ga. App. 176, 57 S. E. 949.

3. SALES (§ 23*)—REQUISITES OF CONTRACTS—ACCEPTANCE OF OFFER.

The alleged contract on which the suit is based consists of a written proposal or offer to buy certain described personal property at a specified price, and the allegations of the petition show that this written offer was withdrawn before acceptance or part performance by the proposed seller. The offer, therefore, never became a complete contract, and the court properly dismissed the petition on demurrer. Oak City Co. v. Kennedy Co., 4 Ga. App. 344, 61 S. E. 499; Sivell v. 1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 162)—REVIEW OF DECISIONS—EFFECT OF TRANSFER OF CAUSE—JURISDICTION OF JUSTICE.

Where an appeal has been entered from a judgment of a justice's court to a jury in the superior court, the former court loses all jurisdiction of the case; and if, by mistake, an appeal from the same judgment to a jury in the justice's court is subsequently entered, and a verdict is returned on the latter appeal, and a judgment entered thereon, the latter proceedings are mere nullities.

2. BANKRUPTCY (§§ 20, 435*)—EVIDENCE (§ 43*)—PENDENCY OF PROCEEDINGS—EFFECT IN STATE COURT.

In a suit in a state court, if the defendant desires a stay of the proceedings therein, because of his adjudication as a bankrupt, until the application for his discharge can be heard and decided by the bankruptcy court, or if he desires to set up his discharge as a defense to such suit, he must plead the adjudication or the discharge. After judgment has been rendered in the state court, he cannot attack the validity of the judgment therein, and move the court to set aside the judgment, or to treat such judgment as a "nullity," either because of the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings, or because of his discharge in bankruptcy from the debt on which the judgment is based. Bankruptcy proceedings must be pleaded and proved, if relied upon. Courts, other than a bankruptcy court, will not take judicial cognizance of bankruptcy proceedings.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; Geo. L. Bell, Judge.

Action by the Chattanooga Medicine Company against J. F. McDougald. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

S. C. Crane, for plaintiff in error. Walter C. Hendrix, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The procedure in this case is somewhat anomalous. The plaintiff in error calls it a motion to treat the judgment of the superior court as a "nullity." In some doubt as to the character of his pleadings he asks that this motion be treated by this court as a motion for a new trial. We think it is more properly a motion to set aside a judgment rendered by the superior court on the facts stated in the motion. From a confused record we have, after some study, evolved the following to be the case:

From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in a suit on an account in a justice's court, the defendant entered an appeal to a jury in the superior court. After the appeal papers had been transmitted to the clerk of the superior court, the defendant—presumably by inadvertence—entered an appeal from the same judgment to a jury in the justice's court, and a verdict was rendered on the latter appeal and a judgment entered thereon. Subsequently the attention of the justice was called to the fact that an appeal had previously been entered to a jury in the superior court in the same case, and he treated as nugatory the appeal to the jury in the justice's court. After verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff on the appeal in the superior court, the defendant, at the same term of the court, filed a motion to treat this judgment as a nullity, upon the following grounds: (1) Because the defendant, after judgment was rendered in the justice's court, filed his petition in bankruptcy in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia, and listed in his bankruptcy schedule his debt to the plaintiff, and the judgment rendered thereon in the justice's court, as one of his provable debts. (2) That on said petition in bankruptcy the defendant was adjudged a bankrupt, "and has made his application for a final discharge, and a final discharge would be a release from [the plaintiff's] claims," and, therefore, the judgment in the superior court against him should be "vacated and treated as a nullity," and the execution issued on the judgment be stayed until the final disposition of the defendant's application for discharge by the district court. To this motion the movant offered an amendment, setting up the following additional grounds: (1) That the plaintiff was bound by the verdict and judgment in the justice's court, and had no right in law to proceed further in the superior court in the case, until the verdict and judgment had been reversed and set aside or declared a nullity by order of the justice or of the superior court; that the verdict and judgment in the justice's court ended the case so far as the plaintiff was concerned, and there was no suit pending against the defendant and the security upon the appeal bond at the time that the papers were sent to the superior court. (2) That the act of the plaintiff in proceeding further in the case in the superior court, after the papers had been sent up by the justice of the peace, was a fraud on the court as well as on the movant, because it was the duty of the plaintiff, when the case was called for trial in the superior court, to inform the court that the defendant had filed his petition in the bankruptcy court and had listed the plaintiff's claim as one of his provable debts, and also to inform the court that the verdict and judgment had been taken in the justice's court, so that the superior court would have been informed as to the true status of the case between the parties and the court; that for these reasons the judgment should be set aside as a nullity, and a new trial be granted to the defendant, and he be allowed to file his plea of bankruptcy. This amendment was disallowed, and to this ruling the defendant excepted. The judge of the superior court denied the motion to treat the judgment as a nullity, and to this, also, the defendant excepted.

[1] After reviewing the case, we find no merit in the motion, even if the amendment had been allowed, although we frankly confess that we are not entirely clear as to what are the contentions of the plaintiff in error. He apparently objects to the conduct of the justice of the peace in treating the appeal entered to a jury in his court, and the verdict rendered by the jury thereon, as nugatory, in view of the fact that an appeal had previously been entered to a jury in the superior court from the judgment of the justice's court. He proceeds on the idea that the justice of the peace, after having rendered a judgment in the case, could not set it aside. This is true; but where a justice's court, as in the present case, renders a judgment on a verdict of a jury in that court after an appeal has been entered to a jury in the superior court, the judgment in the justice's court is entirely void, and the justice himself, as well as any other court, can legally disregard it, and treat it as a nullity, whenever and wherever it may be brought in question (Fontaine v. Bergen, 55 Ga. 410); and the court may proceed in such case as though such verdict and judgment had not been rendered (Chapman v. Floyd, 68 Ga. 455). Manifestly, after an appeal had been entered in the justice court from the judgment therein to a jury in the superior court, the justice's court lost jurisdiction entirely of the case, and there was no case pending therein on which any further proceedings could be taken; and, consequently, the verdict rendered on the appeal from the judgment of the justice to a jury in that court, and the judgment of the justice thereon, were mere nullities.

[2] The real point insisted upon by the plaintiff in error is that the judgment in the superior court should be treated as a nullity, because, after the suit had been filed in the justice's court and an appeal entered to the superior court, he filed his petition in bankruptcy, listing the plaintiff's claim in the schedule as one of his provable debts. No plea setting up the bankruptcy proceedings was filed in the justice's court or in the superior court. It is stated, in the motion made to treat the judgment as a nullity, that counsel for the defendant had called the attention of the justice of the peace to the fact that these bankruptcy proceedings had been filed and were pending. A motion to set aside a judgment on account of bankruptcy, where bankruptcy is not pleaded, will not be sustained. Pulliam v. Dillard, 71 Ga. 599. If the defendant desired a stay of the proceedings until his application for discharge could be passed upon by the bankruptcy court, or if he desires to set out his discharge as a defense, he must do so by a plea in the suit and before a judgment is rendered against him. He cannot, after judgment is rendered against him, attack such judgment on either ground by affidavit of illegality or otherwise. Finney v. Mayer, 61 Ga. 500; Farmers' & Traders' Bank v. University Pub. Co., 9 Ga. App. 128 (5), 70 S. E. 602. Certainly the trial judge could not take judicial cognizance of the pendency of bankruptcy proceedings against the defendant. Woodward v. McDonald, 116 Ga. 750, 42 S. E. 1030. There was no error in the judgment of the superior court, overruling the motion to treat as a nullity its judgment rendered in the case.

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Eve, Judge.

Action by the Birmingham Fertilizer Company against John A. Cox & Son. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. E. Dinsmore, for plaintiff in error. Jas. H. Price, Fulwood & Murray, and J. J. Murray, for defendants in error.

POTTLE, J. The Birmingham Fertilizer Company sold fertilizer to the partnership of John A. Cox & Son and took their note for the purchase price. Cox & Son sold the fertilizer to planters, took their notes, transferred them as collateral security to the Birmingham Fertilizer Company, and retained the collateral notes for collection. Cox & Son having failed upon demand to surrender the collateral notes or account for them, the Fertilizer Company brought an action of trover and bail. At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the defendants, and subsequently overruled the plaintiff's motion for new trial.

[1] 1. It is contended that the verdict was demanded, because there was no proof of the value of the notes sued for. "Promissory notes are evidence of their own value in an action of trover." Wight v. Hester, 24 Ga. 485. As a general rule, in a trover case, the plaintiff must prove the value of the thing sued for. But, where one takes for another notes for collection, he impliedly concedes their value, and, if he converts them, they should be treated, in an action for their conversion, as being prima facie of their face value. If they are in fact valueless for any reason, such as the insolvency of the makers, this would be a matter of defense. Citizens' Bank v. Shaw, 132 Ga. 771, 65 S. E. 81. If the plaintiff elects to take a money verdict, his measure of damages could not exceed either the amount of his debt or the prima facie or actual value of the collaterals as shown by the evidence. There was no proof that the notes were without value, and the direction of the verdict cannot be sustained upon the theory that the notes were not shown to be of value.

[2] 2. The defendants pleaded and proved that pending the action they had been discharged in bankruptcy, and this is urged to sustain the direction of the verdict in their favor. It is settled by the decision in Berry v. Jackson, 115 Ga. 196, 41 S. E. 698, 90 Am. St. Rep. 102, that the discharge in bankruptcy of the defendants in a trover case constitutes no defense to the action. "The issue is one of title, not of debt." The judge erred in directing the verdict and in admitting the record of the discharge in bankruptcy. There is no specific assignment of error upon the direction of the verdict; but as the motion for a new trial complains of the admission of the record of the discharge in bankruptcy, and as this was error, the judgment overruling the motion will be reversed, that the case may be tried anew in the light of the views herein expressed.

RUSSELL, J. Flowers & Whilden brought suit in the city court of Tattnall county against W. L. Strickland to recover the unpaid balance of the purchase price on the alleged sale of a piano. The petition was brought in the name of Flowers & Whilden, a partnership alleged to be "composed of Flowers and E. B. Whilden." Strickland filed a plea of set-off, and upon the trial the jury sustained his contention, and rendered a judgment in favor of the defendant against the partnership of Flowers & Whilden. The judgment was rendered March 6, 1906. On December 30, 1910, the fi. fa. issued upon the above judgment was levied upon a lot in the city of Douglas as the property of W. R. Flowers. He interposed an affidavit of illegality, containing two grounds: (1) That he had never been served with any process or other notice of the pendency of the suit whereupon said execution is based, nor did he waive service, nor did he appear in or defend said suit; and (2) that the execution is against Flowers & Whilden, and not against the deponent, W. R. Flowers, and for that reason could not proceed against the individual property of the deponent, which is not subject to the execution.

It will be noted that there was no judgment taken against the individuals composing the firm of Flowers & Whilden; also that in the original petition filed by Flowers & Whilden the initials of Flowers are not given. The partnership is said to consist of "Flowers and E. B. Whilden." It is needless to determine whether the defendant, when he filed his set-off, might have had the individual members of the plaintiff partnership served and thus have bound them individually for any judgment rendered in his favor. It is a matter, also, of some interest to conjecture what might have been the effect if Flowers had been present, participating in the trial, and in that event an individual judgment had been asked.

Regardless, however, of the first ground of the affidavit of illegality, we are clear that the court erred in striking the affidavit, because the second ground is meritorious. The name of W. R. Flowers does not appear anywhere in the proceedings introduced in evidence in the trial in the court below. To bind individual assets of a partner, the partner himself must be served, and must have had his day in court. The execution cannot be made broader than the judgment, nor the judgment be broader than the original proceeding upon which it is based. For this reason, we think the illegality should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed.

McNAMARA v. GEORGIA COTTON CO.

(No. 3,732.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 116*)—OPERATION OF BAR OF STATUTE—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

It is not necessary that an agent should have written authority to execute in behalf of his principal a contract required by the statute of frauds to be in writing; but such authority may be conferred by parol.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. §§ 251-260; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

2. SALES (§ 406*)—REMEDIES OF BUYER—ACTION FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—CONDITION PRECEDENT.

Where an executory contract for the sale and delivery of personal property at a specified time is entered into, and the seller fails to deliver the property at the time and place agreed on, demand for delivery is not a necessary condition precedent to the bringing of an action for damages by the purchaser for the breach of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 1156-1158; Dec. Dig. § 406.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 594*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—VALUE.

Testimony of a witness having personal knowledge as to the market value of a commodity at a given time and place is evidence of a substantive fact, and, if undisputed, will demand a finding that the commodity was of the value fixed by the witness. In such a case, the jury cannot arbitrarily disregard such testimony, and substitute their own opinion as to the market value of the commodity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2431; Dec. Dig. § 594.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 271*)—DECLARATIONS—SELF-SERVING DECLARATIONS.

In the trial of an action for damages for the breach of a contract such as that referred to in the preceding headnote, memoranda sent by the plaintiff to its agent, who negotiated the contract, indicating that the cotton described in the contract had been resold by the plaintiff, are mere self-serving declarations, and as such are inadmissible in support of the plaintiff's contention that an actual delivery of the cotton was contemplated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068-1104; Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 437*)—PAROL EVIDENCE AFFECTING WRITING—SHOWING INVALIDITY OF CONTRACT.

A contract apparently legal on its face may be shown to have been founded upon an illegal consideration. Where two parties enter into a contract under the terms of which one agrees to sell and deliver at a certain time and place, and the other agrees to take and pay for, cotton of a described quantity and quality, parol evidence is admissible to show that neither of the parties contemplated delivery of the cotton, but that the contract was intended as a mere speculation upon chance, to be settled upon the difference between the agreed price and the market value at the time and place fixed for delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2025-2029; Dec. Dig. § 437.*]

6. DIRECTION OF VERDICT—NO ERROR.

Applying to the facts of the present case the principle stated in the last preceding headnote, the court erred in directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff.

Error from City Court of Ashburn; R. L. Tipton, Judge.

Action by the Georgia Cotton Company against J. W. McNamara. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Haygood & Cutts, for plaintiff in error. J. T. Hill, J. H. Pate, and J. W. Dennard, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The Georgia Cotton Company sued McNamara for the breach of a contract alleged to have been contained in three letters. The following is a copy of one of these letters:

"Fitzgerald, Ga., May 19, 1909.

"Mr. J. W. McNamara, Rebecca, Ga.—Dear Sir: In consideration of one dollar in hand paid, and for value received, we beg to confirm having purchased of you to-day, as follows: One hundred bales (100) of cotton, basis good middling, Savannah classification, at ten and one-quarter cents (10¼) per pound f. o. b. Rebecca, Georgia. This cotton to be delivered to us in good merchantable condition, and reweighed, during the month of November, 1909, not later than the 25th day. This cotton to average in weight between four hundred and eighty (480) and five hundred and twenty (520) pounds per bale. Ruling differences between grades at the time of delivery to apply. Please confirm. Yours very truly, [Signed] Georgia Cotton Co., Thos. Nesbitt."

At the bottom of the letter appeared the following:

"Rebecca, Ga., May, 1909.

"Dear Sirs: I confirm the above contract, and will deliver the cotton as above agreed.

"[Signed] J. W. McNamara."

At the trial the judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, for an amount representing the difference between the purchase price agreed on and the market value of the cotton at the time and place of delivery, as shown by the evidence. The defendant has sued out a direct writ of error, complaining of this ruling.

[1] 1. The contract sued on is in substantially the same form and language as that involved in Terry v. International Cotton Co., 136 Ga. 187, 70 S. E. 1100. The letter addressed to the defendant contained an offer to buy from him, upon the terms stated in the letter, cotton of the character therein described. The written confirmation and acceptance by the defendant completed the contract, and it thereafter became binding on both of the parties thereto. When the contract was offered in evidence, the defendant objected to its introduction, upon the ground that it did not appear that Thomas Nesbitt, who purported to have signed the letter in behalf of the plaintiff, had written authority from the plaintiff to execute the contract. Substantially the same objection was made to the writing in the case of Terry v. International Cotton Co., supra. The point in that case was raised by demurrer. The Supreme Court held that the petition was not demurrable, either on the ground that the contract declared upon was unilateral, or that it was too vague, uncertain, or incomplete to satisfy the requirements of the statute of frauds, or that it constituted a mere option, and did not show who were the parties to it. There was no merit in this objection. "There is no statute in this state requiring the authority to make the memorandum required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, and such authority may be conferred by parol." Brandon v. Pritchett, 126 Ga. 286 (1), 55 S. E. 241, 7 Ann. Cas. 1093. It appeared from the testimony that Nesbitt was manager for the Georgia Cotton Company at its branch office at Cordele, Ga., that he had been representing the company for several years, that it was engaged in the business of buying and selling cotton, and that he had general authority to represent his principal in and about its business. This evidence was sufficient to have authorized the admission of the writings sued on.

[2] 2. It is contended that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize the verdict, because there was no proof of a demand for the delivery of the cotton prior to the date fixed in the contract for delivery, or prior to the bringing of the suit. The defendant answered, admitting that before the bringing of the suit the plaintiff had demanded payment of the amount of damages which it claimed to have sustained by reason of the defendant's breach of the contract, but stated that whether any demand was made for the delivery of the cotton the defendant "is unable at this time either to admit or deny." This is probably an evasive answer, and should be taken as an admission of the allegation that demand was made. The defendant states no reason why he was unable to admit or deny that demand was made upon him for the delivery of the cotton. He ought to have known whether demand was made or not, and he ought to have answered this allegation directly, or at least by assigning some reason why he was unable to admit or deny. See Raleigh & Gaston R. Co. v. Pullman Co., 122 Ga. 700 (5), 50 S. E. 1008. But we do not think any demand was necessary in a case of this character. The obligation of the defendant was to deliver to the plaintiff a certain described quantity and quality of cotton by a certain date at a certain place. His failure to comply with this obligation was a breach of his contract. The suit to recover damages alleged to have accrued on account of this breach was a sufficient demand under the law. It was not necessary that the plaintiff should have, prior to the bringing of the suit, sought out the defendant and in terms demanded that he comply with his contract.

[3] 3. The plaintiff further contends that the directing of the verdict was error, because, while there was direct uncontradicted evidence as to the market value of the cotton at the time and place of delivery, nevertheless, the jury were not bound by the testimony of a witness as to market value. It is contended that this was opinion evidence, and that the jury would have had a right to disregard the opinion of this expert witness, and substitute their own opinion as to the market value of the cotton. While testimony as to market value does involve the opinion of the witness as to what a particular commodity is worth, at the same time it is not such an opinion of a witness testifying as an expert as that the jury would have a right to absolutely disregard it, where it was uncontradicted. The witness in this case was engaged in the business of buying and selling cotton. He was familiar with the market price of cotton at the place of delivery fixed in the contract. This familiarity was gained by him, and this opinion was entertained by him, by reason of the fact that he was engaged in the business of buying and selling cotton, and had personal knowledge as to the market value of the commodity at the time and place of delivery stipulated in the contract. In our opinion, this was testimony of a substantive fact, and, being wholly uncontradicted, the jury would have had no right to disregard it.

The plaintiff in error relies upon the case of Baker v. Richmond City Mill Works, 105 Ga. 225, 31 S. E. 426, to the effect that the jury were not bound by the testimony of an attorney as an expert as to the value of the services of another attorney in a particular case. What has been said above sufficiently distinguishes this case. The case last referred to was cited with approval in A., B. & A. Ry. Co. v. Howard, 125 Ga. 478, 54 S. E. 530, which involved the question of the market value of certain cross-ties. The witness there testified that the market price of the cross-ties in Brunswick was about 44 cents. In commenting upon this testimony, Mr. Justice Evans said that, in the first place, it was not to be regarded as positive and unequivocal proof that the article had the exact value stated by the witness, but that it was merely an expression of an opinion on the part of the witness. He then added: "But it is a mistake to suppose that the opinion of an expert witness on the subject is absolutely binding on the jury, and it is error to direct a verdict upon any such supposition." The learned justice was evidently dealing with this witness as an expert, and not only as an expert, but as a witness who was unwilling to risk his opinion far enough to make an exact statement as to the market value of the commodity. That the Supreme Court did not intend its ruling to go to the extent claimed by the defendant in error is evidenced by the fact that in the case of Watson v. Hazlehurst, 127 Ga. 298, 56 S. E. 459, the court affirmed the direction of a verdict involving the market value of cotton on a particular date in the city of Savannah solely upon the testimony of a witness that it was worth a certain price. The case last referred to involved an action for damages for the breach of a contract similar to the one under investigation in the present case.

The case differs from Martin v. Martin, 135 Ga. 162, 68 S. E. 1095, and Minchew v. Nahunta Lumber Co., 5 Ga. App. 154, 62 S. E. 716, where it was held that the jury were not bound by the opinion of a witness as to the value of specific property directly involved in the trial. In cases of this character there may be, and usually is, proven data from which the jury might form an independent estimate as to value. But where the issue is as to the market value of a commodity at a place other than that of the trial and at a time long anterior thereto, how can it be said that the jury can arbitrarily substitute their mere speculative opinion for the positive and uncontradicted testimony of a witness who professes to know what the market value was at the time and place in question? For instance, suppose that, in a case tried in Georgia in 1912, the question of the market value of wheat in Chicago in 1900 was in issue, and a witness familiar with the Chicago market at that time testified unequivocally to the value of the wheat; would a Georgia jury, without any data whatever, be permitted to disregard this testimony and substitute its own opinion? We think not, nor do we think the authorities require a contrary ruling. See Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Harris, 1 Ga. App. 668, 57 S. E. 1030.

[4] 4. The court admitted in evidence, over objection of the defendant, certain letters written by an officer of the plaintiff to another officer in Cordele. These letters contained memoranda which indicated that the cotton bought from the defendant had been resold by the plaintiff. Evidence of this character would be material on the question as to whether actual delivery of the cotton was contemplated by the parties, and would be a circumstance tending to show that the plaintiff did expect delivery of the cotton; but the evidence offered to prove this fact was not admissible for this purpose. The letters were merely self-serving declarations on the part of the plaintiff, and were, consequently, inadmissible to prove the fact sought to be established.

[5, 6] 5, 6. But we do think the court erred in directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant pleaded that the contract sued on was intended by both parties to be simply a speculation in futures, that actual delivery of the cotton was not contemplated, and that the parties expected to settle with each other upon the difference between the purchase price and the market value at the time and place of delivery. In the recent case of Luke v. Livingston, 9 Ga. App. 116, 70 S. E. 596, it was held: "Parol evidence is competent to show that a written contract apparently relating to an actual sale of cotton was in fact entered into merely for the purpose of allowing the parties to deal in cotton futures." The defendant testified as follows: "Prior to the making of these contracts, early in the season, we agreed to do some future business. The way we agreed, he was to do one side, and me the other; one to buy, and one to sell. The writings were to be fixed up some later day. When we made such future contracts, they were to be discharged by the difference to be paid in money. What was said was that if he lost he was to pay, and if I lost I was to pay. These three letters put in evidence, dated May 19, June 30, and July 7, 1909, under which I wrote the confirmation, were in pursuance of that conversation and followed it up." It is very clear to our minds that, if the jury should credit this testimony, they would be obliged to find that both the defendant and Nesbitt, the manager of the plaintiff company, understood and agreed that no actual cotton was to be delivered, and that the contract was made in pursuance of a mere speculative venture, obnoxious to the law.

We therefore send the case back, that it may be submitted to the jury upon the issue as to whether or not actual delivery of the cotton was contemplated; in other words, whether the writings spoke the truth, or whether, notwithstanding the actual agreement to deliver expressed in the face of the writings, it was nevertheless understood and agreed by both parties, at the time the contract was entered into, that actual delivery of the cotton would not be required, but that the parties would settle simply upon the difference existing at the time of delivery between the market value of the cotton and the purchase price as fixed in the contract. See Farmers' Oil Co. v. Rosenthal, 73 S. E. 428. Judgment reversed.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. ROUNTREE. (No. 3,753.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. REQUESTS TO CHARGE—SUFFICIENCY OF GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS.

The written requests to charge, so far as applicable, are fully and clearly covered by the general instructions to the jury.

2. CONSTRUCTION OF CHARGE AS A WHOLE.

The excerpts from the charge of the court, considered in connection with the charge as a whole, contain no error.

3. COMPARATIVE NEGLIGENCE—DIMINUTION OF DAMAGES—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The law of comparative negligence and consequent diminution of damages, embodied in Civil Code 1910, § 2781, was correctly charged, and the size of the verdict indicates that it was applied to the evidence by the jury favorably to the defendant.

4. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—No ERROR.

No error appears, and the evidence fully supports the verdict.

MICHIGAN MUT. LIFE INS. CO. v. PARKER. (No. 3,756.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 593*)—HEARSAY—WEIGHT.

Hearsay evidence has no probative value.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 22*)—EVIDENCE OF AGENCY—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT.

Agency cannot be shown by the mere declarations of the alleged agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 40; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 76*)—AGENTS—EVIDENCE OF AGENCY—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT.

Where suit was brought by a life insurance company upon a promissory note given for a premium due upon a policy of insurance, and the defense was that an authorized agent of the plaintiff had accepted a return of and canceled the policy, and relieved the defendant from the obligation to pay the unearned portion of the premium, it was error to admit in evidence, over objection duly made, a letter purporting to have been written by the alleged agent from a place other than the home office of the company to a third person upon stationery of the company, to which letter the writer signed his name as "general agent" of the plaintiff. Such a letter was at most only a declaration of agency by the alleged agent. Nor did the letter have any probative value because in the heading were printed the name of the plaintiff and the name of the alleged agent, with the words "general agent" after his name, there being no proof that the plaintiff had authorized the publication and use of such stationery. Had the letter been written from the home office of the company, and shown upon its face that it was in reply to one written by the addressee to the company, the rule might be different. Raleigh Railroad Co. v. Pullman Co., 122 Ga. 700, 708, 50 S. E. 1008.

4. INSURANCE (§ 92*)—AGENTS—EVIDENCE OF AUTHORITY.

Evidence that one is employed as "general agent" of an insurance company is not sufficient, without proof as to his duties, to show authority to release a debtor from the obligation of a note payable to the company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 122; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

5. RATIFICATION OF ACTS OF AGENT—EVIDENCE—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

There was no evidence that the plaintiff had ratified the release of the defendant by accepting the return of the policy of insurance. A verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of the note was demanded, and the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 261*)—MORTGAGE ON CROP—RIGHT OF SALE.

While a cropper has a "mortgageable interest" in the crop, this interest cannot be subjected to levy and sale under the mortgage until the cropper acquires title, and this he cannot do "until there has been an actual division and settlement" with the landlord.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 261.*]

Error from City Court of Ashburn; J. W. Haygood, Judge pro hac.

Action between Charlie Fountain and Archie Fountain. From the judgment, Charlie Fountain brings error. Affirmed.

W. T. Williams, J. A. Comer, and A. S. Bussey, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Tipton, for defendant in error.

POTTLE, J. The cropper executed a mortgage upon his interest in the growing crops. To the levy of the mortgage execution the landlord filed a claim. When the case was here before (7 Ga. App. 361, 66 S. E. 1020) the court held that the mortgage was valid and enforceable, and that the landlord could not, even with the cropper's consent, defeat the mortgage by applying the mortgaged property to an indebtedness created for supplies furnished the year before. At the second trial it was admitted that at the time of the levy the crop mortgaged was ungathered in the field and no division had been made between the landlord and cropper. The plaintiff in fi. fa. offered to show that at the time of the levy the cropper was not indebted to the landlord for supplies or advances. The judge refused to allow this, and entered up a judgment dismissing the levy.

The exact question thus presented is whether or not the interest of the cropper is subject to levy and sale before the landlord has received his half of the crop, but after he has been paid in full for all supplies and advances furnished by him to the cropper. The title to the whole of the crop is in the landlord "until there has been an actual division and settlement." De Loach v. Delk, 119 Ga. 884, 47 S. E. 204; Harley v. Davis, 7 Ga. App. 386, 66 S. E. 1102; Taylor v. Coney, 101 Ga. 657, 28 S. E. 974; Civil Code 1910, § 3707. The manifest policy of the law is to give the landlord complete control over the crop until he has actually received his portion of the crop and had his lien for supplies and advances paid off in full. While the cropper has a "mortgageable interest" in the crops, such interest cannot be subjected to the mortgage debt until the cropper has acquired title, and this he cannot do before a division between himself and the landlord. The "interest" may ripen into a title, but there can be no levy before it does. See, in this connection, Jordan v. Jones, 110 Ga. 47, 85 S. E. 151. If the cropper owes the landlord nothing, there must be some way to protect the creditor. This court has held that garnishment is not the remedy. Thompson v. Passmore, 9 Ga. App. 771, 72 S. E. 185. A division must be made at some time; but if by collusion the landlord and the cropper attempt to defeat the creditor, by refusing to make a division or otherwise, undoubtedly equity would afford relief.

The case seems to have been submitted to the presiding judge to determine all issues of law and fact. If so, a judgment should have been entered finding the property not subject to the mortgage fi. fa., but as the judgment entered was a final termination of the case in favor of the claimant, and he does not complain, the plaintiff in fi. fa. has not been hurt.

Judgment affirmed.

BUSH v. HESSIG-ELLIS DRUG CO.

(No. 3,321.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 29, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. SALES (§ 354*)—REMEDIES OF SELLER—ACTION FOR PRICE—PLEADING.

There was no error in striking the defendant's answer. In the absence of any effort to amend it, the averments of the answer were too vague and indefinite to present a defense, either as a plea of tender or as a plea of failure of consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 354.*]

2. SALES (§ 347*) — ACTION FOR PRICE—DEFENSES.

There was no error in refusing a nonsuit. The suit was upon an account for the price of a certain beverage. The plaintiff introduced in evidence, without objection, a tripartite contract, signed by the defendant, as "dispenser," and by the plaintiff as "distributor," in which the defendant agreed to purchase and dispense a certain quantity of such beverage, manufactured by the third party to the contract. The fact that a third party was the manufacturer would not relieve the defendant from his obligation to the plaintiff under this contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 829*) — ACTION FOR PRICE.

The court erred in excluding testimony offered by the defendant to the effect that the beverage purchased by him was intoxicating. The contract between the plaintiff and the defendant required the plaintiff to sell and deliver to the defendant a nonintoxicating beverage. Ordinarily, where one purchases intoxicating liquor in a state in which the sale of such intoxicants is authorized by law, and the contract provides that it is to be performed in that state, he is liable for the purchase price; and the fact that under the contract the liquor is delivered to the purchaser in a state in which the sale of intoxicating liquors is unlawful would present no defense to an action brought to recover the purchase price. However, the ruling of the trial court, to the effect that, though the beverage sold might be intoxicating, that fact alone would not relieve the defendant from paying for it (though generally a correct statement of law in the abstract), was error in the present case, because the court overlooked the provisions of the contract involved, which required the delivery of nonintoxicating beverage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

Error from City Court of Miller County; W. I. Geer, Judge pro hac.

Action by the Hessig-Ellis Drug Company against E. B. Bush. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

P. D. Rich, for plaintiff in error. Bush & Stapleton, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The Hessig-Ellis Drug Company sued Bush upon an account stated. The defendant pleaded that the goods shipped to him were intoxicating liquors, and that the consideration was therefore illegal. He sought also to plead tender. By amendment, which was stricken upon demurrer, he set out certain representations alleged to have been made to him by the agent of the plaintiff, in regard to the nonintoxicating quality of the beverage which was the subject-matter of the contract between the parties, and in reference to a certificate, which it was alleged was to be forwarded from some officer of the internal revenue service. In the amendment he attempted also to plead a tender to return the goods and failure of consideration. Upon the trial the court ruled out certain testimony upon the subject of tender, and also testimony of defendant to the effect that "Fan Tan," the beverage he had purchased, was intoxicating, that it was to be sold from the defendant's soda fount as a beverage, and that, as it was intoxicating, it was valueless to the defendant. In regard to the latter testimony the court certifies that he did not allow the testimony, because, even though the articles sold might be intoxicating, that fact itself would not relieve the defendant from paying for it. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount sued for. The defendant excepts to the judgment overruling his motion for a new trial and to the ruling striking the amendment to his answer.

[1, 2] 1, 2. With the above statement of facts and rulings contained in the headnotes, no further discussion of the first two points raised in the case would be profitable. Upon another trial it may be that the defendant can file a plea of tender conforming to the legal requirements; and he may also be in possession of facts which will enable him to file a good plea of failure of consideration, for if he purchased a nonintoxicating beverage, and can establish that the liquid shipped to him was intoxicating, that would be a total failure of consideration, because the contract introduced by the plaintiff deals wholly with a nonintoxicating beverage. It is so described in the first statement in the contract.

[3] 3. According to the certificate of the trial judge, the testimony in regard to the intoxicating quality of the "Fan Taz" was excluded, because the court was of the opinion that, "even though the stuff sold might be intoxicating, that within itself would not relieve defendant from paying for same." The court's ruling upon the subject of tender was correct (if for no other reason), because there was no plea of tender after the court had stricken the amendment. We think the court erred in excluding, upon the ground stated, the testimony to the effect that the "Fan Taz" purchased was an intoxicating liquor. The defendant had the right to show, if he could, that the liquid shipped to him was intoxicating, and this would have constituted a good defense. He could, perhaps, have established this fact even under the denials of indebtedness contained in his original answer. The first words in the contract introduced by the plaintiff, and the signing of which by the defendant gave the plaintiff a cause of action, are "nonalcoholic beverages." In the absence of a plea setting out that this language was deceptive, and used merely as a subterfuge to cover a purchase of intoxicating liquors, forbidden by law, these words in the very forefront of the contract import a warranty that the "Fan Taz" thereafter mentioned was nonalcoholic; certainly that it was not sufficiently alcoholic to be intoxicating.

Under the ruling in the Roberts Case, 4 Ga. App. 207, 60 S. E. 1082, it is possible that such a contract would not be violated if the beverage contained vegetable matter which required the presence of alcohol to preserve it, and if the percentage of alcohol used for that purpose was not sufficient to produce intoxication. But we doubt this, because the contract dealt with a beverage, and, under the provisions of the general prohibition law, no alcoholic intoxicating beverage can lawfully be sold. It is not to be presumed that the defendant, who was buying an article by wholesale, to sell it in turn at retail, willfully intended to violate the law. Certainly, if the amount of alcohol in the "Fan Taz" was sufficient to produce intoxication, so that "Fan Taz" could properly be said to be not only alcoholic, but intoxicating as well, the sellers would have violated their obligation under the contract to furnish the purchaser what he contracted to buy, namely, a nonalcoholic beverage.

It is, of course, settled, by numerous decisions (see especially Rose v. State, 133 Ga. 356, 357, 358, 359, 65 S. E. 770, and citations), that one who is lawfully engaged in interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors in one state may sell such intoxicating liquors in another state, though such sales be prohibited by law within the limits of the latter state; and for this reason, among others, the plea which the defendant sought to interpose was properly stricken. The allegations of the plea (so far as it sought to set up that the contract was illegal and contrary to public policy) presented no issuable defense. If the defendant had ordered intoxicating liquors to be shipped by a dealer in Tennessee, engaged in interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors, and had received an intoxicant of the kind he ordered, and in accordance with the terms of his order, the debt would be enforceable against him, if no other reason appeared for its nonpayment than that the contract was outlawed, as contrary to good morals and the public policy of this state. The courts of this state may by comity enforce or refuse to enforce the laws of a sister state, dependent upon whether such laws, or contracts sought to be upheld under them, contravene the well-settled policy of Georgia; but the question with which we are now dealing is controlled by the constitutional right of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. Under our own state Constitution, the federal law takes precedence of ours.

The trial judge correctly stated this general abstract principle in his ruling upon the testimony, but it was not applicable to the case. He erred in excluding testimony offered by the defendant to the effect that the beverage purchased was intoxicating, because the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant required the plaintiff to sell and deliver to the defendant a nonintoxicating beverage. The question presented was, not whether the sale was outlawed because the sale of intoxicants is prohibited in Georgia, but simply a question as to whether the purchaser had received what he ordered. Ordinarily where one purchases intoxicating liquor in a state in which the sale of such intoxicants is authorized by law, and the contract provides that it is to be performed in that state, he is liable for the purchase price; and the fact that under the contract the intoxicating liquor is delivered to the purchaser in a state in which the sale of intoxicating liquors is unlawful would present no defense to an action brought to recover the purchase price. However, the ruling of the trial court to the effect that, though the beverage sold might be intoxicating, that fact alone would not relieve the defendant from paying for it (though generally a correct statement of law in the abstract), was error in the present case, because the court overlooked the provisions of the contract involved, which required the delivery of a nonintoxicating beverage.

The defendant would not be permitted, under the rulings cited in the Rose Case, supra, to assert that the contract was void because the sale of intoxicating liquors in Georgia is prohibited, if he had purchased alcoholic and intoxicating liquors; but he should have been permitted to prove, under his answer and the amendment which was first filed, and which was not stricken, that alcoholic and intoxicating liquor was shipped him, instead of the nonalcoholic beverage which was the subject-matter of his contract of purchase. Of course, if the judge had not placed his ruling upon the ground which he expressly certifies by note, the ruling excluding the testimony might be sustained, because the answer might have been a mere conclusion of the witness, without any facts upon which to base such conclusion. The defendant would have the right to show that the "Fan Taz" he received was intoxicating; but to do this there must be definite evidence of substantive facts or experiment from which such conclusion would reasonably arise, and not a mere statement of opinion or conjecture.

Judgment reversed.

J. S. WOOD & BRO. v. M. E. JONES & SON.
(No. 3,811.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. FACTORS (§ 43*)—DUTIES AND LIABILITIES —BREACH OF CONTRACT.

Where a cotton factor makes with his principal an express contract to hold the cotton until instructed by his principal to sell, if the factor sells in the absence of instructions from the principal, the latter may recover whatever damages he has sustained. The measure of the damages would be the difference between the price for which the cotton was sold and the highest proven market value of the cotton at the place where it was sold at any time between the date of the sale and the date of the trial. If in such a case the factor sues the principal for advances previously made upon the cotton, the principal may recoup whatever damages he has sustained by reason of the breach of the contract by the factor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Factors, Cent. Dig. §§ 45-57; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

2. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NO ERROR.

There was no error of law committed, and the verdict was fully warranted by the evidence.

Error from City Court of Statesboro; J. H. Smith, Judge.

Action by J. S. Wood & Bro. against M. E. Jones & Son. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

The suit was upon a promissory note, dated September 12, 1906, and due January 12, 1907, payment of which was secured by a deed to land. Contemporaneously with the note and the deed the defendants executed a writing in which they agreed that, in consideration of advances aggregating the principal of the note sued on, they would deliver to the plaintiffs, for sale for account of the defendants, one bale of upland cotton for every $10 which had been or might be advanced. The instrument was not signed by the plaintiffs. The writing further provided: "All cotton I deliver for sale or remittances I may make to J. S. Wood & Bro. shall at their option be applied, first, to the credit of any open account I may owe them and to the payment of damages aforesaid, up to the time of a final settlement, and that the above note or notes shall remain in full force, until such settlement." The defendants filed an answer, setting up that the note was given to secure the plaintiffs for advances made to the defendants upon 45 bales of upland and 48 bales of Sea Island cotton which had been shipped to the plaintiffs as factors to be sold by them for the defendants' account; that when the note was executed the plaintiffs agreed to hold the cotton "until the same was ordered sold by the defendants"; that in violation of this agreement the plaintiffs sold the cotton at reduced prices, to the damage of the defendants in a named sum; that if the Sea Island cotton had been held and sold on December 12, 1906, it would have been worth 34½ cents per pound, and if the upland cotton had been held and sold "about the 2d day of December, 1906," it would have been worth 11½ cents per pound. The answer avers that the cotton was actually sold by the plaintiffs without any instructions so to do from the defendants, on a date prior to the dates above mentioned and for a less price than it was worth on those dates. The defendants base their right to recoupment upon the facts just recited. A demurrer to the answer was overruled, and the defendants prevailed at the trial. The plaintiffs assign error upon the refusal of a new trial, and also upon the refusal to strike the defendants' answer.

Brannen & Booth, for plaintiffs in error. J. J. E. Anderson, Deal & Renfro, and Hines & Jordan, for defendants in error.

POTTLER, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] One ground of the demurrer raised the point that the defendants were not entitled in this action to recoup the damages which they claimed to have sustained by reason of the breach of contract by the plaintiffs. The defendants alleged that the consideration which moved them to execute the note sued on and the deed which was given to secure it was the express contract, then and there made with the plaintiffs, under which they agreed to hold the defendants' cotton until instructed by them to sell. "Between the parties themselves any mutual demands, existing at the time of the commencement of the suit, may be set off." Civil Code 1910, § 4340. "Recoupment is a right of the defendant to have a deduction from the amount of the plaintiff's damages, for the reason that the plaintiff has not complied with the cross-obligations or independent covenants arising under the same contract." Civil Code 1910, § 4350. "It differs from a set-off in this: The former is confined to the contract on which plaintiff sues, while the latter includes all mutual debts and liabilities." Civil Code 1910, § 4351. "Recoupment may be pleaded in all actions ex contractu, where from any reason the plaintiff under the same contract is in good conscience liable to defendant. And in all cases where, under the laws of this state, recoupment may be pleaded, if the damages of the defendant shall exceed, in amount, those of the plaintiff, the defendant shall in such cases recover of the plaintiff the amount of the excess." Civil Code 1910, § 4353; Hatcher v. Comer, 73 Ga. 418. Under these sections of the Code it is clear that there was no merit in this ground of the demurrer.

The further point is made that the defendants should not be permitted to set up the parol agreement with the plaintiffs, because to do so would be to add to or vary the written contract; it being claimed that, inasmuch as one of the writings comprising the contract stipulated that the defendants would deliver the cotton to the plaintiffs for sale for account of the defendants, it would be a variance from this contract to permit proof of the contract as relied on by the defendants. There is no merit in this point, because it is expressly alleged in the answer that, when the plaintiffs demanded of the defendants additional security for the advances which had been made and which were to be made in the future, the defendants consented to execute the note and the deed upon the express agreement of the plaintiffs not to sell the cotton until instructed so to do by the defendants. Under this allegation of the answer the plaintiffs' promise was a consideration for the execution of the note and the deed. The plaintiffs seek, not only a general judgment on the note, but a special judgment against the land described in the deed, and, as the consideration of a deed may always be inquired into when the principles of justice require it (Civil Code 1910, § 4179), this ground of the demurrer was properly overruled.

The point is made by demurrer, objections to the evidence, and exceptions to the judge's charge, that the contract relied on by the defendants as the basis of the plea of recoupment was too uncertain and indefinite in its terms to be capable of enforcement, and that the defendants cannot arbitrarily select December 2d and December 12th as the dates from which they estimate the amount of damages which they had sustained; and it is further insisted that, even if the contract was sufficiently definite and certain to be otherwise capable of enforcement, under the law applicable to the case the plaintiffs had a right to sell the cotton without any instructions from the defendants for the purpose of reimbursement for advances made. The plaintiffs had an agency coupled with an interest, and as such agents had a right, in the absence of a special contract, to sell the cotton in their discretion to reimburse themselves for advances previously made. Where there is an agency coupled with an interest, unreasonable instructions detrimental to the agent's interest may be disregarded. Civil Code 1910, § 3578; Gordon v. Cobb, 4 Ga. App. 49, 60 S. E. 821. But where a factor and his principal have entered into an express contract fixing the price at which the goods consigned are to be sold, or the time when the sale shall be made, the parties are bound by such a contract to the same extent and in the same way that parties are ordinarily bound by their contracts. Brown v. McGran, 14 Pet. 479, 10 L. Ed. 550. If the contract was actually made as contended by the defendants, the plaintiffs were guilty of a conversion in selling the cotton without instructions, and an action of trover could have been maintained against them for the recovery of the cotton or its value. In the case of Whigham v. Fountain, 132 Ga. 277, 63 S. E. 1115, this course was pursued. It appeared in that case that the plaintiff sent to factors a certain lot of cotton upon which they advanced him money, and it was expressly agreed between the plaintiff and the factors that the cotton was not to be sold to cover the advances, except by the plaintiff's consent and after due notice to him. The Supreme Court held that the parties were bound by this contract, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in trover the highest proved value of the cotton between the date of the conversion and the date of the trial. It necessarily follows from this decision that, where the owner of the cotton elected to wait until sued for the advances made by the factor, he would have a right to rely upon the fact that the factor had damaged him in a sum greater than the amount sued for by selling the cotton without any instruction from him to do so and in violation of an express contract made between the parties.

In this case the defendants selected two dates, and calculated the damages which they claimed to have sustained upon the market price of cotton on those dates. One of the defendants testified that he had actually sold cotton in Savannah on those two dates, knew what the market price was at that time, and that he would have then sold the cotton which he had consigned to the plaintiffs, if he had had it. Without reference to whether the statement as to what the defendant would have done is too uncertain in an ordinary case, it has no application here, because he would have had a right to take as the basis for the estimate of damages the highest market value of the cotton on any date between the time of the conversion by the plaintiffs and the date of the trial. Gray v. Bass, 42 Ga. 270; 3 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (1st Ed.) 829. It can afford the plaintiffs no ground of complaint that the defendants selected December 2d and December 12th. Especially so in view of the fact that there was evidence showing that at a later date cotton was worth more in the market in Savannah than it was on these two dates. The court did not err in overruling the ground of the demurrer to the defendants' answer hereinbefore referred to, nor was there any error in admitting evidence or in charging upon the theory that, if the defendants proved the contract which they alleged to have been made, they would be entitled to recover against plaintiffs whatever damages they could show they had sustained.

The demurrer, having been filed more than a year after the filing of the answer, cannot be considered, save in so far as it raised the question that the answer did not set forth any defense to the action. The judge's charge was sufficient on the question of the measure of damages, in the absence of a request for more specific instructions. There was enough in the charge for the jury to understand that, if they found in favor of the defendants, they were to find the amount of the difference between the sum realized by the plaintiffs for the cotton and the price they could have realized on the dates on which market value was shown, and that, if this sum exceeded the balance of advances for which the plaintiffs sued, the defendants would be entitled to recover the difference.

[2] The evidence was conflicting, but there was testimony directly substantiating the allegation in the answer with reference to the contract relied on by the defendants, and the verdict was fully supported by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

COOPER v. BROWN, Governor. (No. 3,810.)
(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 6, 1912.)

(Syllabus by the Court.)

1. BAIL (§ 79*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—RELEASE OF SURETIES—REARREST OF PRINCIPAL.

When the principal in a criminal recognizance conditioned for his appearance to answer a specific criminal charge therein designated is thereafter arrested for an entirely distinct offense, and, being found guilty of the latter offense, is delivered into the custody of the state to serve a term upon the public works in accordance with the sentence of a court of competent jurisdiction of this state, the sureties on the bond are released. The release of the sureties from future liability arises from their inability to produce their principal to answer the charge, caused by the act of the state in assuming a custody of their principal to which they were theretofore entitled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bail, Cent. Dig. §§ 350-369; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

2. BAIL (§ 79*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—RELEASE OF SURETIES—REARREST OF PRINCIPAL.

The case is not affected by the fact that the principal in the appearance bond escaped from the chain gang after he had entered upon the service of his sentence. When the state took him into custody to serve the sentence of the court, the obligation of the sureties was annulled, and no act of the principal or of the sureties could revive it.

Error from City Court of Houston County; C. E. Brunson, Judge.

Action by J. M. Brown, Governor, against J. P. Cooper, upon a criminal recognizance. Judgment absolute against defendant, and he brings error. Reversed.

R. N. Holtzclaw, for plaintiff in error. R. E. Brown, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. [1] The single question presented by this record is whether a judgment absolute upon a criminal recognizance can properly be entered against the plaintiff in error, who signed it as security. As appears from the record and from the agreed statement of facts, Cooper signed an appearance bond as surety of Peter Searcy, conditioned for the appearance of the said Searcy to answer an indictment for a misdemeanor. The indictment and the bond were transferred to the city court of Houston county, and thereafter, the principal failing to appear, a rule nisi was granted and scire facias issued thereon on May 18, 1911. On June 13, 1911, Searcy, the principal, was arrested by the sheriff of Dooly county, and was confined in the common jail of Dooly county until June 15th, when he pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor in the city court of Vienna, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $75 and costs, or, in default thereof, to serve 12 months on the chain gang of Dooly county. On June 15, 1911, Searcy was delivered to the warden in charge of the chain gang of Dooly county, and was in the chain gang until July 5, 1911, when he escaped, and he has not been retaken. The warrant under which Searcy was arrested on June 13, 1911, was for a misdemeanor—cheating and swindling—committed in Dooly county, Ga. The sheriff of Dooly county had knowledge that Searcy was wanted in Houston county, to answer to the indictment for misdemeanor, before he was arrested under the warrant for cheating and swindling in Dooly county. Upon this statement of facts the judge of the city court of Houston county entered a judgment absolute against Cooper, as surety, upon the recognizance; and error is assigned upon the rendition of this judgment.

The ruling in West v. Colquitt, 71 Ga. 559, 51 Am. Rep. 277, is cited by counsel for both parties in this case. In that case it was held that, "where one has been arrested and given bond to answer for a criminal offense, the sureties on such recognizance are not discharged by the subsequent arrest of their principal on another charge, and the giving of a bond, with other sureties, to answer therefor. If the state should keep him in continued custody, so as to render his production easy for it, but impossible for the sureties, they would be relieved; but the mere temporary restraint prior to the giving of the second bond would not work a discharge." Really the precise question then presented to the Supreme Court, as stated by Chief Justice Jackson, was whether, after sureties had obligated themselves to produce the defendant to answer an offense, they were discharged by a second arrest, for a different offense, and the giving of bail thereon. As to this the court held that the facts would not entitle the sureties on the first bond to be discharged. In reasoning on the fundamental provisions of the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of this state, by which the right to give bail was granted to every citizen, the learned Chief Justice discusses the question at some length, and says that, "when the bail agree to produce their principal at court, they do so in full view of the fact that the principal may commit another offense, and may give bail for that, under another arrest, and that, because they have agreed to produce his body to answer for the first offense, the state does not bargain with them not to arrest him if he sins again, and then that her highest law guarantees to him the right to give other bail to answer that. The state does an act perfectly lawful when she so arrests him for a second offense." This really concludes the ruling upon the point actually before the court. What immediately follows is an opinion as to the law under a supposable case not then before the court, and therefore in strictness is mere obiter. However, the reasoning seems to us so unanswerable that, in the light of what is said by the Supreme Court in Buffington v. Smith, Governor, 58 Ga. 341, and Hartley v. Colquitt, Governor, 72 Ga. 352, we shall adopt the view of the learned Chief Justice upon the point which is now squarely presented to us. Treating of such a state of facts as those now before us, Chief Justice Jackson says: "If she [the state] should keep him [the principal] in her own custody, of course the bail in the first case would be discharged, because she could produce him, but they could not; and it would be against all reason to punish the sureties for what she did, and by so doing prevent them from keeping their bargain with her, and when all reason for the bail ceased, because she had the man in her own jail or her own penitentiary."

[2] As ruled by the Supreme Court in Smith, Governor, v. Kitchens, 51 Ga. 159, 21 Am. Rep. 232, Cooper, the security in the recognizance now before us, cannot be charged with the escape of Searcy from the chain gang of Dooly county. While the defendant is out on bond, he is, in contemplation of law, in the custody of his bail. Hartley v. Colquitt, 72 Ga. 352. When the bail signed the bail bond the law placed the principal in his custody. He could have arrested him and delivered him to the sheriff at any time. Clark v. Gordon, 82 Ga. 613, 9 S. E. 333. As Searcy, the principal, did not appear in conformity with his obligation, the rule nisi and scire facias thereupon properly issued, and if no action on the part of the state had intervened, and the principal failed to appear at the next term of the court, a judgment absolute would have followed necessarily. In Dennard v. State, 2 Ga. 187, as well as in Roberts v. Gordon, 86 Ga. 386, 12 S. E. 648, the court was dealing in each instance with a bond which required the defendant to answer the same charge for which he was sentenced; and in that respect these cases differ from the case at bar, in which the bond which is sought to be finally forfeited has no connection with the offense for which the principal in the bond was sentenced. But in our opinion the principle which controlled the ruling in the Dennard and Roberts Cases, supra, must be applied in the instant case, for the reason that Searcy, Cooper's principal, was taken as completely from his control and custody and placed as completely within the power of the state of Georgia when the sheriff of Dooly county, and later the warden of the chain gang, became his custodian, as if he had been placed in the custody of the sheriff of Houston county by Cooper's surrendering him, or by an order from the court requiring him to be rearrested. In Roberts v. Gordon, 86 Ga. 387, 12 S. E. 649, Chief Justice Bleckley says: "There can be no doubt that, as soon as the sentence was pronounced, the sheriff, and not the bail, was the proper custodian of the convict. The legal effect of the sentence was equivalent to a special order directing the sheriff to hold him in custody. This being so, it was not necessary to enter an exoneretur on the minutes of the court in order to discharge the bail. The sentence itself operated as an exoneration. Governor v. Kemp, 12 Ga. 466." In Smith v. Kitchens, supra, Judge McCay in holding that the lower court was right in discharging the securities in a case in which the principal on a prior appearance bond taken by a justice of the peace was arrested under a bench warrant, and remained in the custody of the sheriff until he escaped during the progress of his trial, after saying it would be a very bad public policy to treat the bond given by the defendant before a magistrate as inhibiting the judge of the superior court, even after or before indictment, from ordering the rearrest of the defendant, uses the following language: "Here, after indictment found, the judge issues a bench warrant, over his own signature and seal, ordering an arrest. That arrest was made, the party was in the custody of the sheriff, and escaped. It would, as it seems to us, be an outrage to charge the original securities with this escape. He was in the lawful custody of the sheriff. The securities could not control him."

The facts in the present case are not identical with those in West v. Colquitt, supra; but they are very similar to those in Buffington v. Smith, 58 Ga. 342, with the single exception that in Buffington's Case Earle, his principal, had not escaped. In that case Judge Jackson said: "We think that the court erred. The state had Earle in her own custody—in the penitentiary—just as securely confined as if she held him in jail in Hart county. She had, and now has, nothing to do but to bring him out and try him whenever she pleases to do so. If found guilty, she can sentence him for another term, to begin when this White county sentence expires. It would be strange indeed if she forfeited a bond for his not appearing, when she had him in the jail in Hart county, and the penitentiary is her great jail, convenient to Hart as to all the rest of the state." After Searcy's sentence he was in the custody of the state in a chain gang under the control of the state. As said by Judge Jackson, the state could have brought him out any day and tried him for the Houston county case. The act of the state in resuming custody of the principal, though perfectly lawful (to use the language of Chief Justice Jackson), put it out of the power of Cooper to maintain custody of Searcy, or to arrest him for the purpose of delivering him to the sheriff of Houston county in order to relieve his bail. When the state took the custody of Searcy as a convict, she assumed the risk of Searcy's escape. Nothing in the record places upon Cooper any responsibility for the escape, and as to that point the case is similar to the case of Smith v. Kitchens, supra. But, regardless of the escape, and even if Cooper had been implicated in it, while in that event he would have been subject to indictment, the obligation of the bond ceased and became functus officio when Searcy, Cooper's principal, entered upon his service in the chain gang. Cooper's liability, except as to the costs of the forfeiture, ceased. No act of the principal or of the surety thereafter could revive the bond. The case would have been different if, as in the West and Hartley Cases, Searcy had given bond and paid his fine in the Dooly county case.

The judge erred in making the judgment upon the bond absolute.

Judgment reversed.
